Summary

Twelfth Night is a story of love and confused identity. At the beginning of the play, after having survived a shipwreck, Viola (the play's protagonist) finds herself stranded in Illyria. She disguises herself as Cesario, a young man, and enters into the service of Duke Orsino.

Orsino is in love with the countess Olivia, but she does not return his affections. In order to woo Olivia, Orsino sends Cesario (who is actually Viola) to serve as his representative, but Olivia falls in love with Cesario instead. Meanwhile, Viola, in her service to Orsino, is drawn into close friendship with him and finds herself falling in love. Thus, the story of Twelfth Night revolves around this love triangle fueled by mistaken identities, by which Viola is in love with Orsino, who is in love with Olivia, who is in love with Cesario (who is actually Viola).

Viola's twin brother, Sebastian, is also traveling to Illyria with his friend Antonio. When they reach their destination, they separate. There is an additional subplot within Olivia's own household involving her uncle, Sir Toby Belch; her servant, Maria; her steward, Malvolio; and another would-be suitor to Olivia, Andrew Aguecheek. Entertaining themselves at the steward's expense, Maria leaves letters forged in Olivia's handwriting that lead Malvolio to assume that Olivia is in fact in love with him. Maria also advises him to present himself in such a manner that Olivia would find offensive. Malvolio finds these letters and falls for the deception.

Meanwhile, Olivia continues to be in love with Cesario, and Andrew notices her favor for Orsino's servant. Toby tries to push Andrew into fighting Cesario as a way to win Olivia's affections. However, Antonio stumbles upon the scene. Mistaking Viola for her twin brother, he comes to her defense, only to be arrested. Antonio looks toward the man he believes to be Sebastian for support—only to find, of course, that he does not know Antonio or anything about him. Antonio curses his friend as a betrayer as he is dragged away. Finally, the real Sebastian stumbles upon Olivia, who marries him, mistaking him for Cesario.

As the play comes to a close, this comedy of mistaken identities is resolved, with the full truth brought to light. Brother and sister are reunited, Viola reveals her true identity, and Orsino proposes marriage to Viola.

Summary: Introduction

Twelfth Night; or What You Will was composed by William Shakespeare in either 1600 or 1601 as the last of his three "mature comedies" (the other two being Much Ado About Nothing and As You Like It). Like his early comedies, The Comedy of Errors or The Taming of the Shrew for instance, Twelfth Night is essentially a celebration of romantic love and can be viewed as a traditional romantic comedy. The play has many of the elements common to Elizabethan romantic comedy, including the devices of mistaken identity, separated twins, and gender-crossing disguise, and its plot revolves around overcoming obstacles to "true" love. And, like other representatives of the genre, Twelfth Night also features a subplot in which a self-inflated "sour" or "blocking" character, the steward Malvolio, is brought to his knees through a trick orchestrated by a ribald if also self-inflated character in the person of Sir Toby Belch.

But unlike his early comedies, Shakespeare also strikes some discordant notes in Twelfth Night, including a conception of love and other themes that are not part of the conventional romantic comedy formula. Thus, for example, the subject of insanity surfaces as a salient theme and as a force within the plot. Indeed, while Twelfth Night concludes with tandem weddings, Shakespeare also speaks about the madness of love.
Synopsis of the Play

This is a play about love, placed in a festive atmosphere in which three couples are brought together happily. It opens with Orsino, the Duke of Illyria, expressing his deep love for the Countess Olivia. Meanwhile, the shipwrecked Viola disguises herself as a man and endeavors to enter the Duke’s service. Although she has rejected his suit, the Duke then employs Viola, who takes the name of Cesario, to woo Olivia for him. Ironically, Cesario falls in love with the Duke, and Olivia falls in love with Cesario, who is really Viola disguised.

In the midst of this love triangle are the servants of Olivia’s house and her Uncle Toby. The clown provides entertainment for the characters in both houses and speaks irreverently to them. He is the jester of the play. Maria, Olivia’s woman, desires to seek revenge on Malvolio, Olivia’s steward. To the delight of Sir Toby, Olivia’s uncle, and his friend Sir Andrew, Maria comes up with a plot to drop love letters supposedly written by Olivia in Malvolio’s path. When she does, they observe him, along with Fabian, another servant, as Malvolio falls for the bait. Believing that Olivia loves him, he makes a fool of himself.

The love plot moves along as Cesario goes to woo Olivia for the Duke. The second time that Cesario appears at Olivia’s home Olivia openly declares her love for Cesario. All along, Sir Andrew has been nursing a hope to win Olivia’s love. When he plans to give up on her, Sir Toby suggests that Sir Andrew fight with Cesario to impress Olivia. Cesario, however, refuses to fight.

In the meantime, Viola’s brother, who is also shipwrecked, makes his way to safe lodging in Illyria with Antonio the sea captain. After the fight between Cesario and Sir Andrew begins, Antonio intervenes to save Cesario, whom he takes for Sebastian. But the Duke’s officers promptly arrest Antonio for a past offense. Olivia later comes upon Sir Andrew and Sebastian wrangling at her house. Olivia, thinking Sebastian is Cesario, leads Sebastian to marriage in a nearby chapel.

The complications of identity are unraveled in the fifth act. Cesario finally reveals that he is Viola. Sebastian recognizes her as his sister. The Duke takes Viola up on her love offerings and proposes to her. Olivia assures Malvolio that she did not write the letter that so disturbed him. Sir Toby marries Maria in appreciation for her humiliating scheme.

Estimated Reading Time

You can read through Twelfth Night in about three and a half hours. But, when reading Shakespeare, you should plan to re-read at least one more time. When you read more carefully, paying attention to difficult words and Shakespeare’s exquisite use of language, your reading time will necessarily increase. Your more careful reading may take about six hours.

Summary

Viola and Sebastian, brother and sister twins who closely resemble each other, are separated when the ship on which they are passengers is wrecked during a great storm at sea. Each thinks that the other is dead and sets out alone with no hope of being reunited.

The lovely and charming Viola is cast upon the shores of Illyria, where she is befriended by a kind sea captain. They decide to dress Viola in men’s clothing and have her take service as a page in the household of young Duke Orsino. Dressed in man’s garb, Viola calls herself Cesario and becomes the duke’s personal attendant. Impressed by the youth’s good looks and pert but courtly speech, Orsino sends “him” as his envoy of love to woo the Countess Olivia, who is mourning the death of her young brother.
The wealthy Olivia lives in a splendid palace with her maid, Maria; her drunken old uncle, Sir Toby Belch; and her steward, Malvolio. Maria and Sir Toby are a happy-go-lucky pair who drink and carouse with Sir Andrew Aguecheek, an ancient nobleman who is much enamored of Olivia. In return for grog supplied by Sir Andrew, Sir Toby is supposed to press Sir Andrew’s suit with Olivia. Actually, however, Sir Toby never stays sober long enough to keep his part of the bargain. All these affairs are observed disapprovingly by Malvolio, Olivia’s ambitious, narrow-minded steward, who cannot tolerate jollity in those about him.

When Cesario arrives at the palace, Olivia is instantly attracted to the page—thinking her a man. She pays close attention to Orsino’s message, but it is not love for Orsino that causes her to listen so carefully. When Cesario leaves, she sends Malvolio after her with a ring. It is a shock for Viola, who hitherto enjoys playing the part of Cesario, to realize that Olivia fell in love with her in her male clothes.

Meanwhile, Maria, Sir Toby, and Sir Andrew decide to stop Malvolio’s constant prying into their affairs and devise a scheme whereby Malvolio will find a note, supposedly written by Olivia, in which she confesses her secret love for him and asks him to wear garish yellow stockings tied with cross garters and to smile continually in her presence. Overjoyed to receive this note, Malvolio soon appears in his strange dress, capering and bowing before the startled countess. Olivia decides that Malvolio lost his wits; to the amusement of the three conspirators, she has him confined to a dark room.

As the days pass, Viola falls in love with the duke, but the latter has eyes only for Olivia, with whom he presses his page to renew his suit. When Cesario delivers another message from Orsino to Olivia, the countess openly declares her love for the young page. Cesario insists, however, that his heart can never belong to any woman. So obvious are Olivia’s feelings for Cesario that Sir Andrew becomes jealous. Sir Toby and Maria insist that Sir Andrew’s only course is to fight a duel with the page. Sir Toby delivers Sir Andrew’s blustering challenge, which Cesario reluctantly accepts.

While these events unfold, Viola’s twin brother, Sebastian, is being rescued by another sea captain, named Antonio, and the two become close friends. When Sebastian decides to visit the court of Duke Orsino at Illyria, Antonio decides to accompany him, even though he fears that he might be arrested there because he once dueled with the duke. Upon arriving in Illyria, Antonio gives Sebastian his purse for safekeeping, and the two men separate for several hours.

While wandering about the city, Antonio chances upon the duel between Cesario and Sir Andrew. Mistaking the disguised page for her brother, Antonio immediately goes to the rescue of his supposed friend. When officers arrive on the scene, one of them recognizes Antonio and arrests him in the name of the duke. Thinking that Viola is Sebastian, Antonio asks her to return his purse and is surprised and hurt when she disclaims all knowledge of the captain’s money. As Antonio is dragged away, he shouts invectives at “Sebastian” for not returning his purse, thereby alerting Viola to the fact that her brother is still alive.

Meanwhile, the real Sebastian is being followed by Sir Andrew, who never dreamed that this young man is not the same Cesario with whom he just dueled. Prodded by Sir Toby and Maria, Sir Andrew engages Sebastian in a new duel and is promptly wounded, along with Sir Toby. Olivia then interferes and has Sebastian taken to her home, thinking that he is Cesario. After sending for a priest, she marries the surprised—but not unwilling—Sebastian.

As the officers escort Antonio past Olivia’s house, Orsino—accompanied by Cesario—appears at her gates. Orsino recognizes Antonio instantly and demands to know why the sailor returned to Illyria—a city filled with his enemies. Antonio explains that he rescued and befriended the duke’s present companion, Sebastian, and because of his deep friendship for the lad accompanied him to Illyria despite the danger his visit involves. Pointing to Cesario, he sorrowfully accuses the person he supposes to be Sebastian of violating their friendship by not returning his purse.
The duke is protesting against Antonio’s accusation when Olivia appears and salutes Cesario as her husband. Now the duke also begins to think his page ungrateful, especially since he told Cesario to press his own suit with Olivia. Just then Sir Andrew and Sir Toby arrive, looking for a doctor because Sebastian wounded them. Seeing Cesario, Sir Andrew begins to rail at him for his violence until Olivia dismisses the two old men. The real Sebastian then appears and apologizes for having wounded the old men.

Spying Antonio, Sebastian joyfully greets his friend. Antonio and the rest of the amazed group, unable to believe what they see, stare from Cesario to Sebastian. After Viola reveals her true identity and explains how she and her brother became separated, she and Sebastian greet each other warmly. Seeing that the page of whom he grew so fond is a woman, Duke Orsino declares that he will marry her.

After Malvolio is summoned, the plot against him is revealed. As he storms off, vowing revenge, the others begin celebrating the impending marriages of Viola and Orsino and of Sir Toby and Maria. Only Malvolio, unhappy in the happiness of others, remains peevish and disgruntled.
Act and Scene Summaries

Act and Scene Summaries: Act I, Scene 1 Summary and Analysis

New Characters:
Orsino: the Duke of Illyria, who is madly in love with Olivia
Curio: one of the Duke’s attendants
Valentine: another gentleman attending the Duke

Summary
The play opens at the Duke’s palace in Illyria. The Duke is lovesick, and so the first 15 lines express his powerful love for the Countess Olivia. He pours forth sweet words of passion for his love object.

He desires to have music feed his appetite for love. He feels at first that he can’t get enough of the energizing “food of love,” but abruptly urges the musicians to stop playing: “Enough, no more!”

Then, addressing the “spirit of love,” he characterizes it as so broad a force that nothing can outdo or overcome it. Love is very, very powerful.

After this outpouring, one of the Duke’s attendants, Curio, asks him if he plans to go hunting. But Orsino is in no mood for recreation; he is deeply in love. So his response is more than a mere “no.” He says that his desire for Olivia has stronger control over him than anything else.

Valentine, another attendant, enters with words that the Duke does want to listen to because they concern Olivia. Valentine informs the Duke of Olivia’s mourning. She is grieving the loss of her dead brother and plans to stay in mourning for a long time. So, for her, love is out!

This news frustrates the Duke. He realizes that he will not achieve the object of his desire—at least, not yet. He recognizes that Olivia is full of love, but is channeling it in another direction, away from him. Still, his lover’s hope does not lessen as long as he feels that love will awaken in Olivia.

Analysis
The first scene leads us instantly into the major theme of the play—love. Shakespeare, the skillful dramatist, wastes no time in developing it. In so doing, he uses poetic devices such as metaphor, simile, puns, and synesthesia to reveal the extraordinary nature of true love.

The poetry of the Duke’s opening speech clearly conveys the power of his love for Olivia:

If music be the food of love, play on,
Give me excess of it, that, surfeiting,
The appetite may sicken, and so die.

The Duke uses a physical metaphor of eating food to show how strong his experience of love is. He commands the musicians to overwhelm him with music, so that his lingering appetite for Olivia will die. He is totally wrapped up in his love for her.
Further on in the Duke’s opening speech, he directly addresses the “spirit of love,” using a falconry metaphor to indicate the depth of true love. One doesn’t have to be a hunter to appreciate the thought he tries to convey. Consider that the sky is such a broad and spacious area and that falcons can reach great heights while flying. The power of the poetry here rests in comparing the experience of love with the falcon reaching its highest point in flight. It’s a dizzying image. The bird reaches its highest point and then must come down to lower heights. Just as the falcon cannot outdistance the sky, so “nought” can overdo or overwhelm the power of love. All other forces and influences will “fall into abatement” if they try to overwhelm love.

The Duke has ample time to walk around his palace being in love, doing nothing else. This sense of stasis suggests that the Duke is illustrating true love in its intensity as it lasts. He is engaged in the process of loving; he has not entered into a relationship with Olivia or any other woman as yet.

Accordingly, it might be said that the Duke is “in love with love.” But his speeches in Scene i; while exalting the business of love, also demonstrate that he knows his love object to be Olivia, a real, breathing person, and he makes an effort to win her.

The title of the play, Twelfth Night, orients the reader toward another element in the play, namely, that of the playful and festive atmosphere of the action. The Twelfth Night of Christmas was an occasion for merriment when a “Lord of Misrule” was appointed to direct the festivities. It is interesting that Shakespeare associated this particular holiday with the theme of love. In the festival running through the play, love plays an important part as the characters meet and pair off. Plots and affairs of love are entertaining to be involved in. The meaning of the subtitle, “What You Will,” is not so apparent to the reader. It is spoken by Olivia at the end of Act I to Malvolio when she instructs him to get rid of Cesario, who’s come to woo her for the Duke. The casualness of the phrase reflects her loose attitude toward the Duke’s love. It points up the contrast between her feelings and those of the Duke. Feste, the Clown, will later emphasize this mundane level of love. It may also suggest a satire on the foibles of man.

Act and Scene Summaries: Act I, Scene 2 Summary and Analysis

New Characters:
Viola: the female of a twin brother–sister pair, who enters Illyria disguised as Cesario and finds love

A Sea Captain: a friend to Viola who comes ashore with her

Summary
The setting of this scene is appropriately away from the majestic atmosphere of the Duke’s palace. We meet Viola and a captain on a seacoast. Viola’s practical nature serves to complement the Duke’s romantic character.

Shipwrecked, Viola asks the Captain and sailors where she is. The Captain tells her that they are in a region called “Illyria.” Her brother, who had also been on the ship with her, is separated from them, which causes Viola to wonder if he has drowned. The Captain suggests that he may still be alive because he last saw him struggling to stay afloat.

The Captain was born and raised in Illyria, and he knows about the Duke’s courtship with Olivia. The Captain relates Olivia’s disinclination to accept Orsino’s pledge, as he has heard from gossip.

Upon hearing this, Viola is moved to serve Olivia. But the Captain tells her that that is impossible. Olivia has closed herself off to any new relationships while she deeply mourns the loss of her brother.
Viola quickly gets another idea. She decides to serve the Duke instead, as his eunuch. Since she is a woman, that plan will require a disguise: “Conceal me what I am.” This plan is very practical, for it utilizes a disguise. Viola claims to have a purpose in assuming a disguise, but, at this point, it is not clear exactly what she wants to achieve. She even says, “What else may hap, to time I will commit.”

Analysis

This scene shifts the thematic emphasis to a practical, commonsense aspect of love. In so doing, Shakespeare is implying that there’s more to love than mere poetry. It’s all right to put one’s loved one up on a pedestal, but it also becomes necessary to find a way to get her down and together with the wooer. Valentine, the Duke’s servant, had only gone to Olivia to report the Duke’s love for her and obtain a favorable reply. Viola represents a viable plan of action to bring the two together in love. Her offerings of money to the Captain, for example, symbolize this practical side to her character. Money is a tool and a means to an end. Viola is well aware that money represents a way to get people to do what she wants.

The disguise plan has been used a lot in Shakespeare’s plays. Here, as in Measure for Measure and As You Like It, a noble character puts on a mask in order to influence the behavior of other characters. Since Viola desires to serve the Duke, her goal may be to help make the love match a reality for him.

Relevant to her noble motivation is Viola’s stating of a significant Shakespearean theme, that is, appearances versus the reality underlying them. Shakespeare knew all too well that appearances can be deceiving. People seem other than what they are in order to deceive or hurt other people. Viola comments perceptively on the Captain’s true character. He is authentic and can be trusted. Her valuing of an authentic character implies that her own motivation is for the Duke’s benefit.

Viola repeats the music image of the first scene. True to her character as we’ve seen it thus far, she has in mind a specific practical use for music. She plans to “speak to him in many sorts of music.” Clearly, Viola wants to get on the Duke’s good side and help him. So, she will use music to do so. Notice the active/passive contrast of each character’s use of music. Whereas the Duke passively requests that his musicians play music so it will fill him to overflow, Viola contemplates the active use of music to get into the good graces of the Duke.

Act and Scene Summaries: Act I, Scene 3 Summary and Analysis

New Characters:
Sir Toby Belch: Olivia’s uncle, who drinks a lot

Maria: Olivia’s lady-in-waiting

Sir Andrew Aguecheek: Sir Toby’s friend, who thinks he is a potential suitor for Olivia

Summary

This scene is set in Olivia’s house, but we do not as yet meet Olivia. She is in extended mourning. Sir Toby, her uncle, opens with a question about Olivia. He is talking to Maria, Olivia’s lady-in-waiting, who responds with a complaint about Toby’s late carousing.

Maria refers to Sir Toby’s friend, Sir Andrew, as a fool. She heard that Sir Toby had brought him to the house to woo Olivia. Sir Toby, on the other hand, praises the many virtues his friend possesses. He is handsome, has a good income, and speaks several languages. Furthermore, they are drinking buddies.
When Sir Andrew enters, Sir Toby immediately urges him on Maria, “board her, woo her, assail her,” though Sir Andrew misunderstands him at first. As Sir Toby’s meaning dawns on him, he asserts that he wouldn’t do such a thing in Olivia’s house.

Before departing, Maria invites Sir Andrew for a drink. Sir Toby realizes that her invitation was made in a joking manner, and he engages Sir Andrew in a playful conversation. Sir Andrew talks of leaving, having lost hope of winning Olivia’s love. He believes the Count Orsino has a much better chance for her than he does. Nonetheless, Sir Toby reassures him that his chances are still good because Orsino is not the kind of man Olivia is looking for. This reassurance encourages Sir Andrew to stay a month longer.

So, continuing their conversation together, Sir Toby questions his friend’s dancing ability. Sir Andrew says that he’s quite a capable dancer. They then plan to go partying together.

Analysis
The characters of Maria and Sir Toby put us in touch with a lower class of people in Illyria; that is, they do not belong to the aristocracy as do Orsino and Olivia. This is a play for all kinds of people; love is for everyone. The disguise trick suggests this notion. It doesn’t matter what your financial or social status is in love because true love does not play favorites. That is why Sir Andrew and Malvolio can entertain hopes of winning Olivia’s love. Love is an experience that occurs between two human beings. A disguise can prove this statement because if you can conceal who or what you truly are, then it follows that it doesn’t matter what your real identity is. Love can blossom. All is fair in love.

A note of competition enters the play in this scene. Sir Toby believes Sir Andrew to be a proper suitor for his niece. Despite his praise, however, the scene leaves us with the impression that Sir Andrew may not be so appropriate. Maria, for one, knocks him. By suggesting Sir Andrew for Olivia—in the light of his iffy status—Shakespeare asserts the universality of his love theme.

Beyond that, these characters illustrate the party-and-fun atmosphere, as implied in the title’s holiday. They drink, dance, and flirt with the ladies, everything one would expect at a wild, exciting festival. There’s a lighthearted playfulness all through the play; Sir Toby and Andrew seem to keep the celebration going. Their roles may be to suggest that liveliness and fun should surround the process of falling in love.

Notice how Shakespeare uses the language to reveal Sir Toby’s free spirit. He parodies Maria’s use of the word “exception.” His repetition of the word “confine” with a new meaning is an instance of the figurative device called “ploce.” Maria uses it in the sense of “keep,” while Sir Toby switches to the sense of “dress.” There’s a sly defiance in this switch of senses that reflects his high-spirited nature. This example of “ploce” and others in this scene lend a sharp emphasis to the dialogue.

The scene ends with Sir Toby introducing a succession of “dance” images. This imagery both characterizes Sir Toby as the representative of partying that he is, and it strengthens the overall presence of a festival in Illyria.

Act and Scene Summaries: Act I, Scene 4 Summary and Analysis

Summary
We find Viola (now named “Cesario”) on her fourth day in the Duke’s palace, her disguise having gained her the access she wished. Valentine is amazed, in fact, at how much favor she has already gained with the Duke.
The Duke assigns Cesario the task of pursuing Olivia for him. He urges him to be aggressive: “Be clamorous and leap all civil bounds.” The Duke is confident that Cesario can effectively persuade Olivia to respond to his true passion. Cesario is doubtful.

Part of the Duke’s confidence owes to his intuition of Cesario’s real feminine qualities. He implies, in other words, that she can play the womanly matchmaker role well. He promises him a reward if he is successful in his undertaking.

Viola’s last lines allude to another plot strand in the play, her love for the Duke, which she cannot reveal because of her disguise.

Analysis
It is appropriate to consider a definition of the type of play (or “genre”) that Twelfth Night is. Twelfth Night belongs to a species of drama known as “comedy.” We expect the course of action in a comedy to be different from that in a tragedy. As M.H. Abrams puts it in A Glossary of Literary Terms:

> Romantic comedy, as developed by Shakespeare and some of his Elizabethan contemporaries, is concerned with a love affair that involves a beautiful and idealized heroine (sometimes disguised as a man); the course of this love does not run smooth, but overcomes all difficulties to end in a happy union.

Twelfth Night contains both of these elements and a lot more. The definition enlightens us about the ending; it will be a happy one. In comedy, love conquers all. Northrop Frye makes it clear that comedy is “community-oriented, its vision has a social significance. This vision calls for the establishing of society as we would like it.” (Frye, 286)

Recall, therefore, that up until the fourth scene, the Duke’s love is virtually the “talk of the town.” Not only does the Duke brim with lyrical expression of his love, but the other characters are also aware of his infatuation. This tight interweaving of the Orsino courtship strand develops the love theme quite nicely.

This scene offers an inkling as to a slight alteration in the Duke’s impassioned stance toward Olivia. Cesario’s brief stay has exerted a subtle influence on him. Orsino closes the scene with a display of common sense that moves him momentarily away from the love-filled garden he’s been in. He judges Cesario’s ability to perform the errand and offers him wealth if he succeeds.

Act and Scene Summaries: Act I, Scene 5 Summary and Analysis

New Characters:
Olivia: the countess with whom Orsino is in love and who rejects him
Clown: servant to Olivia who sings and provides entertainment Malvolio: steward to Olivia

Summary
This scene opens with Maria and the Clown engaged in conversation. Maria, wondering where the Clown has been, tells him that he’ll be punished for his absence unless he has good reason for it. This threat fails to scare the Clown, as he shows in his offhand replies.
The Clown is equally offhand with Olivia when she enters. He responds to her with insult, ironically calling her a “fool.” Although she tries to get rid of him, the Clown prevails on her to prove that she is the fool. To that end, he questions her about her mourning her brother’s death.

Unoffended, Olivia turns to her steward Malvolio for his opinion of the Clown. An exchange of insults follows her question. The Clown puts down Malvolio and Malvolio puts down the Clown. Malvolio considers the Clown a stupid, useless character. Olivia sides with the Clown, even calling Malvolio an “egotist,” because the Clown is only playing his role as “fool” properly.

Maria announces Cesario’s arrival. Olivia is not in the mood to listen to a suit from the Duke. Malvolio returns to Olivia to tell her that Cesario stubbornly refuses to leave until Olivia will speak with him. Olivia wonders what kind of man he is. She allows him to enter and puts on a veil.

Cesario begins by showering lover’s compliments on Olivia. Cesario makes a point of the fact that her suit is memorized. Everything he will say has been rehearsed beforehand.

Shortly after starting his speech of love, Cesario requests to see Olivia’s face. Olivia complies and is met with praise for her “beauty truly blent.” Cesario further affirms the Duke’s passion for Olivia, expressing a hope that Olivia will reciprocate the Duke’s love.

Unfortunately for the Duke, Olivia has no desire to love him. Cesario does not quite believe her rejection of Orsino. He can do little more than express a hope that Olivia will return the Duke’s love, before he exits.

Olivia then reveals that she has been taken with the youth. His charms have worked their subtle ways on Olivia’s eyes. So, she sends Malvolio after him with a token of her newfound affection, a ring. Her final words intimate some confusion about what is happening to her.

Analysis

The original love connection of the Duke admiring Olivia has gone awry by the end of this scene. We witness two twists: Viola states her attraction to Orsino, and Olivia reveals a liking for Cesario. These two twists suggest that, for Shakespeare, love is truly a subjective experience. When a person sees a potential sweetheart and falls in love, he or she feels it in his or her own heart and mind. One cannot be forced to love another by the sheer strength of the other’s attraction, as the Duke’s suit might imply.

Another way that Shakespeare emphasizes the subjective nature of love is through the Clown’s speech. The Clown stands in counterpoint to the Duke in respect to his attitude toward Olivia. The smitten Duke utters his passionate feeling for Olivia, but the Clown’s insults are couched in a jarringly logical manner. The former exalts Olivia; the latter belittles her. The Clown insists on proving Olivia a “fool.” This slighting of Olivia reveals her to be a real person rather than the idealized goddess that the Duke opens the play with.

Shakespeare’s plays have fools and clowns in them, whose speech very often has relevance to the action. The most famous example is Lear’s fool, who utters profound commentary on Lear’s plight. The Clown’s role in Twelfth Night is a bit more subtle. As noted, the Clown’s self-conscious reference to words and logic provide an indirect commentary on the Duke’s love.

In an obvious way, the Clown is the clown of the party in the play. His wordplay and attitude toward Olivia demonstrate that he’s enjoying the amusement that is found in a festive atmosphere. In keeping with the fun-filled atmosphere, Sir Toby makes a drunken entrance to comment briefly on Cesario’s arrival.

Cesario’s prepared speech for Olivia, on Orsino’s behalf, contains an extended theological metaphor, which Olivia picks up on and carries forward. Cesario contends that he has a sacred message for Olivia. The loftiness of the theological metaphor reflects the great value placed on Orsino’s suit. His love is sacred; Olivia is his goddess. A special bond is thus formed between Cesario and Olivia in view of the way Olivia responds to the theological language of his speech. Perhaps she is valuing the speaker more than the speech.

Cesario finishes his effort to persuade Olivia with speech that has not been studied. He includes hyperbole to emphasize the Duke’s passion. (I. 256) Cesario earnestly believes that Olivia should return the Duke’s offer of love. He regards her closed-mindedness as cruel.

Act and Scene Summaries: Act II, Scene 1 Summary and Analysis

New Characters:
Antonio: a sea captain, friend to Sebastian, who wishes to serve him

Sebastian: Viola’s twin brother, who survives the shipwreck and initially believes Viola has drowned

Summary
This short scene serves the purpose of letting us know that Sebastian, Viola’s twin brother, has reached the shores of Illyria. We need this information to prepare our understanding of later scenes.

Sebastian tells us a little about himself, thus informing us that he has a twin sister. He thinks that she drowned while he managed to gain safety.

He wishes to separate from Antonio and wander about the area. But shortly afterward, he contradicts himself in this intention by stating that he, specifically, wants to go to “the Count Orsino’s court.” Although Antonio offers to serve Sebastian, he cannot go immediately with him to Orsino’s court because he has “many enemies” there. Yet, we will learn that Antonio’s affection for Sebastian is strong enough to prompt him to follow after him eventually.

Analysis
Notice the very straightforward and formal manner in which these men talk to one another. Since this scene serves an informative purpose, the formal dialogue is most appropriate. There is very little poetry in this scene. They are not expressing their love for a woman as Orsino was doing in the first scene. The dialogue serves up numerous indications that its purpose here is just to inform. Antonio starts the dialogue with a straightforward yes-or-no question: “Will you stay no longer?” Sebastian gives his answer. Then Antonio makes a request whose very words explicitly suggest that this scene is providing the audience with information: “Let me know of you whither you are bound.” Finally, Sebastian states background information in his next speech.

The contrast between the formal prose of this scene and the poetry of the love speeches should teach us about Shakespeare’s use of language. Poetry expresses feeling, often strong feeling, so using it to reveal the depth of one’s love is a fine touch. Prose aims to inform and enlighten us about a particular subject or issue, and it is often, though not always, free of the embellishments and imagination of poetry.

The use of shipwrecked twins in a romantic plot, such as in Twelfth Night, is not an idea original to Shakespeare. As with most of his plays, he used source materials to inspire him with characters and plots.
L.G. Salingar enlightens us as to the way in which Shakespeare manipulated his sources:

> There are four essential characters to Gi’Ingannati [a Sienese comedy], Bandello [story], Riche [story], and Shakespeare; namely, a lover, a heroine in his service disguised as a page, her twin brother (who at first has disappeared), and a second heroine. The basic elements common to all four plots are: the heroine’s secret love for her master; her employment as go-between, leading to the complication of a cross-wooing; and a final solution by means of the unforeseen arrival of the missing twin.

Even Shakespeare’s mastery required original source materials on which to work.

Act and Scene Summaries: Act II, Scene 2 Summary and Analysis

Summary
Malvolio catches up with Cesario to give him the ring from Olivia. Naturally, he is surprised inasmuch as he knows he did not leave a ring. Malvolio also repeats Olivia’s desire not to have any further dealings with Orsino. Before leaving, Malvolio puts the ring on the ground.

Left alone on stage, Cesario utters a soliloquy in which he expresses his confusion over the ring. He now realizes that Olivia has fallen in love with him. “She loves me sure,” he asserts. He acknowledges that the disguise must be responsible for stirring up her love. He finishes up the soliloquy wondering how this mistaken love on his part and frustrated love on his master’s part will be resolved. As matters currently stand, there is a mess for all the lovers involved. Time will bring in the solutions.

Analysis
It is useful to understand the function of a soliloquy in drama. Sometimes a playwright cannot include important information about character or plot in the dialogue, so a soliloquy may become necessary.

Soliloquy is the act of talking to oneself, silently or aloud. In drama it denotes the convention by which a character, alone on the stage, utters his thoughts aloud; the playwright uses this device as a convenient way to convey directly to the audience information about a character’s motives, intentions, and state of mind, as well as for purposes of general exposition. (Abrams, 180)

In this scene, Cesario certainly makes an important commentary about the love situation while alone on stage. A soliloquy like the one he utters is true to the character of Cesario we’ve seen so far.

His words continue to reflect his role as representative of the practical, commonsense aspect of love in this play. He very logically takes account of Olivia and Orsino’s feelings. True, he may be capable of such intense feelings for another person, but he realizes that people have to get along in the real world each day, too. This play gives us the feeling that the depiction of love would somehow be incomplete if it emphasized just the romance and passion of Orsino and Olivia’s feelings. Love can still see the beloved as an ordinary human being.

Critics have argued over how to interpret Malvolio. The issue relates to Malvolio’s character and the significance of the comic plot centered on him. Consider how dutiful and nonchalant he appears in this scene. He brings the ring, delivers Olivia’s message, and takes off. We can start to form our opinion of his character.

In his soliloquy, Cesario repeats the motif of “appearances versus reality.” Every instance of a motif should enhance our understanding of the playwright’s views on that particular subject.

Disguise, I see thou art a wickedness
Wherein the pregnant enemy does much.
How easy is it for the proper false
In women’s waxen hearts to set their forms!

These lines express his concern that appearances are deceiving. In this context, Olivia has fallen in love with Cesario’s outer masculinity, which causes him to realize that a mask can lead someone into love, regardless of the true character of the person beneath it. It is not Cesario’s intention, however, to seduce Olivia.

Summary
In case we’d forgotten about the merriment of the play, this scene puts us back in Olivia’s house and opens with the leader of the party, Sir Toby. If we follow the love plot of the previous scene, we are then led astray by what these two men say. They begin by talking about going to bed early. Sir Toby says that going to bed after midnight is equal to going to bed early. Toby calls for some wine to have with their food.

When Feste the Clown enters, Andrew compliments his singing voice and his skill displayed in entertainment the previous night: “Why, this is best fooling, when all is done.” Then, continuing in this vein, Sir Toby calls for another frequently used element in Shakespeare’s plays—a song. Feste suggests either a love song or a song with a moral. Naturally, a love song is apropos. The Clown sings a song that recalls the Duke’s elevated emotion of the first scene; he also defines “love.” Very pleased with the Clown’s song, they engage him in some more singing.

Nevertheless, Maria enters and chides them for their nonsense. Sir Toby banters with her, as is appropriate to his role as “lord of misrule,” (to use the holiday expression). Malvolio’s questions refer to their purpose as the merrymakers in the play. His question, “Do ye make an alehouse of my lady’s house?”, best points up the intersection of the holiday atmosphere and the love theme, which constitutes the play’s peculiar blend. Malvolio seriously restates his lady’s displeasure with Sir Toby’s revels. What follows, to Malvolio’s chagrin, is more singing and wine-drinking. Malvolio departs with an insult from Maria.

It is at this point that the comic plot is hatched. Maria reveals that she wants revenge on Malvolio, and Sir Toby and Andrew go right along with her scheme. Maria believes that she is wreaking revenge on Malvolio’s Puritan character. Maria explains the plot: it involves dropping letters in Malvolio’s way, supposedly written by Olivia (in her own hand), which will lead him to believe that Olivia is professing her love to him. They are to delight in the spectacle.

Analysis
This scene is a good illustration of what L.G. Salingar (quoting Enid Welsford) characterizes as Shakepeare’s transmuting “into poetry the quintessence of the Saturnalia.” There is plenty of wine and singing running through a scene that also gives us the springboard for Malvolio’s pending humiliation. To clarify this important element of the play, Salingar further adds, “The sub-plot shows a prolonged season of misrule, or ‘uncivil rule,’ in Olivia’s household, with Sir Toby turning night into day; there are drinking, dancing, and singing,…and the gulling of an unpopular member of the household.” So, by this point, the significance of the title should be quite clear.

It is noteworthy how appropriate the song from Feste the Clown is, for it defines love. This is a play that illustrates the theme of love, showing a particular vision of the love experience. The song is divided into two halves: the first half resembles the outpourings that we’ve already read from the Duke. It expresses praise and longing for the love object. The second half embodies the theme, “What is love?” The definition emphasizes the intensity of feeling such as the Duke has shown. Thus it has little relevance to Cesario’s role in the play.
There is a double-faceted nature to love. (Some may even see or feel more facets.) Willard Gaylin puts it this way in his Rediscovering Love:

> Obviously loving and being loved can and should coexist in one relationship—there is no real conflict between the two. One may so dominate the psychological needs of an individual as to exclude the other [as we clearly see with Orsino], but they have a natural compatibility.

(Gaylin, 108)

In the opening scene, the Duke has no relationship with Olivia as he utters his love. Cesario enters his service to engender a loving relationship for him.

As for the controversy surrounding Malvolio, there is no reason to expect that he take part in the revelling. So, Maria’s criticism of his being too straitlaced doesn’t hold a lot of water. He performs his service earnestly and dutifully for his lady. We ought to ponder whether revenge is a fitting motive for the deception to follow. Some readers might conclude that Maria and Sir Toby resent Malvolio because he appears moralistic and judgmental.

Summary

In this scene, we are back at the Duke’s palace. Once again, the Duke wants to hear some music, the food for his love. He calls for the Clown, who happens not to be there at the moment. While waiting for the Clown to be located, he speaks with Cesario.

The Duke affirms his true love. He continues to be the passionate lover who yearns for his beloved. His emotions, as a lover, are topsy-turvy.

The Duke surmises that Cesario had once also been in love, as he currently is. He answers “yes” that she was of the same age and temperament as the Duke. He responds with his belief that the woman should be the younger of the pair, so as to ensure that the love remain robust.

The Clown returns and Orsino is eager for a love song, a song that deals with the innocence of love, such as he is experiencing. The emphasis in the Clown’s song is prophetic. It focuses on the Duke’s frustration with and failure to obtain Olivia, his heart’s desire. The lover in the song is “slain by a fair cruel maid.” In short, it’s a song of unrequited love.

Interestingly, in spite of the Duke’s praise for this song, the Clown insults Orsino in a manner similar to the way he insulted Olivia in Act I. The Clown suggests that he lacks consistency and direction, though the logical form of his expression is not so apparent as in his insult to Olivia.

The Duke sends Cesario to Olivia to woo her for him. Cesario warns him that Olivia is not open to romance with him. Cesario asks the Duke if he would love a woman just because she had an intense attraction to him. The Duke does not think that that is a valid comparison, suggesting that a man’s love is more powerful. Cesario disagrees with the Duke’s proposition. Women are capable of very strong love attachments. Cesario, in fact, refers to his father’s daughter as an example.

Analysis

The Duke wants to hear some music. This is the same request he makes at the start of Act I. This suggests that his love is still strong. The frustration has failed to extinguish the fire in his heart. Again, he is in the passive role of wanting the music to work on his feelings. His request for Feste to sing again should also remind us of the festive spirit.

As the Duke speaks to Cesario, we find him in the same infatuated frame of mind as in previous scenes. Shakespeare thus illustrates the love theme. The Duke is in the state of “loving” (in Gaylin’s terms). He is not yet in the condition that Cesario perhaps represents.

Cesario presents more evidence that he is in touch with the reality of the situation. After the Duke requests that he go to Olivia to sue, Cesario counters with an eye-opening question: “But if she cannot love you, sir?” Not only does the Duke’s answer suggest that his love continues intense, but it also demonstrates that love has a will of its own that may run at variance with reality. “No” is not a viable answer for him. In this way, Cesario is trying to reason with Orsino. Just because he is in love with Olivia, it doesn’t follow that Olivia will fall in love with him.

The song Feste sings is prophetic, so it relates to the theme in a forward-looking manner. It expresses the death of love, which, in view of the Duke’s confidence, may astonish the reader. The Duke feels that Olivia should reciprocate his love. But there’s a song that tells of a “fair, cruel maid,” who is obviously Olivia, who has killed her wooer. Cesario has already referred to Olivia as “fair cruelty.” Olivia never accepts the love of Orsino. To the passionate lover, such rejection is tantamount to murder. So intense are the rejected lover’s feelings that he desires to be buried in a grave. This intensity is fitting for Orsino, who has already expressed such passionate feelings for his beloved.

Act and Scene Summaries: Act II, Scene 5 Summary and Analysis

New Character:
Fabian: the servant to Olivia who is the third spectator to Malvolio’s humiliation

Summary
This scene is devoted exclusively to the devious comic plot. Sir Toby gathers Fabian, another servant, and Andrew to enjoy the exercise in shame that Maria is about to execute. Fabian seems to have a bone to pick with him, so he is interested in what will happen to Malvolio.

Maria has the whole trick worked out. They will hide in a box tree and observe as Malvolio picks up the falsified letter to read it. Olivia is on Malvolio’s mind when he enters. Sir Toby and Fabian believe that Malvolio’s arrogance makes him suitable game for the trap that’s been set. Malvolio fancies himself a suitor to Olivia.

Speaking aloud, Malvolio continues to let his imagination run wild over the prospect of loving Olivia and the accompanying self-aggrandizement. While doing so, Sir Toby, Fabian, and Andrew devilishly comment on his behavior. That they are sadistic in intention is evident in such remarks as “Pistol him, pistol him” and “O for a stonebow, to hit him in the eye.”

Eventually Malvolio sees the letter, which appears to him to be in Olivia’s handwriting. Though it is a love letter, it doesn’t completely mention Malvolio by name. Malvolio takes the declaration of love to be addressed to him because it identifies the beloved as “M,O,A,I,” four letters that can be found in Malvolio’s name. Furthermore, the phrase “I may command where I adore” leads him to believe that he is the man because he is her servant.
The letter goes on to suggest that fortune is now smiling on Malvolio. The letter also induces him to adopt peculiar behaviors. He is to be hostile with a kinsman, smile in Olivia’s presence, study political treatises for advice, and wear yellow stockings and cross-garters. Malvolio, convinced of the letter’s authenticity, resolves to follow all of its suggestions.

Sir Toby foreshadows his subsequent marriage to Maria in this scene. He is so intrigued by her skill in the trap that he cannot help feeling love for her: “I could marry this wench for this device.”

As yet, Malvolio has not humiliated himself before Olivia. The scheme will come to fruition when Malvolio confronts Olivia with smiles and yellow stockings, cross-gartered. So, for this devilish group, the best is yet to come.

Analysis

“Whether Malvolio has been most notoriously abused, or whether he is the well-deserving victim of a practical joke that explodes his vanity, social-climbing, and pretentiousness is the point at issue,” says Maurice Charney. Until the device of Maria’s letter, the play does not firmly emphasize Malvolio’s vanity and social-climbing. As has been shown, he properly carries out his duty for Olivia. Only through what other characters say of him may we feel justified in labeling him an “overweening rogue,” as Sir Toby does. His behavior, though, is quite proper.

What we should come to terms with is the relationship of this comic plot to the other plot. What it has in common, of course, is the theme of love. Malvolio is duped into believing that Olivia loves him, and he falls in love. This “symbolist drama,” as Ralph Berry terms it, becomes a perversion of Orsino’s love for Olivia. Malvolio may be likened to the Duke in the way that the letter ignites his passion for her. The letter, as a practical means of expression, reminds us of Cesario’s position in the total rendering of the love theme. But, since the letter is a trick, Malvolio’s love is a parody of the feelings and behavior of the Duke and Cesario. Olivia does not, nor will she, love Malvolio.

Perhaps the most glaring instance of perverseness is in the endings of the plots. Comedy prescribes a happy ending for the lovers in the romantic plot. Maria’s contrived plot only issues forth a cruel outcome for Malvolio. The letter contains no truth. Malvolio will go mad.

This scheme is too cruel to be characterized as a bit of sport in keeping with the festive atmosphere. The desire for revenge that Sir Toby and Maria reveal undermines the acceptability of such as “jest,” as Sir Toby euphemistically calls it. Malvolio is alienated from the rest of the household, and the way in which its members so handily trap him, “the woodcock near the gin,” emphasizes his alienation. From the moment Malvolio enters, he is unaware of the others in the box tree. His lines are interspersed with the reactions of the spectators, with neither side being able to hear the other. This gives us a physical representation of the psychological phenomenon of “alienation.” The spectators enjoy the device on Malvolio at the expense of his pride and feelings.

It is evident why this plot element in the play has been puzzling to critics.

The spectators to the trick associate animal imagery with Malvolio throughout this scene. This imagery lays emphasis on both his alienation from them as human beings and their view of him as an egotistical fool. Sir Toby’s first question to Fabian refers to Malvolio as a “sheep-biter,” that is, sneaky dog. To Maria, he is the “trout that must be caught with tickling.” For Fabian, he is alternately a “rare turkey cock” and a “woodcock near the gin.” Sir Toby also uses a bird image after Malvolio has begun reading the letter. As these characters delight in the cruel scheme, they feel that they have Malvolio right where they want him. Reducing Malvolio in their eyes to animal status sharply conveys that feeling. Animals lack reason, so they are wrapped up in their own little worlds to the extent that they operate by instincts. Sir Toby, Fabian, Andrew, and Maria are presumably drawing a parallel between the animals’ instinctual selfishness and Malvolio’s egoism.

Act and Scene Summaries: Act III, Scene 1 Summary and Analysis

Summary
Cesario and Feste the Clown are conversing in Olivia’s garden. Cesario, of course, has arrived with the purpose of courting Olivia. Cesario begins by asking the Clown if he earns a living with his tabor. In addition to engaging Cesario in wordplay, the Clown comments on the arbitrariness of words. People can do whatever they like with them regardless of good or bad intentions. Cesario briefly turns the conversation to identifying the fool. Feste, as usual, cannot give her a straight answer. He answers ironically that Olivia has no fool until she marries the man who will accept the role. In a short span, the Clown mentions a beard for Cesario, coins earning interest, and the love story of Troilus and Cressida. The Clown then goes to fetch Olivia. While awaiting Olivia, Cesario praises Feste’s skillfulness at being a fool.

Sir Toby and Andrew arrive before Olivia. Sir Toby informs Cesario that Olivia is eager to see him. Paradoxically, Cesario asserts that he is Olivia’s servant as well as Orsino’s because the Duke has put himself at Olivia’s service. His servant therefore is also hers. Olivia insists that she does not want to hear anymore wooing. Orsino is out.

Olivia, recalling the ring, broaches the subject of love toward Cesario. Cesario, rather than accept her love, says that he feels pity for Olivia. Cesario faithfully suggests the Duke’s love again only to hear Olivia pour out her feelings of love for him: “I love thee so that, maugre all thy pride,/Nor wit nor reason can my passion hide.” Cesario does not wish to form a relationship with Olivia or any woman.

Analysis
We are meant to note a kind of kinship between Feste and Cesario. Shakespeare establishes this kinship by means of the ploce in the opening dialogue. For example, when Cesario says that those who manipulate words can make them “wanton,” meaning equivocal, Feste picks up on another sense of “wanton,” that is, unchaste, in his response. They have used the same word but in different senses. To play on someone else’s words shows an interconnection between the two characters’ ways of thinking. Cesario appreciates the Clown and even pays him for acting his role as fool.

The Clown of this play is a wordsmith and logician, in addition to being a good singer of the thematic songs. It behooves us to question the Clown’s self-conscious commentary about words and their logic. He even refers to himself as not the fool, but rather Olivia’s “corrupter of words.” In essence, the Clown indicates his understanding of the arbitrariness of words: “Words are grown so false I am loath to/prove reason with them.” There is no necessary and sufficient relationship between words and the reality to which they refer. Therefore, people can so manipulate words to do and say what they want, whether or not the words are true to the reality of the situation. Keeping in mind Cesario’s connection with the motif of “appearances versus reality,” his appreciation for the Clown’s sensitivity to that issue is readily understandable. This scene sketches the Clown/fool’s role in the play. For the characters in the play, this role of fool has entertainment value, and for the readers, his words have relevance to the play’s interpretation.

In his short soliloquy following the Clown’s departure, Cesario reveals his appreciation for the skill Feste exercises: “And to do that well craves a kind of wit.” If Cesario can appreciate this skill, he is certainly capable of exercising it himself. The Clown is attuned to the mood and quality of people with whom he practices his fooling. Although we can assert that the Clown is very talented in his use of words, the truth value of what he says about others is not so clear.
Cesario, who represents practical common sense for the lovers, is everywhere a most admirable character. He makes a diligent effort to woo on Orsino’s behalf. Another way that Shakespeare demonstrates his good communication skills is in the way he uses the same metaphors as other characters. When Sir Toby uses a trade metaphor, “trade be to,” to characterize Cesario’s presence in the garden, Cesario responds with another expression drawn from the language of trade, “I am bound to your niece.” Cesario understands and can get along with all the characters in the play.

Olivia discloses her love for Cesario in this scene. The fundamental irony is that Cesario is there on the Duke’s behalf, but Olivia expresses love for Cesario. This creates a complication in the original plot. Not only has Olivia not reciprocated her love to Orsino, but she’s also bestowed it on Cesario. At this point, although we should expect a happy resolution to this entanglement, the issue of who-joins-who is not clear in this scene. Olivia, in declaring her love, is in the state of “loving”: Cesario does not accept her offer.

The one clue we have that Cesario cannot wind up with Olivia is the knowledge of his true gender. Cesario is really a woman, so he must be paired with a male. At this point, we can surmise that Cesario will form a relationship with Orsino, the man for whom his female self has already expressed an attraction. Herschel Baker argues that the delay in the happy ending derives from the characters’ inability to know the truth about themselves. This brings in the issue of “self-knowledge.” Not everyone knows who they are, what they believe, or what they really want out of life. Thus, Cesario’s disguise represents any such intellectual and emotional confusion of the other characters in concrete terms. It is only when he unmaskes at the end and the misconception is cleared up that they can feel a sense of liberation from their illusions. Self-knowledge is attained, according to this view. This view changes Cesario’s place in the love theme.

Taking the plunge into the experience of love, as Orsino and Olivia amply demonstrate, appears easy enough. The important related step of cementing a bond between the two persons is not so easy. Understanding this truism makes Cesario an appealing and curious character in the play.

Summary
Sir Andrew is disappointed that Olivia has not shown an interest in him. He has seen her giving more attention to Cesario than to him. Fabian claims that Olivia was deliberately trying to exasperate Andrew so as to spur him to more aggressive action. Andrew should have seized the moment to prove his masculinity: “You should have banged the youth into dumbness.” Having failed to act has put Andrew way out of Olivia’s thoughts, unless he can act quickly to arouse her admiration with his valor. Andrew agrees.

Sir Toby’s idea for Andrew to achieve Olivia’s love is to challenge Cesario to a fight. A fight will kindle her admiration. Sir Toby tells Andrew to write out a provocative challenge—“Let there be gall enough in thy ink”—to Cesario. Despite this incitement, Sir Toby says he will not actually deliver the letter to the youth.

Sir Toby espies Maria with a term of affection. Maria informs them how hilarious Malvolio’s deception has turned out. He has obeyed every point of the letter. She manifests her sadistic pleasure in the way he is so taken over by the letter.

Analysis
Sir Toby plays his role as “lord of misrule” in this scene as well as in others. No sooner has Sir Andrew conveyed his frustration at winning Olivia’s hand than does Toby devise a hostile plan to get her attention. It might be more proper to designate someone to court Olivia, as Cesario has done for Orsino, but, he instead tells Sir Andrew to write an inflammatory letter to Cesario, a letter Sir Toby does not intend to pass on. Sir Toby keeps the action lively, stirring up a fracas that has love as its dubious impetus.

Sir Toby’s plan reveals, moreover, underlying masculine values. First of all, he proposes a fight, which is often considered a manly activity. Secondly, he and Fabian place a great value on “valor” as a stimulus to love. This statement of belief in valor as a “lovebroker” for Sir Andrew is more evidence of the breadth of the love theme. Love is very subjective. People may love another for varied reasons and in varying intensities. In Sir Toby’s masculine world, the reputation of valor may lead a woman into love.

Maria comes in to report that her scheme is reaching its high point. She deems it odd that Malvolio has so naively accepted the contents of the letter to the point of following every item. She mentions the confrontation with Olivia that is about to take place. However perverse it may be, Malvolio’s embarrassing descent into love is also indicative of the subjective nature of the experience of love. It’s puzzling, however, why Malvolio was so ripe to fall for his lady—unless the reader accepts the argument that Malvolio is egotistical and arrogant.

Summary
This short scene lets us know that Sebastian and Antonio are making their way into the action; they have not been left out. Antonio explains to a grateful Sebastian that both love and concern for his safety urged him to catch up to the youth. Antonio knows the area; Sebastian does not.

Sebastian desires to do some sightseeing in town, to see the “memorials and the things of fame,” but Antonio has to back out. Antonio is wanted by Orsino’s court for his part in a previous incident at sea. Sebastian reckons that perhaps he has murdered. Not so; Antonio says he is only guilty of piracy.

Antonio gives his money to Sebastian in case he wishes to purchase something, while Antonio lays low. He also recommends an inn where they can meet (the Elephant). They agree to find each other there.

Analysis
This scene does advance the plot even though there is no mention of either character’s being in love. Sebastian is Viola’s twin brother. As far as the love theme is concerned, we can predict—since a theme should be coherently worked out—that just as Viola has a place in the love plot, so too will Sebastian. He is a missing link. Olivia, Orsino, and Cesario expressing love make an uneven number. One more is needed to make two couples. These two couples, as they will eventually turn out to be, constitute two of the three love knots that are realized by the end of the play. Malvolio’s love comes to naught, however, and Sir Andrew never gets Olivia.

We have had plenty of exposure to Olivia, Orsino, and Cesario’s brand of loving and being loved in the play. So, Shakespeare need not belabor the role that Cesario has represented as the practical, commonsense-oriented person in the relationship. It’s the Cesarios that keep the relationship going from day to day. The family tie that exists between Viola and Sebastian also implies a thematic parallel between the two characters. Shakespeare’s economy had no need to dramatize Sebastian’s practicality.

Antonio is familiar with the Duke and his Illyria. He, unfortunately, has had a run-in with the Duke’s men in the past, so he feels it necessary to hide his presence. Shakespeare keeps him involved in the plot in such a way that will call attention to the illusion created by Viola’s disguise. Later on, Antonio will take Cesario for Sebastian.
Act and Scene Summaries: Act III, Scene 4 Summary and Analysis

New Characters:
Servant: the one who informs Olivia of Cesario’s return
First Officer: one of the Duke’s officials who comes to arrest Antonio Second Officer: accompanies the First Officer to carry out the arrest

Summary
Olivia, longing for Cesario and out of sorts, wonders where Malvolio is. Here, she commends his nature as agreeable to her. Maria alerts her to his agitated state: “He is sure possessed.” In accordance with the letter, Malvolio is smiling about the place. Nonetheless, Olivia wants to see him because she feels as disturbed as he.

Malvolio speaks to Olivia as though she knew about the letter. His smiling doesn’t fit the mood Olivia is in. After Malvolio refers to his cross-gartering, Olivia asks if there is something wrong. Malvolio only mentions the commands of the letter to explain his behavior. For the rest of the dialogue between them, Malvolio quotes directly from Maria’s letter, while Olivia intersperses her bewildered replies. Having been subjected to this unaccountable behavior, Olivia considers Malvolio to be mad: “Why, this is very midsummer madness.” At this point, a servant enters with news that Cesario has come.

In his soliloquy, Malvolio sounds convinced that Olivia is following the letter. So, her bewilderment was lost on him as he raved on. He thanks Jove for the divine assistance he’s been given.

Sir Toby, along with Fabian and Maria, comes to investigate Malvolio’s behavior. Malvolio assumes the hostility toward him that the letter commands, not listening to the mock sympathy Sir Toby demonstrates. Fabian and Maria’s similarly mock sympathy must be false because they know he’s still under the influence of the letter. When Malvolio leaves, the culprits reflect on Malvolio’s absorption by the letter. Sir Toby foreshadows at Malvolio’s madness and ordeal in the dark room.

Sir Andrew enters with his letter of challenge. Fabian compliments the phrasing of the letter, containing a challenge to a fight, as Sir Toby reads it aloud. Sir Andrew is then egged on to draw on Cesario in the orchard. Claiming that Sir Andrew’s letter will not ring true for Cesario, Sir Toby chooses to convey the challenge by word of mouth in order to “drive the gentleman…into a most hideous opinion of his rage, skill, fury, and impetuosity.”

Following this, there is a brief interlude involving Olivia and Cesario. Olivia complains that her protestations of love are falling on deaf ears. Part of her thinks that it is blameworthy to be so bold, but another part of her holds that love gives her the freedom to speak her love. Cesario likens Olivia’s passion to Orsino’s. Giving Cesario a jewel, Olivia asks him to return tomorrow. Olivia, conscious of her honor, wonders what it will inspire her to give Cesario. Cesario wants nothing but her return of love to the Duke. That is not possible for Olivia because she’s given her love to Cesario. Olivia repeats her request for Cesario to come tomorrow.

When Olivia departs, Sir Toby alarmed Cesario with the news that Sir Andrew is preparing to attack him. He urges Cesario to prepare to defend himself. Innocently Cesario cannot believe that he’s done offense to anyone. Sir Toby counters that he has given cause for a fight. Sir Toby further tries to frighten Cesario with Sir Andrew’s strength and prowess. Sir Toby conjures an image of Sir Andrew as a valiant and well-connected knight who has three deaths in dueling to his credit. Cesario refuses to fight, it’s not his way. So he seeks an escort from Lady Olivia.
Cesario surmises that Sir Andrew is only trying to test his valor. But Sir Toby explains that he has just cause. Cesario therefore must face the challenge. At Cesario’s request, Sir Toby leaves to get Sir Andrew so he can tell him what offense Cesario has done. Fabian only admits to knowing that Sir Andrew is incensed against him. Fabian echoes Sir Toby’s spurious praise of Sir Andrew’s skill and power.

When Sir Toby finds Andrew, he scares him with an equally spurious account of Cesario’s skill at fencing. Likewise, Andrew decides to avoid the duel, even offering his horse as a peace offering. Sir Toby supposedly rides off to make the proposal to Cesario. Cesario and Andrew are holding images of each other’s hostility.

As these two men finally come together, Sir Toby alters the situation by claiming the cause not to be as grave as it was first thought to be. But, as a formality, they should have a duel. Sir Toby assures both of them that harm will not come of it.

After they draw, Antonio makes a timely entrance into the garden. His first impulse is to protect Cesario, who he believes is Sebastian. As soon as Sir Toby draws on Antonio, the Duke’s officers enter. They recognize Antonio and arrest him. Antonio asks Cesario for some of the money he gave Sebastian. Cesario, though confused at this request (not being Sebastian), offers Antonio some of his own money. Antonio takes that as a denial and warns him that he will become angry at his ingratitude. Cesario affirms that Antonio is a stranger to him; Antonio cannot possibly hold a claim on him. Antonio recounts how he rescued Sebastian from drowning and showed him brotherly love. Antonio, feeling betrayed, leaves with the officers.

Cesario gathers that Antonio was referring to his brother, Sebastian. Realizing that he closely resembles his brother, Cesario fervently hopes that Antonio meant Sebastian.

Sir Toby judges Cesario a coward. This stirs up Sir Andrew’s ire to fight, which is met with Sir Toby’s command to give him a good thwacking.

Analysis
This is a lengthy scene in which Shakespeare draws together some of the loose ends of the love plot. Considering that Sebastian’s presence is now signaled, this scene becomes the climax of the rising action. This revelation constitutes the major surprise, for the rest of the scene forms a logical continuation of plots that have been in motion since Act I. “This scene as a whole,” according to L.G. Salingar, “with its rapid changes of mood and action, from Olivia to the sub-plot and back towards Sebastian, braces together the whole comic design.”

In order for Malvolio’s humiliation to be complete, he has to face Olivia under the influence of the letter. Olivia, at the start of the scene, has her mind on Cesario. She wants to see him and considers how she can best allure him. She speaks solemnly of Malvolio, “he is sad and civil,” with whom she desires some fellowship. Maria alerts her to his mental agitation.

Malvolio’s dialogue with Olivia is at once comic and per-verse. We must laugh at the way he has been so duped by the other characters, as well as the way he carries the illusion until he is undeceived. The perversion of the love experience stands out promi-nently. Malvolio has the commands of the letter on his mind as he speaks to Olivia. Such love has no genuine source, as Orsino and Olivia’s does. Malvolio elaborates on a love that Olivia has no idea of, nor has she any intention of falling in love with her servant. The only genuine element in this whole perverse matter is Malvolio’s temporary infatuation. Shakespeare heightens the cruelty of the trick by having Maria play dumb and Olivia bespeak concern for his state of mind. Charles T. Prouty sums it up this way: “Thus the subplot may be seen as representing the obverse, the other side of the coin. In the main plot the characters move in the world of an established convention while in the other the characters are alien, if not antithetical, to the convention.”
Sir Andrew returns to show Sir Toby the letter he has written. Sir Andrew has obviously taken a liking to Olivia; we have just not heard him utter his passion. Sir Toby’s commonsense plan to interest Olivia in his friend partakes too much of the playful spirit of the play to qualify as reasonable interceding. Nonetheless, Sir Toby as the “lord of misrule” brings together these two major aspects of the play, love and foolery. Those two aspects intersect in the duel scene.

The interlude between Cesario and Olivia keeps their two distinct roles in the play sharply focused. The dialogue does not surprise us, so we can take pleasure in Cesario’s consistency as representative of a practical quality. Olivia says that she has poured out her heart to a heart of stone. Cesario asserts his master’s love, thus finely playing his role of intermediary.

In addition to blending the play’s two key elements, the arranged fight between Cesario and Sir Andrew prepares the way for Antonio’s timely rescue. Antonio comes upon the duel and believes he is saving his friend Sebastian. Regardless of whether the officers had come for him or not, it is evident that he would have made Sebastian’s existence known. Upon his arrest, Antonio asks of Cesario the money he had given to Sebastian. The interchange that ensues finally brings out the name “Sebastian.” Cesario’s hope for her brother is revived.

Act and Scene Summaries: Act IV, Scene 1 Summary and Analysis

Summary
The Clown and Sebastian are talking in front of Olivia’s house. Sebastian, unlike his sister, has not taken so well to Feste. They seem at odds with each other. Sebastian dismisses the Clown, maintaining that he has no business with him. The Clown, characteristically clever, responds by denying the reality of everything:
“Nothing that is so is so.” Indeed, Sebastian is not Cesario. Sebastian orders Feste to take his folly elsewhere.
The Clown, clever though he be, is not omniscient, so he thinks that Sebastian is just pretending ignorance.
He requests a message for Olivia. Sebastian dismisses him with an insult, but not without giving him a tip.
The Clown is thankful.

Sir Andrew, Sir Toby, and Fabian enter. Sir Andrew immediately strikes Sebastian, mistaking him for Cesario. Though puzzled, Sebastian strikes multiple blows in return. Sir Toby joins the fray to help Sir Andrew by seizing Sebastian. After witnessing the fray, the Clown goes off to inform Olivia.

They continue the fight, with Sir Andrew threatening legal action and Sebastian ordering them to let go.
Sebastian forcefully disentangles himself from their holds and warns them that on further provocation, he’ll draw his sword. Apparently, Sir Toby cannot resist; he draws on Sebastian.

Olivia enters and surveys the scene to her distaste. The fracas is yet another instance of Sir Toby’s uncivilized tastes. She orders them to stop and get out. That her beloved (or the one she thinks is Cesario) is involved in the fight adds to her sense of offense. Olivia hopes that Sebastian will look rationally on the incident. She invites him to her house so she can tell him about Sir Toby’s other “fruitless pranks.”

Olivia’s invitation baffles Sebastian. He wishes for further oblivion to add to the confusion he is experiencing.
Yet, when Olivia repeats her invitation, he accepts.

Analysis
Critics disagree on how to interpret Feste’s role. Despite Sebastian’s attitude to Feste, the Clown and his role retain their dignity within the play. If anything, Sebastian depreciates the value of the Clown’s content, that is, what it is he talks about. Cesario’s praise for his wit, however, is well-taken. And his wit is clever in this scene. Although the Clown’s songs have relevance to the theme and plot, the relevance of his dialogue is less clear. He is good with words and logic, and his displays of skill have proven quite entertaining, but whether he penetrates character and motive remains debatable. After all, in reality, Sebastian is not dissembling. Feste does not know he’s with Sebastian instead of Cesario. L.G. Salingar puts it this way, “Feste is not the ringleader in Twelfth Night, nor is he exactly the play’s philosopher.” Similarly, Maurice Charney, in his chapter on Twelfth Night, discusses only Feste’s agile mind at wordplay.

This is the scene in which Sebastian and Olivia are brought together, the foursome of the love plot is hence complete. Rightly so, the confusion seems all on Sebastian’s part.

What relish is in this? How runs the stream?
Or I am mad, or else this is a dream.
Let fancy still my sense in Lethe steep;
If it be thus to dream, still let me sleep! (4.1.60–3)

This confusion arises out of the familiar way in which Olivia addresses Sebastian, whom she thinks is Cesario. Olivia has had dealings with Cesario already and expressed her love for him. In this scene, since they are twins, she thinks it is he. Sebastian does not fall in love with Olivia; rather, he puzzles over her familiarity. What does she mean, he wonders. The whole situation seems so unreal that he thinks he may have lost his senses. Yet he goes along with Olivia, perhaps taking pleasure in the illusion. He asks for oblivion so he can prolong the dream that Olivia is sustaining. To the extent that Sebastian’s analogous role (to his sister’s) is a necessary component to the love theme, his acquiescence in Olivia’s dream is very likely. One of the complications of the plot is about to be cleared up, and the genre’s happy ending is happily in the offing.

Summary

Maria gives the Clown a gown and beard, apparently wishing to prolong the sham with Malvolio. Feste readily accepts the offer to play Chaucer’s Sir Topas. He has a stereotyped notion of a curate and a student, which he doesn’t fit, though he does account himself an honest man and a good citizen. Sir Toby enters, greeting him as a parson, and pushes him on to Malvolio.

The Clown, dressed as Sir Topas, visits Malvolio in a very dark room. Malvolio immediately orders Sir Topas to go to Olivia without specifying the contents of his message. Malvolio perceives himself as a wronged man. He says that to Sir Topas and, in the same breath, he asserts his sanity. Sir Topas responds with assurance of his own mildness. Malvolio insists that the house is dark and that his abusers have laid him in the darkness. Sir Topas points out that there are sources of light coming into the room. Malvolio suggests that it’s perhaps a figurative darkness surrounding him as well as maintaining his sanity once again. Sir Topas does not admit to any darkness, insinuating instead that Malvolio is full of perplexity.

Malvolio asks for a test of his sanity, to which Sir Topas responds with a question about Pythagoras’ doctrine. Malvolio answers aptly, but Sir Topas does not admit his sanity.

According to Maria, Malvolio is so blinded he cannot even see the Clown’s disguise. The Clown goes once more, at Sir Toby’s prompting, to talk with Malvolio. Sir Toby shows that his sadism in the matter has not subsided. The reason he must stop the trick is Olivia’s disapproval of his antics.

The second conversation between Malvolio and Sir Topas follows in the same vein as the previous one. This time, Malvolio requests a pen, ink, and paper with which he can write to Olivia. The Clown (as Sir Topas) persists in the contention that Malvolio is mad, which Malvolio vigorously rejects. Moreover, Malvolio’s counterclaim of abuse in this scene provides compelling evidence of the validity of his perceptions. He has indeed been played with.

During this conversation, the Clown speaks to Malvolio as both the Clown and Sir Topas. When Malvolio realizes this, he asks the Clown to get him some paper and light. He wants to send a message to Olivia. The Clown, though agreeing to help, still cannot resist implying that Malvolio is mad.

The Clown ends this scene with a song, whose significance is a bit obscure but does bear relevance to Malvolio’s present predicament.

Analysis

The Clown puts on an act in this scene. He goes to Malvolio’s room disguised as a Chaucerian curate, Sir Topas. This performance is commendable to the extent that the Clown is fulfilling his role as jester. It is truly his role to entertain the others. The talent the Clown exhibits is also impressive. It is not easy to do all that he does in this play.

Maria shows that she wants to antagonize Malvolio and continue the cruel deception. The Clown operates more out of the requirements of his role than a desire to further vex Malvolio. What he says to Malvolio helps to illuminate Malvolio’s character and the effect of the trick on him. Malvolio is certain that he has been wronged. The confidence with which he asserts the abuse builds our sympathy for him. He appears the undeserving victim of a cruel hoax. A man who can perceive the wickedness of abuse would probably not be the kind to foist abuse on others. His perception therefore is valid.

The Clown insinuates that he is mad. Malvolio maintains his sanity. His perception of his sanity is reinforced by his desire to communicate with Olivia. He knows he has humiliated himself before her, and the reasonable thing to do is to make amends. The impulse to communicate is a sound one. Presumably he wants to apologize and to show her that he is in possession of his faculties.

The darkness surrounding Malvolio symbolizes his alienation from the other members of the household, which has reached a grotesque level. The darkness also suggests more. It may symbolize the cruelty and lack of understanding of the other characters. They are the ones who have abused him as he eloquently maintains. The Clown points out that there are sources of light in the room. They just aren’t illuminating a man who has been swooped down on by malicious associates. The darkness may symbolize the closedmindedness of the Puritans. His incarceration may be the “lack of freedom” of the Puritanical philosophy.

The image of darkness coupled with allusions to the Devil offer compelling evidence of bad intentions on the other characters’ parts and Malvolio’s sound character. Sir Topas’ second speech to Malvolio reflects this: “Out hyperbolical fiend! How vexest thou this/Man!” Sir Topas states explicitly that the forces impinging on Malvolio are malicious.

Summary

This scene is set in the garden, a fitting locale for the culmination of a love match. Sebastian tries to come to terms with his good luck in his opening soliloquy. This love match is so quick that we have no inkling as to Sebastian’s feelings about love as an experience and as they relate to Olivia.
He tells us that she gave him a pearl. He marvels at his new-found sweetheart and discounts that he is mad. He wishes for Antonio, who he couldn’t locate at the Elephant, and for his esteemed advice. The improbability of his good fortune leads him to doubt the reality of what has happened. Unlike Cesario, however, he doesn’t reject Olivia’s gift of love. When the thought crosses his mind that Olivia may be mad, he dispels it immediately with the knowledge that Olivia is such a competent and fit manager of the affairs of her household. His good instincts conclude that there’s some kind of deception attaching to Olivia’s love.

Olivia wastes no time in proposing marriage. She has brought a priest to Sebastian to marry them. She invites Sebastian to the nearby chapel to participate in the ceremony. She promises him confidentiality until such time as he becomes ready to divulge the news of their wedlock. Sebastian accepts, pledging his everlasting faithfulness.

Analysis
In this scene, one of the love matches is fully realized. Olivia and Sebastian marry. This is a hasty move for Sebastian, who accepts, but not for Olivia. She has been in love with his twin (Cesario) throughout the play. So, she feels a sense of triumph in gaining her beloved. Sebastian, on the other hand, should express the surprise and wonder that he does. The play hitherto has given us little knowledge of his thoughts and feelings. Sebastian’s significance resides in his symbolic function as Viola’s thematic twin.

Sebastian and Olivia serve to illustrate the love theme quite well. Olivia has expressed her love; Sebastian takes his place as the practical, common sense complement to the loving aspect. His soliloquy reflects his appreciation for the role of reason and prudent management in life. He praises Olivia for the latter.

Act and Scene Summaries: Act V, Scene 1 Summary and Analysis

Summary
This scene forms a conglomeration of previous elements in the play. We are before Olivia’s house when it opens with Fabian and the Clown. Fabian is asking Feste to show him Malvolio’s letter to Olivia, which he doesn’t want to show him.

After this brief exchange, the Duke, Cesario, Curio, and other lords are on the scene. After inquiring of Feste and Fabian if they are connected to Olivia, the Duke recognizes one of them as the Clown. Upon being asked how he is, the Clown starts in with his wordplay. He answers ironically that, as far as his foes are concerned, he is better, and as far as his friends are concerned, he is worse. That makes no sense to the Duke, so he requests an explanation. The Clown’s explanation holds that friends deceive, while enemies tell the cold truth. Once explained, the Duke likes the idea and tips him. The Clown wants more and gets another coin from the Duke. Before leaving to summon Olivia, the Clown requests yet another coin from the Duke.

Antonio and the officers then enter. Cesario recognizes Antonio as the man who stepped in on his fight with Sir Andrew. The Duke also recognizes Antonio from the time when he did courageous battle with one of his ships. An officer relates that he arrested Antonio while fighting in the street. Cesario hastens to his defense mentioning his help, though his speech quite perplexed him.

Antonio recounts how he saved Sebastian, inadvertently referring to Cesario, and offered his love and service to him. He exposed himself to danger for Sebastian’s sake. Yet, Sebastian denied him when he intervened in the fight. Sebastian held back his purse, too.

Cesario wonders how that could be possible. He has been under the Duke’s service since arriving in Illyria.
In walks Olivia asking the Duke how she can be of service to him. She takes Cesario for Sebastian. Olivia’s speech thus baffles Cesario. Olivia repeats her rejection of the Duke. The Duke expresses his disappointment and adds a fierce note for emphasis. He retaliates by spiriting Cesario away, out of Olivia’s sight. Cesario, supportive of the Duke, reveals his love for him.

Olivia calls for the priest to remind Cesario that they are married. She thinks that Cesario is afraid to admit the truth. The priest comes to substantiate the marital bond that exists between them (her and Sebastian). This proof convinces the Duke, who becomes angry with Cesario.

Sir Andrew, entering injured, calls for a doctor to attend him and Sir Toby. Sir Andrew lays the blame for this violence on Cesario. Cesario, of course, denies the charge. Sir Andrew was set on him by Sir Toby. Sir Toby enters limping and requests a doctor. Olivia orders him to bed.

Sebastian enters with an apology for the injuries he has produced. He was justified inasmuch as he acted in self-defense. The Duke notices the resemblance between him and Cesario, considering it an optical illusion. Sebastian is glad to see Antonio.

For the first time in the play, Sebastian speaks to Cesario. Cesario offers clear proof that he and Sebastian are related. The time is not right for Cesario to unmask, but he promises to bring Sebastian to where his woman’s clothes are hidden.

Sebastian characterizes Olivia’s mistake as natural since she was attracted to Cesario’s masculine exterior.

Seeing a chance for his own happiness, the Duke shows interest in Cesario. Cesario accepts because she did, in fact, fall in love with him. The Duke wishes to see the Viola beneath the Cesario.

Olivia then requests to see Malvolio, at which point the Clown enters with his letter. Feste continues to ascribe madness to Malvolio. Irked by his unusual manner of reading the letter, Olivia asks Fabian to read it. The letter blames Olivia for the cruel joke that’s been played on him. Though her love letter led him astray, he still kept his wits about him. He intends to broadcast the wrong she’s done him. Olivia requests to see him.

Malvolio enters chastising Olivia. She need only read her letter for the proof. Malvolio asked what possessed her to stoop to such a wicked scheme. Olivia recognizes the handwriting as Maria’s and assures Malvolio that he will get justice. Fabian confesses his and the others’ wrongdoing. He attributes their actions to “some stubborn and uncourteous parts,” character flaws in them. Now that the trick has been exposed, Malvolio vows revenge on all those involved. Olivia acknowledges the abuse he’s suffered at her servants’ hands.

The Duke desires that a solemn combination be made of their hearts at a propitious hour. The third couple to join the other two is Maria and Sir Toby. Sir Toby proposed to Maria as a reward for her cleverness.

Analysis
This is the last scene of the play, so Shakespeare must provide a sense of closure. The way the action wraps up determines the overall meaning of the play. The genre of comedy has already provided us with some sense of the play’s message. The dizzying sequence of interludes mirrors the festive form of the previous acts and gives the impression of a large holiday gathering. This scene is a fitting conglomeration of the play’s elements—all the more satisfying because it resolves previous misunderstandings and complications. It ends in a happy “combination” of three couples. Even Malvolio is presented with some consolation from Olivia.
The Clown’s irreverence toward the Duke is entirely in character. He is a wit to the very end. The Duke, pleased with his foolery, tips him twice before he goes off to get Olivia.

Antonio is necessary as a catalyst to the recognition scene. Having already raised hope of Sebastian’s existence for Cesario, in this scene, Antonio dramatizes the duality of character. He speaks to Cesario as though he were Sebastian, which astonishes Cesario. The twins look alike, but they are not the same person. Antonio’s previous dealings have been with Sebastian.

When Olivia enters, the Duke speaks the last words of love to her that he will ever speak. She has remained steadfast in her rejection. He acknowledges how futile his passion has been.

The confusion over mistaken identities continues a bit longer as Cesario prepares to leave with Orsino. Olivia speaks to Cesario as though he were her husband. This causes more astonishment for the Duke and Cesario—clarification has not yet come. The priest adds to the confusion by confirming the marriage ceremony between Sebastian and Olivia.

Happily the moment of recognition and resolution comes when Sebastian himself enters hard on the heels of Sir Andrew and Sir Toby. The twins, now together for the first time in the play, face each other and make their relationship clear. They are brother and sister. This clarification paves the way for the pairing of Viola and the Duke: “You shall from this time be/Your master’s mistress.” Critics offer numerous opinions on this ending. Alexander Leggat affirms that the play embodies the theme of love: “The ending takes little account of the reasons for particular attachments; it is, on the contrary, a generalized image of love.” The pairings make up a formal design, which, in turn, illustrates the theme.

The cruel scheme against Malvolio is also laid bare in this scene. Fabian reads Malvolio’s letter in which he accuses Olivia of abuse. Knowing herself innocent, Olivia requests to see Malvolio. When Malvolio comes, Olivia has a chance to vindicate herself and assign the blame to Maria where it belongs, for she composed the letter. Once again, this resolution, which may perhaps be cathartic for Malvolio, becomes a perverse reflection of the resolution of the love plot. Olivia tries to console him with the prospect of justice being served, while Malvolio, more harshly, thirsts for revenge.

Feste ends the play with a song, which unlike previous examples, has a looser connection to the action. The fact that the rain comes down every day has a bearing on their lives and activities. By referring to life’s stages and natural imagery, he places the action in a larger, more ambiguous context. The song tells us how we are to take all the confusion and how we are to react to it. We shouldn’t take troubles too seriously; life works itself out. The song is nonetheless open to interpretation. One critic has said of it that it is just “whistling in the dark.”
Themes

The essential spirit of Twelfth Night is captured in its title. It refers to the "Twelfth Night" of Christmas, the Feast of the Epiphany celebrating the gift of the Magi to the infant Jesus. Believed by the Elizabethans to also be the day of Jesus' baptism, the Twelfth Night was an even more important holiday in Shakespeare's time than Christmas itself. In (partial) contrast to our own domesticated Christmas, this was not only a festive season for the Elizabethans but a time when excess and license were expected to run rampant. It was a time of merry-making, of hard drinking, and of romantic (or lusty) pursuits. The play is unique among Shakespeare's works in having a second or subtitle, "What You Will." This second part to the play's title is an open-ended invitation by Shakespeare to his audiences. They can choose to enjoy the play as a simple, romantic comedy with a happy ending, but they are also free to take note of certain negative or problematic aspects woven into the general revelry by the mature Bard.

The world of Twelfth Night is one of comedy and comic excess; and among all of the characters in the play, it is the drunken, misbehaving and prankish Sir Toby Belch who epitomizes its humorous nature. The plot against Malvolio is, to an extent, a jocular undoing of a negative character, an authority figure without power intent upon silencing Sir Toby. The humor here is amplified by the degree to which Malvolio comes to see himself as Olivia's equal. Thus, in the phony letter he receives, Malvolio emphasizes the words, "Some are (born) great, some (achieve) greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon 'em" (II.v.144-145). No matter how he slices it, Malvolio comes to the opinion that he, a mere steward, is somehow great or deserves to become great by virtue of his pomposity. The audience is in on the joke from the start, so that Malvolio's reading of the letter is entertaining in itself and magnifies the humor of his ultimate demise when Olivia's behavior makes it plain that Malvolio is not great, but deluded.

In addition to the comic moments of mistaken identity that arise in the course of Twelfth Night, there are many funny bits in the play that stand on their own. In the first scene of Act III, the clown Feste is asked by Cesario if he is a musician who "lives by" playing the tabor. He replies that he "lives by the church." When the disguised Viola then asks "Art thou a churchman?" Feste answers: "No such matter, sir: I do live by the church; for I do live at my house, and my house doth stand by a church" (III.i.1-5). Along with Sir Toby, Andrew, and Maria, Feste is one of several characters in Twelfth Night who engages in comic wordplay, some of it on purpose and some of it unwittingly. After learning of Olivia's love for Cesario, the disguised Viola says to the countess at the end of Act III, scene ii:

I have one heart, one bosom, and one truth,
And that no woman has; nor never none
Shall mistress be of it, save I alone.
And so adieu, good madam; never more
Will I my master's tears to you deplore.
(III.i.158-162)

This speech is, of course, ironic, since the speaker is, in fact, a woman. But above this, Viola's response to Olivia's overture highlights the primary subject of the play: romantic love. In her coupling of "one heart, one bosom, and one truth," Viola gives expression to an idealized conception of "true" love as being an all-consuming passion for a single "authentic" lover that will overcome any and all obstacles.

Twelfth Night validates this idea of love, but with some disconcerting qualifications. Love is true in Twelfth Night, but it is also irrational, excessive and fickle; it wanes over time, as does its chief cause, physical beauty.
Duke Orsino opens the play with the lines: If music be the food of love, play on, / Give me excess of it; that surfeiting, / The appetite may sicken and so die (I.i.1-4).

But after hearing strands of the same tune being played in the background, Orsino commands "Enough; no more; / 'Tis not so sweet now as it was before" (I.i.10-11). In Twelfth Night, Orsino is irrational in his pursuit of the lovely Olivia, but he cedes her readily to Sebastian and then falls instantly in love with "Cesario" when he reveals himself to be Viola. Love is powerful, but its constancy is certainly in question. In Act II, scene iv, the Duke says to Cesario that "For women are as roses, whose fair flower, / Being once display'd, doth fall that very hour" (II.38-39). Love at first sight is rampant in Shakespeare's Illyria, but he will not vouchsafe its permanence.

Worse, in Twelfth Night, love is consistently associated with madness. After seeing Cesario for the first time, the love struck Olivia says at the end of Act I, "Mine eye [is] too great a flatterer for my mind" (I.v.309). Love is a form of insanity, in which one's senses deceive and overcome one's reason. In Act IV, scene iii, Sebastian waxes about his instantaneous love for Olivia:

This is the air, that is the glorious sun;
This pearl she gave to me, I do feel't and see't;
And though 'tis wonder that enraps me thus,
Yet 'tis not madness. …

Sebastian's denial that his love for Olivia is madness only underscores the connection between unbounded passion and an unbalanced mind. Shortly thereafter, Sebastian says that because of his love for Olivia, he is willing to "distrust mine eyes" and "wrangle with my reason" (IV.iii.13-14). In a play in which many references are made to being possessed by the devil and being victimized by witchcraft, love is of necessity equated with being mad.

There is one character in Twelfth Night for whom love (co-mingled with self-infatuation) is madness—the steward Malvolio, whose professions of love to Olivia lead to his being restrained as a lunatic. Over the centuries, Shakespearean critics have discussed the so-called "Malvolio problem." On the one hand, Malvolio is basically a stock comic figure who deserves the comeuppance that he receives. But on the other, his imprisonment is excessive, and he excludes himself from the closing marriage ceremony with good cause. Indeed, when he speaks finally of exacting revenge in Act V, Malvolio evokes a certain sympathetic understanding. Malvolio has been abused as the target of a trick perpetrated by the parasitical, self-serving Uncle Toby. For his part, Uncle Toby, Malvolio's chief tormentor, is a merry soul, but he is also a rogue who is scheming to marry his fair niece to the absurdly non-heroic, non-romantic figure of Sir Andrew. If we view the play as a standard romantic comedy, Malvolio warrants the comedown that he undergoes; but as a matter of justice, Malvolio has done very little to earn a humiliating payback.

Themes: Advanced Themes

Celebration and Festivity
Twelfth Night’s light-hearted gaiety is fitting for a play named for the Epiphany, the last night in the twelve days of Christmas. While the Christian tradition celebrated January 6 as the Feast of the Magi, the celebrations of the Renaissance era were a time for plays, banquets, and disguises, when cultural roles were reversed and normal customs playfully subverted. The historical precedent to this celebration is the Roman Saturnalia, which took place during the winter solstice and included the practices of gift-giving and showing mock hostility to those authority figures normally associated with dampening celebration. While the action of Twelfth Night occurs in the spring, and no mention of Epiphany is made, the joyful spirit of the play reflects the Saturnalian release and carnival pursuits generally associated with the holiday. The youthful lovers engage in courtship rituals, and the one figure who rebukes festivity, Malvolio, is mocked for his commitment to order. The Saturnalian tradition of disguise is also a major theme in Twelfth Night, with Viola donning the uniform of a pageboy, Olivia hiding behind a veil of mourning, Malvolio appearing in cross-gartered yellow stockings, and the wisest of all characters, Feste, in the costume of a clown. However, some critics argue that, as Feste reminds the audience, that nothing is as it seems, underneath the festival atmosphere of Illyria lies a darker side, which is revealed in brief episodes such as the gulling of Malvolio. While the merrymakers contribute to the high comedy of the play through their practical joke, its conception lies in their desire for revenge.

Role Playing and Problems of Identity

Nearly every character in Twelfth Night adopts a role or otherwise disguises his or her identity. Viola disguises herself as a man upon her arrival in Illyria, setting the plot in motion. Feste disguises himself as a priest and visits the imprisoned Malvolio. The deliberate deception of these consciously adopted disguises provides a contrast to the subtle self-deception practiced by Olivia and Orsino: when the play opens Olivia is clinging to the role of grieving sister long after the time for such behavior has passed, while Orsino stubbornly hangs on to the role of persistent suitor despite Olivia's lack of interest in him. Yet another example of role playing can be seen in the duping of Malvolio, which involves outlining a role for him to play before Olivia—that of a secretly loved servant.

Critics have attempted to show how these disguises and adopted roles relate to the various themes of the play. Their overall effect is to make Illyria a place where appearances cannot be trusted, and the discrepancy between appearances and reality is a central issue in Twelfth Night. The appearance of a woman as a man, a fool as a priest, and a servant as the suitor of a noblewoman evoke the festivities and revelry of the Christmas holidays when the everyday social order of the period was temporarily abandoned. On a deeper level, the roles and disguises influence the major characters' ability to find love and happiness.

Language and Communication

Wordplay is one of the most notable features of Twelfth Night. Feste's wittiness is an obvious example: words that seem to mean one thing are twisted around to mean another. He states that words cannot be trusted, that they are "grown so false I am loath to prove reason with;" yet he skillfully uses words for his own purposes. Viola, too, demonstrates a talent for wordplay in her conversations with Orsino, when she hints at her feelings for him, and with Olivia, when she makes veiled references to her disguise. In these instances, the listener must look beneath the surface meaning of the words being used to discover their true import. Thus, language contributes to the contrast of illusion and reality in the play.

Commentators have also examined how the written messages in Twelfth Night also contribute to the theme of language and communication. When the play begins, Orsino and Olivia are engaged in a continuing exchange of messages that state and restate their stubbornly held positions which lack any real emotion to back them up. Another formal message, in the form of a letter, dupes Malvolio into believing that Olivia loves him. In these instances, formal messages convey no truth, but serve only to perpetuate the fantasies of the characters in the play. Malvolio's message to Olivia is an exception: while he is imprisoned, Malvolio pleads his case passionately to her in a letter. This instance of true communication provides a contrast to the self-indulgent fantasizing of Olivia and Orsino.

Viola (Cesario)

Viola is the protagonist of Shakespeare's comedy Twelfth Night. She is an aristocrat who disguises herself as a young man named Cesario after being shipwrecked on the coast of Illyria. Viola is witty, resourceful, and charismatic. She shows self-control and dignity in contrast to the bombastic, overly sentimental performances of Orsino and Lady Olivia. (Read extended character analysis of Viola.)

Duke Orsino

Duke Orsino is the duke of Illyria. He is mercurial and passionate, and he is more in love with the idea of being in love than he is with any person. He passionately pursues Lady Olivia for the majority of the play while simultaneously revealing his personal thoughts and emotions to Cesario. (Read extended character analysis of Duke Orsino.)

Sebastian

Sebastian is Viola’s twin brother, who becomes lost in the shipwreck. Sebastian is pragmatic and kind. He is not as passionate as other characters in Twelfth Night and appears to be fairly calm in relation to the wildly loving characters surrounding him, such as Lady Olivia and Antonio. (Read extended character analysis of Sebastian.)

Lady Olivia

Lady Olivia is an upper-class, wealthy, and beautiful countess in Illyria. Olivia is judgemental and overindulgent. Much like Duke Orsino, Olivia is also quick to fall in love and makes rash decisions. She also claims to be in a seven-year, loveless period of mourning for her recently deceased brother. However, Lady Olivia’s mourning period appears to exist as an excuse to refuse Orsino’s advances. (Read extended character analysis of Lady Olivia.)

Minor Characters

Antonio

Antonio is a sea captain and a friend of Sebastian’s. He is generous, kind, and loyal to a fault. His selfless nature leads him into trouble, as does his intense love for Sebastian. Antonio’s love for Sebastian is one of the only examples in the play of a love based on intimate knowledge of another person. Antonio spends three months taking care of Sebastian and getting to know him. As such, his love for Sebastian is based on a solid foundation of knowledge and friendship.

Antonio’s love for Sebastian leads him to follow Sebastian when he leaves for Illyria, despite the region being a dangerous place for Antonio. Antonio has “many enemies in Orsino’s court” due to his piracy against Orsino’s ships. When Antonio and Sebastian arrive in Illyria, Antonio is generous and gives Sebastian his coin purse to allow Sebastian to buy things for himself. Despite his lower social standing, Antonio gives money to Sebastian as if he were his benefactor.
Antonio, like other characters in the play, accidentally falls prey to Viola’s duplicitous disguise. When Antonio sees Viola in disguise as Cesario, he mistakes her for Sebastian and goes so far as to protect her from a duel with Sir Andrew. Viola, of course, does not know who Antonio is, and lets him be arrested by Orsino’s men. Antonio, still thinking that Viola, disguised as Cesario, is Sebastian, believes that Sebastian has betrayed him, despite his generosity and love. At the end of the play, Antonio is reunited with Sebastian, who rapturously greets Antonio with love: “how the hours have rack’d and tortur’d me / since I lost thee!” Despite their reunion, Antonio only appears confused and distrustful of the similarity between Viola and Sebastian. He is unsure if Sebastian is truly himself or someone else.

Sir Toby Belch

Sir Toby Belch is Lady Olivia’s uncle. He is one of the more comedic characters in Twelfth Night, engaging in tricks, jokes, and hijinks. Sir Toby is also a drunkard—which explains his surname—who is nearly always drinking with Sir Andrew Aguecheek, the silly and vain knight who wants to woo Lady Olivia. Sir Toby enjoys being entertained and will trick others for his own amusement. He is similar to Maria, Lady Olivia’s lady-in-waiting, who also looks for entertainment through tricks. Sir Toby and Maria engage in playful banter throughout Twelfth Night, and together they offer the audience playful respite.

Sir Toby’s playfulness—and arguably his duplicity—can be seen when he convinces Sir Andrew to duel Cesario for Olivia’s affection. Sir Toby knows that Sir Andrew will never gain Olivia’s affection, but he keeps him around for entertainment and as a friend to drink with. He believes that the duel will allow Sir Andrew to stay around longer. At the very least, it will entertain him. Sir Toby works with Fabian, Olivia’s servant, to purposely confuse and scare Sir Andrew and Cesario before the duel, adding further hilarity for those observing. Sir Toby also engages in romance, but in a much calmer and quieter way: Near the end of Twelfth Night, Sir Toby proposes to Maria, Olivia’s lady-in-waiting, as a reward for her wit.

Maria

Maria is Lady Olivia’s lady-in-waiting. She is witty, intelligent, and fast-paced. Maria is also the love interest of Sir Toby and banters with him throughout the play. She is another of the comedic and lighthearted characters, and she plays the role of a trickster in some respects. While she mostly engages in humorous conversations with Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, and Feste, the jester, Maria is also responsible for tricking Lady Olivia’s steward, Malvolio. She, Sir Toby, and Sir Andrew trick Malvolio with a letter Maria wrote: the letter appears to be from Olivia, and it declares Olivia’s love for Malvolio. The group watches as Malvolio reads the letter and pompously believes he could marry the countess Olivia, who is very high above his social standing. The letter also includes directions for Malvolio that result in humor and bad consequences for him.

Near the end of the play, Sir Toby proposes to Maria, quietly and in the background. She and Sir Toby act as minor characters in this way, with a love story that contains little confusion or drama.

Sir Andrew Aguecheek

Sir Andrew Aguecheek—the word “ague” means shivering—is a foolish and cowardly knight. Although supposedly of a high social status, Sir Andrew lacks knowledge and often misspeaks throughout Twelfth Night. He is a source of ridicule and entertainment for Sir Toby, who keeps him around to drink with. Sir Toby even convinces Sir Andrew to duel Cesario (Viola in disguise) when Lady Olivia expresses affection for Cesario. When Sir Andrew tries to duel Cesario, he is blocked from doing so by Antonio, who is promptly arrested by Orsino’s men.

Malvolio
Malvolio is Lady Olivia’s dry and puritanical steward. He lacks humor and good nature. In fact, his name means “ill will.” Malvolio is a subject of ridicule in Twelfth Night and is representative of the madness that love can bring.

He is tricked by Maria into thinking that Lady Olivia is in love with him after he finds a love letter seemingly written by her. The letter claims that Lady Olivia loves him but wishes him to smile more, act proud, and wear cross-gartered yellow stockings. For Malvolio’s social position, acting proudly would be insulting to Olivia. Furthermore, cross-garters and the color yellow are Olivia’s least favorite things. Malvolio’s utter belief in the letter’s authenticity points to his vanity and lack of knowledge of Olivia. Furthermore, Malvolio’s following through with the letter’s stipulations illustrates his irrational behavior. Despite his lower status, he is willing to act pompous and proud because the letter asked him to do so. He is also willing to wear horrendous and low-status clothing. Blinded by love, Malvolio cannot see the ridiculousness of the requests in the letter.

When Malvolio approaches Olivia, wearing the yellow cross-gartered stockings, smiling, and acting pompously, Lady Olivia believes him to be insane. Maria had previously warned Olivia that Malvolio seemed “out of his wits.” Thus, Lady Olivia leaves it to Maria to look after Malvolio, who urges Sir Toby and Fabian to lock him in a dark room. This act only stokes madness in Malvolio, who is tricked and mocked more while locked away. Feste, who disguises himself as a curate named Sir Topas, visits Malvolio and confuses him further. Malvolio is abused throughout the play in this way, and at the end of Twelfth Night, he swears revenge on all the characters.

Feste

Feste is Lady Olivia’s fool, or court jester. Feste is the only character who is willing and able to express the truth about others—a role exclusively available to fools. He creates humor and ridicule through his observations, often pointing out the hypocritical nature of those around him. Feste is also the most witty and intelligent of the characters. It is shown that for Feste to be a successful fool, he must be intelligent enough to read another person’s character and faults and to create a successful joke out of it. As said by Viola: “this fellow’s wise enough to play the fool.”

Feste interacts with multiple characters in Twelfth Night. He also uses more than one persona and dresses up as Sir Topas the curate when playing more tricks on Malvolio, who has been locked away. Feste does several performances in Twelfth Night as well, and although he is Lady Olivia’s fool, he flits between Orsino’s and Olivia’s houses. Feste acts as a sort of background narrator, tying together all of the characters’ experiences through humor, truth, and song.

Sea Captain

The Sea Captain rescues Viola after the shipwreck. He is the only character to know of Viola’s true identity after she disguises herself as Cesario.

Curio

Curio is one of the servants of Duke Orsino.

Valentine

Valentine is one of the servants of Duke Orsino.

Fabian
Fabian is a servant of Lady Olivia.

Characters: Viola

Extended Character Analysis

Viola is the protagonist of Shakespeare's comedy Twelfth Night. She is an aristocrat who disguises herself as a young man named Cesario after being shipwrecked on the coast of Illyria. Viola is witty, resourceful, and charismatic. She shows self-control and dignity in contrast to the bombastic, overly sentimental performances of Orsino and Lady Olivia.

In the aftermath of the shipwreck, Viola has lost her twin brother, Sebastian. Viola decides to disguise herself as a man in order to survive in a male-dominated world. Her disguise acts as a protection. Without her brother, Viola is alone and unable to make a living. Disguised as Cesario, she is able to find a job under Orsino, the Duke of Illyria.

Viola as Cesario

Viola’s disguise brings confusion and duplicity into other characters’ lives as well as her own. As Cesario, Viola also provides insight into characters such as Lady Olivia and Duke Orsino. Although Viola is well-meaning, she realizes that her disguise leads to ill consequences. For example, Orsino, who is infatuated with Lady Olivia, orders Cesario to go and woo Lady Olivia for him. Viola, who is rational and logical, at first avers that Olivia wouldn’t let her in. However, Viola must do Orsino’s bidding, and in an aside Viola claims, “Whoe’er I woo, myself would be his wife.” This shows that Viola has already decided to love and marry Orsino, despite her disguise and situation. Unfortunately, when Cesario arrives at Lady Olivia’s home to deliver Orsino’s message, Olivia falls in love with Cesario instead. Viola’s disguise highlights Lady Olivia’s true desires. Olivia does not love Orsino, and she is hypocritical in how she throws out her proclaimed mourning period to court Cesario. Viola sees the fallacy and misfortune in Olivia’s love for Cesario, saying “Poor lady, she were better love a dream.”

Viola also finds herself the subject of dislike and trickery while disguised. Sir Toby, for example, tricks Sir Andrew into challenging Cesario to a duel in order to gain Olivia’s affection. Sir Andrew’s duel with Cesario for Olivia is a ridiculous act, and Viola tries to decline. When she fails to avoid the duel, she is tricked further by Sir Toby and Feste, who work to convince both Viola and Sir Andrew of the other’s prowess in dueling, when in reality both Viola and Sir Andrew are inept duelers. Viola and Sir Andrew reluctantly show up to the duel, both feeling an irrational fear of each other’s skills due to Sir Toby’s and Feste’s trickery.

Viola’s disguise also inadvertently causes Antonio, a sea captain, to be arrested. Antonio, who is the savior and friend of Sebastian, sees Viola in disguise and believes she is Sebastian. He sees that Viola is about to duel Sir Andrew and tries to protect her from the duel. Antonio is then arrested by Orsino’s men, and he asks Viola for money, thinking that she is Sebastian. However, Viola does not know Antonio, and her refusal and claim of not recognizing him makes Antonio believe he has been betrayed by Sebastian.

Viola and the Irrationality of Love

The revelry of love is a primary theme in Twelfth Night. Viola is in the midst of much amorous wildness, with Duke Orsino’s excessive pining and Lady Olivia’s quick infatuation with Cesario. Even Viola finds that she is falling in love with Duke Orsino, despite her precarious situation.
Lady Olivia’s declaration of love for Cesario shows love’s irrationality, especially given her quick turn-around from grieving to infatuation. When Lady Olivia meets Cesario, she drops all pretenses of mourning and tries to court Cesario. Viola highlights Olivia’s rashness in a soliloquy, claiming that women are susceptible to falling in love with deceitful men: “How easy it is for the proper false / In women’s waxen hearts to set their form!” For the audience, Lady Olivia’s irrational love for Cesario is an example of dramatic irony. The audience knows that Cesario is Viola, a woman in disguise, while Olivia is blissfully unaware and infatuated with a person who, in a sense, doesn’t exist. With Lady Olivia’s advances, Viola finds herself unwillingly placed in an insensible love triangle. While reflecting on her powerlessness in love and relationships, Viola claims, “O Time, thou must untangle this, not I.”

Viola as Viola

At the end of play, Viola is reunited with Sebastian. After making sure he is truly her twin, she then reveals that she is a young woman in disguise. Viola then expresses her love to Duke Orsino, who agrees to marry her, despite having been supposedly in love with Olivia for the majority of the play. The lovesick characters are all married, putting an end to the romantic and duplicitous madness of Twelfth Night.

Characters: Orsino

Extended Character Analysis

Duke Orsino is the duke of Illyria. He is mercurial and passionate, and he is more in love with the idea of being in love than he is with any person. He passionately pursues Lady Olivia for the majority of the play while simultaneously revealing his personal thoughts and emotions to Cesario.

Orsino and Surfeiting Love

Duke Orsino is so in love with Lady Olivia—or at least he believes he is—that he wishes to be drowned in Olivia’s love. The idea of satiety, or of being surfeited in love, is something that Orsino longs for throughout the play. He only wishes for his love-sickness to end, claiming, “If music be the food of love, play on!”

Orsino exemplifies love’s irrationality in his decisions and his tendency to leap into romance. His affection for Olivia has little foundation. Orsino appears to enjoy pining for Olivia more so than he actually loves and wants to be with Olivia. Olivia’s consistent refusal allows him to continue to be in the throes of unrequited love as opposed to actually being with Olivia.

Orsino’s Friendship with Cesario

In Twelfth Night, Orsino is unaware that Cesario, his recently hired servant, is Viola in disguise. However, he does feel a certain attraction towards Cesario because of Cesario’s “shrill” voice and feminine looks. Orsino allows Cesario into his confidence within three days, which is a short period in which to begin to trust a stranger. Furthermore, Orsino claims that he has opened his soul to Cesario like a book and has allowed Cesario to see his deeper emotions and thoughts: “I have unclasped / to thee the book even of my secret soul.” In doing so, Orsino forms a close relationship with Cesario, inspiring Viola’s eventual love for Orsino.

Unfortunately for Viola, Orsino trusts Cesario enough to send her to woo Lady Olivia for him. Cesario’s existence is also a tool for Orsino; as a Duke, he is likely unable to act out, so he instead asks Cesario to go to Olivia and “be clamorous and leap all civil bounds.” Whereas Orsino cannot do this, Cesario can. Furthermore, Orsino believes that Cesario’s admirable feminine features will help. He claims that Lady Olivia will be more inclined to return Orsino’s favor after hearing it from a younger and sweeter-looking man like Cesario. Ironically, Orsino’s idea ruins any chance of gaining Olivia’s love—being unwilling or unable to go and woo her himself, he inadvertently causes Olivia to fall for Cesario.

Orsino’s quick friendship with Cesario and his unrequited love for Lady Olivia highlight his irrational nature when it comes to love and relationships. This reflects Twelfth Night’s underlying theme of the revelry and madness of love.

Orsino and Viola

Orsino continues pursuing his unrequited love for Olivia until Viola casts off her disguise and reveals that she is truly a young woman. Orsino then happily agrees to marry Viola, despite claiming to have been in love with Lady Olivia for almost the entire play. He sees that he can still gain something from the situation by marrying Viola, stating, “I shall have share in this happy wrack.”

In Twelfth Night, Orsino shows the madness that love can bring through his pining for Olivia. However, when there is no longer a problem of identity, his decisions in love become more logical, as everything has returned to its “proper” place.

Characters: Sebastian

Extended Character Analysis

Sebastian is Viola’s twin brother, who becomes lost in the shipwreck. Sebastian is pragmatic and kind. He is not as passionate as other characters in Twelfth Night and appears to be fairly calm in relation to the wildly loving characters surrounding him, such as Lady Olivia and Antonio.

Sebastian and Antonio’s Relationship

Antonio is Sebastian’s friend and rescuer. He shows an arguably dangerous amount of love and loyalty toward Sebastian. Antonio claims to love Sebastian deeply after having saved him and nursed him back to health. When Sebastian travels to Illyria, Antonio follows, despite being wanted by Orsino and his men.

After arriving in Illyria, Sebastian is shown further kindness by Antonio, who offers him his money. Sebastian accepts it, despite his higher social class. This shows Sebastian’s dependence on Antonio, who has become a sort of nurturer and caretaker for him. Without Antonio, Sebastian would not have arrived in Illyria or survived the shipwreck.

Sebastian and Lady Olivia

Sebastian becomes distracted once in Illyria. After parting with Antonio and promising to reunite with him later, he wanders off and meets Lady Olivia. Upon meeting Olivia, he finds himself in wondrous circumstances: The wealthy and beautiful Lady Olivia is in love with him and wants to marry him, believing that he is Cesario.

In an act of nonchalance and perhaps madness, he wonders at Olivia’s seemingly unfounded love and contemplates marriage. Sebastian even believes that he is mad, or “else this is a dream… If it be thus to dream, still let me sleep!” His wish to continue his “dream” shows his oddly ideal situation, as well as his satisfaction with it. He is unsure of what to say to Olivia, and he wishes for Antonio’s presence, saying “His counsel might do me golden service.” This comment shows that he trusts Antonio and wants his advice.
However, in a logical yet hasty decision, Sebastian decides to marry Olivia, seeing that marrying her will bring him wealth and social stature. Sebastian’s role in the play allows Lady Olivia to have a heterosexual marriage with someone who appears to be her beloved Cesario. With Sebastian’s arrival, the comedy begins to fall into place. Soon, the main characters are paired happily with their loves.

At the end of the play, Sebastian is reunited with Antonio and greets him with affection. Sebastian is also reunited with Viola, and the confusion over identity is solved, ending all duplicity.

Characters: Olivia

Extended Character Analysis

Lady Olivia is an upper-class, wealthy, and beautiful countess in Illyria. Olivia is judgemental and overindulgent. Much like Duke Orsino, Olivia is also quick to fall in love and makes rash decisions. She also claims to be in a seven-year, loveless period of mourning for her recently deceased brother. However, Lady Olivia’s mourning period appears to exist as an excuse to refuse Orsino’s advances.

Olivia's Hypocrisy

Lady Olivia claims at the beginning of Twelfth Night to be mourning her brother’s death. She says she will mourn for seven years and will refuse to fall in love during that time. Lady Olivia shows that she is hypocritical in that she uses her brother’s mourning period to avoid Orsino’s romantic advances but ignores her promise to mourn once she falls in love with Cesario. When she meets Cesario—Viola in disguise—she throws her vow away and sends a ring after Cesario to secretly show her affections. Lady Olivia realizes the irrationality of her love for Cesario but finds that she cannot help it. In following with the theme of revelry in love, Olivia chooses to pine after Cesario despite her original intentions.

Olivia's Love

Olivia’s abrupt change of heart and mind shows a distinct lack of rationality. She tries to woo Cesario, but is unsuccessful given that Cesario is Viola in disguise. Olivia claims that she cannot love Orsino, despite his wealth, stature, and genuine personality. Olivia’s love for Cesario highlights the illogical side of love. Orsino is the more logical, sensible decision, but Olivia immediately feels love for a new young man whom she does not know.

Olivia goes so far in her love-induced blindness as to marry Sebastian, Viola’s twin brother. Olivia believes that Sebastian is Cesario, and is pleasantly surprised when she notices his interest in her. Beforehand, Cesario (Viola) had always politely rejected her advances. Olivia is so excited to be able to marry Cesario that she plans the ceremony and completes the marriage with Sebastian in a single day. However, having married Sebastian instead of Cesario, Olivia soon finds herself in the center of duplicity and chaos over love and mis-attributed identity.

When Olivia meets Viola, who is still disguised as Cesario, she calls Cesario “husband.” This results in confusion and arguing until Sebastian arrives and clears the confusion. Olivia’s willingness to marry Sebastian (whom she believed was Cesario) with such speed shows that her love was shallow and passionate instead of steady and thoughtfully considered. Once Olivia learns that Sebastian isn’t Cesario, however, she is surprised but not entirely disappointed. Like Orsino, Olivia’s love for Cesario was more motivated by the journey of finding love as opposed to an actual grounded affection for Cesario’s personality.
Analysis

Analysis: Historical Background

Although fifteenth-century England had been a time of grave civil unrest and violence, by the time Shakespeare achieved prominence during Elizabeth and James’ reigns it was enjoying a period of socio-political security and respect for the arts. Queen Elizabeth’s reign extended from 1558 until 1603, when she was succeeded by the Scottish King James. Shakespeare received the patronage of both monarchs during his career as a playwright.

Elizabeth’s reign was not without its tensions. There was an intense religious climate in which the Queen had to act decisively. The religious tensions that existed during Elizabeth’s reign continued during James’ reign, when he was pitted against the Puritans. England had gone to war with Spain. In other foreign affairs, the Queen was moderate, practicing a prudent diplomatic neutrality. There were, however, several plots on her life.

There was also evidence of progress. The nation experienced a commercial revolution. Elizabeth’s government instituted two important social measures: “the Statute of Artificers” and the “Poor Laws,” both of which were aimed at helping the people displaced and hurt by changing conditions. Laws were passed to regulate the economy. Explorers started to venture into the unknown for riches and land. The machinery of government was transformed. The administrative style of government replaced the household form of leadership.

The Elizabethan Age was an age that made a great writer like Shakespeare and his contemporaries possible. It produced excellent drama; Marlowe’s Tamburlaine and Jonson’s Every Man in His Humour are two examples. Sir Philip Sidney and Edmund Spenser produced masterpieces during Elizabeth’s reign. Shakespeare was in good company.

Shakespeare was well suited to the English Renaissance, with its new-found faith in the dignity and worth of the individual. Shakespeare profoundly understood human nature and provided us with some of the most imaginative character studies in drama. Shakespeare wrote for his company of players, known as the Lord Chamberlain’s Men. He achieved considerable prosperity as a playwright. In addition to his artistic brilliance, Shakespeare wrote under the influence of the philosophy and effervescent spirit of the Elizabethan Age. Notably, we find the presence of the “Great Chain of Being,” a view of life that started with Plato and Aristotle, in some of his plays. Furthermore, other ideas and social structures established in the Middle Ages still held sway during the early seventeenth century.

Shakespeare could display his universality and penetration in the public theater for his audience. His work, largely free of didactic and political motives, proved very entertaining.

The date of the composition of Twelfth Night is fixed around 1600. In using his creative powers on original sources, such as the Plautine Gl’Ingannati and Barnabe Rich’s “Of Apolonius and Silla,” Shakespeare was following a Renaissance tradition of working creatively with original situations. Shakespeare thus enjoyed artistic freedom and encouragement to produce a play like Twelfth Night for his audience, knowing that it would entertain viewers of all ages and status.
Analysis: Places Discussed

*Ilyria

*Ilyria. Region on the east shore of the Adriatic Sea, between Italy and Greece. Its history is marked by waves of conquering invaders, from early Slavs to Ottoman Turks. In William Shakespeare’s time, Illyria—still part of the Ottoman Empire—was a group of city-states controlled by Venice. In the play, Illyria is distinctly Italianate, making for an atmosphere that is congenial to romance, with the seacoast providing an apt setting for plot conveniences of shipwreck, separated twins (Viola and Sebastian), and exotic adventures. At Illyria, fantasies and dreams are realized, and lessons are learned. There Viola is transformed from a woman to a man to “Orsino’s mistress,” and there she is finally able to live in an earthly Elysium.

Duke’s palace. Site of romantic sentimentality. The duke revels in wordplay and music, which feed his passion. The palace is also a site of ambiguous sexual identity, as shown by Viola’s disguise as Cesario.

House of Olivia

House of Olivia. House modeled on the English system of servants and retainers with prescribed duties. On one hand, there is the mourning figure of Olivia, and the humorless, austere, proud figure of her steward, Malvolio, the epitome of all puritans. On the other, there are Fabian and Maria, Olivia’s servants, and the faithful old retainer, Feste—a well-educated clown. Olivia attempts to live a cloistered life, but Sir Toby Belch and Sir Andrew Aguecheek, the two rowdy rioters, are unaffected by Olivia’s sadness over her dead brother.

In a room within this house, Malvolio is confined indarkness and cruelly mocked and tormented by a disguised Feste, at the instigation of Sir Toby and Maria.

Olivia’s orchard

Olivia’s orchard. Scene of Malvolio’s gulling by Maria’s faked letter. One of the comic highlights of the play comes from Malvolio’s strange cross-gartering and absurd posturings as Olivia’s would-be lover. However, the real point of the comedy is character revelation.

Analysis: Modern Connections

Twelfth Night is a holiday that occurs on January 6, which is the festival of Epiphany and the last day of the twelve days of Christmas. During Shakespeare's time, Twelfth Night marked the end of a period of seasonal festivities when dances, parties, and banquets were held and plays were performed, and the traditional social order was temporarily overturned—ideally to allow any tensions that had built up over the year to be safely released. A king or lord of misrule was crowned, and traditional social roles (master/servant, bishop/choirboy, king/fool) were reversed. Today, Halloween, New Year's Eve, and Mardi Gras perform a similar function: on these holidays, many people eat and drink whatever they want, go to parties until early in the morning, and temporarily lose their cares and sometimes their inhibitions by wearing costumes or masks, pretending for a short time to be someone else.

Although Shakespeare never makes it clear whether or not the play's action occurs during the Christmas season, Twelfth Night has been described as carnivalesque in plot and tone, and indeed, Sir Toby Belch, for example, seems to be perpetually drinking and partying until late at night with his friend Sir Andrew Aguecheek. There are also plenty of role reversals in the play, including a fool speaking words of wisdom (Feste), a humorless steward made to look like a fool (Malvolio), and a woman (Viola) pretending to be a man.

Women were not employed in acting troupes during Shakespeare's time, so female roles—such as Juliet in Romeo and Juliet or Ophelia in Hamlet—had to be performed by boys whose voices had not yet deepened. This fact added an extra bit of humor to the action in Twelfth Night: Renaissance audiences knew that the part of Viola was played by a boy, and would find it amusing when Viola disguised herself as Cesario, thereby in reality becoming a boy playing a woman playing a young man.

Today, the part of Viola is customarily performed by a woman, which allows modern audiences to focus more on her heart-to-heart discussions with Duke Orsino regarding the differences between the sexes—an issue that continues to interest us today. In II.iv.29-41, for example, Orsino supports his remark that women should marry men who are older than themselves by arguing that men's "fancies are more giddy and unfirm, / More longing, wavering, sooner lost and worn, / Than women's are." Today, those who say that men behave badly, or that they are just like little boys, are voicing arguments similar to the duke's. Orsino then asserts that men need to marry younger women because female beauty does not last very long: "women," he declares, "are as roses, whose fair flow'r / Being once display'd, doth fall that very hour." This sounds very much like the still current attitude of some people that men grow distinguished but women grow old.

Viola, however, strongly disagrees with Orsino's claim in II.iv.93-103 that women cannot love as passionately and profoundly as men can. Still disguised as the male page Cesario, Viola asserts that men are all talk and no commitment when it comes to love: "We men may say more, swear more, but indeed / Our shows are more than will; for still we prove / Much in our vows, but little in our love" (Il.iv.116-18). The debate over the intensity of a man's love versus a woman's persists today, and men are often stereotyped as being afraid of commitment.

Finally, Twelfth Night focuses not only on the roles of the sexes, but on those of the different social classes as well. As a countess, Olivia is a member of the nobility; on the other hand, her steward, Malvolio, is a commoner and is expected to recognize and remain in his place as Olivia's inferior. All the same, Malvolio has hopes. Just before he falls victim to Sir Toby and Maria's practical joke, the steward is heard fantasizing about marrying the countess, telling himself that weddings between commoners and the nobility have happened before. "There is example for't," he says, "the Lady of the Strachy married the yeoman of the wardrobe" (II.v.39-40). In the United States, there isn't a formal class system like the one that plagues Malvolio, but there are divisions between the rich, the middle class, and the poor. There are no rules which prevent marriages between members of different financial classes; nevertheless someone who is poor or middle class usually cannot afford to travel in the same circles as someone who is fabulously wealthy. Like Malvolio, some Americans may dream about marrying someone rich and famous, but that doesn't mean it is likely to happen.

Critical Essays: Critical Overview and Evaluation

William Shakespeare wrote Twelfth Night apparently to be performed on the twelfth feast day, the joyous climax of the Renaissance Christmas season; however, the feast day itself otherwise has nothing to do with the substance of the play. The play’s subtitle suggests that it is a festive bagatelle to be lightly, but artfully, tossed off. Indeed, Shakespeare may have written the play earlier and revised it for the Christmas festival, for it contains many signs of revision.

The tone of Twelfth Night is consistently appropriate to high merriment. With nine comedies behind him when he wrote it, Shakespeare was at the height of his comic powers and in an exalted mood to which he never returned. Chronologically, the play immediately precedes Shakespeare’s great tragedies and problem plays. Twelfth Night recombines many elements and devices from earlier plays—particularly The Two Gentlemen of Verona (c. 1594-1595) and The Comedy of Errors (pr. c. 1592-1594, pb. 1623)—into a new triumph, unsurpassed in its deft execution.

It is a brilliant irony that Shakespeare’s most joyous play should be compounded out of the sadnesses of its principal characters. However, the sadnesses are, for the most part, those mannered sadnesses that the Elizabethans savored. Orsino, for example, particularly revels in a sweet melancholy reminiscent of that which afflicts Antonio at the beginning of The Merchant of Venice (pr. c. 1596-1597, pb. 1600). Orsino’s opening speech—which has often been taken overly seriously—is not a grief-stricken condemnation of love but rather owes much more to the Italian poet Petrarch. Orsino revels in the longings of love and in the bittersweet satiety of his romantic self-indulgence. He is in love with love.

On the other side of the city is the household of Olivia, which balances Orsino and his establishment. Although Olivia’s sadness at her brother’s death initially seems more substantial than Orsino’s airy romantic fantasies, she, too, is a Renaissance melancholic who is wringing the last ounce of enjoyment out of her grief. Her plan to isolate herself for seven years of mourning is an excess but one that provides an excellent counterbalance to Orsino’s fancy; it also sets the plot in motion, since Orsino’s love-longing is frustrated by Olivia’s decision to be a recluse.

The point of contact between Orsino and Olivia—ferrying back and forth between the two—is Viola. As Cesario, she also is sad, but her sadness, like the rest of her behavior, is more direct and human. The sweet beauty that shines through her male disguise is elevated beyond a vulgar joke by Olivia’s immediate, though circumstantially ridiculous, response to her human appeal. Viola’s grief is not stylized and her love is for human beings rather than for abstractions. She seems destined to unite the two melancholy dreamers, but what the play instead accomplishes is that Viola, in her own person and in that of her alter ego, her brother, becomes part of both households. The ultimate outcome is a glorious resolution. It is, of course, immaterial to the dreamy Orsino that he gets Viola instead of Olivia—the romantic emotion is more important to him than is the specific person. Olivia, already drawn out of her seclusion by the disguised Viola, gets what is even better for her, Sebastian.

The glittering plot is reinforced by some of Shakespeare’s best and most delicate dramatic poetry. Moreover, the drama is suffused with bittersweet music, and the idyllic setting in Illyria blends with language and imagery to create a most delightful atmosphere wholly appropriate to the celebration of love and to the enjoyment of this world.

The one notable briar in the story’s rose garden is Malvolio; however, he is easily the play’s most interesting character. He is called a Puritan, but although he is not a type, he does betray the characteristics then associated with that austere Anglican sect. He is a self-important, serious-minded person with high ideals who cannot bear the thought of others being happy. As Sir Toby puts it to him, "Dost thou think because thou art virtuous, there shall be no more cakes and ale?" Malvolio suffers within a joyous world; it is against his will that he becomes part of the fun when he is duped and made to appear ridiculous. As a character, he represents a historical group, then growing in power, whose earnestness threatens to take the joy out of life (and, incidentally, to close England’s theaters). Yet, Shakespeare does not indulge in a satire on Puritanism. He uses the critical powers of comedy in indirect ways.

Malvolio is ridiculous, but so are the cavaliers who surround him. The absurd Sir Andrew Aguecheek and the usually drunken Sir Toby Belch are the representatives, on the political level, of the old order that Malvolio’s counterparts in the real world are soon to topple. While these characters are flawed, they are certainly more engaging than the inflated Malvolio. Shakespeare does not set up the contrast as a political allegory, with right on one side and wrong on the other. Nevertheless, Malvolio is an intrusion into the otherwise idyllic world of the play. He cannot love; his desire for the hand of Olivia is grounded in an earnest will to get ahead. He cannot celebrate; he is too pious and self-involved. Nothing is left for him but to be the butt of a joke—his role in the celebration. Some critics have suggested that Malvolio is treated too harshly, but a Renaissance audience would have understood how ludicrous and indecorous it was for a man of his class to think, even for a moment, of courting Countess Olivia. His pompous and blustery language is the key to how alien he is to this festive context. When he does his bit, Olivia casually mentions that perhaps he is put upon, but this is the only sympathetic gesture he deserves. He is the force that threatens to destroy the celebration of all that is good and refined and joyful in Elizabethan society.

Twelfth Night develops its theme on two levels. The main plot, written mostly in blank verse, shows the nobility in pursuit of love. The subplot features lower characters, who speak in prose and pursue drunkenness and mischief.

In the main plot, the twins Viola and Sebastian are shipwrecked on the Illyrian coast and separated; each presumes the other dead. Disguised as a young man, Viola joins the court of Duke Orsino, falls in love with him, and becomes his favorite. Orsino loves the lady Olivia, who refuses his attentions because she still mourns her dead brother. When Orsino sends Viola to woo Olivia for him, Olivia falls in love with Viola.

In the subplot, Sir Toby Belch, Olivia’s uncle, and Sir Andrew Aguecheek, a ridiculous suitor to Olivia, fall out with Malvolio, Olivia’s puritanical steward, who condemns their revels. With the help of Maria and Fabian, Olivia’s servants, they trick the self-serving Malvolio into thinking Olivia loves him, then they confine him for insanity. Sir Toby also persuades Sir Andrew to challenge Viola to a duel.

These plots untangle when Sebastian appears, marries Olivia, and whips Sir Andrew and Sir Toby. Viola throws off her disguise and accepts Orsino’s proposal of marriage. Freed, Malvolio stomps out vowing revenge on them all.

Symbolically opposed to Malvolio is Feste, the wise clown. He fools Olivia out of her mourning and Orsino out of his lovesickness—both self-indulgent, sterile behaviors, like Malvolio’s self-love. Shakespeare implies that people should open themselves to celebration and love, even if it makes them appear foolish, since it is truly foolish to deny these life forces.

Critical Essays: The Image and Metaphor of "Drowning" in *Twelfth Night

William Shakespeare's Twelfth Night; Or, What You Will is a comedy rich in poetry and puns, a masque concerning masks, a romance with none of the required elements missing. Beyond this, it is a play about drowning: in love, in sorrow, in appetite. It is an intriguing statement about people who are so immersed in excesses of various sorts that they cannot see beyond their own immediate desires in order to act to obtain what they claim to want. The play is a bridge between the comedies that Shakespeare wrote previously and the tragedies to come; as such it has elements of both and is an echo and a prophecy.

The purpose of this essay is to explore the image and metaphor of "drowning" in this play as it relates to the central themes, and to examine some of the ways in which this image takes the play out of the realm of pure fun and farce into Shakespeare's usual realm of profound human truths.

Drowning in Twelfth Night is nearly always a metaphor for loss, usually a loss of perspective through submersion in excess. The theme is seen in the first speech of the play, as Orsino asks to be drowned in the music that feeds his melancholy love. Act I is primarily concerned with exposing the ways in which the central characters are caught up, as Orsino is, in the final stages of emotion. Scene ii gives us the first of the two literal scenes of drowning, which turn out to be counterfeit in two senses: Sebastian is not really drowned as Viola believes; and Viola does not drown, but comes out of the sea to Illyria and is thus the person who rescues the inhabitants of that land from inundation.

Sir Toby Belch's particular sea is that of drink; in Act I we find that he is "drunk nightly" in, as he puts it, "drinking healths to my niece." Feste is the first to seize upon this metaphor when speaking of Sir Toby, whom he likens to a "drowned man, a fool, a madman - in the third degree of drink - he's drowned." The image is picked up by others, including Viola, who speaks to Olivia of Orsino's love as being with "adorations, with fertile tears," here linking Orsino's tears to Olivia's, called by Valentine, "eye offending brine."
Act II moves back to the sea, where Sebastian becomes the second person to be saved from the deep; again the image of tears is linked to drowning, this time by Sebastian, speaking of his sister: "She is drowned already sir, with salt water, though I seem to drown her remembrance again with more." Two very different images associated with the sea occur later in the act in a dialogue between Feste and Orsino. Feste suggests to Orsino that men like him, with such changeable minds, should be "put to sea that their business might be everything, and their intent everywhere; for that's it that always makes a good voyage of nothing." Orsino answers with his own view: his love is "all as hungry as the sea and can digest as much."

In terms of the play's major theme, Antonio's sea imagery in Act V is the most important; the lines might have better been spoken by Viola:

That most ingratitude boy there by your side
From the rude sea's enraged and foamy mouth Did I redeem. A wrack past hope he was.
His life I gave him, and did thereto add
My love without retention or restraint,
All his in dedication.

Later in the act it is Viola who is again, though mistakenly, linked to drowning and the sea. Sebastian speaks: "I had a sister, / Whom the blind waves and surges have devoured," and were she alive, "I should my tears let fall upon your cheek and say, 'Thrice welcome, drowned Viola!'".

Other characters are drowning in things other than tears or drink. Sir Andrew Aguecheek is absorbed in eating, Maria in troublemaking, Malvolio in his own self-importance. The one thing that the characters all have in common is boredom as the reason for their individual monomanias. What kind of place is this Illyria, which allows its inhabitants the freedom to indulge in such nonsensical excesses? Joseph H. Summers has noted that in this world, the responsible older generation has been abolished, and there are no parents at all... in which young ladies, fatherless and motherless, embark on disguised actions, or rule, after a fashion, their own household, and in which the only individuals possible over thirty are drunkards, jokesters, and gulls, totally without authority. ¹

If irresponsibility can reign supreme in this land at any time, imagine the scene on Twelfth Night, when the spirit of revelry is in complete control, and drunkenness and practical joking at their height. It would seem that, of all the characters, only Feste and Viola are interested in disturbing the revelry and games so that the real business of living can begin.

Viola is responsible for saving those similar spirits, Orsino and Olivia from their sea of tears; both are startled out of their sense of propriety by falling in love with her as Cesario. Olivia is distraught because she has fallen for a servant, Orsino because he is attracted to a boy. Viola manages the situation purely through verbal skill and a charming double-edged wit. We can see in Viola the one person who keeps her head above water for the length of the play; she is the only one with any strong inclination toward self-preservation. She is a realist in the company of complete sentimentalists, and with Feste, finds something to love in these weak Illyrians, and so saves them.

Feste, the sharpest wit of all Shakespearian clowns, attempts through mockery to pull the other characters out of their absurd moods; he sees the essential sanity in his cynicism, as opposed to the madness of the rest of the Illyrians: "I wear not motley in my brain." No one escapes Feste's cutting wit; there is no one whom he cannot outsmart or out talk, and yet he is also the only person to treat Malvolio humanely, with actions and not just words. Viola is the only one to see Feste's real accomplishments: "This fellow is wise enough to play the fool,
And to do that well craves a kind of wit. This is a practice as full of labor as a wise man's art." Feste's art is best put to use in his scene with Malvolio, in which he impersonates Sir Topas. Malvolio's prison is a sea of sorts, in which he is drowning in confusion and terror. Although Feste has been sent in to mock Malvolio, he perhaps sees the comic truth in Malvolio's assertion that he is "as well in my wits as any man in Illyria," and he promises to help him. The song with which Feste ends the play also serves to tie together some of the tear and drowning imagery, whether it be with a sexual pun, as Leslie Hotson has suggested, or through the references to drowning in the rain.

Shakespeare's most serious commentary on the evils of excess is contained in the subplot concerning the gulling of Malvolio. This is a perfect example of a joke that has gone too far and of the imposition of the neurotic compulsion towards "fun," that comes from boredom and drink, on another person. Malvolio's humiliation comes close to marring the comic spirit of the play and yet, the incident is a necessary one in terms of portraying the limits of human cruelty. Malvolio alone remains untouched by Viola's saving goodness; the most serious note in the play is sounded by Feste when he explains the situation and concludes: "And thus the whirligig of time brings in his revenges."

It is interesting to ask to what extent the excesses of the beginning of the play have given way to moderation at the conclusion. Olivia seems not to have changed much; the hasty marriage and then the easy acceptance of Sebastian hint that she is still more in love with the idea of love than with her husband. Orsino easily accepts Cesario-Viola as his bride, in place of Olivia, but any hope we have for the success of this match rests on Viola's talent for love. Maria and Sir Toby get what they deserve: each other, and they will probably cause more mischief as a team then they ever did alone. Malvolio does not seem to have learned very much, and swears to be "revenged on the whole pack of you!" Feste, of course, remains alone to comment on the coming follies of the Illyrians. All in all, however, no one has really been lost. There is no more cause for tears in Illyria, and this in itself is a salvation from drowning. Twelfth Night is the most festive of Shakespeare's plays, and yet much of the humor and singing is ironic, with the mockery turned towards both characters and audience. One may, of course, choose to ignore the undercurrents and concentrate solely upon the fun. The poles of the play are quite clearly drawn in Orsino's first speech: one may be drowning in sentimentality and enjoy it; and yet there comes the time when one realizes that, "'Tis not so sweet now as it was before."

Shakespeare gives us his play with a choice of perspectives: the festival of Twelfth Night or, what you will.

Critical Essays: Worm i'the bud: The Games of Love in Twelfth Night

According to Patrick Swinden in his book, An Introduction to Shakespeare's Comedies, a comedy does not demand "the degree of concentration and belief" required by tragedy. As a result, an audience of a play "is amusedly aware that it's all a play, a game that they are sharing with the actors". 1 In Twelfth Night, it is the characters, almost without exception, who, in varying degrees, are involved in deception. Swinden says, "Whether we look in the plot that Shakespeare took (indirectly) from the Italian, or the plot he made up to put beside it, we shall discover deceit piled on deceit."

Cesario/Viola deceives Olivia, Orsino, Sir Andrew, and Sir Toby, while Maria, Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, and Feste deceive Malvolio.

In an intricate pattern of "concealment" and "revealment" the play spins dizzily toward its happy resolution with all the deceptions that had, and had been, concealed revealed. Is the end of the play really a happy ending? What dynamic in the process of deception could cause Sir Andrew to disappear or force Malvolio to declare, "I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you!" (V.i.380)? Are the characters bettered or changed by their experiences when they arrive at the end of Act V than when they started at the beginning of Act I? Whether it be a practical joke or a clever disguise, the games being played in Illyria simultaneously result from and protect each character's deception not only of others but also, more importantly of themselves. The clearest examples are Duke Orsino and Olivia.

The games begin with Orsino's opening lines to the play:

> If music be the food of love, play on;
> Give me excess of it, that surfeiting,
> The appetite may sicken and die (I.i.1-4).

As Orsino continues to wax rhetorical and hysterical about being in love, it rapidly becomes apparent that he is playing a game with himself, which he will continue throughout the play. He is not in love, but in love with love. Olivia is unattainable and she has told him so repeatedly. Yet Orsino persists in making himself suffer, listening to sad love songs, writing to her, staying awake at night and crying into his pillow because he believes that this is the way someone in love acts. We almost want to shout at him "Get over it. Move on." It is part of the game that while it may appear that Orsino is rhapsodizing about Olivia, he is actually concentrating on himself. The words "I," "me," and "mine" occur ten times in the opening passage, culminating with:

> How will she love...
> ... when live, brain, and heart,
> Those sovereign thrones, are all supplied and filled
> Her sweet perfections with one selfsame king! (35-39).

Shakespeare's use of "selfsame" intensifies not only Orsino's description of Olivia, but also his focus on himself. Throughout these lines there is a sense that Orsino's sexual identity, encased in a male body, has not yet been clearly defined, hence his necessity for adopting what he thinks are the affectations of a successful lover.

Orsino begins Act II, scene iv in the same way he begins Act I: "Give me some music" (II.iv.1). Here, however, Orsino requests a specific song, one overheard just the night before, as Feste, Olivia's fool, sang it. How Orsino managed to overhear Feste's performance is one of the mysteries of the play, but its effect on Orsino is unquestionable "it did relieve my passion much" (II.iv.4). The song's lyrics are most depressing:

> Come away, come away, Death,
> And in sad cypress let me be laid.
> Fie away, fie away, breath,
> I am slain by a fair cruel maid;
> My shroud of white, all stuck with yew,
> O prepare it.
> My part of death no one so true
> Did share it.
Not a flower, not a flower sweet
On my black coffin let there be strown;
Not a friend, not a friend greet
My poor corpse, where my bones shall be thrown.
A thousand thousand sighs to save Lay me, O where Sad lover never find my grave
To weep there (II.iv.49-64).

Although Orsino says that he heard only a "piece of song" (II.iv.2), he also notes that it is an "old and antique song" (II.iv.3), indicating that he knows it in its entirety. Its tune and sentiment are so powerful that it remains with him the next morning. It is possible that the song reminds Orsino that he is no longer young enough to pursue an amorous campaign, and that there will be neither lover nor child to mourn him as Olivia mourns her brother. In modern pop-psychology terminology, Orsino appears to be having a mid-life crisis.

Orsino's game reaches a breaking point when Cesario interrupts his rhetoric with, "Ay, but I know" (II.iv.99). Orsino is shocked that this young man may have love experiences to which he has not been privy. He questions what Cesario knows about love and women and is eager to hear the boy's "blank" (II.iv.106) story. Yet, Orsino remains oblivious to Cesario's confession: "I am all the daughters of my father's house, And all the brothers, too" (II.iv.116-117). Orsino seems to be uncomfortable with this very personal, very intense revelation from another man since his "Ay, that's the theme" (II.iv.119) appears to restore his concentration to the safety and comfort of the pursuit of Olivia.

Orsino decides to discard his affectations and goes to speak directly with Olivia. Whatever has transpired between him and Cesario in their "three months" (V.i.88) silence of Acts III and IV has given him the strength to declare that he "will be so much a sinner to be a double-dealer" (V.i.27).

Many productions have offered Orsino actually falling in love with Cesario, such as the 1994 Royal Shakespeare Company version which had the events of Act II scene iv take place in Orsino's bed. Orsino and Cesario share a passionate kiss that surprises them both, but the kiss also seems to flow from the action and its location. Trevor Nunn's 1996 film moves the moment of passion to the scene during which Feste sings a love madrigal in a stable. Feste who coughs at the critical moment of their lips almost touching breaks the momentum. The interpretation is a valid one based on Orsino's customarily rhetorical proclamations of love for Cesario:

Why should I not ... Kill what I love. (V.i.106, 108)
...This your minion ... whom, by heaven I swear I tender dearly (V.i.114-115)
... the lamb that I do love (V.i.119).

Has Orsino fallen out of love with love and in love with Cesario? His proclamations arise from his anger at Olivia's very public rejection of them as "fat and fulsome to mine ear / As howling music" (V.i.98-99), the same music that he has found so soothing. This anger is not generated by some newfound awareness. Swinden comments: "He is talking about Cesario, not Olivia... The presence on stage of both partners during the tirade brings out very delicately the ambiguity of Orsino's shift in feeling. He fails to distinguish the object of his anger from the object of his love." 3

Even when Cesario is revealed to be Viola, his acceptance of a "share in this most happy wrack" (V.i.250) seems to be dependent on his seeing her in "woman's weeds" (V.i.257). Yet it is to Viola still dressed as Cesario to whom Orsino offers his hand, not once but twice. That Orsino will not accept Viola unless she looks like a proper woman and yet offers his hand to the male vision suggests that Orsino has not surrendered completely his comfortable sexual cocoon into which he has only admitted Cesario and then only with restraint. This reticence is confirmed at the play's end when Orsino admits:

... Cesario come -
For so you shall be while you are a man,
But when in other habits you are seen
Orsino's mistress, and his fancy's queen (V.i.362-365).

In his essay, "The two Antonios and Same-Sex Love in Twelfth Night and The Merchant of Venice," Joseph Pequigney explains that, "[Orsino's] attraction to Olivia, where he is heterosexually straight, like the other would-be wooers Sir Andrew Aguecheek and Malvolio, is a disaster. The love Cesario could not have changed instantaneously with the revelation of his femaleness; if it is erotic, then it would have been erotic before; what does change is that marriage suddenly becomes possible, hence the immediate proposal." This proposal is followed by a mournful song from Feste on the stages of a love life, which brings the play back to the beginning. Clearly, Orsino has not changed from the man he was: he will still have his "fancy." He is as he was at the beginning of the play: he cannot totally abandon his own sexual game. In all likelihood, Viola will now become an Olivia substitute, "his fancy's queen."

As Orsino hides behind the game of love, Olivia hides behind the game of grief cut off from love, adopting an Orsino version of mourning behaviour. Her entire household is in mourning and she daily goes to her brother's grave. As long as she grieves for her dead bother, her sexual desires can be put on hold. Grieving gives her the perfect excuse for rejecting Orsino's suit and relieves her of making a sexual investment in any man until she chooses "the sight / And company of men" (I.ii.40-41). Unlike Orsino, Olivia has put a seven-year limit on her mourning for her father and brother of which "twelvemonth" has already elapsed when Viola lands in Illyria.

In addition, Olivia differs from Orsino significantly since she can:

sway her house, command her followers,
Take and give back affairs and them dispatch
With such a smooth, discreet and stable bearing (IV.iii.17-19).

She is generous and tolerant, boarding Sir Toby and his guest, Sir Andrew, and positive in her view of the repressed Malvolio. With Feste's logical and systematic stripping away of her facade, with Olivia's consent, Olivia is free in a way that eludes Orsino. She demonstrates keen judgment about the affectations of love: "'Tis not that time of the moon with me to make one in so skipping a dialogue" (I.v.164-165). She has an agile mind and is able to counter Cesario's metaphors as quickly as he issues them. She is inquisitive and only asks Cesario the necessary questions. She seems to be a realist, offering "divers schedules of my beauty" (I.v.200-201) in response to Cesario's lyricism. These qualities refuse to be submerged even as she finds herself falling in love with Cesario:

... Not too fast! Soft, soft!
... Even so quickly may one catch the plague.
Methinks I feel this youth's perfections
With an invisible and subtle stealth
To creep in at mine eyes. Well, let it be. (I.v.248, 250-253)

Olivia thus chooses to abandon the safety of her game and pursue Cesario with complete abandon and confidence in her womanhood. In her pursuit, free from her facade, Olivia is naively honest with herself and Cesario. She confesses in Act III scene i that she sent "a ring in chase of" him (III.i.98). She asks him honestly, "I prithee tell me what thou think'st of me" (III.i.123). Cesario attempts to repay this honesty, "That you do think you are not what you are" (III.i.124). Because of her naïveté, Olivia takes the phrase literally and assures Cesario that she is not mad. However, the line also points out that Olivia, the noblewoman, has fallen in love with a manservant, though a "gentleman," and that that gentleman is actually a gentlewoman. Even so, Olivia is rational enough to realise that, "wit nor reason can my passion hide" (III.i.137). Unlike Orsino, Olivia embraces the opportunity for sexual fulfilment with such enthusiasm that she will attempt to overcome every obstacle with actions, not moaning and words. She is quite lucid on love, "Love sought is good, but giv'n unsought is better" (III.i.141). In this sense, she is the sexual positive to Orsino's negative.

Olivia's views will be challenged, however, when confronted by Sebastian. Since fraternal identical twins are a biological impossibility, it would seem that Olivia would note some difference between Cesario and Sebastian. But in the throes of sacrificing love, she would rather soothe her beloved's ire with tales of "how many fruitless pranks" have been instigated by Sir Toby than launch an investigation into any differences that may exist between the sister and brother.

For his part, Sebastian seems to think that nature caused Olivia's consistency in being sexually attracted to a woman who looks just like him. But like Orsino, Olivia is eager for the sexual experience promised by marriage. Olivia is actually very much steeped in Orsino's "selfsame" deception. She was in love with the image of a man, not a man, admitting she was suffering from "a most extracting frenzy of mine own" (V.i.265). With this admission, Olivia too returns to being as she was at the beginning, involved in a self-deceiving sexual game, as Cesario had lamented: "Poor lady, she were better love a dream" (II.ii.23).

Although Sebastian notes that he sees the reality and thinks it a dream, Olivia's relationship with Sebastian will ostensibly have to be redefined, as will Orsino's with Viola. Pequigney observes:

Like Orsino, Olivia goes through a homoerotic phase that lasts through and beyond betrothal; both have experiences that evince their bisexuality. Nor do they ever pass beyond it, for the sine qua non of their psychological development - his away from fruitless doting on her, hers away from fixation on a dead brother - and it has a crucial, integral, and unerasable part in both their love stories, that of Orsino with Cesario/Viola and that of Olivia with Cesario/Sebastian. 5

Twelfth Night not only asks the comic question, "How does an individual get out of tune with society?" But also the tragic question, "Why does the individual behave this way, and why does society insists upon its standards." 6 This play is unique in that it asks these questions simultaneously, and within the context of the sexual games of the play, the answers can be found in the most basic and defining activity of human kind: sex.

Critical Essays: Feste and Fabian: Plots and Complots

Act II, scene v of Twelfth Night opens with Sir Toby's injunction to a character we have never seen before: "Come thy ways, Signor Fabian" (II.v.1). Fabian's reply indicates that he not only knows of the intended "sport," but that he too has a grudge against Malvolio: "You know he brought me out o' favour with my lady about a bear-baiting here" (II.v.6-7). By Maria's entrance, it becomes clear that it is to be Fabian, and not Feste, who is to hide in the box-tree with Sir Toby and Sir Andrew in order to observe Malvolio's antics over the letter; indeed that Feste will not appear in the scene at all. The sudden and unexpected appearance of Fabian in the famous "box-tree" scene is one of the intriguing elements of Twelfth Night. His appearance is intriguing because he has apparently replaced Feste in Sir Toby and Maria's plot against Malvolio. Yet in Act II scene iii, where the idea for the letter is conceived, Maria quite clearly suggests, "the fool make a third" (II.iii.167-68). Why does Shakespeare suddenly replace "the fool" with Fabian with no warning? The answer to this question lies in the character of Feste. Examining Fabian's role in the Sir Toby-Maria plot against Malvolio gives us a greater understanding of Feste and his overall function within the play.

I would like to look briefly at who Feste is, before addressing the question of Fabian, in order to establish the social and intellectual differences between the two characters. The list of characters describes Feste as "the clown, [Olivia's] jester" 1, yet throughout the play he is referred to as "the fool." These terms may have been interchangeable but the Oxford English Dictionary defines a clown as "a fool or jester as a stage character, or (in Shakespeare) a retainer of a court or great house" 2 and a fool as "one who professionally counterfeits folly for the entertainment of others." 3 Whilst these definitions are certainly close, it is interesting to note that a "fool" is not necessarily attached to a house or court. We are also told that Feste is "a fool that the lady Olivia's father took much delight in" (II.iv.11-12), but are given the impression that he has been absent from Olivia's house for sometime: "Nay, [either] tell me where thou hast been…. My lady will hang thee for thy absence" (I.v.1-3). Feste appears to be more of a "free spirit" since he doesn't appear to be part of Olivia's permanent household and we are given the impression of a passing itinerant who doesn't entirely belong in Illyria.

Feste is a lone character; a commentator and an analyst who in many respects provides a link between the audience and the action of the play. Trevor Nunn's 1996 film of the play makes all three of these points very strongly. Ben Kingsley's Feste hovers on the fringes of the Edwardian society in which the film is set. He is an itinerant musician, a traveller with license to appear at Olivia's home and Orsino's palace. Trevor Nunn comments:

The image of a traveller… seemed to me to provide what Malvolio would revile, what Sir Toby would relate to, what Olivia would forgive, what Maria would scold, and that by which Viola would feel threatened, Sebastian pestered and Orsino disturbed. 4

The welcome extended to him by Olivia suggests long acquaintance; he has known her since she was a small child and shrewdly reads the truth behind her actions and her moods. Yet despite this intimacy with Olivia, Feste remains an outsider throughout the film. His quiet departure from the scene of midnight revels immediately expunges him from the possibility of becoming part of the gulling of Malvolio (interestingly, Maria's line, "let the fool make a third" (II.iii.167-68) is cut), and his ability to disturb Orsino, Sebastian and Viola with his penetrating questions and perceptive observations gives him the quality of an "otherworldly" visitor. This impression is given credence by the fact that Feste is the only character that makes direct eye contact with the camera; we later realize that it is his voice that has spoken the "prologue" at the beginning of the film. In effect, the film makes him a storyteller and we watch the story through his eyes.

Turning to Fabian, it is harder to define exactly who he is in the social world of the play. Actors playing Fabian have found him a difficult character to play since he has no stated function in Olivia's household, and is given little opportunity to develop a distinct character in the play. Directors have also found Fabian a problem in terms of introducing him and fitting him into the fabric of the play. Bill Alexander felt that he had partially solved the problem of how to fit Fabian into the play in his 1987 production at Stratford-upon-Avon by making him "a kind of under-steward to Malvolio… it gives him a potential aspiration and a relationship to Malvolio – a reason why he should join in a plot against Malvolio." 5 Describing the effectiveness of this solution, Alexander comments that:

I think it helps… to introduce him [Fabian] silently into the earlier scenes: for instance, when Olivia and Malvolio first appear, he was clearly one down the pecking order from Malvolio – he did what Malvolio told him to physically, and he hung around and was dressed in a way that suggested a sort of second-in-command. 6

Alexander's comment takes us to Fabian's grudge against Malvolio over the "bear-baiting," which seems to me to provide a strong clue about Shakespeare's reasons for replacing Feste with Fabian in the "box-tree" scene. Fabian's comment not only provides us with evidence about his connection with Olivia's household, it clearly, and more importantly, allies Fabian with Sir Toby and identifies him with Sir Toby's world of "cakes and ale." This is a world, which Feste, for reasons we shall examine, is never a complete part of; he lives on the fringe of the Illyrian worlds and effectively becomes a kind of Greek chorus, a link between the audience and the world of the play. Fabian however, is "all-Illyrian" and therefore practically useful to Sir Toby in ways that Feste can never be.

Critics have described Fabian's sudden appearance as both "crude" and "clumsy," arguing that his abrupt introduction "contrasts strikingly with the theatrical expertise of the play so far." 7 Certainly the theatricality of Fabian's first entrance seems somewhat contrived and clumsy as Sir Toby initiates Fabian into the plot and introduces him to the audience. The pace of this very comic and theatrically accomplished scene lags somewhat in its opening moments as we register Fabian's presence and Feste's absence. Warren and Wells note that it is at this point the "difficulties" of the second half of the play begin. The first half of the play has a tight theatrical structure and moves smoothly through the introduction of the major characters and their situations. The second half however, falters slightly around the middle of the play, "especially in the very long 3.4." 8 Warren and Wells attribute this faltering of the dramatic rhythm to Fabian, partly because of his verbosity in this later scene:

Fabian not only plays a major part in spurring Sir Andrew on to challenge Viola, he does so at length and in a very elaborate, even laboured, style, with formally balanced phrases and contrived comparisons… not like the utterance of a dramatic utterance but like a set speech… Shakespeare is cranking the dual plot into action…. 9

The idea that Fabian's appearance occurs as the secondary plot is starting to unfold is also helpful for examining the reasons behind why he replaces Feste. The gulling of Malvolio is the brainchild of Maria and Sir Toby and Feste has had no part in developing it. Looking ahead to the theatricality of the box-tree scene, Sir Toby clearly needs an accomplice to exploit the humour of this scene; Sir Andrew is included by association, but he does not have the wit necessary to carry the comedy; Maria has written the letter and her part is effectively played, so a third character is needed to offset Sir Toby's boisterous humour. When the idea for the plot is raised in Act II scene iii, Feste is present. Many productions show him leaving soon after Malvolio's exit because he says nothing further in the scene. However there is no stage direction to imply that he exits before the others so that Maria's suggestion that "the fool make a third" (II.iii.167-68) is made in his hearing.

Sir Toby instantly applauds Maria's proposal in a typically boisterous and enthusiastic way. She includes Feste in the plot at that stage, much in the way that she makes Sir Andrew the implicit "second": he is still present and he has been part of the midnight high-jinks interrupted by Malvolio. It is not because either of them are obvious choices; Sir Andrew is a visitor to the house and has no long-standing personal grudge against Malvolio, and Feste is not the obvious "third" in terms of character or motive. Maria's idea for the gulling of Malvolio is a prank reminiscent of playground humour, earthily and bawdily comic, but is hardly in keeping with the analytical and intellectual wit we have seen from Feste. The Elizabethan Fool held a special position in royal or noble households and was given license to speak his mind without punishment. As Olivia rather impatiently tells Malvolio, "there's no slander in an allowed fool" (I.v.89-90). It seems unlikely that a Fool who values and promotes his position as a professional in his trade would achieve any degree of professional satisfaction from a prank such as this.

If Feste remains onstage as the text indicates, then the problem arises of how to explain his silence after Maria's suggestion that he become "a third" in the gulling plot. He says nothing and his silence is frequently taken for complicity. This compounds our surprise (and chagrin) at the appearance of Fabian in Act II scene v
– we are expecting the subtle wit and intellectual humour of the Fool and instead we are given a characterless nobody. If, however, we consider the staging of the "midnight revels" scene and the theatrical possibilities inherent in stage silences then plausible alternatives for Feste's silence become evident, in-line with his character. His silence in this scene gives him the opportunity of physically rather than verbally disassociating himself with Maria's plan, and indeed this does occur in performance. Warren and Wells observe that:

His [Feste's] silence may make dramatic points. Peter Hall's 1958 production… let Feste 'feign sleep, head on arm, at a table. As the others went out he raised his head and stared thoughtfully after them…' this Feste was a detached observer. The Feste of Hall's 1991 version made this detachment more specific: after Malvolio's exit, he lay stretched on a seat, and when Maria said let the fool make a third, he simply waved a dismissive hand; Fabian was clearly needed to make a third here. 10

A "dismissive" gesture from Feste here makes the point clearly; he is "out," and Sir Toby and Maria will need to find someone else to fill the place. Therefore a new character is needed and Fabian's later appearance is explained.

Removing Feste from the gulling of Malvolio returns the focus of the gulling plot to the worlds within the play. Illyria is almost a parallel universe: Orsino, Olivia, Viola, and Sebastian belong to the world of courtly and romantic love; Sir Toby to the world of "cakes and ale" and the spirit of Twelfth Night. The gulling of Malvolio belongs firmly in Sir Toby's world and Sir Toby's accomplices need, by association, also to be part of that world. Fabian, with his second line referring to the "bear-baiting," establishes himself as an integral part of the "Sir Toby world" in which gaming, drinking, duelling, and sports such as "bear-baiting" reflect the world of Elizabethan England. Whilst Feste is able to play the role of Fool with Sir Toby and Sir Andrew in Act II scene iii and join their drunken banter, he remains removed from their world, hence his sudden silence toward the end of this scene.

Sir Toby's hasty acceptance of Fabian's involvement with the plot against Malvolio at the beginning of Act II scene v suggests a familiarity between them that does not exist with Feste. Whilst Sir Toby addresses Feste in familiar terms, Feste always refers to him as "Sir Toby," maintaining a personal distance. Sir Toby refers to Fabian as "Signor," possibly ironically, but equally possibly suggesting that Fabian has the status of a gentleman. Fabian himself seems on easy terms with Sir Toby, addressing him familiarly as "man" ("I would exult, man" (II.v.6)) and their collusion in both this scene, and the later duel scene with Sir Andrew and Viola serves to sideline Sir Andrew and instate Fabian as fellow-conspirator in the Sir Toby-Maria jest against Malvolio. Feste however, seems to exist on the fringes of both worlds, able to interact with both, but never becoming a part of them. He moves easily from the gentle catechism of Olivia, to the riotous midnight revels with Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, and Maria, to the melancholic mood of Orsino's court. In acknowledging this it is therefore impossible to see him playing an active part in the gulling of Malvolio or taking delight in the burlesque duel between Sir Andrew and Viola-Cesario.

Feste does, of course, have his own agenda in relation to Malvolio, and we see his contribution to the downfall of Malvolio in the often-troublesome "dark house" scene in Act IV scene ii. Sir Toby's treatment of Malvolio in confining him in the dark house often seems vindictive and unnecessarily cruel, yet it is Feste who prolongs the scene and taunts Malvolio still further. Sir Toby admits to Feste that it has been a "sport" to humiliate Malvolio in this way; it is at his suggestion that Feste impersonates Sir Topas the curate in order to further "baffle" Malvolio's wits, but he leaves Feste to his own devices and does not stay to witness the "knavery." The scene becomes troublesome when we suspect that Feste goes beyond the role of impartial observer that he has hitherto represented, and becomes actively and primarily involved in the degradation of Malvolio.

Sir Toby's aversion to Malvolio, as we have seen, is because he represents a Puritan threat to the celebration of festivities such as Twelfth Night. Feste's involvement is harder to explain. He has a much more personal axe to grind, and in Act V scene we are given his explanation: "...but do you remember, Madam, why laugh you at such a barren rascal, an you smile not, he's gagged..." (V.i.370-72), as he reminds Olivia of the moment in Act I scene v, when Malvolio denigrates both Feste and his wit. The line suggests that Feste's professional pride has been abused by Malvolio's comments and that the nonsensical catechism of Malvolio in the "dark house" scene is his way of proving Malvolio to be a fool. His final comment to Olivia seems to suggest that his motives were not sinister, and that he regards the "Sir Topas" episode as a consequence of Malvolio's unpleasantry: "...thus the whirligig of time brings in his revenges" (V.i.373). As John Caird comments,

…what Feste is saying to Malvolio is, 'Do you remember, you who were so pompous... Now look who the joke's on. Thus, the whirligig of time brings in its revenges. I didn't.' Feste doesn't actually do anything. 11

Theatrical interpretations of both this and the "dark house" scene itself vary considerably, with directors portraying Feste at both ends of the revenger-joker spectrum.

In posing the question of the reasons behind Feste's treatment of Malvolio in the "dark house" scene, it is useful to contrast Fabian's function in the play with Feste's function. Fabian, as we have seen, is a useful adjunct to Sir Toby's tremendous energy in the gulling of Malvolio. He is the crucial accomplice in the "box-tree" and the "duel" scene, and he does this successfully because he is an unremarkable character who does nothing to detract the focus from Sir Toby. Feste, on the other hand is a remarkable character, and to expend his energies as Sir Toby's back-up man would detract considerably from his complexity and versatility as a character. Feste describes himself to Viola-Cesario as Olivia's "corrupter of words" (III.i.34-5) and he plays with and distorts language much as the play itself plays with and distorts concepts of gender. Shakespeare uses distortion of gender to reveal truths about the nature of love, and he uses Feste to distort language to reveal psychological truths about the other characters.

In Trevor Nunn's film, Ben Kingsley's Feste highlights the character's function as an analyst: he analyses Olivia's grief, analyses Orsino, analyses Malvolio, even analyses Viola. Rather in the manner of a psychological clairvoyant, he is able to see truths that the other characters cannot see, and through his Fool's "toolbox" of wit and language distortion, he forces the main protagonists to see truths about themselves. He takes Olivia through a mock catechism to reveal to her the absurdity of her elaborate mourning regime, and proving her a "fool." This routine is repeated in the "dark house" scene with Malvolio in which Feste, as "Sir Topaz" attempts to restore the apparently mad Malvolio to his right mind through a catechism on a series of contemporary Elizabethan religious issues, and in doing so, proves Malvolio to be the real "fool" of the play. For this reason, it seems preferable to accept John Caird's interpretation of Feste's final comment since it becomes the way in which Feste attempts to show Malvolio the truth about himself. Thus, Feste's function as commentator and analyst is fulfilled, and his final song to the audience provides the link between the world of the play and the audience's world in the "wind and rain" of reality.

Critical Essays: Present Me As An Eunuch: Female Identity in Twelfth Night

Throughout Twelfth Night Shakespeare examines patterns of love and courtship through a repositioning of traditional Elizabethan gender roles. The familiar comic formula of identical twins creating confusion is employed with an added twist so that identical twins of opposite gender provide the foundation for the comic confusion. Viola, the protagonist, is stranded on the shores of a foreign land by a shipwreck. She adopts the identity of her brother, Sebastian, so that she can live in safety without a male protector. Shakespeare uses the comedy behind Viola's gender transformation to explore the notion that concepts of romantic love are not always selective by gender. In the course of the play we are presented with a series of same-gender love situations (Olivia for Viola, Orsino for Cesario-Viola, Antonio for Sebastian) that parallel "legitimate" opposite gender love relationships (Orsino for Olivia, Viola for Orsino, Maria for Sir Toby and in some respects Malvolio for Olivia). The result is a unique "comedy of gender" that uses gender and disguise of gender to reveal one of the play's chief messages: "nothing that is so, is so" (IV.i.8).

The "unnatural" love relationships in Twelfth Night highlight a major gender issue in Shakespearean drama: the role of boy players. They also bring into account the position of Elizabethan women in society and how that position was undergoing subtle changes during the period. Shakespeare's notion of Elizabethan gender roles, and in particular those of Elizabethan women, was presumably that of the accepted theological doctrine, which taught that Adam was created first, and Eve from his body; she was created specifically to give him comfort, and was to be subordinate to him, to obey him and to accept her lesser status. Thus, to Elizabethans the concept of sexual equality would have been anathema. A dominant woman was unnatural, a symptom of disorder. Shakespeare apparently endorses this belief in his comedies, returning his heroines to the accepted and "safe" role of wife/daughter once the resolution of the play takes place. However the theatre itself is a place of fluidity and artifice where "nothing that is so, is so." I will discuss the ways in which Shakespearean theatrical conventions override Elizabethan notions of the female role and in Twelfth Night, establish female characters not as two-dimensional Elizabethan archetypes but as tenacious and distinct characters with a strong sense of identity.

Viola, the chief female protagonist, is by far the strongest character in Twelfth Night. After the tragic shipwreck that has separated her from her brother, Viola disguises herself as a man for most of the play not only to protect herself, but also in order to preserve her state of free will. It can be argued that in placing his heroine in this situation, Shakespeare is using Viola as a means for examining female capabilities and instincts. The shipwreck has left her in an unprecedented, indeterminate state: she has no one to connect with at all. Lacking anyone to provide for her, she is forced to take measures to protect herself so that the understood reason for her deception is to insure herself against immediate danger, but also to retain her prospects and status for the kind of future that she would like to have. She is unwilling to accept the female role of complete passivity just as Olivia is unwilling to submit to Orsino’s advances because she enjoys playing her role as “lady of the manor.” Viola enjoys her life and position as a man, and does not reveal who she is until the last scene of the play. Curiously, she also voluntarily accepts the role that society would impose on her again at the close of the play: that of a wife. It is important to note however, that she freely chooses this role and does so out of her own sense of self. For Viola, it is a personal choice based on her desires. She is in love with Orsino and keeping the pretence of her male identity is no longer necessary, as she desires to be his wife.

Shakespeare’s female characters have frequently been criticised as two-dimensional and unrealistic portrayals of subservient women, a notion that clearly overlooks the complex contradictions not to mention the acting challenges inherent in roles such as Portia, Lady Macbeth and Cleopatra. The general assertion has often been that the roles of women in his plays were prominent for the time and culture that he lived in. Little conclusive evidence exists concerning the actual involvement of women with the Elizabethan stage. Women were not permitted to act on the stage, with the occasional exception of women at court taking part in special, private performances for Elizabeth and her guests. By the reign of James I it was not uncommon for the ladies at court, including Queen Anne, to take part in the masques that were a popular form of court entertainment. It does seem however, that the appearance of women on the public stage was not altogether unknown. Coryat's Crudities of 1611, recounting experiences in Venice comments: "I saw women acte, a thing that I never saw before, though I have heard that it hath beene sometimes used in London". It is therefore clear that although they took part in plays on the Continent, particularly in the popular Commedia dell'arte plays, it was not the norm for women to act on the public English stage. Boys or young men whose voices had not yet changed acted the women's parts, and it is this convention of contemporary Shakespearean theatre practices that in many ways contributes to the development of positive and powerful female characters in Shakespearean drama.

Boys acting as women disguised as boys provide the strongest visual symbol of Feste's comment in Twelfth Night that "nothing that is so, is so" (IV.i.8). Several of Shakespeare's comic plays, of which Twelfth Night is just one, capitalize on the effect of boys acting women, who then take on disguise as boys. Sylvia (Two Gentlemen of Verona), Portia, Nerissa and Jessica (The Merchant of Venice), Rosalind (As You Like It), and Imogen (Cymbeline) are other well-known characters. Shakespeare often exploits the extra layer of irony available in this situation by having the character refer to his/her/his male/female attributes. Much of the ironic humour of Viola's situation comes from her own wry acknowledgement of her assumed manhood. In Act II scene ii when Malvolio catches up with her after leaving Olivia's house, she meditates on Olivia's motives in sending the ring to her. She quickly anticipates Olivia's feelings: "Fortune forbid my outside have not charmed her" (II.ii.18), but goes on to contemplate the possible complexities of the situation: "How will this fadge? My master loves her dearly, / And I, poor monster, fond as much on him, / And she, mistaken seems to dote on me" (II.ii.33-35). Shakespeare is setting up a double level of humour: the humour inherent in the age-old love triangle, but also the humour of a male actor wooing a boy actor playing a girl, who is wooing a boy actor playing a girl who is posing as a boy, who in turn is a boy actor playing a girl posing as a boy who is in love with the first male actor! The humour thus worked on an entirely different level for Shakespeare's audience than it does for a modern audience.

By placing boy actors in these complex levels of cross-dressing humour, Shakespeare, along with the other dramatists of his time was flouting biblical law and incurring considerable opposition from the Puritan faction. Their argument against the practice was based on the biblical verse Deuteronomy 22.5 in which it is stated:

The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment: for all that do so are abomination unto the Lord thy God.

The notion of boys playing women clearly went against this law, yet the playhouses continued to uphold the practice, and in some cases they had their supporters. John Case, a defender of the drama on Humanist grounds pointed out: "It is not necessarily indecorum for a man to wear the dress of a harlot on the stage, if his object is to expose the vices of harlotry." The idea that drama could function as a means for moral instruction was not a new one; indeed the Church itself sanctioned drama for that purpose in the medieval period. However Case's cautious endorsement raises another possibility: that women in drama could be presented in an alternative way to the traditional view of women and womankind; that boy players actually legitimize women as strong, thinking individuals.

In order to explore this notion further it is useful to look briefly at the way women were viewed socially and iconographically at this time. The Medieval church in Europe established a view of women that was split between the ideal of the Virgin Mary and her weaker counterpart Eve, or the anti-type to the ideal, the Whore of Babylon. The Elizabethan church continued this tenet, supported by the general distrust of women portrayed in frequently misogynistic Medieval and Renaissance literature. Shakespeare's Henry VI, Part One depicts the French heroine Joan of Arc as a witch, a devil-woman in league with Hecate and a "foul accursèd minister of hell" (I Henry III, V.vi.93); but Queen Elizabeth ("Gloriana," "the Virgin Queen," "Good Queen Bess") is portrayed variously in literature as a female ideal. It is for this reason that Shakespeare's plays frequently demonstrate that men have difficulty seeing women as something between these two extremes: if they are not perfect they must be whores and/or witches. This goes some way to explaining the abrupt swing between love and hate in such characters as Claudio (Much Ado About Nothing), Othello (Othello), and Leontes (The Winter's Tale). The accepted hierarchy of the sexes was that women were the lesser sex because of their unpredictability.

The female in Elizabethan society was not only subordinate to the male because of her unpredictability but also because of her nature as the "gentler sex." A woman was considered to be fit for homemaking and child-bearing; she was considered to have no interest in, or ability to, understand politics and her virtue was at all times protected, firstly by her father, brother, or guardian and subsequently by her husband. For a woman to show an interest in current affairs, to express opinions or even to write literature other than a personal diary was to exhibit unladylike and indecorous behaviour. The major female figurehead to escape the shackles of contemporary Elizabethan womanhood was Elizabeth I, who became a powerful image of female authority despite her unmarried state and who commanded respect for her hard-headed intellect in all manner of political, religious, social, and artistic affairs. The presence of such a figurehead on the throne of England created an interesting situation for the literary and dramatic worlds in terms of the way they could now portray women in general. For the dramatic world, the move away from allegorical representations of character to more three-dimensional characters also allowed for more diversity in the ways women were portrayed, and the use of boys in the women's roles seems to have been part of this move. It is hard to imagine that a male representation of a woman, particularly given the social and religious history, could be anything other than stereotypical, however, in order to refute this, it is necessary to return to Shakespeare's text.

The inherent humour of boys playing girls is exploited in many ways throughout the play. In Act III, scene i, Olivia displays the confusion created for both characters and audience as she takes on the traditionally male role of wooer in an attempt to win the disguised Viola, whom she knows as Cesario. Viola, too, is in an unusual position, being firstly dressed as a boy and secondly sent to woo Olivia on behalf of Orsino. The sexual ambiguity of both Viola and Olivia in this scene highlights the way in which both women are supposed to be behaving and are not. Neither young woman is displaying behaviour appropriate to females of the era: Viola because she is dressed as a man and not chaperoned, and Olivia through her overt interest in a young "man" with whom she has no acquaintance. Judged by the morals of the time, both women, had they been real people, would be labelled whores. However the play neither passes judgement nor censure on them. Arguably, this is because the "women" that Shakespeare's audience were seeing on the stage were well known to actually be male. If a man plays the part of a woman then the female character and behaviour become hypothetical rather than actual. Through Viola Shakespeare seems to be celebrating the female potential for honour, loyalty and truth as opposed to censuring the behaviour of a whore.

The approbation given to boy actors such as the celebrated Nathan Field, suggests that their portrayals of women were at least realistic enough to be believable in comic situations and to arouse appropriate levels of pity and fear in tragedies. In 1582, Stephen Gosson complained in his Epistle to Sir Francis Walsingham about the practice of boys playing women, and in doing so, highlights an interesting point about the success of the boys in these roles:

The Law of God very straightly forbids men to put on women's garments… In Stage Playes for a boy to put one the attyre, the gesture, the passions of a woman is by outwarde signes to shew them selues otherwise then they are, and so with in the compasse of a lye…

His comment, designed as it was to challenge the existence of the boy players on a theological level serves to defend them on a dramatic level. Gosson's observations suggest that the boys are not simply putting on the clothing of a woman they are actually mimicking female gestures and passions; so much so that they are "within the compass of a lie." This type of characterization is a huge development from the two-dimensional figures of the morality plays and early imitative comedy that used classical "stock" characters and plots. The notion that the boys were starting to imitate female voices, movements and habits suggests a much greater attention to the detail of characterization. Therefore, despite the "fact" of the male actor behind the female character, what the audience sees is a "woman" exemplifying behaviour outside of the normal female spectrum without becoming the two-dimensional "virgin Mary" ideal or the "devil-woman." In the case of both Viola and Olivia, Shakespeare can be said to have moved them beyond the extremes of Elizabethan womanhood to a point that is both acceptable and desirable to Elizabethan men; in this case Orsino and Sebastian.

Whilst it is these situations of sexual ambiguity that provide much of the comedy and also much of the lyrical poetry in the play, these two female characters also represent contradictory female role models for Elizabethan women. As already remarked, it can hardly be thought that Viola's situation in Twelfth Night can be considered a typical one for an Elizabethan woman. Her trials and tribulations in Illyria are very much the stuff of fairytale: an accident, separation from her brother, near disaster followed by despair, frustrated love, and finally love triumphant are all part of the romantic comedy formula that was starting to emerge in dramatic literature at the beginning of the seventeenth century. What is of particular note about romantic comedies is the fact that Shakespeare's women start to be portrayed in subtly different ways. Unlike characters such as Kate in The Taming of the Shrew or Adriana in The Comedy of Errors, the heroines of romantic comedy - for example Viola, Rosalind, and Portia - despite acknowledging their state as "helpless" females, prove themselves assertive, capable and intelligent. They are often responsible for creating comic misunderstandings but also challenge the stability of appearances, gender roles, and the "off-limits" territory of same-sex-desire. This also applies to the secondary female characters who start to appear as confidante and support to the heroine (Celia and Nerissa are good examples), or, as in Olivia's case, as a foil or counterbalance to the heroine. Both scenarios allow for enriched comic interaction and female dominated scenes and situations such as the battle of wits between Olivia and Viola.

Viola shares the same characteristics that Shakespeare imparted onto many of his later heroines; characteristics that make them strong, and fiercely individual. Though Elizabethan society demands certain behaviour from women, Viola, through necessity, chooses to undertake a different path to deny that behaviour. In doing so, she promotes self over public image and proves that women can be both individual and intellectual without compromising what Elizabethan men saw as the "ideal" in womanhood. Presenting Viola as "an eunuch" is a way of legitimizing her choice and free will, and at the same time liberating female characters from two-dimensional stereotypes. Twelfth Night stands out particularly well as a play in which Shakespeare, though conforming to contemporary attitudes of women, circumvented them. He did this by utilizing theatrical conventions to his advantage in order to experiment with the creation of resolute female characters with a strong sense of self and an individual identity.

The only reference to Twelfth Night during Shakespeare’s own lifetime is to a performance on February 2, 1602. A law student named John Manningham wrote in his diary about a feast he attended at the Middle Temple in London where he was a law student and where “we had a play called Twelfth Night; Or, What You Will.” This was likely to have been an early performance since it is generally agreed that the play was probably written in 1601. In 1954 Sir Leslie Hotson's book, The First Night of Twelfth Night, sought to identify the exact date of the first performance of Twelfth Night. He used the evidence of old records to suggest that Queen Elizabeth asked for a new play for the last night of the Christmas 1600-01 season, the Feast of the Epiphany on January 6, and that Shakespeare wrote Twelfth Night accordingly.

Among other evidence for this conclusion cited by Hotson is the information that during this period Queen Elizabeth was entertaining at court one Don Virginio Orsino, the Duke of Bracciano, who supposedly gave his name to the chief male character in the play. Hotson’s conclusion is that this play was written specifically for this occasion – hence the title. Whether or not this was indeed the case, and the play did in fact gain its primary title from the date of its first performance, has continued to be a source of disagreement for critics, directors, and actors, some of whom, like Samuel Pepys, agree that the play is “not at all related to the name of that day.” The title is therefore not necessarily helpful in ascribing time, or even place to Twelfth Night. It has been variously presented onstage at any time of the year from the deepest and bleakest English midwinter to the height of "midsummer madness" on a Greek island. I would like to address two issues: firstly, what kind of relationship the play has with its title, and secondly, where, or rather what, Illyria is.

The festival of Twelfth Night is the Roman Saturnalia, the Feast of Fools. There can be little doubt that the licence that marked this occasion had its origin in very ancient pagan customs. As Christianity spread across Europe, the church subsumed the old pagan festivals and replaced them with celebrations of religious significance. However the old traditions took centuries to die out, and the feast of the Epiphany on January 6 retained a Saturnalian flavour for many centuries. Even superficially, it is quite clear that Twelfth Night echoes this religious and cultural "compromise" by highlighting notions of order and chaos: the order of accepted religious and social morals, and the chaos of pagan Saturnalian licence. It is certainly possible from Leslie Hotson’s extensive research that the play was indeed performed on this date, but I suggest that the title has more to do with the atmosphere surrounding the play than the actual date of the original performance. Unlike Samuel Pepys, I cannot contend that the play has nothing to do with the feast – indeed I will argue that the festival of Twelfth Night and the traditions surrounding it are central to both the sustaining mood of the play.
The world of Twelfth Night is often seen to be a utopia of "Olde Englande," where the old traditions are given free reign and where that elusive "happy ever after" quality can be achieved. Yet there are disquieting elements in Illyria that in many ways reflect the situation in early seventeenth century England. Despite the exotic and distant sound of its name, Illyria is in fact a peculiarly English setting and the play is sprinkled liberally with references to the social life and customs of Jacobean England: Antonio and Sebastian lodge at the Elephant (probably an inn south of the Thames in London); Fabian is in trouble with Olivia for a "bear-baiting," Sir Andrew is a "great eater of beef" (I.iii.81); Sir Toby talks heartily of beagles, staniels and bumbailies; and we hear variously of spinsters, tinkers, tosspots, peascods, bawcocks and woodcocks. The disquieting element comes with the revelation that despite Sir Toby’s freedom to drink and make merry, despite Malvolio’s strict adherence to puritanical doctrine and despite Orsino’s romantic inclinations not one of them is truly happy; in fact nobody in Illyria is happy. Society cannot function normally because the extremes of social and religious life depicted by Sir Toby Belch and Malvolio cannot co-exist.

The cause of the underlying despondency is the way in which Illyrian society works in reverse to social norms. This reversal is linked closely with the festivities of Twelfth Night. The central idea of Twelfth Night was derived from the old notion behind Saturnalia: a brief social revolution or period of "misrule" in which power, dignity, or impunity is reversed upon those ordinarily in a subordinate position so that masters become servants and servants become masters. A mock figure known as the "Carnival King" or "Boy-Bishop" was elected to head the festivities; a figure echoed in Twelfth Night both by Sir Toby Belch, who becomes a kind of "carnival king" upholding the feasting, revelry and license of the festival period, and by Feste who impersonates a clergyman in his attempts to "re-educate" Malvolio into his "right" mind. When challenged about his drinking by Maria; “Ay but you must confine yourself within the limits of order,” Sir Toby retorts, “Confine! I'll confine myself no finer than I am.” In the true style of Saturnalia, Sir Toby overturns all norms. He almost literally turns night into day through his apparently continuous drinking: “Cousin, cousin, how have you come so early by this lethargy” (I.v.102), and is cheerfully unrepentant of his behaviour: “I'll go burn some sack; 'tis too late to go to bed now” (II.iii.159-60). He presides over the mock duel between Viola and Sir Andrew, and he finally rejects the social norms of his class to marry a waiting maid.

However in Shakespeare’s day, the ruling Church of England was not only attempting to retain control over the excesses of festivals such as Twelfth Night, but also endeavbouring to temper a compromise between the rival factions of Rome and Geneva; in other words, to mitigate the abstemiousness of the Puritans. The "Roman" faction favoured observance of the old saints’ days (also called "holy days" or "holidays"), which, as we have seen, retained elements of the old pagan rituals, whilst the Puritans frowned on festivities of all kinds. Sir Toby’s response to Malvolio’s puritanical admonishments in the "midnight revels" scene: “Dost thou think that, because thou art virtuous, there shall be no more cakes and ale?” (II.iii.114-15), is essentially a rejoinder to the sobriety of the Puritans. If Toby’s drunkenness and unconventional behaviour are purely Saturnalian, Shakespeare also shows the diametrically opposite excesses at Olivia’s house: her mourning for her dead brother verges on self-confinement in a nunnery and her steward’s objections to all merry-making voice the confines of Puritanism.

Both the main plot and the sub-plot of Twelfth Night strongly echo the idea of Saturnalian "misrule," as Warren and Wells identify in the Oxford edition of the play:

…in the main plot, the Duke Orsino is educated out of his aberrant state of love-melancholy by his servant, who then becomes her "master’s mistress;" in the sub-plot, Olivia’s steward aspires to become his mistress’s master. 3

Social boundaries are crossed and re-crossed as the characters undergo transformations in class distinctions, appearance and gender. These transgressions of the norm cause varying degrees of chaos that can only be eventually restored to order through the appearance of both twins onstage together, providing a visual sense of order that resolves the chaos created by their separation. Orsino, Olivia, Sir Toby, Malvolio, and implicitly, Maria’s love interests lead them across the divisions of the social classes defined in the play, just in the way that social codes were reversed during the period of Twelfth Night. The crossing of gender norms and gender boundaries is constantly examined through the actions of the main characters. Viola and Sebastian, fraternal twins, are mistaken for each other because they wear the same clothing. In the true spirit of carnival, the audience becomes complicit in the element of misrule as they suspend their disbelief to "see" these fraternal twins as identical beings. Similarly, we are asked to believe in, and recognize love at first sight. Viola's transvestism is also emblematic of the antic nature of festival. Cross-dressing was a feature of Twelfth Night revels, and gives Viola not only the appearance of a male, but the privileges and power of masculinity. In this way, by reversing her own notions of social and romantic normality, Viola becomes the servant in charge of her master, the woman in charge of a man, and leads Illyrian society towards a normal hierarchy.

At the beginning of the play, Orsino declares his passionate love for Olivia, who is probably his social equal and therefore an appropriate marriage partner, although Sir Toby interestingly tells Sir Andrew that Olivia will “not match above her degree” (I.iii.102-3). His affection for her is soon perceived by the audience as merely self-indulgent and during the course of the play, we are led to assume, becomes focused instead on his page, the disguised Viola. The comic confusion of this situation is given greater effect through the reversal in the master-servant relationship as Viola-Cesario. By the end of the play Orsino accepts as his “fancy's queen” this young woman who only five minutes before functioned as his male page, underscoring the opal-like quality of his affections. Olivia, who has spurned the sight of men rejects the love of her social equal Orsino and instead embraces a complete stranger, the Duke's page, as a worthy partner. It is interesting that in doing so, she also rejects the conventional forms of wooing as she takes the initiative both in appearance and in fact; much as Viola does on Orsino’s behalf. She eventually marries Sebastian whom we gather is not of her class, but his blood is “right noble” (V.i.258), making the marriage socially acceptable. Sir Toby too, rejects social expectation and eventually marries his niece’s waiting-woman, Maria, rather than a woman of his own class. Maria provides an interesting parallel with Malvolio in that she, like Malvolio, seeks a liaison outside her social class. The difference is that unlike Malvolio, she is able to see the necessity of both excess and restraint. She is therefore rewarded for her clever schemes by being allowed to rise through the social hierarchy as she becomes the wife of a knight.

Of all the characters however, it is Malvolio who gains nothing from the play’s resolutions. Malvolio’s very name, Italian for "ill-will" sets him up in opposition to the other characters. His social status is quite clearly defined – he is the steward of Olivia’s household, a figure who, in the Elizabethan period was a highly trained and often well-educated person with responsibility for the running of a large house and estate. Malvolio, however, has developed a greater sense of his own importance. He is, as Maria points out, “a kind of puritan” (II.iii.130), and the humour of the "box-tree" scene and his appearance in yellow stockings “derives from the incongruity between his puritanical rectitude and the context in which he finds himself...”. The Puritan faction was a crucial part of Shakespearean society, providing a threat to both the social and religious traditions of generations. Forty years after Twelfth Night was written, the Civil War saw them running the country; a fact that critics often claim the play very accurately foreshows in Malvolio’s somewhat disconcerting exit line, “I’ll be revenged on the whole pack of you” (V.i.368). It is certainly tempting to read the play as a call for moderation in the changing society of the early seventeenth century.

Whilst Maria’s description suggests that Malvolio only adopts a puritanical demeanour when it suits him, it does not adequately explain that it is his unbending attitude towards his fellow human beings that means that eventually, he cannot be redeemed from himself. Being the puritan in the general Illyrian atmosphere of license and revelry allows him to create a sense of dignity and authority. What he forgets, and what Sir Toby reminds him of so abruptly in the "midnight revels" scene, that he is, in truth, no more than a steward. Malvolio’s crime, and the one for which he undergoes punishment, not only in the dark house but also by leaving the impending wedding festivities without allowing himself to be reconciled to the other inhabitants, is that he refuses to acknowledge a balance between the extremes of his existence and that of Sir Toby.

Taking Malvolio and Sir Toby as the opposite ends of the Illyrian spectrum gives us a personified image of the Saturnalian spirits of chaos and order. Sir Toby represents not only the advocate of perpetual festivity, but through it, the chaotic aspects of Illyria. For Illyria, whilst a place of magic and enchantment, is also a place of lurking dangers inspired by carnival revelry and reversals of normal behaviour. There is a wild and uncontrolled element that lurks beneath the apparent festivity and jollity of the surroundings. Illyria is, in the language of the play, a world "gone mad." No-one, not even the sanctimonious Malvolio is exempt from the influences of Illyrian magic and its carnivalesque reversals of normality and acceptability. It is a world pervaded by the non-conformist spirit of carnival that allows aristocrats to fall in love with servants, servants with their masters, and where stewards are able to entertain absurd delusions of grandeur. Disguise, mistaken identity, and gender reversals combine to provide a deliberate and provoking reversal of sixteenth century English social norms. Notions of madness and sanity are frequently invoked to provide a counterpoint to the normality of life outside the play, a fact we are reminded of by Feste, when he sings of the "wind and the rain" in his final song. It is not in fact a "real" place at all. Geographically, Shakespeare used the name for an area on the Adriatic coast, but in terms of the play, it exists only as a hypothetical parallel universe inhabited by drunkards and zealots.

Into this peculiar melting pot of puritan extremism and festive license arrives Viola, a heroine who brings with her the power for a restorative balance to the wild swings of mood, temperament, and behaviour inherent in Illyrian society. If Sir Toby represents the archaic "carnival king," and Malvolio the unbending proponent of puritanical abstinance, then Viola can be seen to approximate the reverse: the voice of reason and renewal. Sir Toby upholds chaos, Malvolio maintains rigid adherence to unrealistic self-denial, and Viola is eventually the mechanism for normality and order. Viola’s arrival suggests an influence from the external world – our world, the world of the audience – where festivity is confined within proper boundaries, and an apposite balance of gravity is achieved: nothing occurs in excess.

What we see therefore is that Twelfth Night refers not to the time of year at which the events in the play take place, nor perhaps even the time at which it was first performed. Twelfth Night is not about the end of the Christmas festivity period when the decorations come down and "normal" life is resumed, it is instead a picture of the chaos and order created by extremism at both ends of the spectrum. By association, the place in which the play is set is not geographically representative of any actual place, but of a hypothetical state in which the norms and order of everyday life are absent, and the chaos of excess runs unchecked. The opposing elements of liberalism and Puritanism espoused by the chief characters of the play, and the way in which the multi-plots of Twelfth Night rely heavily on the elements inherent in the historical festivities of Twelfth Night show that the title has much more to do with the pervading "anything goes" spirit of festival; the "What You Will" of the subtitle.

Simultaneity and coincidence are the essential features which connect Viola and Sebastian in Twelfth Night. Twins, after all, are born at the same time and coincide in one womb. Indeed, Sebastian identifies himself as Viola's twin, rather than merely her brother: "He [Sebastian of Messaline] left behind him myself and a sister, both born in an hour: if the heavens had been pleased, would we had so ended!" Though Viola never reveals that her brother is her twin until she is mistaken for him, Sebastian begins his existence in the play as a twin and, just as importantly, as a displaced twin. His lament for lost simultaneity is followed in the next scene by Viola's response to her own emotional quandary: "O time, thou must untangle this, not I, / It is too hard a knot for me t'untie" (2.2.39-40). For both twins, time is the deciding factor: Sebastian regrets the failure of simultaneity in his experience while Viola commits herself to time, both when she adopts her male disguise and when she discovers the situation which that disguise has provoked. By rescuing Sebastian, Antonio has, from Sebastian's perspective, disrupted the simultaneity of the twins' experience, which arose from their birth at the same time and was reflected in their crucial similarity of feature. What was once a twinned existence in brother and sister becomes a string of coincidences in Illyria. Whereas before they experienced life at the same time (and would have died at the same time), when the play begins their lives are only coincidentally the same. Both are rescued and befriended by a ship's captain; both set down in Illyria; both decide to serve Duke Orsino; and both are caught in the interplay between Olivia's household and the Duke's. The events which occur to them are similar but no longer identical.

In consequence, a minor but fascinating textual problem develops in Twelfth Night. As Dennis Huston succinctly puts it, "Sebastian and Viola collide spatially when they are temporally almost three months apart." The doubled time experienced by the twins arises from two unnecessarily specific temporal references, one which precedes the sequence of scenes which causes the problem and one which follows those scenes. Before Viola leaves the Duke to woo Olivia on his behalf, Valentine, noting how fond the Duke has become of his new page, draws her attention to the fact that "he [the Duke] hath known you but three days" (1.4.2-3). In the middle of the conversation between Viola and Olivia which immediately follows, after she parts company with Olivia in act 1, scene 5 and before she receives from Malvolio the ring Olivia has sent after her in act 2, scene 2, Sebastian lands in Illyria with Antonio. His first appearance in act 2, scene 1 would cause no controversy except that in act 5 Antonio insists that Sebastian has just arrived that day and has been with Antonio "for three months before" (5.1.92). During the three days in which Orsino has come to trust Cesario, Sebastian has passed three months with Antonio. Sebastian's lament for lost simultaneity is made literal in the context of the major differences between the twins' experiences: Viola becomes enamored of Orsino in three days, and Sebastian becomes the beloved of Antonio in three months.

This temporal disjunction provokes interesting responses from both critics and producers of the play. The standard critical explanation is that the incongruity is not noticeable to a spectator watching the action. As John Dover Wilson puts it, "It is only evident to the careful reader, the spectator would notice nothing wrong."4 When Twelfth Night becomes a text to be read rather than a performance which has a promptbook, the discrepancy becomes noticeable; the reader facing the text recognizes the references to time. Perhaps because Twelfth Night is so thoroughly a text as well as a play by the early 1700s, a number of productions, as presented in both promptbooks and performance editions, appear to resolve the problem anyway. They either omit all or part of Viola's conversation with Valentine in act 1, scene 4 or, more drastically, move the first scene between Sebastian and Antonio so that it does not intrude between Olivia sending the ring and Viola receiving it. Both resolutions of the double date within Twelfth Night are quite revealing, but the ease with which Valentine's reference to three days can be dropped shows how arbitrary the reference is from the start.

Twelfth Night shows an attention to time which rivals that in As You Like It, ranging from the sea captain's assertion that he was "bred and born / Not three hours' travel from this very place" (1.2.22-23) to the priest who has married Olivia and Sebastian "since when, my watch hath told me, toward my grave / I have travell'd but two hours" (5.1.160-61). Most often, however, periods of time define the relationships in this play, as if emotional distance or proximity were a temporal consideration. Orsino responds to Olivia's plan to mourn for seven years by imagining how great her love for him will be if she will "pay this debt of love but to a brother" (1.1.34). When Valentine marvels at the threeday bond between Orsino and Cesario, he seems to suggest an instant attraction. Even Malvolio articulates his imagined relationship with Olivia in a specific time frame and plans his life, "Having been three months married to her" (2.5.44). These measures of affection have all the consistency of Cecily and Gwendolen in The Importance of Being Earnest when each stakes her claim as Ernest's fiancée by asserting, respectively, the most recent proposal or the first.5 In the same way, strength of affection in Twelfth Night can be measured in one scene by seven year's mourning and in another by three day's acquaintance.

Yet the force of time as a measure of emotional ties most vividly appears in Sebastian's assertions of his feeling for his sister and in Antonio's response to the apparent betrayal of Sebastian. Sebastian's claim of being born within an hour of Viola first introduces simultaneity as a principle of closeness. Their separation in the course of the play, first introduced by Viola and then intensified in Sebastian's claim of twinning, signals a failure of congruent experience. This loss of simultaneity is set against the way relationships in Illyria are figured in terms of varying, and even sometimes contradictory, time frames.

Antonio brings together these two models in response to the twins he perceives as one. He represents "Sebastian's" inexplicable coldness to him by describing how Sebastian "grew a twenty years' removed thing / While one would wink; denied me mine own purse, / Which I had recommended to his use / Not half an hour before" (5.1.87-90). He offers this description in almost the same breath in which he affirms that he and Sebastian have spent the last three months married to her" (2.5.44). These measures of affection have all the consistency of Cecily and Gwendolen in The Importance of Being Earnest when each stakes her claim as Ernest's fiancée by asserting, respectively, the most recent proposal or the first.5 In the same way, strength of affection in Twelfth Night can be measured in one scene by seven year's mourning and in another by three day's acquaintance.

When Antonio first invokes the model of simultaneity, his claim is dismissed as lunacy. Even so, Orsino's response to him extends the three days of Valentine's remark to three months: "fellow, thy words are madness. / Three months this youth hath tended upon me" (5.1.96-97). Thus begins the process in the final scene.

whereby the coincidences in Twelfth Night begin to produce simultaneity. The odd congruence of Orsino's and Antonio's three-month connection with Cesario, the similar claims on her loyalty from Olivia and Orsino, and the identical grievances of Sir Toby and Sir Andrew are concurrent demands on Viola which build to the ultimate coincidence: "One face, one voice, one habit, and two persons!" (5.1.214). This final coincidence, which cannot be explained away as Antonio's madness or Viola's duplicity, leads the twins to their dance of mutual recognition. They survey what proofs, what coincidences, link them. Each had a father named Sebastian; the father of each had a mole upon his brow. The final and deciding coincidence is, suitably, temporal—both recall the father who "died that day when Viola from her birth / Had number'd thirteen years" (5.1.242-43).

The most unusual aspect of this proof is frequently overshadowed by Sebastian's inexplicable failure to identify himself as Viola's twin: he does not acknowledge that his father also died on his thirteenth birthday but says, "He finished indeed his mortal act / That day that made my sister thirteen years" (5.1.245-46). His answer apparently violates the parallelism of their mutual catechism ("My father had a mole upon his brow." / "And so had mine" [5.1.240-41]), but actually follows Viola's impulse to identify herself. After all, Sebastian has external verification when he recognizes Antonio and Antonio names him; Viola's identity is the issue, as Sebastian's questions indicate: "what kin are you to me? / What countryman? What name? What parentage?" (5.1.228-29). Her self-identification depends on the internal evidence of memory. The proof she offers is remarkable indeed—the date of her thirteenth birthday is the date of her father's death. Olivia reinforces this return to simultaneity and restored relationships when she offers to be Orsino's sister and asserts that "one day shall crown th'alliance on't" (5.1.317); the twins will marry simultaneously, and Orsino and Olivia will become brother and sister in amity at the same time. The "whirligig of time" (5.1.375) may bring its revenges to Malvolio, but "golden time convents" (5.1.381) to sort out most of the other relationships in Illyria—once the twins are restored to the same time.

Similar concerns for simultaneity and identity, time and connection, are the very principles at work in the determinations of two very different dates for the play in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. In the late 1700s when Edmond Malone first argued that a chronology of Shakespeare's plays would be useful, texts like Twelfth Night which appear only in the Folio posed special problems. In the absence of quartos or other early references, scholars relied on internal evidence to ascertain a play's date. Horace Howard Furness points out in the Variorum edition that a scholar named Thomas Tyrwhitt discovered an apparent topical reference to undertakers; as a result, the play was dated at 1614 when there was considerable parliamentary furor about undertaking, "although this date involved the undesirable conclusion that Twelfth Night was the last play that Shakespeare had written."6 Published references to the 1614 origin of Twelfth Night actually begin with Malone's "An Attempt to Ascertain the Order in Which the Plays Attributed to Shakespeare Were Written," which is included as part of the introductory material in the George Steevens edition of Shakespeare's works in 1778.7 In discussing the chronology he offers, Malone affirms the 1614 date by challenging readers to discover "among the plays produced before 1600, compositions of equal merit with Othello, King Lear, Macbeth, The Tempest, and Twelfth Night which we have reason to believe were all written in the latter period" (p. 271). For the next fifty years, most experts considered Twelfth Night to be one of the later, if not the last, of Shakespeare's works.

References to the 1614 date of Twelfth Night's composition occur in a variety of places besides Malone's scholarly essay. Perhaps the most pervasive case is The Life of WILLIAM SHAKSPEARE: Collected and Arranged from Numerous Rare and Authentic Documents. Containing EVERY FACT OF IMPORTANCE from the Birth of This Eminent Poet to the Close of His Brilliant Career, written by Joseph Graves in the 1820s. Though Graves acknowledges that all efforts to establish which of Shakespeare's plays was written first have failed, he feels confident enough about some of the sequence to assert that: "we may not hesitate . . . to station 'Pericles, the three parts of Henry VI., Love's Labour lost; The Comedy of Errors; The Taming of the Shrew; King John; and Richard II.;' among his earliest productions, we may with equal confidence, arrange 'Macbeth; Lear; Othello; Twelfth Night; and the Tempest;' with his latest, assigning them to that season of life, when his mind exulted in the conscious plenitude of power.” The cover of this Life of Shakespeare announces that it is "adapted and printed, for the purpose of binding up with any edition of Shakespeare's Plays." Some editions, particularly Cumberland's British Theatre (1830), did indeed bind up Graves's version of Shakespeare's life with the plays. Moreover, others who were producing biographies of Shakespeare echoed Graves, like Charles Symmons, who in 1837 also assumed that Shakespeare wrote Twelfth Night "when his mind exulted in the conscious plenitude of power."

Even The Dramatic Souvenir: Being Literary and Graphical Illustrations of SHAKESPEARE and Other Celebrated English Dramatists, published in 1833, devotes fully half of its "literary illustration" of the play to discussing its composition: "Malone considered Twelfth-Night was written at leisure, in 1614, when the author had retired from the Theatre, the very last of his plays, and about three years before his death." These ideas about the date of the play were also accepted by Shakespeare enthusiasts, as John William Cole's intensely annotated edition of Shakespeariana indicates. His copious notes on the available editions and documents associated with Shakespeare testify to his interest in the plays and their author, while he lists in his own hand Twelfth Night's date of composition as 1614.

However, in 1831 John P. Collier completely revised the date of Twelfth Night's composition by publishing his discovery of John Manningham's 1601-2 diary entry, which alludes explicitly to a production of the comedy: "Feb 2, 1601 [-2] At our feast we had a play called Twelve Night or what you will, much like the comedy of errors, or Menechmi in Plautus, but most like & neere to that in Italian called Inganni. A good practise in it to make the steward believe his lady widdowe was in love with him by counterfayting a letter." This reference seems indeed, as Collier says, "a striking, and at the same time a rarely occurring, and convincing proof (p. 327). This determination also completely revises the date promoted by Malone and others.

This nominally "absolute" determination of the comedy's date dislocates the text; as a result, later editions had to explain the change. Burton's Theatre Edition, published in 1852, quotes the Oxberry introduction but carefully rectifies the date by offering Collier's discovery, evidently common knowledge by that time (p. V). Other editors, like those of Chambers's Household Shakespeare (1840), felt obligated to justify the earlier error: "The dramatic art evinced in Twelfth Night, and its general excellence, led to a belief that it was one of the poet's latest productions" (p. I). Far from rendering the comedy more firmly established, the diary entry actually exposes the ways in which even identical texts can vary because of "extratextual" considerations such as their date of composition.

The Tyrwhitt Twelfth Night (1614) differs from the post-Manningham Twelfth Night (1602) established by Collier because Tyrwhitt depended on the way the playwright's imagination supposedly transformed and reflected the events of his day within the play. Collier, on the other hand, derived his date for the play from the physical evidence of the play's production. Both versions of Twelfth Night's date depend on the crucial mutuality which the play itself considers—coincidence and simultaneity. For Tyrwhitt, and Malone as well, the mention of undertakers in act 3, scene 4 and the furor over "undertaking" in Parliament in 1614 were too great a coincidence for the reference not to be deliberate: "Mr. Tyrwhitt, with great probability, conjectures, that Twelfth Night was written in 1614: grounding his opinion on an allusion, which it seems to contain, to those parliamentary undertakers, of whom frequent mention is made in the Journals of the House of Commons for that year" (Malone, p. 344). Toby's jesting about undertaking reflected Shakespeare's creative rendering of a topical issue particularly hot in 1614—the two must have occurred simultaneously.

When Collier discovered the Manningham diary, Toby's comment was revealed as an irrelevant coincidence rather than one which denotes simultaneity. The many features which define the comedy Manningham saw—the title Twelve Night, Or what you will, the plot's similarity to The Comedy of Errors, the trick on a steward involving a letter—coincide in the diary entry dated 1601. Although there is a play by John Marston called What You Will, all the circumstances in Manningham's diary combined constitute an even greater coincidence than a single reference to undertakers. Thus the occurrence of Manningham writing in his diary and Shakespeare's company producing Twelfth Night must be mutually determinant—the date attached to one can also be attached to the other.

Like the twins, two texts of Twelfth Night, one dated 1614 and another dated 1601, look the same but participate in different relationships. These doubled texts enact the situation imagined in Jorge Luis Borges's short story "Pierre Menard, Author of Don Quixote". The narrator claims that Menard's "work, possibly the most significant of our time, consists of the ninth and thirty-eighth chapters of Part One of Don Quixote and a fragment of the twenty-second chapter."¹⁴ Menard does not copy the novel; he does not produce a contemporary version or a transcription; he does not write it by reenacting Cervantes's life. He takes up a different challenge—to write Don Quixote as Pierre Menard. As a result, the narrator tells us, "The text of Cervantes and that of Menard are verbally identical, but the second is almost infinitely richer" (p. 52). In this story, Borges displays the inherent contradiction between, on the one hand, attempting to anchor the text historically in relation to its author and, on the other hand, claiming that a text transcends its time. By insisting that the second Don Quixote is "infinitely richer," Borges imagines that the temporal displacement enriches and changes the text, even though the later version is "verbally identical." The second Twelfth Night, dated at 1601, may not necessarily be "infinitely richer" but it has certainly occasioned many more readings of the play, including some analyses explicitly based on the 1601 date, like Leslie Hotson's The First Night of Twelfth Night.¹⁵

For the readers of the early nineteenth century, Twelfth Night is a comedy self-evidently from the close of Shakespeare's career. Yet, for the twentieth-century reader, with the benefit of 150 years of scholarship based on the 1601 date, Twelfth Night is obviously a middle comedy with connections to Hamlet and to the tragedies. Like the two versions of Don Quixote in Borges's story—one from the sixteenth century and one from the twentieth—the Folio text of Twelfth Night before 1831 and after are typographically identical, but utterly different.

Although Twelfth Night seems one of the least problematic works in the Shakespearean canon because we can now establish its date so confidently, the achievement of that fixed date actually reveals the text's multiplicity rather than its singularity. Moreover, the real purpose of dating Twelfth Night or any Shakespearean play is not so much absolute as relational. The shift of Twelfth Night's date not only exposes the doubled nature of that play, but also calls into question the status of The Tempest. The speculation on The Tempest as Shakespeare's last play (and final statement) originated at the time when Twelfth Night's date shifted. Malone corrected his own chronology in 1821 to give the date as 1607, and, as Gary Taylor notes, Thomas Campbell at around the same time first put forward the attractive theory about The Tempest's valedictory quality.¹⁶

When Malone initially published his attempt to discover the order of Shakespeare's plays, he laid out the potential importance of such knowledge: "While it has been the endeavour of all his editors and commentators, to illustrate his obscurities, and to regulate and correct his text, no attempt has been made to trace the progress and order of his plays. Yet surely it is no incurious speculation, to mark the gradations by which he rose from mediocrity to the summit of excellence; from artless and uninteresting dialogues, to those unparalleled compositions, which have rendered him the delight and wonder of successive ages" (pp. 270-71). Malone implied that the idea of giving a chronology to Shakespeare's works had not occurred to anyone before him, even though Nicholas Rowe indicated his own curiosity concerning the dating of the plays as early as 1709 (Taylor, p. 157). Malone also linked chronology to the evolution of Shakespeare's art. Indeed the readers and critics of Malone's day were interested in his chronology and fashioned their own theories of Shakespeare's development. Joseph Graves gave a typical view: "It is probable that such as were founded on the works of preceding authors, were the first essays of his dramatic talent: and such as were more perfectly his own, and are of the first sparkle of excellence, were among his last" (pp. 9-10). Graves, like Malone and others, carried his point by inviting the reader to compare the earlier works with the superior later ones.
The significance of dates, then, is twofold. The comedy's date of composition determines its connections with the other plays, and those connections anchor the text to the author's evolving psyche. As Margreta de Grazia has argued, Malone's purpose in determining the sequence of plays was little more than a small part of his overarching aim to establish Shakespeare as an individual. She further suggests that this treatment of Shakespeare's artistic development becomes a model for the emerging bourgeois subject.\textsuperscript{17} That model hinged on the idea that his development registered ever-greater perfection.

Comments on \textit{Twelfth Night} found in performance editions before 1831 underscore this notion. George Daniel's 1830 introduction to the play is particularly fulsome: "It is, therefore, not without emotion that we approach this last work of Shakspeare's mighty genius. . . . That Shakspeare parted with the world on terms of friendship, this legacy of his love sufficiently demonstrates; though, in the Epilogue Song (the last lines that he ever wrote,) we think we can discover something that savours of transient bitterness" (Cumberland, p. 5). Daniel even goes so far as to praise John Fawcett's acting of Feste by commenting that "he sang the Epilogue Song with true comic spirit; and with a harmony and feeling as if conscious that the last words of Shakspeare were trembling on his lips" (Cumberland, p. 7). While asserting \textit{Twelfth Night}'s privileged position as the last play, these statements also raise several problems.

Most striking, perhaps, is the reference to the Epilogue Song, which we are asked to take as Shakespeare's last words. After all, Malone himself notes that the song appears "earlier" in Shakespeare's career, in a slightly different form as one of the Fool's songs in \textit{Lear}\textsuperscript{18} If Feste's cryptic song is Shakespeare's final statement, the various attempts to decipher or dismiss the song which begin as early as 1774 with Bell's edition take on new significance: "The epilogue song gives spirit to the conclusion, tho' there is very little meaning in it, except a trifling address to the audience in the last line" (Bell, vol. 5, p. 329).\textsuperscript{19} The song troubled Leigh Hunt as well, who praised Fawcett's presentation of the Clown's role but disliked the song: "Yet we do not like to think that this was the last song which Shakespeare wrote. It has too much of the scorn of the world and all he has seen in it."\textsuperscript{20}

There are also more subtle problems revealed in the assumptions expressed by Daniel. For example, it is now common knowledge (with all the uncertainty the phrase should imply) that Shakespeare left the theatre well before he left the world. Yet placing the date of \textit{Twelfth Night} at 1614 suggests that Shakespeare wrote the play after retiring from London. \textit{Twelfth Night} is thus not only the last of his plays but also a work written after he left the playhouse. Malone goes to some lengths to explore this most unusual aspect of Tyrwhitt's date. He develops an elaborate explanation of why Shakespeare would take up the pen again after he had abandoned the theatre: "When Shakspeare quitted London and his profession, for the tranquillity of a rural retirement, it is improbable that such an excursive genius should have been immediately reconciled to a state of mental inactivity, . . . To the necessity, therefore, of literary amusement to every cultivated mind, or to the dictates of friendship, or to both these incentives, we are perhaps indebted for the comedy of \textit{Twelfth Night}; which bears evident marks of having been composed at leisure, as most of the characters that it contains, are finished to a higher degree of dramatrick perfection, than is discoverable in our author's earlier comick performances" (Malone, p. 344). Malone perceived a greater perfection in Shakespeare's characterization in his "last" comedy, underscoring his notions of Shakespeare's developmental improvement. Daniel concurred and reinforced this sentiment in the opening of his introduction: "We have now come to the last production of the Divine Shakspeare. Having followed his genius through its bright path of glory, we arrive at the point where it sets, with a splendour worthy of its highest meridian" (Cumberland, p. 5).

These comments may seem like little more than amusing, if antiquated, examples of previous misconceptions about Shakespeare, which we can safely ignore. Nevertheless, the readers of Shakespeare in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries knew a different \textit{Twelfth Night} from the 1601 text we read now, whether they subscribed to the bardolatrous view of the comedy which Daniel offers or thought, as the Oxberry edition tells us, that "it is not a little singular that this play should be one of the last of Shakspeare's productions, a play that has all the joyousness and revelry of youth about it" (Oxberry, p. ii).
Even though explanations of Shakespeare's developing art have changed considerably, Malone was more prophetic than he knew. While perhaps no longer a subject as hotly debated as it was when Malone and George Chalmers argued about whether Shakespeare wrote Twelfth Night "in 1614 or in 1613" (Souvenir, p. v), the dating of his plays still functions as the unacknowledged foundation for many critical arguments. Our readings depend upon the coincidences recorded in Manningham's diary as thoroughly as Malone and Tyrwhitt relied on a coincidental reference to undertakers. However, as the twins' experiences in the play and Malone's error point out, coincidences do not necessarily indicate simultaneity. Current criticism may take a different model of development, but it derives comparably from the interconnections between chronologically linked plays and their presumed reflections of an author's individual evolving psyche.

For example, many psychoanalytic approaches to Twelfth Night rely on its position in Shakespeare's development. Leonard Manheim argues that the play is a wish-fulfillment fantasy restoring the playwright's son Hamnet, twin to Judith, who died in 1596. In turn, Thomas MacCary discovers in the plays a model of male sexual development through homoerotic attraction which he sees most fully expressed in the mature comedies like Twelfth Night: "The late romances do not share that fervour and obsession so characteristic in the mature comedies like Twelfth Night." Joel Fineman, in his argument about the shifting uses of doubling at the crucial shift in Shakespeare's career from comedy to tragedy, implicitly depends on the contemporaneity of the four plays he considers, As You Like It, Hamlet, Troilus and Cressida, and, of course, Twelfth Night. Likewise, C. L. Barber and Richard Wheeler explicitly rely on canon chronology for their study of Shakespeare's psychology, The Whole Journey. For these critics, involved in considering Shakespeare's development, the status of Twelfth Night as mature comedy is essential and unquestioned.

Even critics less overtly concerned with Shakespeare's overall psychological development also assume the fixed placement of Twelfth Night in the canon. Nowhere in his essay about the problem of identity in the play does Dennis Huston specify the play's date as a concern, yet he opens the essay by explicitly linking the comedy to Hamlet and brackets the comedy's treatment of sexuality as "an idea that Shakespeare used twice before as a starting point for comedy—in Love's Labour's Lost and The Taming of the Shrew—and would use again with more serious overtones in Measure for Measure" (p. 283). Matthew Wikander, who juxtaposes psychological and anthropological readings of adolescent experience in Twelfth Night with the experiences of the boy-actress in Shakespeare's company, also calls upon Hamlet in support of the ambivalence toward the theatre which he reads in the boy-actress facing his uncertain future in the company.

In contrast to the central and sometimes invisible role of the 1601 date in these studies, the 1614 date figures in current criticism only as a curiosity. Both Margreta de Grazia and Gary Taylor mention it in passing, but both are more concerned with the developing uses of Shakespeare as an icon rather than with the development of a particular set of texts. Taylor, for example, dismisses Leigh Hunt's praise of Twelfth Night as Shakespeare's last play with the conclusion that, given modern scholarship, Hunt is wrong (p. 157). The 1614 date is simply incorrect and therefore irrelevant. Or is it? After all, Taylor catalogs successive generations of scholars and readers who all discover their own versions of Shakespearean authenticity, and de Grazia explores late-eighteenth- and early-nineteenth-century scholarly recuperations in terms of the emergence of bourgeois subjectivity. Similarly, because revisions of the date relocate and duplicate a text like Twelfth Night, the text's relationships to the rest of the canon are more historical constructs than transparent reflections of Shakespeare's development.

The shift in Twelfth Night's date implicitly challenges any absolute assumptions, including our own, about the comedy's position in the Shakespearean canon. The historical contingency of our ideas about Shakespeare's chronology, based on the evidence available now, suggests that the suppositions in our current criticism and the analyses themselves are only provisional. However, the resulting loss of transcendent truth does not negate the value of their readings and assumptions or of ours. Instead the significance of successive understandings of the Shakespearean text derives from their historical specificity, that is, from their placement within a particular cultural situation and historical moment. Consequently, the 1614 date of Twelfth Night is more than a mistake or an oddity; it is one of those historical moments which reveals the multiplicity of Shakespearean plays in general and of \textit{Twelfth Night} in particular. Collier's discovery changed the \textit{Twelfth Night} texts as it changed the comedy's date of composition because the physical texts of the play, which we think of as permanent and limited, always exist only within a multiplicity of contexts, including their several selves.

For some scholars, this multiplicity may seem easily resolved. After all, doesn't the problem disappear if what is "really" changing is the interpretation and not the material text itself? This question raises the implicit issue of the material text and its boundaries. The narrative of \textit{Twelfth Night}'s changing date actually reveals three distinct texts, all of which are (at least potentially) typographically the same. The first is the \textit{Twelfth Night} for which the date of composition is irrelevant and unknowable, mere speculation according to Nicholas Rowe. When Malone introduces the importance of recovering the chronology of Shakespeare's plays, not only does he initiate the creation of the Shakespearean subject, as de Grazia argues, he also creates a second \textit{Twelfth Night}, composed around 1614. With the chronology, what was outside the text and unnoted becomes part of the text and inseparable from its interpretation. As the 1601 date gradually became well known, altering the comedy's position among Shakespeare's plays, the change yielded yet a third \textit{Twelfth Night}. The very typographical sameness of these \textit{Twelfth Night} texts points to the real issue: what is inside and what is outside the text? The uncertainty of the text's limits, which this chapter explores in terms of date, the rest of this book examines in terms of the many physical texts associated with Shakespeare's comedy.

Thus double dating offers my first negotiations between "inside" and "outside" the text. When Jacques Derrida argues that the text is "henceforth no longer a finished corpus of writing, some content enclosed in a book or its margins, but a differential network, a fabric of traces referring endlessly to something other than itself," he suggests that texts endlessly overrun their apparent boundaries. Nonetheless, we assume an inside and an outside to texts like \textit{Twelfth Night}. On the one hand, the shifting grounds of \textit{Twelfth Night}'s date implies that dating is somehow outside the text, changeable, subject to constant revision, victim to chance, coincidence, and time. The double date is an aberration; our current date is correct. On the other hand, the changes that \textit{Twelfth Night} underwent between the early nineteenth century and now, merely because of the dating, suggest that the changeability of \textit{Twelfth Night}'s date is part of the multiple traces which break open the notion of the singular text.

In the shift of dates, the texts of \textit{Twelfth Night} experience a temporal dislocation similar to that the twins experience in Illyria; the 1614 \textit{Twelfth Night} exists in a different time with different connections than the 1601 \textit{Twelfth Night}, even though they both occur in one place—the Folio text. When the coincidences overwhelmingly support the 1602 date, \textit{Twelfth Night} apparently takes on a fixed, determinant date. Comparably, when coincidence supports Sebastian's version of time, identity is restored, as Viola redefines herself in terms of father/author and twin. The mysterious other time which Viola/Cesario occupied during the comedy vanishes, just as the 1614 date of the Tyrwhitt \textit{Twelfth Night} becomes irrelevant and has, in essence, vanished. Perhaps the spectators watching the play, like the critics now discussing the date, would not notice the double time of the twins' experience, yet it is that separation and reunion of the twins in time which underscores the metaphoric force of relative time in many relationships within the play.

As a result, the end of \textit{Twelfth Night} gives a truer picture than the current critical perception of a single \textit{Twelfth Night} fashioned around 1600: Viola and Sebastian are twins, the same in appearance but involved in different relationships. The Tyrwhitt \textit{Twelfth Night}, associated with the late plays and implicated in an early-nineteenth-century theory of Shakespeare's development, and the Manningham \textit{Twelfth Night}, associated with the end of Shakespeare's comic writing and implicated in his psychological development, are the same but different. The existence of the second does not negate or dissolve the experience of the first, any more than the dominance of Sebastian's time and the resulting coincidences negate Viola's earlier experiences in the play. \textit{Twelfth Night} leaves us with both twins, and I argue that this history of double dating leaves us with multiple texts. The odd congruence of the history of \textit{Twelfth Night}'s dating and the stories of the twins within the play is, of course, just coincidence.
For my reading, that coincidence demonstrates that the multiplicity of texts, generated materially through history as Jerome McGann suggests, constantly reworks the boundaries of "the text." The permeable, provisional edges, the Derridean "folds" where suddenly the outside edge touches the inside of the form, open a space which is somehow neither inside nor outside. Reading the "outside" history of Shakespearean texts, as this book does, does not and cannot avoid reading the "inside" of those texts as well. This continuing transgression of the textual edges, which are themselves constantly under construction and erasure, is an essential feature of my critical project. The apparently exterior history of performance editions—considered to be outside proper textual history, irrelevant to reading the play, tangential in critical scholarship—also offers an "interior" history of the comedy: a repetition of loss and return, impossible desire and shifting sexual identity, displacement and continuity, and, inevitably, simultaneity and coincidence.

2 Olivia's emotional turmoils are also marked by time as a clock inexplicably strikes in the middle of her confession of love for Cesario and she responds, "The clock upbraids me with the waste of time" (3.1.132).

describes, where the "inverted reapplication of the outer edge to the inside of a form where the outside then opens a pocket," offers the text as Kleinian bottle, where the outside somehow becomes an inside (Derrida, "Living On," p. 96).

The emergence of queer studies in the academy has led to many influential rereadings of Renaissance works, including those of Shakespeare. While Twelfth Night continues to be one of the major textual sites for the discussion of homoerotic representation in Shakespeare, interpretive conclusions about the effect of same-sex attraction in this comedy are divided, especially in light of the natural "bias" of the heterosexual marriages in act 5. The relationship between Antonio and Sebastian has proven the most fertile ground for queer inquiry; for example, Joseph Pequigney recently has set out, in New-Critical fashion, to prove the "sexual orientation" of these two characters as unquestionably "homosexual" in a play whose "recurring theme" is "bisexuality." Although Pequigney's observations are refreshing as well as important, "The Two Antonios and Same-Sex Love" unproblematically applies contemporary constructions of sexual identity to an early modern culture in which the categories of homo- and bisexuality were neither fixed nor associated with identity. In fact, as I will argue, Twelfth Night is centrally concerned with demonstrating the uncategorical temper of sexual attraction.

The other main focus of queer study in this drama continues to be the relationship between the Countess Olivia and the cross-dressing Viola/Cesario, though critics, tellingly, have discussed the lesbian erotics that are integral to the first three acts of the play much less often. In her recent Desire and Anxiety: The Circulation of Sexuality in Shakespearean Drama, Valerie Traub has acknowledged the lesbian overtones of the erotic scenes between Olivia and Viola as part of what she calls the play's "multiple erotic investments"; but her careful and ground-breaking study warns us that Viola's homoerotic investment is not celebrated in the play and concludes that Twelfth Night is less "comfortably" open in its representation of the "fluid circulation" of desire than As You Like It. In my view, the Olivia-Viola affair is more central to Twelfth Night than previously has been acknowledged. This centrality—along with the homoerotics found in relations between Antonio and Sebastian as well as between Orsino and his page—establish same-sex erotic attraction as a "major theme" in the play, to use Pequigney's shopworn term. But this theme functions neither as an uncomplicated promotion of a modern category of sexual orientation nor, from a more traditional perspective, as an ultimately contained representation of the licensed misrule of saturnalia. The representation of homoerotic attraction in Twelfth Night functions rather as a means of dramatizing the socially constructed basis of a sexuality that is determined by gender identity.

Judith Butler's critique of the notion that there are fixed identities based on the existence of genital difference provides a useful model for understanding how Twelfth Night uses the vagaries of erotic attraction to disrupt paradigms of sexuality. In Gender Trouble, Butler argues that the cultural meanings that attach to a sexed body—what we call gender—are theoretically applicable to either sex. Initially, Butler questions the idea that there is an essential, prediscursive subjectivity that attaches to the biology of either male or female, arguing that the "production of sex as the prediscursive ought to be understood as the effect of the apparatus of cultural constructions designated by gender." In other words, what she calls the law—the cultural, social, and political imperatives of social reality—actually produces and then conceals the "constructedness" that lies behind the notion of an immutable, prediscursive "subject before the law" (2). Her attack on the concept of biological inherence is followed by an equally strong indictment of the "metaphysics of gender substance"—the unproblematic claim that a subject can choose a gendered identity, that the self can "be a woman" or a man (21).

In Bodies That Matter, Butler's subsequent work, she partially retreats from this position of radical constructivism, returning to the sexed body by shifting the terms of the debate from the "construction" of "gender" through an interpretation of "sex" to an inquiry into the way regulatory norms "materialize" the sexed body, both in the sense of making it relevant and fixing or "consolidating" it. The reiteration of norms simultaneously produces and destabilizes the category of sex, creating "terrains" and "sedimented effects" that influence the way we understand the sexed body. Even as the process of materialization creates boundaries, surfaces, and contours by which sex is established as heterosexually normative, these strategies of materialization simultaneously expose the exclusions and "gaps" that are the constitutive instabilities inherent in these norms. Bodies That Matter seeks to understand how what has been foreclosed or banished from the "proper" domain of "sex"—where that domain is secured through a heterosexualizing imperative—might at once be produced as a troubling return, not only as an imaginary contestation that effects a failure in the workings of the inevitable law, but as an enabling disruption, the occasion for a radical rearticulation of the symbolic horizon in which bodies come to matter at all.

In both Gender Trouble and Bodies That Matter the primary way that the categories of sex are both established and disrupted is through a process of what Butler calls "performativity," the means by which the norms of sex are naturalized and substantiated simply by their continual pronouncement as foundational and ideal—by the sheer weight of their repetition. Yet because this reiteration necessarily creates erasures that are the very cites of deconstructive possibilities, the interrogation of those exclusions is one strategy by which the symbolic hegemony of sexuality can be challenged. Although performativity is primarily a discursive practice derived from the notion of the performative in rhetoric, Butler acknowledges cross-dressing as a performative practice in which the "sign" of gender is parodically reiterated in a potentially subversive way. The performance of cross-dressing can be disruptive, Butler argues, to the extent it "reflects the mundane impersonations by which heterosexually ideal genders are performed" (231) or "exposes the failure of heterosexual regimes ever fully to legislate or contain their own ideals" (237).

Within the context of early modern theatrical culture, Shakespeare's Twelfth Night functions as a dramatic critique of the ideal norm of imperative heterosexuality in three interrelated ways. First, the effects of Viola's cross-dressing point to the socially constructed nature of gender in Shakespeare's play. Secondly, Shakespeare's drama interrogates the exclusionary nature of the constructed categories of sex and challenges the symbolic hegemony of heterosexual love by producing representations or "citations" of same-sex love between Viola and Olivia as well as Antonio and Sebastian. Lastly, I will argue that the final act, through a series of improbable turns of plot and phrase, exposes the failure of heterosexual "regimes ever fully to legislate or contain their own ideals."

Gender Trouble in Twelfth Night: I. The Renaissance Context: "I, poor monster" (2.2.33)10

The early modern English theatre, unlike its counterparts in other European countries, maintained the practice of using all-male acting companies to perform the parts of both men and women. Thus, an element of what Butler calls the "denaturalization" of gender difference is built into the structure of Elizabethan stage convention, and Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, like many other plays of the period, dramatizes the consequences of this ambiguity by casting its heroine Viola, played by a boy, as a character who cross-dresses as the male page Cesario. In the doubly androgynous role of male actor playing a woman playing a man, Viola/Cesario must literally perform the role of the male; her success before the aristocratic Orsino and Olivia consequently points to the constructedness and performative character of gender itself. In other Renaissance critical venues, the concept of performance in social roles has been discussed convincingly by Stephen Greenblatt as "self-fashioning" and by others in relation to the role of the courtier in Castiglione's famous treatise. Shakespeare's Twelfth Night is arguably about the fashioning of gender. This staging of gender imitation by Viola, the performance of her gender performance, uses her disguise and her identity with her brother Sebastian as vehicles to demonstrate that erotic attraction is not an inherently gendered or heterosexual phenomenon. The homoerotic and cross-gendered disruptions that ensue, finally, operate within a world that is properly named Ill-lyria in order to demonstrate how the phenomenon of love itself operates as a mechanism that destabilizes gender binarism and its concomitant hierarchies. Lovers like Olivia, Orsino, Malvolio, and Antonio construct fantasies that turn the objects of their affection into something more than they are, thereby disrupting the boundaries of compulsory heterosexuality and classconsciousness through the performance of these imaginary fantasies.

Butler's postmodern promotion of gender trouble and its application to Shakespeare's dramatization of sexual identity finds historical support in Renaissance conceptions of masculinity and femininity that, by most accounts, were much less essentialized than today's fixed categories of woman and man. Arguably more patriarchal, more homophobic, and more misogynist than contemporary western culture, the polarized rhetoric of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Europe nevertheless masks a decided anxiety about what is feared to be the actual fluidity of gender. Studying the pseudomedical treatises of the period, commentators like Thomas Lacquer have argued convincingly that sixteenth-century anatomists viewed female genitalia as merely an inverted male penis and testicles. Renaissance scientist Johann Weyer, for example, states, "although women are feminine in actuality, I would call them masculine in potentiality," indicating the degree to which women were thought of as merely incomplete males, capable on certain traumatic physical occasions—a particularly tall hurdle or heated liaison—of springing forth a penis. What Weyer refuses to admit, in spite of evidence to the contrary from the physician Ausonius, is that men, given the proper circumstances, could as it were suck in their genitalia and become women. "[N]ature always adds, never subtracts," Weyer insists, "always thrusts forth, never holds back, always moves toward the more worthy, never toward the less" (346). Weyer's phobic response to the possibility of reciprocated interchange between men and women, his resort to ethics to uphold his science, is a telling sign that the barriers between masculine and feminine in Renaissance discourse were considerably more blurred than they are today. Although Greenblatt has argued that this homology between the sexes was almost always presented within the rhetorical context of a patriarchal ideology, the possibility of women becoming men and to a lesser extent men becoming women was a real one for the physiologic consciousness of the Elizabethan, who upon viewing the final scene of Twelfth Night saw just how interchangeable sex as well as gender were.

The English Renaissance popularity of both the all-male stage companies and plays about gender switching reflects a social and cultural fascination with the subject who symbolized the bodily cite of this gender ambiguity: the hermaphrodite—strictly speaking, a person who possesses both male and female sexual organs, but more broadly defined as an androgynous subject with both male and female characteristics. Ann Rosalind Jones and Peter Stallybrass have argued that Renaissance discussions of hermaphroditism reveal that all attempts to fix gender during this period were essentially "prosthetic," that gender in the Renaissance was "a fetish" that played "with its own fetishistic nature" unhampered by the essentializing claims of medicine and biology in the nineteenth century. Their view is usefully contrasted to that of Greenblatt, whose essay on Twelfth Night focuses finally on the way the discourse of androgyny is recuperated into a masculine ethos that supports a patriarchal gender hierarchy. The views of these critics are not, however, mutually exclusive; anxiety over the "prosthetic" nature of gender difference could well have produced the exaggerated rhetoric of misogyny and male superiority common in Renaissance discourse. In a play like Jonson's Epicoene, for example, representations of the ambiguity of gender in the silent woman exist in conjunction with the rhetoric of antifeminism in speeches by Truewit and Morose. When Sir Edward Coke, the foremost English jurist of the Renaissance states in his Commentaries that "every heir is either a male, or female, or an hermaphrodite, that is both male and female," he is acknowledging the degree to which official discourse sanctioned what Trumbach calls the "third sex." But when the same jurist states that hermaphrodites are required by law to follow either a masculine or female role exclusively, his injunction manifests an official desire to place that third term within a juridical binarism that reduces gender to the binary of sex.

The figure of the hermaphrodite, both on and off the stage, gives Renaissance culture a more ready and accepted focus for the questioning of the ideology of gender, even though the rhetoric of that ideology remains more strident. The Renaissance preoccupation with hermaphrodites in medical discourse accompanies social concerns about transvestites walking the streets of London like Moll Cutpurse or the ingle in Middleton's Microcynicon," as well as in political concerns about queens who were kings (Elizabeth) and kings who were queens (James I). At the outset, however, we must be careful about readily ascribing erotic motivation or sociological categories to these transgender experiences. Cross-dressing was and is undertaken by different subjects for different reasons. Woman as diverse as Mary Frith (Moll Cutpurse) and Lady Arabella Stuart passed as males out of economic and social necessity because of the limited public roles for women, while the male ingle in Middleton and the roaring girl walk the streets of London presumably for homoerotic as well as economic reasons. By contrast, an androgynous sixteenth-century portrait of Francois I as Minerva met with approval primarily because the influential philosophy of neoplatonism portrayed the soul as ideally androgynous. Women passed as men and men as women for political and social reasons not necessarily attributable to what we now call homo- or heterosexuality.

Viola's metatheatrical cross-dressing takes place within the transvestite context of the Elizabethan stage convention of all-male repertory companies like the Lord Chamberlain's Men, who were the formal successors to the traveling players that roved the countryside in Tudor England as well as other presumably more rotten states like Denmark. Theatrical transvestism—still extant in Asia—arises out of a configuration of social and economic variables that must be distinguished from nontheatric cross-dressing, though most certainly the restricted freedom of women plays a decided part in both. Scholars have questioned why Elizabethan England and not other European states followed the custom of young male actors playing women's parts. Lisa Jardine has argued that the boy actors, by arousing homoerotic passions for the predominantly male audience in late-sixteenth-century England, presented an unthreatening version of female erotic power. In agreement, Stephen Orgel claims that "homosexuality in this Puritan culture appears to have been less threatening than heterosexuality" because it avoids "a real fear of women's sexuality." These explanations shed less light on the historical development of English stage convention than on the growing controversy over the moral implications of this stage practice in the face of the increased secular and religious power of Puritanism. As early as 1579, Stephen Gosson in the School of Abuse accuses the theatre of being "effeminate" and effeminizing. In Th' Overthrow of Stage-Playes, Dr. John Rainoldes, citing the injunction in Deuteronomy 22.5 against cross-dressing, condemns the wearing of female dress by boy players as "an occasion of wantonness and lust." By 1633, William Prynne's Histrio mastix proclaims transvestism to be a wickedness "which my Inke is not black enough to discypher." "Players and Play haunters in their secret conclaves play the Sodomites," he announces. As Barish and others have documented, Malvolio and the Puritans finally were "reveng'd on the whole pack" of actors when the theatres were closed in 1642.

The continued enjoyment of all-male repertory companies as well as the insertion of Puritans and crossdressers into plays by Heywood, Shakespeare, Jonson, Middleton, and Ford evidence how the English theatre became both a literal and figurative staging ground for debates over early modern sexuality. Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, first staged in 1601, dramatizes this debate by incorporating it into the heart of its plot. Viola, after her initial introduction as a would-be eunuch, describes herself in her soliloquy as a "poor monster," a Renaissance appellation reserved for unnatural prodigies, including hermaphrodites. Sir Toby will later in jest call her a "firago"—a virago or female warrior (3.4.279). Once Viola realizes the effect of her "disguise" on Olivia, she calls her transvestism "a wickedness, / Wherein the pregnant enemy does much," anticipating Prynne's rhetoric (2.2.26-27). "Could this enemy be Satan?" commentators have conjectured. Instead of blaming herself as the deceiver, Viola displaces the mischief of her disguise on to the device of transvestism itself, which is "pregnant"—ready to hatch—the "wantoness and lust" that serve as the signifiers of same-sex desire in the Renaissance. Viola's surprise and concern over the effect of her deception demonstrates the relational nature of transvestism: it functions as a behavior the motivations for which may wholly differ from the erotic effect it produces on those who confront it.

Viola's androgynous performance as a woman playing a man, like the position of the young men playing women's parts on the Elizabethan stage in general, upsets the restriction of erotic attraction to heterosexual binarism in part because that dualism is collapsed in a single subject. As Viola is a man, her "state is desperate for her master's love," but as Viola is a woman, Olivia's sighs for her must prove "thriftless," under the social condemnation of same-sex love (2.3.35-38). She not only upsets essentialist constructs of gender hierarchy by successfully performing the part of a man as a woman, but in her hermaphroditic capacity as man and woman, I will argue, she also collapses the polarities upon which heterosexuality is based by becoming an object of desire whose ambiguity renders the distinction between homo- and hetero-erotic attraction difficult to decipher. The theatrical convention of crossdressing and the androgyny it comes to symbolize thus challenge the regulatory parameters of erotic attraction through the vehicle of performance, a performance that shows gender to be a part playable by any sex.

Critics have struggled recently to determine the degree to which such theatrical gender trouble affected the social fabric of Renaissance England. Although the plethora of antitheatrical diatribes from 1570 to 1633 would appear to signal a strong reaction among some circles to the influence of the popular theatre, the critical social question has tended to revolve around the circumscribed role of women in the Renaissance in relation to Shakespeare's depiction of strong directorial female characters who cross-dress, such as Portia, Viola, and Rosalind. While Catherine Belsey and Phyliss Rackin argued first that "stage illusion radically subverted the gender division of the Elizabethan world," new historicists like Stephen Greenblatt and Howard have more recently made claims that the Globe operated as a world in itself, a place of stage and licensed misrule, which had less effect on the diminishing power of women in Renaissance England. Even if the popular performance of Shakespeare's comedies did not coincide with social change for women in late-sixteenth-century England, this lack of coincidence does not necessarily warrant a conclusion that the Elizabethan theatre was socially ineffectual. If the relative power of woman was diminished in Renaissance England, the causes of that reduction were as much due to religious and political forces as they were to mechanisms of cultural appropriation.

The larger debate over whether cultural representation has the capacity to subvert and influence social reality or is usually contained by a political matrix that limits its power is not only raging today over questions of pornography and violence on television, but is important for purposes of Gender Trouble and Twelfth Night because both Butler and Shakespeare rely upon performance as a theoretical means of shaking the foundations of the metaphysics of binarism and gender hierarchy. If that performance is contained or circumscribed within the saturnalia or "green world" of comedic convention, its social and political utility is mitigated. Although the effects of literary discourse are rarely as pronounced as the slue of suicides that followed the publication of The Sorrows of Young Werther or the gang fights that took place outside the movie houses after Boulevard Nights, Shakespeare's transvestite comedies are safely counted as part of a discursive explosion concerning questions of gender and sexuality, an explosion that included texts as disparate as Sidney's New Arcadia, James I's Letters, and Marston's satires. In his antitheatrical tract Histrio-mastix, Prynne claims that the popular theatre not only promoted sodomitical practices among the theatregoers, but also encouraged effeminacy and sodomitical practices in the general population as well.
For a stage production in Elizabethan England to occur under the purview of an autocratic and censorious monarchy does not mean that the terms of that play's representation necessarily replicate the terms of that matrix of political power. Ironically, the historicist quest to determine whether Shakespeare's plays or other texts actually produced social trends is finally dependent for its conclusions on an examination of texts themselves—diaries, cases, speeches, satires, and last but not least plays. Monique Wittig theorizes that language is a set of acts repeated over time that produce reality effects that are eventually perceived as "facts." The text and the play Twelfth Night is an act of language both as it was performed in the Globe in 1601 and as it is read by undergraduates preparing to cast or ignore votes on anti-gay rights initiatives. When Shakespeare's play represents gender and sex in a certain way, it is engaging, from the viewpoint of textual materialists like Wittig, in an act of domination and compulsion, a performative that creates a social reality by promoting a certain discursive and perceptual construction of the body. Historicists in search of containment narratives that reinstate a monolithic patriarchy are not only engaging in what Butler calls the determinism behind a universal, hegemonic notion of masculine domination but also forgetting that Shakespeare's play is part of a contemporary canon of literature that the academy is requiring students to read and take seriously—nothing being more serious than Shakespeare's sexual comedies. Which is not to say that women in Renaissance England—or now for that matter—were free of social, political, and religious oppression; yet to extrapolate from this historical trend that Shakespeare's play was and is largely ineffectual or recuperated or contained by larger social and political forces is, I think, an argument that both overlooks the implications of our own inescapable historicity as contemporary readers and fails to consider fully the ways in which textual power operates through complicated, contradictory methods.

Shakespeare's comedies are sometimes read teleologically for reasons that are as ideological as they are aesthetic. Whether under the rubric of a renewal of normality or of patriarchal containment, the categorical heterosexuality that act 5 hastily produces as the solution to the erotic problems explored in the bulk of the play has become the definitive statement of Twelfth Night's perspective, while the possibility of interpreting the conclusion as an ironic retraction in keeping with the medieval tradition remains less appealing to the modern reader. When C. L. Barber suggests that Shakespeare's festive comedies use the sexual and social upheaval of conventional saturnalia in order to renew the meaning of normal sexual relations, he may be overlooking the possibility that Shakespeare's play is as much about the unconventional treatment of erotic attraction in the development of the drama as it is about the conventional romance ending in marriage, as much about Viola fending off Olivia's unknowingly lesbian protestations as about Orsino's decision to marry his page once she retrieves her female habit from the sea captain in the last act.

Gender Trouble in Twelfth Night: II. "I am the man" (2.2.24)

If part of the problem with the recent criticism of Twelfth Night comes from a proclivity on the part of some to reduce the concerns of gender studies to the us-against-them binarism of traditional feminism, Shakespeare's play arguably introduces patterns of homo-erotic representation in order to disrupt that binarism and to show how gender identities that uphold such duality are staged, performed, and "playable" by either sex. Viola/Cesario is the primary performer: she is that strange androgynous "monster," that eunuch/castrato/page or "script" who, through her gender ambiguity, retunes the music of love that has fallen out of key under the belated courtly scripts that the Count and Countess banally reenact in Illyria. Like the drag queen Butler discusses in Gender Trouble, Viola/Cesario demonstrates a parodic awareness of the three contingent dimensions of her corporeality: her anatomical sex as a boy actor, her gender identity in the drama as a woman washed ashore, and her gender performance as the page Cesario in the employ of the sexist Orsino.

Cesario points to himself as actor or performer in the metadramatic comments he makes in his first encounter with Olivia in act 1, scene 5. Having reluctantly been asked to woo the countess on behalf of the man she loves, Cesario initially feels conflicted about delivering the "speech" he has "penned" and "conned" (1.5.174-75). When Olivia asks where he has come from, Cesario replies, "I can say little more than I have studied, and that question's out of my part" (1.5.179-80). When he admits to Olivia that he is not what he plays, the metaphor of theatricality in this scene continues in even greater earnest. Cesario is alluding, in his staginess, to more than the fact that he is a she in this drama; he is reminding us, when he tells us that he took "great pains" to study his "poetical" "commission," that he is an actor playing a part, a boy actor playing the part of a woman playing a part of a man (1.5.190, 195-96). Given the common Elizabethan bawdy pun on the word "parts" as sexual genitalia, this confluence of meaning between the theatrical and the sexual has particular significance for Twelfth Night's staging of the performative homology between the two. When Olivia presses Cesario to divulge his identity ("What are you?" [1.5.215]), he cryptically tells her that what he is and what he would be are "as secret as maiden-head," pointing primarily to his gender identity as Viola in the drama but also alluding to the male virginity that Sebastian will admit to in the final act when he tells Olivia she will marry a man and a maid (1.5.218-19). The boy actor's and Cesario's maidenhood is also Viola's maidenhood; the part he plays depends on the hiding of the nature of his private part(s).

Even though Cesario goes out of his text in 1.5 when he lifts the veil of his rival Olivia with jealous interest and commends her unparalleled beauty, his growing interest in Olivia reminds us that Viola is now adlibbing as Cesario and that this impromptu performance, which points to her servant's role as disguise, is in many ways more endearing than the stiff delivery of an identity-bound young man. In fact, improvisation allows Cesario/Viola to enact her third role as agent of her master: the boy actor playing a woman playing a male page who is asked to act out the passion of his master. "If I did love you in my master's flame" (1.5.268), Cesario proclaims, as he warms up to his poetic performance, he would Make me a willow cabin at your gate,

And call upon my soul within the house;
Write loyal cantons of contemned love,
And sing them loud even in the dead of night;
Halloo your name to the reverberate hills,
And make the babbling gossip of the air

In this performative address, in which the poet speaks the loyal canton s/he has written, Viola/Cesario is the antithesis of Patience on a monument. In Viola's role as a self-conscious male mediator between man and woman, s/he becomes a better—a more eloquent, persuasive—man than the man s/he represents. In fact, Cesario plays his part so well that Olivia immediately catches the plague of lovesickness, a sickness which, from the point of view of gendered identity in the play, casts her as an unwitting lesbian. The upshot of this self-reflexive gender confusion is a layered combination of ironic plays on performance that self-consciously point to boy actor/Viola/Cesario/Orsino's agent's uncanny ability to be what he does, to adopt his identity through imitation, through an art that not only outdoes nature, but shows nature herself to be art. The "babbling gossip" of the natural element air in its reverberate identity as Echo will take on the poetic artifice of the singing poet, crying out, "Olivia." Echo is a fitting mythological analogue for the imitative Viola/Cesario, whose performative roles as actor and agent make her a master of reverberation.

When Olivia falls in love with the page we know to be a woman, she realizes that the imaginary fantasy of love has taught her that "ourselves we do not owe [own]" (5.1.314-15), that the self is not an entity within the control of an ego-identity. The unorthodoxy of a countess's infatuation with a servant is enough to prove to Olivia that she has, as a result of her passion, fallen into "abatement and low price," but the dramatic nexus between social degradation and homoerotic attraction—not without its historical analogues—is an even more troubling development. Alan Bray and others have identified the relationship of servant/master as one of the social arenas in which homoerotic interaction commonly took place.37 Admittedly, Cesario/Viola is not Olivia's servant, but Cesario's ostensible estate is well below that of the Countess, and she takes liberties, such as the gift of her ring, which would not be expected to occur between social equals. Although until recently most scholarship in Renaissance homoerotics has dealt almost exclusively with male-male relationships, there is no reason to believe that lesbian practices were not equally as common within the protected hierarchal environment of the domestic house-hold. In fact, erotic practices between women may have been less threatening and more overlooked within domestic spheres. Not only was sex between women not explicitly prohibited under the 1533 sodomy statute enacted by Henry VIII (in force until 1967), but women were also confined within the household to a much greater degree than men. Condemned by St. Paul in Romans 1:26 and Aquinas in his Summa, lesbian sexual practice continued to be an egregious offence outside of England, as Greenblatt has demonstrated in his discussion of the hanging in France of Marie le Marcis for falsely impersonating a man and marrying a woman. Yet even on the Continent, where women were condemned for homosexual practice until before the French Revolution, records of premodern persecutions remain scarce.

The relative dearth of lesbian prosecutions in early modern Europe is indicative of a history even more hidden than that of male homosexuality. The combination of a crime too nefarious to name and a set of perpetrators officially silenced and obedient within a predominantly patriarchal culture has made lesbian history a “blank,” a closet within a closet, that scholars are only now beginning to attempt to reconstruct. Cultural representation of relations between women have recently garnered some attention. The Fioirdispina-Bradamante episode in Ariosto’s Orlando Furioso and Philoclea’s love of the apparently Amazon Zelmane in the New Arcadia are well-known examples from the romance tradition, while Donne’s “Sappho to Philes” and Katherine Philip’s Restoration love poetry are English verses that must be counted as part of this presumably lost tradition.

Jorge de Montemayor’s La Diana, a sixteenth-century Spanish romance translated into English by Bartholomew Yong in 1598, is an important analogue to Shakespeare’s Twelfth Night, which contains more than one episode of same-sex love between women cast under the narrative rubric of transvestite performance. In Book Two of La Diana Felismena disguises herself as the page Valerio when her beloved Don Felis is sent to the Portuguese court by his father. After enlisting in the service of her unwitting Don Felis, Valerio/Felismena adopts the same role as Viola/Cesario, wooing another woman on behalf of the man she loves and causing that woman, Celia, to fall in love with her instead. In this more tragic rendering of the Italian stage comedy Gl’Inganni (1562), Montemayor, unlike Shakespeare, decides not to create a Sebastian-like clone to meet the romance convention of reconciliation. Instead Celia—the Olivia counterpart—dies heartbroken when she learns that the male page with whom she has fallen in love has a stronger affection for his male master than herself. The performance of gender in the story of Felismena leads finally to a suicide that presumably arises out of an assumption by Celia of a male homoerotic relationship that undermines her own unwitting lesbian love for Felismena. La Diana, by some accounts the most fashionable Spanish book in England at the close of the sixteenth century, establishes a prose precedent for the representation of erotic relations between women through the mechanism of transvestite performance.

In a theatrical forum more public and regulated than the spheres of private circulation and limited publication of early domestic fiction and poetry, Shakespeare’s representation of same-sex attraction between women must even more cautiously use indirection to find direction out. In her discussion of the homoerotics of Shakespearean comedy, Valerie Traub has argued that the limitation of the consequences of theatrical crossdressing to the evocation of male homoeroticism ignores the ambiguities that transvestism creates and reinstates the restriction of gender binarism into the discussion of homoerotics. Women were in attendance at the Globe, and there is no reason to ignore female homoerotics as part of the disruptions that cross-dressing explores. The gender ambiguity of Viola/Cesario in fact sets the stage for the representation of a plethora of desires: homoerotic attraction between Orsino and Cesario, heterosexual attraction between Orsino and Viola, and lesbian attraction between Viola and Olivia. The last relationship is in many ways the most compelling and time-consuming in the play. Ostensibly, the passion that Olivia finds herself unable “to hide” by means of “wit or reason” is directed at a young man, but dramatic irony tells us that her hidden passion is for a maid (3.1.153-54). When, after their first encounter, Olivia sends Cesario her symbolic ring for him to slip his finger into, Cesario/Viola, in her famous soliloquy, suddenly realizes, "I am the man: if it be so, as 'tis, / Poor lady, she were better love a dream" (2.2.24-25). Viola is acknowledging that her performance as a man has out-manned every other suitor of Olivia in Illyria, but she also realizes that this performance has led to a homoerotic attraction more socially and legally untenable than an illusory dream. Olivia is not entirely to blame for this sudden attraction, as Traub has pointed out. Viola/Cesario, whose original inclination was to stay with the Countess, has gone out of her text in their first meeting, taking the liberty of lifting Olivia's veil, and playing the part of her wooer with more fervency than expected. "But if you were the devil," Cesario exclaims upon seeing her face, "you are fair" (1.5.255).

In her soliloquy that follows their first meeting, Viola/Cesario unquestionably blames the wickedness of her disguise and the frail nature of women for this instigation of bi-gendered passion, but this retreat into essentialism is undermined by Viola's unnatural status as boy actor, female character, and male page, which demonstrates that although frailty may be the name of woman, the name of woman is applicable to both sexes in this play:

My master loves her dearly
And I, poor monster, fond as much on him,
And she, mistaken, seems to dote on me:
What will become of this? As I am a man,
My state is desperate for my master's love,
As I am a woman (now alas the day!)
What thriftless sighs shall poor Olivia breathe?

Viola/Cesario is the poor hermaphroditical monster or, in another context, the master/mistress who has stirred the homoerotic passion of Olivia by incorporating the polarities of sexual and gender difference into the unity of her maddening disguise, thereby representing gender tropes in a manner that de-forms, de-naturalizes, and de-constructs their oppositional status. The dear fondness and doting, moreover, is not altogether gender specific; it occurs among all three in this love triangle. When Viola attempts to articulate the "knot" of her predicament, she finds that her gendered figures of speech are subject to ironies that unsettle the heterosexual bent of her identity as the lover of Orsino. Editors insist that "desperate" in this context means "hopeless," but when Cesario tells us that as a man he is desperate for his master's love, the male homoerotic irony of such a statement again problematizes her desire to be sincere in her heterosexual identity. As a woman, she laments, even pities, the profitless sighs that Olivia must undergo both in her mistaken doting on a page and in her capacity as a woman in love with another woman in a world where such behavior was literally unheard of.

Despite Cesario's protestations, Olivia continues her amorous assault until the end of the play, unwilling to take no for an answer. In act 3, the haughty Olivia is willing to ask Cesario what he thinks of her:

Viola: That you do think you are not what you are.
Olivia: If I think so, I think the same of you.
Viola: Then think you right; I am not what I am.
Olivia: I would you were as I would have you be.
Viola: Would it be better, madam, than I am?
I wish it might, for now I am your fool.

In dramatic context, Viola is attempting to fend off Olivia by telling her that she is not really in love as she thinks she is because Cesario is not in fact a man; however, in textual isolation this witty repartee functions as a profound if unsystematic critique of gender identity as a boundary to licit love. Viola assumes that Olivia's love would vanish if she knew Cesario's true sex, but the persistent Countess reminds the heroic androgynene that s/he too thinks s/he is someone s/he is not, thinks s/he is not in love with Olivia when in fact the pity s/he shows her is a form of love. When Cesario almost steps out of his part and admits with Iago-esque frankness that he is not what he is, the text again shifts into its self-reflexive gear, reminding both audience and reader that subjectivity is constructed by epistemology; it does not exist in some pre-Cartesian substance that instantly assigns a bedrock of transcendent traits to either female or male. Mistaking Sebastian for Viola, Feste will later remind the audience of the fiction of gender identity: "Nothing that is so, is so," he surmises, as he looks at Viola's identical male twin (4.1.8-9). His sly critique of what Butler calls the "metaphysics of gender substance" continues in his role as Sir Topas, the Pythagorean curate, in act 4. "That that is, is," the learned cross-dressing Sir Topas proclaims, "I, being Master Parson, am Master Parson" (4.1.14-15). Feste's mock tautology points to the performative nature of what we assume to be ontological essence. This jester turned sermonizer is who he is because he plays who he is; in the same way Viola can be the male Cesario by transvestite performance.

Similarly, who Viola/Cesario is or is not, as a subject, is as much a figure of Olivia's and Viola's imaginations as it is a stable, gendered identity, the revelation of which will undo some mistaken affection (4.2.15-16). The dialogue that Olivia and Cesario have in act 3 not only dramatizes the instability of the subject as a determinate entity that exists outside of social interaction but also shows how the performative self is further complicated by the fictions or fantasies played out in the imaginary mental constructions of those in love. When Olivia tells Cesario that she wishes he were the reciprocating lover she would like him to be, she is divulging the way in which lovers, by reason of their imaginary dreams, act as agents in the disruption of normative identity politics. Put simply, the lover, like Olivia, turns the object of her love into something more than he or she is. Olivia's amorous thinking reshapes this male servant into the gentleman of her dreams, while in fact that gentleman is a woman—a Viola whose anagrammatic name shapes the reverberate echoes that feed the Countess's narcissism. Cesario recognizes that Olivia's amorous strategy is turning him or her into a fool, that her narcissistic aggressivity is the consequence of an emotion that both disrupts determined notions of subjectivity while simultaneously transferring its own ideal notions of self on to the object of love.

Yet surely, critics have argued, the identity and gender trouble produced by Viola's disguise is largely undermined by her ultimately heterosexual aim; after all, the object of her desire is Orsino. Butler herself warns that heterosexuality can augment its hegemony through the denaturalization of cross-dressing, when those denaturalizing parodies work to "reidealize heterosexual norms without calling them into question." Unlike Moll Cutpurse or even Portia, Viola, Jean Howard argues, does not use her disguise to gain power, but only to secure her position as a dutiful wife. She neveractually challenges patriarchy. By privileging intentionality over action or what Butler calls performance, these important objections to my line of argument assume that the subversive effects of Viola's disguise are vitiated by the sexual orientation of the character Viola, while it is my position that the language of the play questions the metaphysics of orientation and intentionality, replacing them with a concept of performativity.

Even if Viola does not actively challenge patriarchy in her erotic goal, she nevertheless questions its validity in her disguised wooing of her master in act 2, scene 4. In discussing earlier scenes, both Bruce Smith and Pequigney have commented upon the homoerotic overtones of Orsino's sudden infatuation with his new domestic servant, to whom he "unclaps .. the book even of [his] secret soul," delighting in Cesario's "smooth and rubious" lips and "shril and sound" voice, which he calls a "small pipe" comparable to a "maiden's organ" (1.4.31-33). This ambiguous affection for his male servant sets the stage for their discussion of the differing capacities of male and female amorous longing in act 2. When asked by Orsino, Viola/Cesario admits that she is in love with a "w oman," but one close to the Count in "years" and "complexion" (2.4.26-28). When Orsino complains that no woman's heart is capacious enough to hold the passion that a man feels, Viola/Cesario challenges him by passionately telling her own story in the third person: "My father had a daughter lov'd a man / As it might be perhaps, were I a woman, / I should your lordship" (2.4.107-9). The ironies of gender that inform the performative layers of this scene render Orsino's sexist construction of love highly suspect. As a servant, Cesario boldly challenges his master's complacent speculation even as Viola is reiterating the strength of her own passion under the risk of revealing her disguise. But this scene critiques Orsino's assumptions not merely by contrasting traditional female patience to male boasting; both those positions are thrown into question by the posture of Viola's performativity—by the very fact that she is commanding the discursive space of this scene. Her impersonation of herself in her autobiographical history, her objectification of herself as quiet, allegorical Patience on a monument is a verbal tour de force ironically iterated by a woman. Viola reveals her concealment, impatiently describes her patience and thereby points to the constructedness of both Orsino's and her own depictions of gender paradigms. Meanwhile, as the boy Cesario tells the story of his sister who is himself, Orsino continues to fall in love with his/her "masterly" speech (2.4.22). This scene thus challenges patriarchy not by reidealizing the heterosexual norms of passion-vowing males and patiently passive females, but by calling those constructions into question through portraying the cross-dressing female as a figure who deconstructs the categories of gender by ironically reiterating them in a context that depicts their reversal.

Gender Trouble in Twelfth Night: III. "I do adore thee so, / That danger shall seem sport" (2.1.46)

In counterpoint to the ironies and ambiguities that closet the lesbian subtext in the main courtship of Twelfth Night, the representation of male homoeroticism in this comedy is by contrast glaring and ultimately inexplicable. Metaphors of adoration, devotion, and passionate oblation saturate the heated but highly stylized rhetorical interactions between Sebastian, the twin brother of Viola, and Antonio, the erstwhile pirate, who redeems Sebastian "[f]rom the rude sea's enrag'd and foamy mouth" and gives his life back to him, adding thereto his "love, without retention or restraint / All his in dedication" (5.1.76-80). Neither the Ciceronian tradition of male friendship nor attention to the intensity of homosocial male bonding in the Renaissance can explain away Antonio's melancholia. He is prepared, we learn, to spend three months with his foundling after rescuing him, prepared to risk his life to follow Sebastian to Illyria (where he is wanted on criminal charges) prepared to give this young man his purse, and prepared finally to intercede on his behalf in the midst of a duel: "I do adore thee so," Antonio states, "That danger shall seem sport, and I will go" (2.1.46-47; emphasis mine). Like Olivia, Antonio has "exposed himself pure for love"—an exposure doubly dangerous because its gendered object represents an unmentionable anathema to the religious and judicial laws that officially condemned such homoerotic behavior. To put this notable pirate's passion in perspective, we need turn no further than the pages of Billy Budd to find a trace of the sodomitical practices that traditionally have been ascribed to men at sea. In the seventeenth century, according to B. R. Burg, English sea rovers and buccaneers were renowned for their sodomitical behavior. Antonio may be a part of this historical tradition, while at the same time he may be another one of Shakespeare's male characters—Horatio, Enobarbus, Patroclus, Antonio in The Merchant of Venice, to name a few—who are devoted to other males.

Antonio disrupts normative constructions of gender by enacting his homoerotic passion in a character that is the most traditionally "masculine" in the play. He is aggressive, bold, eloquent, faithful, uncompromising—traits which are ironically alignable with his counter-part Olivia and also ironically employed in the service of a homoerotic rather than heterosexual compulsion. Some critics recently have argued that male homoerotics were not associated with effeminacy until later in the seventeenth century, Antonio's machismo being a case in point. Whatever the validity of this point of social history, Antonio exists as a direct foil to the hopelessly sycophantic but presumably heterosexual courtier, Sir Andrew Aguecheek. Although Antonio's histrionic intensity is tempered by little or none of the gender irony ascribable to Viola, the play's dramatic representation of him as one of the most heroic and intense characters in the drama points to an alternative domain of cultural intelligibility in which the significations of heterosexual masculinity are repeated within a context that directly subverts the rigid codes of heterosexual practice.

The relationship between Antonio and Sebastian even subverts some of the accepted parameters of homoerotic practice in the Renaissance. Although Pequigney calls it "the classic relationship, wherein the mature lover serves as guide and mentor to the young beloved," this facile reading overlooks a number of factors that make this homoerotic relation strangely unclassic, tellingly noncategorical. Alan Bray has tried recently to delineate the difference between the often-similar rhetoric of male friendship and sodomy in the English Renaissance. He concludes that the passionate discourse of male friendship did not imply sexual practices as long as the interlocutors were both assumed to be gentlemen, their relationship personal not mercenary, and their interaction not disruptive of the social order. Despite Orsino's epithets "notable pirate" and "salt-water thief" (5.1.66), Antonio denies his piracy, bears himself as a gentleman consistently, and is known for his fame, honor, and kindness. Antonio's loaning of his purse to Sebastian is an act of generosity, not payment. Although the sea-captain is presumably of lower social standing than Sebastian, the play does not provide sufficient evidence that their interaction is unnatural or disruptive of the social order. Antonio's homoerotic attraction contains few of the social clues of the sodomite that Bray outlines. What is unusual in this relationship is that Antonio, although of lower social status than Sebastian, is the more powerful and principled figure, a circumstance that places their connection outside the scope of the usual master/servant, teacher/student matrices that social historians indicate as potentially homoerotic. Similarly, though critics assume Antonio to be older and more experienced than Sebastian because of his sea-battle experience, the play does not make the age difference between the two so discernible that this relationship falls squarely within the man/boy paradigm often associated with homoeroticism in this period. Nor, finally, can this couple be subsumed under accepted categories of gender binarism. Although Antonio's more intense ardor and Sebastian's possibly homoerotic name might lead to assumptions about their masculinity and femininity, both are proven swordsmen; and, ironically, the resistant Sebastian is the character who readily adopts a heterosexual role when he accepts Olivia's marital offer. Even in its depiction of same-sex love, Twelfth Night departs from patterns that would subsume homoeroticism under entrenched gender stereotypes. The dramatization of the marginal erotic relationship of Antonio and Sebastian carefully avoids a rendition that reinstates the excluded outside of homoeroticism as a simplified reflection of heterosexual roles within a same-sex context.

Gender Trouble in Twelfth Night: IV. "Thou hast put him in such a dream, that when the image of it leaves him he must run mad" (2.5.193-94)

Like Olivia's love for Cesario/Viola, Antonio's love for Sebastian partakes in a psychological enactment of fantasy that functions as an inward performance of gender trouble. Mistaking Viola for her twin brother in act 3, "even in a minute" Antonio has his faith undermined by the confused Cesario (3.4.370-72), who is unable to return Antonio's purse because he does not have it. In his crestfallen state, Antonio announces that he has done "devotion" to Sebastian's "image" with a "sanctity of love," but that this "god" has proved a "vile idol" unworthy of Sebastian's handsome features (3.4.374-75). Antonio's passionate disenchantment—reminiscent of Othello's—is based on a mistaken interpretation of objective reality, and like the amorous image-making that preceded it, his recasting of Sebastian into the image of a deceiving "devil" partakes of the same process of transference that marked his process of falling in love. He turns his lover into something more than he is through a mentality that seeks finally the attention of the idol that he has created, fashioned, and enacted in the realm of his imaginary fantasy. Although his bitterness is played out within the comedic context of his mistaking a "girl" for his "boy," his virulent disappointment stands in marked contrast to his unexplained silence in the play's final act, when his beloved Sebastian has cavalierly married and when, from a contemporary point of view, Antonio would seem to have more reason to protest. Silence is often the most telling form of disappointment.
Antonio and Olivia's transformation of their lovers into something more than they are is indicative of a larger pattern in Twelfth Night that employs the process of love as an agency in the disruption of gender binarism and social hierarchy. The internalized fantasy of the lover—whereby an Orsino turns Olivia into a Petrarchan goddess or a Malvolio turns her into a Duchess of Malfi—lays the foundation for the legitimization of a social and gender upheaval under the rubric of what Antonio calls the "witch-craft" of love (5.1.74). Orsino sets the stage for this disruption in his opening words:

O spirit of love, how quick and fresh art thou,
That notwithstanding thy capacity
Receiveth as the sea, nought enters there
Of what validity and pitch so'er,
But falls into abatement and low price,
Even in a minute! So full of shapes is fancy,
That it alone is high fantastical.

At once capacious and enveloping, love is at the same time ephemeral and destined to disappointment, primarily because of its dependence on an internal fantasy for its sustenance. In Shakespeare's usage, "fancy" connotes both the operation of "love" and "fantasy" or imagination. The quick and giddy shapes that the lover's imagination generates and transfers on to the object of affection render that object vulnerable to the "abatement and low price" that the realities of compulsory heterosexuality and diverging desire reaffirm in the proverbial fifth act of Shakespeare's comedies. Yet the capacity to create and "perform" those "shapes"—the ability of Olivia to turn Cesario into the perfect lover, of Antonio to idolize Sebastian—remain the fragile but crucial catalysts for the promotion of gender trouble.

Few who read this final scene, upon which much criticism depends, are not troubled by the solutions to the erotic problems that the plot has engendered. For Traub, Twelfth Night's conclusion seems "only ambivalently invested in the 'natural' heterosexuality it imposes," while Pequigney challenges the accepted interpretation that Sebastian has rejected his male lover because he has taken a wife. Olivia's ready acceptance of her beloved's twin as her husband and Orsino's equally mercurial capitulation to his male page who awaits her change of attire add to the delightful but troubling improbability. These unlikelihoods, whether explained as dramatic plot convention or a return to normalcy, expose "the failure of heterosexual regimes ever fully to legislate or contain their own ideals."

Twelfth Night attempts to resolve this trouble by playing on the concept of identity in so far as it means sameness as opposed to individuality. If the major portion of Shakespeare's plot employs the tropes of performance to show how gender is a melodramatic act rather than an inherent trait of the individuated ego, the ending of the play reaffirms this conclusion by producing a male that is, for all intents and purposes, the same or identical to a female. Viola/Cesario is not only a female successfully playing a male, but her success is confirmed by her fungibility with her twin brother. The reunion of Viola with Sebastian comes after he opportunely is betrothed to an Olivia who mistakes him for Cesario. Seeing Cesario and Sebastian on stage together for the first time, Orsino exclaims "one face, one voice, one habit, and two persons! A natural perspective that is, and is not!" (5.1.214-15). The identity of this twin brother and sister does more than provide a convenient Terencian plot device to untie the erotic knot that the play has created up to this point; this sameness also points to the way in which the essentialism of a "natural perspective" is not always divided into gendered binarism. Nature herself has produced an unnatural perspective that reveals the constructedness of essentialist notions of gender by depicting the collapse of difference. Echoing Troilus's famous speech during his eavesdropping of a Cressida that is and is not, Orsino sees a nature that is capable of copying itself exactly in spite of the natural sex difference between brother and sister that we expect. In the identity of Sebastian and Viola, the play's denouement stages a critique of binarism, a parodic subversion of the dichotomies between female and male, homo- and heterosexual. The result of the appearance of these identical twins in the final act is a decided disruption of the stability of sexual and gender difference and the sense of individuated identity it fosters. Sebastian tells Olivia that even though she would have been contracted to the maid Viola if he had not fortuitously appeared, she is now "betroth'd both to a maid and a man" (5.1.261). He is not only assuring her that he is himself a virgin, but he is also making wanton with the meaning of the word "maid" as a young woman. Sebastian is a character whose similar appearance to his sister gives him a decided resemblance to a maid, but whose identity with Cesario allows him to play the part of a man. Even in this concluding marriage scene, therefore, the play's language produces destabilizing configurations of gender.

The prosthetic nature of gender's supposed inherency is dramatized even further by the role that costume plays in this concluding scene. Once Cesario discloses herself as Sebastian's twin sister, Orsino decides he wants a share in the "happy wrack" of this collapse of gender identity by capitalizing on Cesario's previously proclaimed love for a woman like him; but he continues to address her as "boy" and "Cesario":

For so you shall be while you are a man;
But when in other habits you are seen,
Orsino's mistress and his fancy's queen.

Like Clerimont in Jonson's Epicoene, who uses his "ingle" at home when his mistress is unattainable, Orsino settles for a marriage with his male page. For Orsino, Viola can only establish her true identity by recovering her maiden's weeds from the captain she left in act 1, who now for some reason is under arrest at the behest of Malvolio. Consistent with the import of Renaissance sumptuary laws that regulated dress among classes as well as sexes—laws championed by Malvolian moralists like Gosson and Stubbes—Orsino's final statement indicates, albeit playfully, that Viola will be a man until she adopts the "habit" of female attire, until her appearance conforms to the mundane trappings that are the foundations of gender identity. Her gender is dependent upon a factor as easily changeable as her weeds are pret-a-porter. Ironically, that attire is still unrecovered at the close of this final scene, as Orsino walks off stage with his Cesario.

While the wonderful discoveries of act 5 make for a tidy if contrived romance ending, below the surface of these marriage knots, with their diluted flavor of androgyne, lies an entanglement that transcends the freedom these characters may gain from a mild subversion of normative gender relations. What is particularly troubling about the ending of Twelfth Night—and particularly important from a perspective beyond the necessary upheaval of entrenched gender politics—are the ways in which gender performance in this play, although successful in questioning identity, does not necessarily give these characters what they want. The dismantling of the automatic collapse of sex and gender in this play, even when successful, does not bring the subject to a new metaphysical substance, to a new place of performative stability. Although Viola achieves her goal of marrying Orsino, the man she is betrothed to has, minutes before, agreed to sacrifice her for the love of Olivia. Arguably Sebastian is satisfied with his surprise catch of the Countess, but his reaction to the appearance of his friend Antonio on the scene gives the audience pause: "Antonio! O my dear Antonio, / How have the hours rack'd and tortur'd me / Since I have lost thee!" (5.1.216-18). How can Olivia have satisfied her desire by mistakenly marrying the enchanting Cesario's seeming copy, a stranger as passionately attached to a pirate as herself? The homoerotic element of the play, while troubling and disruptive in its dramatic development, may not have the power in this final scene to overcome fully the symbolic dictates of compulsory heterosexuality, at least from a perspective of formal kinship relations. Yet even if homoeroticism triumphed in Twelfth Night and Viola walked off stage arm-in-arm with Olivia and Sebastian with Antonio, the problems of the irrationality of desire and the instability of identity would not vanish. Desire is not erased by the successful disruption of gender boundaries; it continues to haunt the subject despite the performance of the most fantastic of love's imaginings. Yet the interminable nature of desire and the fantasies of love that are desire's dialectical counterpart serve as important catalysts for the subversion and displacement "of those naturalized and reified notions of gender that support masculine hegemony and heterosexist power" through strategies of gender trouble.

In The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psycho-Analysis, trans. Alan Sheridan (New York: Norton, 1981), Jacques Lacan remarks that narcissistic gratification is love's primary motivation. Comparing the processes of analysis to the interaction of lovers, he concludes that the lover turns the beloved into a subject supposed to know, someone who can answer all his questions about what he wants (267). This transference is actually undertaken by the lover as a strategy of narcissism, in which the beloved, flattered by the lover, eventually recognizes and pays attention to the beloved (253). This imaginary and narcissistic fantasy called love necessarily seeks to close off the unconscious and the lack that is desire. The motto of the lover in approaching the beloved is always "in you more than you," a phrase that summarizes this process of imaginary overestimation for purposes of avoiding desire (263).

"Despite her masculine attire and the confusion it causes in Illyria, Viola's is a properly feminine subjectivity; and this fact countervails the threat posed by her clothes and removes any possibility that she might permanently aspire to masculine privilege and prerogatives" (Howard, "Crossdressing," 432). For Howard the truly transgressive female in the play is Olivia, but she is "punished, comically but unmistakably" by her love for Viola/Cesario (432). But what characters do not fall into "abatement and low price" because of their erotic attraction in this play? Howard's reading of Twelfth Night usefully illustrates one way in which the concerns of feminism can collide with the aims of gender studies, in so far as the latter attacks power through parodic deconstruction of its categories while the former seeks to work within those categories of power by searching for women who gain masculine "privilege."

Admittedly, one of the historian's main points is that these clues were growing more and more ambiguous at the end of the sixteenth century.

Although Greenblatt ("Fiction and Friction") argues that the sameness is a maleness since both characters are dressed as men at the end of the play, Viola's central performance throughout the play has already shown that clothes do not necessarily make the man, that masculinity is a role played most successfully by a woman.

Critical Essays: Malvolio and the Eunuchs: Texts and Revels in Twelfth Night

He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord:

But she that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth.

1 Timothy, 5, 5-6

Fashionably enough, the central farcical scene of Twelfth Night concerns an act of reading. What Malvolio reads and how he reads it have significant connections both with other events in the play, and with the wider world of seventeenth-century English society. The letter he finds invites him to join the festive rituals of love—to disguise himself, to smile, and to become a wooer, on the expectation of ending the revelling with epithalamium and marriage. This model for human conduct—the argument of romantic comedy—is in fact endorsed by a secondary text hidden within the first, as we shall see. But Malvolio, reading the words eagerly in the light of his predisposition, sees no subtleties, let alone the gaping trap. The festival in which he has already begun to take part is not the affirmative and sustaining one he imagines, but a punitive, defaming, mocking ritual aimed at him, his pride, pretensions, and authority. His reading—or misreading—marks his entry to a festive world, and festivals, like texts, are ambiguous. Particularly his treatment at the hands of the plotters forms a suggestive inverse ritual to set against those patterns which are traced by the energies of misplaced and baffled erotic desire, eventually untangled and fulfilled.

In the last scene of the play Feste finally delivers Malvolio's letter, excusing himself with the observation that 'madman's epistles are no gospels'. One could say that Malvolio's mistake has been to fall into the trap of taking a mad epistle for gospel, but here Olivia is not to be diverted by Feste's attempt to superimpose a theatrical style on plain sense: Orsino's recognition that 'This savours not much of distraction' echoes her own. Earlier in the play, Toby has pre-empted another plain reader, Viola, by rewriting Sir Andrew's challenge and by avoiding committing it to paper: 'this letter, being so excellently ignorant, will breed no terror in the youth. He will find it comes from a clodpoll'. In the course of the play we have, then, two epistles which are gospels, in so far as their sense, or lack of it, is revealed in their style, and one which is dressed as a dish of poison, devilish and heretical.

Malvolio, if he is indeed a 'kind of puritan', should have had some experience in the interpretation of difficult or ambiguous writings, but he capitulates so absolutely to the apparent sense of a text that even Maria is amazed at his extreme folly: 'Yon gull Malvolio is turned heathen, a very renegado, for there is no Christian that means to be saved by believing rightly can ever believe such impossible passages of grossness.' Something has been wrong, clearly, with Malvolio's Puritan discipline, if he can fall so easily for 'some obscure epistles of love', taking the shadow for the substance in such an unguarded manner. In doing so, of course, he is unconsciously aping his betters, and it is the deluded Olivia who is readiest to understand and forgive him, pointedly comparing his case with hers twice in the play. Not that she is aware of her own delusion, however. She confidently assumes she is an accomplished reader of texts, and of bodies as texts, when she dismisses the first chapter of Orsino's heart, which Viola proposes as her gospel: 'O, I have read it. It is heresy.'

The revenge of foolery and holiday on Malvolio is motivated by his repressive and humourless sense of order, and by his self-conceit, but the terms of his humiliation are very deliberately chosen: not only is he made to transgress class barriers, but he is translated into a lover, about which role there is something deeply and fundamentally inappropriate. Malvolio's initial rule over the celibate, mourning household of Olivia is sterile and deathly. Sad and civil, he is customarily dressed in suits of solemn black, and he marks himself all too clearly as an enemy to the life of comic energy: his first line in the play invokes the pangs of death. Olivia's own brooding on death, however affected it may be, aligns her sympathetically with Malvolio's gloomy order: the entirely imaginary affection that Maria invents has at least a germ of plausibility about it. But Malvolio is valued by Olivia as a servant precisely because he appears to be passionless, 'Unmovèd, cold, and to temptation slow', a defender not only of wit, manners, and honesty, but of honesty in its sexual sense, a symbolic guardian at Olivia's gates. As a classically constructed blocking character, Malvolio inamorato is punished by the passion he apparently denies.

By the beginning of the box-tree scene, the treasons have already been planted in his mind, which is running on marriage: 'Having been three months married to her, sitting in my state— ... Calling my officers about me, in my branched velvet gown, having come from a day-bed where I have left Olivia sleeping.' Dreams of power and luxury, therefore, accompany the relatively sober, yet preposterous 'married to her'; indeed the fantasy of high social rank runs slightly ahead of dreams of sexual indulgence. Married in his mind, he encounters the fateful epistle, the very letters of which drip with concupiscence. The style of the text he reads is a clever mixture of obliquity and directness, fustian riddles, grandiloquence, and minor rhetorical flourishes with a rather dated air. The prose begins with a clear warning—'If this fall into thy hand, revolve'—and immediately passes to an apparently clear statement—'In my stars I am above thee'—followed by a fugal development on the theme of greatness, which Malvolio is naturally disposed to hear with pleasure. Within the famous tripartite clause, thrice repeated in the course of the play, there lurks, perhaps, another warning for the truly virtuous. That is to say that the construction of this part of the epistle is remarkably close to gospel. In the nineteenth chapter of the Gospel according to St Matthew, Christ has been drawn by the Pharisees into a discussion of divorce and marriage. The complexities of morality and law lead the disciples to think that perhaps 'it is not good to marry'. In the King James Bible, Christ replies as follows:

- But hee said unto them, All men cannot receive this saying saue they to whom it is given.
- For there are some Eunuches, which were so borne from their mothers wombe: and there are some Eunuches, which were made Eunuches of men: and there be Eunuches, which haue made themselues Eunuches for the kingdome of heauens sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receiue it.

Christ's words, he twice warns, are not to be understood by everyone, and the terms of his analogy are in many respects puzzling, but the evident centre of his meaning is that true greatness is not of this world, and that sexuality may be a bar to finding it. If Maria has intended this gospel text to serve as an allusive reflection beneath the surface of her epistle, the sense of the phrases begins to shimmer with opposites and distinctions: physical loss and spiritual gain, greatness and littleness (deficiency), fertility and sterility.

Malvolio has been offered an oblique warning about the futility of his marriage, if not a veiled insult, but fails to catch either. He would not, however, have known the gospel in the Authorized Version, and any kind of Puritan would have been most likely to be familiar with the Geneva Bible. The 1560 text translates the crucial verse in Matthew in a slightly different way:

For there are some chaste, which were so borne of (their) mothers bellie: and there be some chaste, which be made chaste by men: and there be some chaste, which haue made them selues chaste for the kingdome of heauen.

The effect of 'chaste' is a good deal blander, and implies choice rather than compulsion or accident, although the second clause becomes puzzling in this respect. But the marginal glosses, a chief feature of the Calvinist bibles, leave the reader in no doubt over the sense in the first instance: 'the worde signifieth (gelded) and they were so made because they shuld, kepe the chambers of noble women: for they were iudged chaste.' Malvolio, keeper of the chamber to Olivia, certainly wishes to be judged chaste, but is far from deeming himself unable to marry, from recognizing his own incapacity. The gloss on those that make themselves chaste, or who achieve chasteness, might we say, explains the phrase as a positive effect of grace, and of an effort of free will rather than negative self-abnegation or mutilation: Christ's phrase refers to those 'Which haue the gift of c tin ce, & vse it to serue God with more free libertie.' And perhaps because the connection between chastity and godliness has an unfortunately Papist slant, the final sentence of the verse, Christ's second caveat, receives the following gloss: 'This gift is not commune for all men, but is verie rare, and giv to fewe: therefore men may not rashly absteine from marriage.' The Puritan reading of the text, finally, is to endorse the argument of comedy. This is made particularly clear in Calvin's own commentary on these verses. Speaking of the disciples' uncertainty, he writes, perhaps rather surprisingly:

But why do they not think on their side how hard was the bondage of their wives? Simply because they are thinking only of themselves and their own convenience and are not motivated by the mind of the flesh that they forget others and want only themselves to be considered. Their ungodly ingratitude betrays itself that they reject this wonderful gift of God out of fear of one inconvenience or out of boredom. According to them it would be better to flee marriage altogether than to tie oneself to a perpetual bond of fellowship. But if God instituted marriage for the common welfare of the human race, it is not to be rejected because it carries with it some things which are less agreeable.

The world must be peopled, and the will of God followed. Malvolio may therefore have some sense of the buried text, but without necessarily reading it as being directed against marriage; God, or 'Jove', as he may have more innocuously become by the time of the Folio text, seems to be overseeing the whole affair, including the interpretative spirit with which the sense of the words is received. Malvolio's reading of the letter, which he imagines to be free of 'imagination', could therefore be said to be a parody of the tendency of Puritan interpretation to read ambiguous texts in the direction of a theological programme, or to invoke the will of God to endorse personal predilections.

Godliness may render a man unfit for marriage, but the Geneva glosses also warn that 'Some by nature are vnable to marië, and some by arte'; 'The worde Eunuche is a generali word, and hath diuers kinds under it, as gelded men and bursten men.' By extension, one might say that the metaphoric application of physiological circumstances, Christ's starting point, hath divers kinds under it. Malvolio's spiritual sterility renders him unfit for comic marriage, whatever his physical potency may be. More importantly to the rituals of comedy, the gulling which is initiated in the box-tree scene is an extended episode of humiliation. Induced to declare himself no eunuch by nature, Malvolio then puts himself at risk of being made one by art. His self-exposure, capture, imprisonment, and binding—the entire course of his 'bafflement'—is not only the well-recognized expulsion of repressive order from festival and holiday, but an act of sexual degradation—a displaced gelding, through which Malvolio is emasculated by the laughter of the sexually united pairs:

Maria writ
The letter, at Sir Toby's great importance,
In recompense whereof he hath married her.
(Twelfth Night, 5.1.359-61)

Yet however absurd the holy duty of marriage may seem in Malvolio's case—and it is not so much that the world has no need of more Malvolios as that he is contemplating marriage with the wrong person and for entirely the wrong reasons—it is extremely important to the play as a whole. 'If anyone imagines', says Calvin, 'that it is to his advantage to be without a wife and so without further consideration decides to be celibate, he is very much in error. For God, who declared that it was good that the woman should be the help meet for the man, will exact punishment for contempt of his ordinance. Men arrogate too much to themselves when they try to exempt themselves from their heavenly calling.' The solemnity of God's punishment may be out of place in a comedy, as may the name of God itself, but the sense of 'heavenly calling' in sexual union is precisely in key with the magical happiness towards which the romantic comedies move. Resistance against this movement, or surprised acquiescence in it, is generally expressed with reference to purely natural or pagan forces, as when Viola speaks to Olivia about her beauty.

Lady, you are the cruell'st she alive
If you will lead these graces to the grave
And leave the world no copy.
(1.5.230-2)

Or when, at the end of the same scene, Olivia gives in to something beyond her own power to resist:

Fate, show thy force. Our selves we do not owe.
What is decreed must be; and be this so.
(1.5.300-1)

It is Olivia who most resists her obligation to marry by taking on a vow to what she imagines are higher things. Her withdrawal from the world is cast in the language of religious observance.

… like a cloistress she will veilèd walk,
And water once a day her chamber round
With eye-offending brine—
But the form of the observance, as Feste points out, is really without a religious object, an empty fetish like that of abjuring the sight and company of men, 'as if celibacy contained some meritorious service—just as the Papists imagine it is an angelic state. But all Christ intended', Calvin says of making oneself a eunuch for the kingdom of heaven's sake, 'was that the unmarried should set the aim before them of being more ready for the exercises of religion if they are freed from all cares. It is foolish to imagine that celibacy is a virtue, for this is no more pleasing to God in itself than fasting is, nor does it deserve to be reckoned among the duties required of us.' The 'divinity' the disguised Viola brings to Olivia shows her the vanity of withdrawing from the world. False and true divinity continue to pursue each other, with ironic effect, throughout the play. Immediately following the scene in which a false priest catechizes the desperate Malvolio, Olivia marries the dream she has loved since the fifth scene of Act 1.

If you mean well
Now go with me, and with this holy man,
Into the chantry by. There before him,
And underneath that consecrated roof,
Plight me the full assurance of your faith,
That my most jealous and too doubtful soul
May live at peace.

The wonderful gift of God is celebrated in a religious ceremony which the seemingly arbitrary forces of nature, imagination, and sheer chance have helped bring about. The 'peace' Olivia looks forward to is precisely what has eluded Malvolio at the end of the play—but his symbolic and structural roles are very different from hers.

Viola's loss of a brother does not lead her to a cloistered withdrawal from the world, but she does pursue concealment, and specifically proposes a disguise which will remove her from the responsibilities of sexuality: 'Thou shalt present me as an eunuch to him.' She makes herself a eunuch not for the kingdom of heaven's sake but to gain some advantage over the forces of time and occasion, both of which eventually give her the peace they give Olivia. The exotic nature of Viola's proposed role, however, is unlikely to render her unobtrusive: in a Christian climate the eunuch was both freakish and foreign, specifically Turkish, as the Captain recognizes in his acknowledgment of Viola's request. Eunuchs might be fascinating in themselves as human types, but certainly by virtue of being involved in the mythologized fantasy world of Turkish sexuality. No more is made of the oddity of Viola's disguise—she is no Castrucchio, as Orsino's Ilyria is not Volpone's Venice—but she retains a troublingly provocative physical presence, constantly drawing attention to her appearance from Orsino, Malvolio, Feste, and chiefly from Olivia. Disguise, and hence denial of sexual identity in her case, is a 'wickedness' as much as it is creative and liberating. It liberates, in fact, only for so long, and time first draws the knot of confusions tighter before untangling it. Olivia's claim on her as a husband, which she is able to corroborate with priestly authority, threatens first Viola's death and then the loss of the man she loves. So, once the appearance of Sebastian has begun to resolve the paradoxes, we have Viola's insistence, echoed by Orsino, that she resume her own clothes: 'Do not embrace me' she tells her brother, and the prohibition is implicitly extended to her future husband. As she is a man—or a eunuch—she is not ready to give herself to anyone.

Viola's superfluous disguise in Act 5 is matched by that of the humiliated Malvolio, still wearing the ludicrous costume he has been gulled into assuming by his reading of the letter—point devise, the very man. The 'notable shame' he has undergone has included his parading in the clothes and demeanour of an aspiring lover—a sexual role quite out of keeping with his peevish, repressed, sterile self-regard. One of the roles of festival customs, modern social historians agree, was to enforce communal order as much as temporarily to subvert it. David Underdown has described the clash in seventeenth-century English society between the cohesive function of festival and the godly order of those with a new vision of and programme for social organization:

The division in the English body politic which erupted in civil war in 1642 can be traced in part to the earlier emergence of two quite different constellations of social, political, and cultural forces, involving diametrically opposite responses to the problems of the time. On the one side stood those who put their trust in the traditional conception of the harmonious, vertically integrated society—a society in which the old bonds of paternalism, deference, and good neighbourliness were expressed in familiar religious and communal rituals—and wished to strengthen and preserve it. On the other stood those—mostly among the gentry and middling sort of the new parish élites—who wished to emphasize the moral and cultural distinctions which marked them off from their poorer, less disciplined neighbours, and to use their power to reform society according to their own principles of order and godliness. 7

The church ale—at which cakes and ale were the traditional fare—was one typical site of this conflict. An ancient parish tradition—a kind of communal picnic with drinking, as well as piping, dancing, and sometimes dramatic activity—its function was to bring the parishioners together in a festive money-raising activity to support the parish's charitable works. To the Puritan eye this praise-worthy end was entirely vitiated by the displays of un-righteousness the feast gave rise to. From about the time of Twelfth Night onwards there are numerous instances from across the country of festal customs being used against local Malvolios, in the course of which the representatives of authority were both mocked and, in extreme cases, physically assaulted.

Violence is in fact an entirely traditional ingredient of many forms of game and festival, and hence could give further cause to the godly to suppress festive customs. The liminal and group-bonding functions of football games with neighbouring villages, for example, are noted by Underdown: "Tis no festival unless there be some fightings' is a contemporary saying he quotes (p. 96). Personal or communal rivalries and disputes could therefore be sorted out—more or less symbolically—under the cover of festival licence. In Twelfth Night it is Sir Toby who is the lord of violent misrule, and he is perhaps not uncharacteristic of enthusiastic seventeenth-century revellers in that during his final appearance in the play he is both drunk and bleeding. The particular contest he has just lost, begun in jest and ended in earnest, is with a young stranger over his apparent sexual invasion into territory Toby may regard as his to defend, if not to bestow. However ironically, he has promised Olivia to Sir Andrew, and his oath to his gull earlier in the play is made on the physical manifestations of his own manliness: 'If thou hast her not i'th' end, call me cut' (2.3.180-1). Once Cesario shows some fighting spirit, male prowess is at stake: 'Come, my young soldier, put up your iron. You are well fleshed … Nay then, I must have an ounce or two of this malapert blood from you' (4.1.37-43).

Malvolio's heated imaginings about Olivia in the letter scene give rise to a string of violent stage-whispers from the box-tree—'O for a stone-bow to hit him in the eye!'; 'Fire and brimstone!'; 'Bolts and shackles!' (a premonition of Malvolio's punishment); 'Shall this fellow live?'; '… does not Toby take you a blow o' the lips, then?'; 'Out scab'; 'Marry, hang thee brock'; '… I'll cudgel him, and make him cry "O!"' After this, Malvolio is perhaps lucky to undergo the relatively lenient treatment he gets, although it is certainly a fairly frequent tendency in modern stagings of the play to emphasize the physical punishment in the revellers’ teasing of him in 3.4, and since the eighteenth century the pain and privation of the dark house scene have often been stressed, to the degree that Malvolio has seemed on the edge of being mad indeed. His binding—promised by Sir Toby in 3.4—is not usually seen. He leaves the stage free, and while on Shakespeare's stage he may have been entirely invisible in 4.2, these days we tend to see an anguished face and beseeching, clutching hands as he pleads with Sir Topas and Feste. In any event, in fictional terms he must be free enough to write his letter, and when he re-emerges into the world of light he doesn't usually bear about him signs of his bondage (the far commoner stage tradition is for him to have straw sticking to his hair and clothes). Yet he is still dressed in his lover's garb, as I noted above, usually sadly muddied and ripped in performance, to signal the trials of
The absurd costume, Maria's fantastical invention, includes the restricting bonds of the cross garters, which soon after he has put them on are already making him 'sad':

This does make some obstruction in the blood, this cross-gartering, but what of that?
(3.4.19-21)

The Grocer's Wife from The Knight of the Burning Pestle could tell him; there are dangers in putting on silly costumes: 'Tll see no more else indeed, la: and I pray you let the youths understand so much by word of mouth: for I tell you truly, I'm afraid o' my boy. Come, come, George, let's be merry and wise. The child's a fatherless child; and say they should put him into a strait pair of gaskins, 'twere worse than knot-grass; he would never grow after it' (2.92-8). The innocently lubricious sense of 'grow', typical of the Wife's chatter, alerts us to one element of Malvolio's shaming: his binding is a symbolic sign of his impotence, of his having been made a festival eunuch. I think he should keep his cross garters obediently tied until he finally hobbles off to seek revenge.

I want to return to the rituals of sexual humiliation, but first to explore a second violent festive practice which has frequently been noted in commentary on the play, as seeming in some way to stand for the treatment of Malvolio. The previously unannounced Fabian enters the play in 2.5 as a further resentful victim of Malvolio's war on holiday pastimes: he has been 'brought ... out o' favour with my lady about a bear-baiting here'. 'To anger him', Toby replies, 'we'll have the bear again, and we will fool him black and blue. Once again the promised violence happens only symbolically—Malvolio is not beaten up as is Captain Otter (as bear) by his wife (as dog) in Jonson's Epicoene—but we are reminded at this moment of the strong connections between festival and brutal punishment, and the evident need to give vent to disruptive and aggressive tendencies even in the midst of celebrations which affirmed the strength and mutual support of the community. Malvolio's bearishness remains in that he sees his tormentors as a 'pack'—hounds rather than people—at the end of the play. The violent accompaniments of festive activity are everywhere apparent in the social world surveyed by David Underdown: bear and bull baitings are the invariable entertainments at church ales. While one may have been attendant on feasting—the bull was baited before being butchered—the other patently was not. That the actual torturing of animals, whatever symbolic function it may have been recognized to carry, could itself take a symbolic form in festival is proved by an intriguing reference Underdown cites from Somerset in 1603, involving some trouble while someone was 'playing Christmas sports in a bear's skin' (p. 60). Such a winter-time activity—very reminiscent of Lanthorn Leatherhead's reported feats in Batholomew Fair (3.4. 126-28)—may have as much to do with The Winter's Tale as with Twelfth Night, but the ritualized hunting that is expressed in animal baiting, and the deliberate arousal, in the case of cock-fighting, for example, of competitive sexual aggression in the animals, reveal an ambivalent fascination with purely physical power and instinctive drive as forces which must be celebrated, yet punished. Jonson, once again, more directly incorporates festive baatings and huntings into his comic structure, and his plays are to that extent crueller than Shakespeare's. Volpone's direct address to the audience following his sentence by the court—"This is called mortifying of a fox'—reminds us of the festive custom of hunting a fox or other small animal indoors, within the hall at a feast, frequently involving killing it by driving it into the fire. One of the fox's sins in Volpone, of course, is lust. The totemic sexual rituals associated with hunting and killing the stag, however, are clear enough in Shakespeare's work. The festive song in As You Like It is an anthem of male prowess and anxiety—the lusty horn is given to the victor as a sign that he is a potential victim of forces which lie outside his direct control. Falstaff's ritual punishment for lust at the end of The Merry Wives of Windsor is suffered in the disguise of a male deer—he is symbolically pinched and burnt, rather than actually butchered and cooked. Falstaff's dis-horning, George Turberville tells us, exactly follows the English practice of dismembering the stag after the kill; following the removal of one sign of the deer's maleness, 'before that you go about to take off his skynne, the fyrst thing that must be taken from him, are his stones which hunters call his doulcettes'. These form part of 'the dayntie morselles which appertayne to the Prince or chief personage on field'. In Beaumont and Fletcher's Philaster the cowardly and lustful Pharamond has paid the woodmen for the dowcets and head of a slain deer (4.2)—that he evidently needs them as aphrodisiacs hardly commends his unassisted sexual powers. Following the scenes of actual hunting in the fourth act, Pharamond becomes the human quarry of a popular riot in the fifth, when the citizens, like Laertes' Danish supporters, mutiny to reinstate Philaster. The language with which they threaten him deliberately recalls the hunting terms of Act 4, and his proposed punishment mockingly strips him of manhood.

PHARAMOND

Gods keep me from these hell-hounds.

1 CITIZEN

Shall's geld him, Captain?

CAPTAIN

No, you shall spare his dowcets, my dear donsels; as you respect the ladies let them flourish. The curses of a longing woman kills as speedy as a plague, boys.

1 CITIZEN

I'll have a leg, that's certain.

2 CITIZEN

I'll have an arm.

2 CITIZEN

He had no horns, sir, had he?

CAPTAIN

No, sir, he's a pollard; what wouldst thou do with horns?

O, if he had, I would have made rare hafts and whistles of'em; but his shin bones if they be sound shall serve me. (5.4.53-74)12

Symbolic hunting therefore carries within it a potential for sexual shaming and degradation. Pharamond and Falstaff are both punished for lust by public exposure, and Malvolio's treatment clearly has something of a similar purpose, although it certainly lacks the direct physical violence the two former figures suffer. At least this is so in the text; there is a theatrical tradition of varying degrees of physical torture of Malvolio by Feste in 4.2. Malvolio's punishment is to be 'propertied', but largely to be forgotten, removed, and 'baffled' until his incandescent entry into Act 5. He is certainly punished for excess, but punished by deprivation, and his physical powerlessness in the dark house is perhaps to remind him of his unsuitability for the preposterous role he has taken on. A born eunuch, in Christ's terms, he is absurdly unfitted for the position of comic wooer and bridegroom.

The impotent lover, in body, mind, and social conduct, is a stock figure of erotic comedy. The absurdly enamoured father, the old man, the stupid heir, the pretentious braggart, the rake, all are variant threats to the union of the true lovers, and they must be outwitted, exposed, or otherwise removed in the course of the plot. In Jonson's Bartholomew Fair the egregious ninny Cokes, the contracted bridegroom of the witty but powerless Grace Wellborn, loses his fiancée to Quarlous in the liberating chaos of a festival atmosphere. He also loses his money, but in having his purse cut—twice—he is symbolically gelded of the manhood he so ineptly represents. He half recognizes what has happened to him in the words he addresses—mistakenly—to Overdo: 'Cannot a man's purse be at quiet for you, i' the master's pocket, but you must entice it forth, and debase it?' (3.5.213-14), while Wasp scornfully tells his charge 'now you ha' got the trick of losing, you'd lose your breech, an't 'twere loose' (ibid. 221-3). Cokes, though he hardly cares in the regressively childish festive world he has entered, is symbolically shamed and neutered. His fascination with the puppets, babies, and trash is a complete identification—he, like the puppet Dionysius, has no sex. It is Jonson's disciple Richard Brome who writes the frankest version of what appears to be a submerged theme of festival and comedy when in his 1639-40 play The Court Beggar a doctor is held down across a table and threatened with castration at the hands of a 'Sowgelder' (4.2). His protests remind the audience of the dangerous uproar of popular holidays:

> You dare not use this violence upon me
> More rude than rage of Prentices.

The gelding turns out to be a 'counterfeit plot'—partly a deliberate degradation in revenge for the doctor's prior actions, and partly to scare him into confessing that the patient he is attending is, like Antonio in The Changeling, a sham madman. The scene could therefore be taken simply as a particularly risqué piece of farce used to enliven a rather creakily episodic plot, yet the larger question remains of why this particular action may have occurred to Brome as being suitable to a comedy filled with spurious and defective wooers.

Nothing quite so specifically humiliating or violent turns up in the court records of pre-Restoration England, although there is a good deal of material connected with disorders and outrages arising from popular rituals of sexual control. The usual individual target for the community to direct its displeasure over aberrant sexual conduct was likely to be a woman; the whore, the adulteress, the scold, all suffered ritual mockery, exposure, and varyingly violent degrees of punishment. Yet the ceremonies which marked such disapproval—ridings, parades, rhymes, lampoons, duckings, and so forth—were by no means directed at women alone. The man who suffered himself to be cuckolded or beaten was likely to be a target of mockery as an unmanly man, a man who couldn't wear the breeches. One particularly widespread custom, which has a literary record that stretches at least from Samuel Butler to Thomas Hardy, was the skimmington, a wild processional ride involving disguise, rough music, and, as Martin Ingram has written, 'mocking laughter, sometimes light-hearted, but often taking the form of hostile derision which The ritual could, into physical occasion, escalate violence'. The ritual is clearly related to symbolic hunting, and indeed could feature participants dressed in horns or animal skins. If the custom arose to mock unconventional sexuality or deviant behaviour within a marriage its scope could be far wider, as Ingram explains:

While female domination and immorality were the characteristic pretexts for ridings, there were other occasions. A simple form of riding was sometimes used in a holiday context in 'trick or treat' games, and to punish people who refused to join in the festivities or who in other ways offended the holiday spirit. At Chichester in 1586, a game of 'tables' on New Year's Eve was rudely interrupted when 'William Brunne who then played the part of a lord of misrule came in … and said that that game was no Christmas game and so perforce took [one of the players] … from thence and made him ride on a staff to the High Cross.' The use of ridings to punish people who would not give money to Lords of Misrule on holidays was denounced by Philip Stubbes. Unfortunately, when refusal to take part in festivities (or, worse still, attempts to suppress such festivities) were based on Puritan principles, such ridings were apt to become distinctly less lighthearted and more elaborate. John Hole, the Puritan constable of Wells, discovered this to his cost in 1607. Hole and his associates tried to suppress the city's May games, which had been organised on a particularly grand scale that year in order to raise money for the repair of St Cuthbert's church. Hole's interference raised a storm of opposition, and he and his friends were savagely derided in a series of spectacular ridings performed before thousands of people. (Ingram, pp., 170-1)

The John Hole case, which was surveyed by C. J. Sisson in Lost Plays of Shakespeare's Age as long ago as 1936, is particularly suggestive about the treatment given Malvolio by the revellers of Twelfth Night. Hole, like Malvolio, set out to oppose holiday revels on principle; the revellers' revenge was character assassination, as Hole was accused of adultery with another godly objector to the festival, the delightfully named Mrs Yard. None of the surviving lampooning verses make what one would think to be the obvious jokes about hole and yard (suitably inverted in good festival fashion), but Hole is simultaneously accused of lechery and impotence, like Malvolio doubly mocked for sexual ambition and incapacity. Particularly the exposure of the Wells killjoys by theatricalizing them—staging them in disguises and caricatured paintings—by making them join, in effigy at least, the very celebrations they have tried to stop, reveals a direct relationship between festive rituals and the comic structure of such plays as Twelfth Night. In the play Malvolio is more subtly tricked into staging himself as a parodic festival figure—a grotesquely inept embodiment of the energy celebrated in holidays, and as such a betsy, a guy, a Jack-a-Lent, a cockshot man, at whom people can hardly forbear hurling things. Death, darkness, sterility, and ill luck are heaped on his back, and laughed out of the play.

His scapegoat function has frequently been remarked on, but one theoretical defence of festive customs, presumably including the shaming rituals, was that they were restorative and socially cohesive. The exhibition of conflict or aberrance under the special conditions of holiday licence would lead, with luck, to resolution and rehabilitation. Thus those accused as rioters at Rangeworthy near Bristol in 1611 defended themselves by pointing out that communal feasting was for 'the refreshing of the minds and spirits of the country people, being inured and tired with husbandry and continual labour … for preservation of mutual amity, acquaintance, and love … and allaying of strifes, discords and debates between neighbour and neighbour'. This sounds remarkably like the spirit of Fabian's plea to Olivia not to let retributive justice inappropriately be applied to holiday jests:

Good madam, hear me speak,
And let no quarrel nor no brawl to come Taint the condition of this present hour,
Which I have wondered at. In hope it shall not,
Most freely I confess myself and Toby Set this device against Malvolio here

How with a sportful malice it was followed
May rather pluck on laughter than revenge
If that the injuries be justly weighed
That have on both sides passed.

But the victims of the Rangeworthy riot, a Puritan constable and his followers who were beaten when they tried to arrest musicians and dancers, did pursue their case through the courts, and hence we happen to know about the incident. David Underdown holds up this obscure rural scuffle as an emblem of a changing world: 'The Rangeworthy revel is thus a classic example of Jacobean cultural conflict. Rituals appropriate to a traditional society, enshrining ancient values of custom and good neighbourhood, were attacked by people in authority who put individual piety, sobriety, and hard work above the older co-operative virtues' (p. 63).
Malvolio refuses Fabian's open hand. He has, after all, been most notoriously abused, and excluded from achieving greatness in any sense. Donald Sinden's entertaining account of playing the part ends with his invocation of the bitterness of Malvolio's humiliation and disappointment. There is nothing for him following his exit, Sinden suggests, save suicide. Yet surely only a particularly sensitive, late-Romantic Malvolio would be snuffed out by a device. I think the seventeenth-century man is heading for his lawyer, and Star Chamber.

To return, finally, to texts, it is worth noting that mock preaching was a recurrent element in popular revels, particularly those with a satiric thrust against a local community figure. Such was the play which Sir Edward Dymock had performed at his house in Kyme, Lincolnshire, in August 1601, and which guyed Henry, Earl of Lincoln. Following the play proper one John Cradock preached a mock sermon in a black gown and cap; a witness said that he wore 'A counterfeit beard, and standing in a pulpit fixed to the maypole on kyme greene, havinge a pott of ale or beare hanginge by him in stead of a hower glasse.' The costume sounds remarkably like that of Sir Topas, but the performance was evidently a good deal more elaborate, though entirely in key with Feste's excellent fooling. Cradock 'did represent the person of a Minister or Priests, and did … utter … "The Marcie of Musterd Seed and the blessing of Bullbeefe and the peace of Pottelucke be with you all. Amen."

Cradock's spoof text for the sermon, from 'The 22 chapter of the book of Hitroclites', led to a series of improbable romance tales and jests, possibly with further parodie reference to the formulae of the liturgy and scripture. Some years later in Wiltshire a drunken revel included the preaching from the pulpit within the parish church of a mock sermon on the text of 'the one and twentieth chapter of Maud Butcher and the seventh verse' (Ingram, p. 166). Mockery of ecclesiastical authority and liturgical frameworks for mock heroics may be thought particularly Rabelaisian revels, but they were evidently equally English, and survived to the years when they might be employed to deride Puritan earnestness. If they did not appear overtly in plays licensed for the public stage, that should not surprise us. The subter parodic text Maria includes in the spurious letter is at once a test of Malvolio's reading, a word to the wary, and a libel on his sexuality; as such it lies entirely within the English festival tradition.

Notes

1 A further interpretation of Malvolio's chosen letters has been suggested by Leah Scragg: "'Her C's, her U's, and her T's: Why That?'; A New Reply for Sir Andrew Aguecheek', RES 42 (1991), 1-16. Her suggestion that the line may have some reference to cutpurses has an interesting incidental bearing on my argument in this essay: see below.

2 This translation is superseded by the 1582 (et seq.) Geneva New Testament, which gives the word as 'eunuches', and in every other respect is very close to the King James version. The Bishops' Bible (1568) uses 'chaste'.

4 That the text was read literally as well as metaphorically is demonstrated by its citation in the discussions over the Essex divorce case in 1614. George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, quoted the passage as clear 'warrant' for annulment of marriage. King James, arguing against too narrow a definition of 'inability', denied that Christ's categories of male impotence were prescriptive. See The Narrative History of King James (London, 1651), pp. 95, 102. I am grateful to Professor Leslie Thomson for drawing my attention to this material.

15 For a political reading of the play see Martin Butler, Theatre and Crisis 1632-1642 (Cambridge, 1984), pp. 220-8. The aberrant sexual behaviour in the play might be said to be a further manifestation of the madness and corruption Butler locates as its organizing themes.

16 An incident related in a letter by Robert Gell to Sir Martin Stuteville in July 1628 concerns violent revenge for rape at the siege of La Rochelle. Ten men of the town dressed up as women to lure the guilty soldiers of the besieging army, who then 'were so received that all to save their lives yielded unto ye young men, and went into the town, where, beeing most severely and barbarously punished, they were sent back to glory in the camp of their exploit, for which they were never again fitted'. Critical Essays: Sample Essay Outlines

The following paper topics are designed to test your understanding of the play as a whole and to analyze important themes and literary devices. Following each question is a sample outline to help you get started.

Topic #1

It is obvious that the play’s tapestry contains more than a single plot. Write an essay analyzing the way in which the comic plot involving Malvolio becomes a perverse reflection of the love plot involving Orsino and Olivia. Discuss Cesario’s role as go-between for the Duke.
Outline

II. Explain the romantic plot.
A. An aristocratic man falls in love with a countess.
   1. The Duke has seen Olivia and desires union with her.
   2. He initially expresses the depth of his feeling in poetic lines.
B. Cesario acts as a go-between for the Duke.
   1. Cesario forms a practical complement to the Duke’s romantic behavior.
C. Olivia rejects the Duke’s love.
   1. Olivia says that she cannot love the Duke while she mourns her brother’s death.
   2. Olivia, rather, falls in love with Cesario.

III. Explain the comic plot.
A. Maria plots to gull Malvolio.
   1. There is no genuine source for Malvolio’s love; it’s the result of a scheme.
   2. The letter left by Maria is falsified.
B. Malvolio picks up and reads a falsified letter.
   1. The letter seems to be in Olivia’s hand.
   2. It commands him to adopt peculiar behaviors.
C. Malvolio proceeds under the influence of a devious trick.
   1. Malvolio thinks Olivia is in love with him.
   2. Malvolio approaches Olivia in yellow stockings and cross-gartered.

IV. Malvolio’s love is a perversion of the Duke’s and Olivia’s.
A. Malvolio’s love is an artificial fantasy—put stress on the “artificial.”
   1. Malvolio loves on the basis of a letter and a readiness in his own mind.
   2. Malvolio’s love has no possibility of being realized because Olivia has no intention of loving him.
B. Orsino, by contrast, is truly in love with Olivia.
   1. Orsino’s feelings have a genuine source.
   2. Orsino is truly involved in an effort to court a woman.
   3. Ideally, he could possibly achieve Olivia.
C. Malvolio winds up humiliated.
   1. Malvolio isolates himself with a sense of being abused.
   2. Rather than being an accepted lover, Malvolio winds up wronged and humiliated.

V. Conclusion: To the extent that the schemers are cruel, Malvolio’s love for Olivia is perverse. Love cannot thrive in an atmosphere of ill will.

Topic # 2
Many playwrights have dealt with the theme of love. It’s a theme that carries so much interest because of the power it wields in peoples’ lives. Write an essay that explores Shakespeare’s treatment of the theme of love in Twelfth Night.

Outline
I. Thesis Statement: The formal design of Twelfth Night illustrates the theme of love as having two key aspects, “loving” and maintaining the relationship.
II. The aspect of “loving” as embodied in the play
A. Define the concept of “loving.”
   1. The Duke serves as an example of the true lover.
   2. The Duke places Olivia on a pedestal.
B. Olivia falls in love with Cesario.
   1. Just as the Duke loved Olivia upon seeing her, so Olivia loves Cesario when they meet.
   2. Olivia pours forth poetic feeling for Cesario.
C. Both Orsino and Olivia are rejected in their loving.
   1. Olivia rejects the love of the Duke.
   2. Cesario rejects Olivia’s love.

III. Cesario represents the practical aspect of love that sustains a relationship.
A. Cesario goes to work for the Duke.
   1. Cesario’s speech shows that he understands the need to be realistic and practical.
   2. Cesario diligently attempts to woo Olivia for the Duke.
B. Cesario does not give himself over to sentiment.
   1. Cesario does not fall in love and utter love speeches.
   2. Cesario is a man of action, not of words.
C. Cesario has a twin brother.
   1. Cesario’s twin brother, Sebastian, will prove a similar complement to Olivia.
   2. Olivia’s love is similar to the Duke’s in its romantic nature.

IV. The two aspects of love are brought together in the final harmony of the play.
A. Sebastian enters Illyria.
   1. Sebastian is puzzled over Olivia’s immediate affection for him.
   2. The two lovers can achieve their other halves because Sebastian joins Viola.
B. Cesario reveals his true female identity.
   1. Olivia and Sebastian have married; Cesario is not a man.
   2. The Duke can propose to Viola upon learning of Olivia’s marriage.
C. The couples of the love plot complement each other perfectly.
   1. Cesario is the practical aspect that sustains the love which Orsino embodies.
   2. Sebastian, like his sister, represents the practical aspect for Olivia’s amalgam of love feeling.

V. Conclusion: Looking at a theme in an abstract sort of way, as here with love, requires that the play be seen quite like a static work of art. Characters thus become more like poetic symbols than real, dynamic personalities.

Topic # 3
The festive atmosphere is so much a part of this play that it should be considered to gain a deeper understanding. Sir Toby, as the “lord of misrule,” is the master of ceremonies and surely keeps the party going. Write an essay that explores the function of the foolery and fun within the play.

Outline
I. Thesis Statement: Shakespeare weaves in a festive atmosphere that enhances the enjoyment of the love plot.
   II. Define the festive atmosphere.
      A. The title Twelfth Night indicates a holiday and day of revelry.
         1. Tradition places a “lord of misrule” in charge of the fun in this play.
         2. The holiday includes eating, drinking, and entertainment.
      B. Sir Toby handles the merriment quite well.
         1. Sir Toby and Sir Andrew eat and drink for diversion.
2. Sir Toby instigates a fight that provides high-spirited entertainment.
C. The Clown plays a remarkable role in the festivities.
   1. The Clown is a jester who is clever at wordplay.
   2. The Clown sings for the Duke and the other characters.

III. The saturnalia is absorbed in the action of the play.
A. The gulling of Malvolio as an example of high jinks
   1. Sir Toby approves of the way Maria orchestrates the scheme.
   2. The spectators take eerie pleasure in Malvolio’s humiliation.
B. Imagery underscores the awareness of a holiday
   1. Sir Toby uses dance images in a conversation with Sir Andrew.
   2. Sir Toby refers to wines and has a reputation for being a drunk.
C. Feste’s role in the festive design
   1. He impersonates Sir Topas when speaking with Malvolio.
   2. Feste and Cesario have a meeting of the minds in their conversation.

IV. The intersection of the festive element and the love theme
A. Sir Andrew as one of Sir Toby’s men has a mock duel with Cesario.
   1. Sir Toby suggests that a show of valor will entice Olivia.
   2. Sir Andrew is egged on to confront Cesario.
B. The content of the Clown’s songs relates to the theme of love.
   1. The first song Feste sings deals with true love.
   2. Feste also sings a song that expresses Orsino’s frustrated love.
C. The last act consists in a dizzying array of interludes.
   1. The act has the semblance of a large party with all the characters coming together to share in the roistering.
   2. Sir Toby marries Maria in recompense for her cleverness.

V. Conclusion: Love can thrive in almost any environment. But, perhaps an ambience that is full of fun and liveliness can best match the emotional high that being in love means for some.

Critical Essays: Suggested Essay Ideas

Act I, Scene 1
1. Does the Duke’s opening speech show praise for Olivia in particular or for the experience of love in general? Explain your answer by citing specific lines.

2. What kind of judgment would you make about the Duke’s character based on his speech and behavior in the first scene? Discuss why you get this impression. Discuss either several specific qualities or one generalized personality trait.

Act I, Scene 2
1. Viola comments on the deceptiveness of appearances. People aren’t always what they seem to be. Why do you think this theme would be significant in a play that deals with love? Cite evidence from the play to support your answer.

2. Why does the love object have to come down from the altar of the lover’s worship? Why, that is, can’t the Duke keep praising Olivia forever? How does Viola make it clear that there’s more to being in love than just poetry? Make sure you present your topic sentences clearly in the essay.
Act I, Scene 3
1. Sir Andrew may not be a good suitor for Olivia. Defend this thesis statement referring to specific examples from the dialogue.

2. Analyze the dance imagery found in lines 116–138. Why do you think Shakespeare included it in the dialogue? With what aspect of the play does it tie in? What does it emphasize?

Act I, Scene 4
1. Think of your efforts to win a sweetheart when you’ve fallen in love, or what you might do to win one. In what ways would those efforts be similar or different from Cesario’s endeavors to woo Olivia for the Duke?

2. Consider once again the definition of “Romantic comedy” stated earlier. Why do you think the society of a given era would desire a happy ending? Would you like to see Twelfth Night end in another way than it does?

Act I, Scene 5
1. How does the Clown prove that Olivia is a fool? Is he correct or incorrect in his assessment? Explain your answer with evidence found in the text.

2. How many love strands does the first act contain? Who is involved in them? Where do the relationships stand by the end of Act I in relation to how they will eventually develop?

Act II, Scene 1
1. Name one characteristic of poetic language and one of prose. After you state those, select one speech in the play that contains poetry and another from Act II, Scene i that contains prose, and explain the differences you notice between the two. Allow your imagination to explore the significance of the two different styles.

2. An important issue to be aware of when discussing characters’ motivations and fates is that of “free will” versus “determinism or fate.” Define these two concepts. And then, consider lines 3–8, spoken by Sebastian, in the light of that issue. Does Sebastian feel that he is in full control of things?

Act II, Scene 2
1. An important issue to be aware of when discussing characters’ motivations and fates is that of “free will” versus “determinism or fate.” Define these two concepts. And then, consider lines 3–8, spoken by Sebastian, in the light of that issue. Does Sebastian feel that he is in full control of things?

Act II, Scene 3
1. Describe the fun and festive atmosphere that makes up most of this scene. What role does Feste the Clown play in it? Cite specific lines to strengthen your description. Do you enjoy the playfulness? Why or why not?

2. Analyze Maria’s speeches in this scene. Explain carefully her motive to entrap Malvolio. Do you believe that she is justified in doing it?

Act II, Scene 4
1. Analyze the song in this scene. Who and what is involved in it? Which Twelfth Night character does it relate to? Explain your answer.

2. Why does the Duke believe that the man should be older than the woman in a relationship? Consider lines 29–39. Do you agree with his opinion? Why or why not?

Act II, Scene 5
1. Make the argument that Sir Toby, Andrew, Maria, and Fabian are behaving cruelly toward Malvolio. Is their cruelty justified in the light of the whole play? Do you personally accept the gulling of Malvolio?

2. Write an essay on “the love letter.” First of all, define what you think it is. Does Maria’s dropped letter fit your definition? What do you think of the requests made in the letter? How would you compose your own real love letter.

Act III, Scene 1
1. Describe the way in which the Clown carries out his role as “fool.” What functions does he see himself as performing? Does he fulfill them as he thinks he should? Make a judgment at the end of your essay as to whether he is a necessary or superfluous character in the play.

2. As Olivia is in the process of revealing her feelings for Cesario, she makes use of metaphors drawn from the animal kingdom—lines 120–122 and lines 130–131. State what these animal metaphors are, and then explain their significance. How do they illuminate the depth of Olivia’s feelings at the moment?

Act III, Scene 2
1. Articulate Fabian and Sir Toby’s assumption about the strength of a man’s valor in inciting love. Then write an opinion essay on whether you think valor, “machoness,” manliness, etc. are all that are necessary to win a woman’s love. Are they sound bases to build a love on? Explain your thesis.

2. Summarize briefly all the love connections up to this point. Even sound like a gossip. Tell who loves who and who has hopes of who. Then, in the remainder of the essay, explain who you think deserves to be together with whom. In other words, you be the matchmaker. (You don’t have to agree with Shakespeare’s resolution of the complications.)

Act III, Scene 3
1. Why doesn’t Antonio find love in this play? Is it because a play can only have so many major and minor characters? Does he deserve to be matched up with Olivia, Viola, or some other woman in Illyria?

2. How does Shakespeare render the relationship between Antonio and Sebastian? Compare their relationship to Sir Toby and Sir Andrew’s. Discuss the importance of friendship in a play like Twelfth Night.

Act III, Scene 4
1. Some critics have argued that Malvolio is presumptuous and arrogant. Discuss the extent to which those characteristics are responsible for his gulling and eventual madness. Support your case with evidence from the text.

2. Analyze this play in terms of its credibility and realism. To what extent is the action credible? To what extent is it fantasy and romance? Define the concepts you work with in your essay.

Act IV, Scene 1
1. In what way do Viola–Sebastian constitute a “poetic symbol,” as one critic has said. In other words, if they are one spirit in two bodies, how does that technique help us to understand Shakespeare’s vision of love in the play? Be careful to explain the symbolism before you construct your argument.

2. Discuss Olivia’s attitude toward the brawl she comes upon. Find other places in the play where Sir Toby’s foolery is criticized and list them. Why do you think characters express disapproval for the festive behavior? How would the play stand without Sir Toby’s merriment?

Act IV, Scene 2
1. Why does the Clown insist that Malvolio is mad? Whom do you believe, Malvolio or Sir Topas/Clown? If Malvolio is not mad, in your opinion, what does the Clown’s insistence suggest about his role in the play? If Malvolio is mad, explain why you don’t accept his contentions.

2. Analyze the song with which the Clown closes the scene. Is the allusion to the Devil in harmony with the preceding allusions in the scene? How does the song pass judgment on Malvolio?

Act IV, Scene 3
1. What is an “arranged marriage”? Do you know of anyone who was part of an arrangement? What motives may be involved? Compare an arranged marriage to the manner in which Sebastian and Olivia are brought together.

2. Consider the influence of “accident and flood of fortune” on Sebastian’s success with Olivia. Is the marriage just good luck and is Sebastian taking advantage of an opportunity to marry up? Discuss Sebastian’s attitude to Olivia in your essay.

Act V, Scene 1
1. Explain Antonio’s function in the play. Is he a minor or major character? Does he clarify or interpret what is going on with the twins? Does he oppose or support the twins?

2. Isolate the methods that Shakespeare uses to establish and reveal character. It would probably be best to do a character study of one particular character. Are the actions of the characters properly motivated and consistent?

On Not Being Deceived: Rhetoric and the Body in Twelfth Night

Elder Loveless. Mistres, your wil leads my speeches from the purpose. But as a man—

Lady. A Simile servant? This room was built for honest meaners, that deliver themselves hastily and plainely, and are gone. Is this a time or place for Exordiums, and Similes, and metaphors?

"Shakespearean comedy," writes Stephen Greenblatt, "constantly appeals to the body and to sexuality as the heart of its theatrical magic." Without wishing to disparage the enterprise of writing histories of the body, or indeed to underestimate what such histories have accomplished in terms of enhancing our understanding of early modern culture, I would like in the following pages to challenge the operation of a certain kind of "body history" within recent Shakespeare criticism. I do not so much want to disagree with Greenblatt's statement as it stands, as to argue that our understanding of how Shakespeare's comedy intervened, both in its own time and subsequently, to modify attitudes to sexuality and to gender has been more obscured than enlightened by the obsession with the "body" as Greenblatt here understands it, and with the kind of body history to which he and others have prompted us to turn.

I shall focus my argument on Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, a play which, for all the curiously metaphoric, even disembodied nature of the language in which it articulates the desires of its protagonists, has nevertheless become the touchstone of this "body" criticism within Shakespeare studies. Yet it is worth remarking that the current critical interest in Twelfth Night as a play about the indeterminacy of gender and the arbitrary nature of sexual desire actually began with the contemplation not of the materiality of the body, but with that of the signifier. In much earlier twentieth-century criticism, Shakespeare's comedies have been appreciated as temporary aberrations from an established sexual and social order for the purposes of a thoroughly conservative "self-discovery" and return to the status quo.4 Saussurian linguistics, alerting critics to the way in which meaning in language is always the effect of a play of differences, enabled them to challenge such interpretations on their own terms by arguing that the conservative denouement was inadequate to contain and fix the meanings released by the play of differences. This was especially the case in comedies such as As You Like It and Twelfth Night, in which the fiction of a woman's successful masquerade of masculinity is complicated by the understanding of its having been originally composed for performance by a boy. Suddenly, instead of being about the discovery of one's "true" identity, or a "natural" social and sexual order, it seemed that what the comedies were about was the ease with which systems of sexual difference could be dismantled, and the notion of gendered identity itself called into question. This was important when it happened—the mid-1980s—because at the same time feminist critics were beginning to draw attention to the misogynistic implications of the transvestite theater, thereby throwing into confusion that venerable tradition of critical delight in the sprightliness of Shakespeare's girls-dressed-as-boys. How could we go on liking Rosalind and Viola in the knowledge that what they really represented was the denial to women of access to the histrionic exchanges in which they excelled and we took pleasure?5 Just in time poststructuralist criticism saved us from the agony of this dilemma by recuperating the double transvestitism of the comedies as a calling into question of the "fully unified, gendered subject," thereby producing, instead of a patriarchal Shakespeare, a Shakespeare who, in the words of Catherine Belsey, offered "a radical challenge to patriarchal values by disrupting sexual difference itself."6

Subsequently, the notion that what the comedies were about was really the indeterminacy of gender was given a new and historically authenticating twist by investigations into the history of biological definitions of gender which seemed to prove that, in the minds of Shakespeare's contemporaries, gender itself was a kind of comic plot, the happy denouement of which could only be masculinity. A special issue of Representations on "Sexuality and the social body in the nineteenth century" contained an article by Thomas Laqueur which, though primarily concerned with the politics of nineteenth-century reproductive biology, was nevertheless to have a considerable impact on Renaissance literary studies as a result of what its findings implied about the biological construction of gender in the early modern period. Laqueur drew our attention to a momentous, but overlooked event in the history of sexuality. Sometime in the late eighteenth century, the old belief that women needed to experience orgasm in order to conceive was abandoned. Women were henceforward to be thought of as properly passionless, because passive, participants in the act of sexual reproduction. What this implied was nothing less than a change in the existing physiology of sexual difference: the ancient Galenic model, according to which the hidden reproductive organs of women were merely a colder, imperfectly developed, and introverted type of the penis and testicles, requiring to be chafed into producing their seed, was replaced by the modern notion of the incommensurability of male and female reproductive organs. Laqueur's crucial point, however, was that the need to replace the old Galenic "metaphysics of hierarchy" between the sexes with an "anatomy and physiology of incommensurability" actually anticipated any real scientific understanding of women's reproductive makeup, and must therefore have been motivated not by scientific discovery, but by the need to find a new rationale for the exclusion of women from Enlightenment claims for the equality of men.7

I am ignorant of the effect of Laqueur's argument on nineteenth-century criticism, but the impact on Renaissance studies has been considerable. Writing in 1986 Laqueur cites, in a footnote, a paper on Shakespeare's Twelfth Night by Stephen Greenblatt, which was first published in 1985 in a collection called *Reconstructing Individualism*8 and subsequently included in Greenblatt's 1988 Shakespearean Negotiations as... the essay, "Fiction and Friction." Both authors evince exactly the same ancient and sixteenth- and seventeenth-century medical texts—first and foremost, Galen on the exact parity between male and female reproductive organs ("think of the 'uterus turned outward and projecting': Would not the testes [ovaries] then necessarily be inside it? Would it not contain them like a scrotum? Would not the neck [the cervix], hitherto concealed . . . be made into the male member?"
9 and then Galen's sixteenth and seventeenth-century readers, Ambroise Paré, Jacques Duval, Thomas Vicary, Helkiah Croke, and Jane Sharp.
10 They also both cite Montaigne, who twice refers to a story also told by Ambroise Paré about the sex-change of Marie-Germaine, a contemporary inhabitant of Vitry-le-François, who had the misfortune or good fortune to realize her manhood by jumping too energetically over a stream, thus prompting the eruption of the appropriate genitals.

Where Laqueur expounded the Galenic model of woman as introverted man in order to expose the politics of nineteenth-century reproductive biology and its denial of female orgasm, Stephen Greenblatt's identical quotations employ the model's stress on the defective "heat" of female reproductive organs, and the "friction" required to activate them, as an allegory for the "theatrical representation of individuality in Shakespeare."
"Erotic chafing" writes Greenblatt, "is the central means by which characters in plays like The Taming of the Shrew, A Midsummer Night's Dream, Much Ado About Nothing, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night realize their identities and form loving unions." 12 One might be forgiven for balking at the definition of The Taming of the Shrew as a fiction of "identity," or at the naturalization of its highly pragmatic argument of husbandry as a form of "erotic chafing"; Greenblatt, however, refrains from pursuing his argument in relation to this or indeed any of Shakespeare's comedies other than Twelfth Night. He puts the question of the relation of identity to erotic chafing—of fiction to friction—more persuasively by asking, "how does a play come to possess sexual energy?" 13. The answer is supplied by a reading of Twelfth Night, the crux of which is a short speech made by the male twin, Sebastian, after Olivia has realized that his double, with whom she was in love, is a woman and his sister. "So comes it, lady," says Sebastian, "you have been mistook."

But nature to her bias drew in that.
You would have been contracted to a maid;
Nor are you therein, by my life, deceiv'd:
You are betroth'd both to a maid and man.

According to Greenblatt, the "nature" to which Sebastian refers is, precisely, the Galenic discourse of the one-gender body. Sebastian's reference to himself as "both a maid and man" consequently invokes the inherent instability of gender as construed by this model, which in turn enables a good, radical-sounding assault on more comfortable readings which essentialize sexual difference. Thus, Greenblatt quotes C. L.
Barber's argument that, "the most fundamental distinction that the play brings home to us . . . is the difference between men and women" in order to reinforce, by contrast, the persuasiveness of his view that the fundamental physiological distinction between men and women is precisely what the play can't "bring home," historically speaking. At the end of Twelfth Night, as he points out, "Viola is still Cesario—'For so you shall be,' says Orsino, 'while you are a man' (5.1.386)—and Olivia, strong-willed as ever, is betrothed to one who is, by his own account, both 'a maid and a man.'" 15 Notice just how closely this conclusion resembles the poststructuralist reading which found Twelfth Night calling into question, "the possibility of a fully unified, gendered subject." And, as with the poststructuralist argument, a crucial legacy of this reading is its obscuring of the need to account, in feminist terms, for the historical fact of the absence of women's bodies from the Renaissance stage. In the light of the Galenic theory of reproduction, concludes Greenblatt, it is easy to see that transvestitism actually "represents a structural identity between men and women—an identity revealed in the dramatic disclosure of the penis concealed behind the labia." 16 And the dramatic fiction—an outrage to belief which is nevertheless endowed with generative because persuasive power—becomes analogous to the friction or chafing required, according to this Galenic model, both to warm women into conception, and to stimulate their reticent reproductive organs into realizing their latent virility.
Two years after Greenblatt's "Fiction and Friction" was published, Laqueur's thesis on the political and cultural investments of reproductive biology was published in book form as, Making Sex: Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud. The chapter on the pervasiveness of the Galenic model in Renaissance thought and culture carries an epigraph from Twelfth Night:

Sebastian [To Olivia]
So comes it, lady, you have been mistook.
But nature to her bias drew in that.
You would have been contracted to a maid;
Nor are you therein, by my life, deceived:
You are betrothed both to a maid and man.17

And he goes on to introduce the substance of his chapter thus:

Somehow if Olivia—played by a boy, of course—is not to marry the maid with whom she has fallen in love, but the girl's twin brother Sebastian; if Orsino's intimacy with "Cesario" is to go beyond male bonding to marriage with Viola, "masculine usurped attire" must be thrown off and woman linked to man. Nature must "to her bias" be drawn, that is, deflected from the straight path. "Something off center, then, is implanted in nature," as Stephen Greenblatt puts it, which "deflects men and women from their ostensible desires and toward the pairings for which they are destined." But if that "something" is not the opposition of two sexes that naturally attract one another—as it came to be construed in the eighteenth century—then what is it?18

The answer, of course, is the one-gender body according to Galen, with all its micro- and macrocosmic correspondences. The reading of a single Shakespeare play—or rather, the reading of five lines from a single Shakespeare play—seems to be doing a lot of work in supporting a circular argument about the relevance of body history to the question of how the magic of theater relates to the early modern conception of the body.

In the last five years, Laqueur's and Greenblatt's arguments and examples—Galen, Ambroise Paré, Jacques Duval, Helkiah Crooke, Jane Sharp, and (especially, perhaps) Montaigne—have been repeatedly invoked and quoted to support arguments about the pervasiveness of sixteenth-century fears that women might turn into men and men into women. Stephen Orgel thus accounts for the practice of having boys play women on the English stage by means of a complex argument whereby pathological fears about the chastity of women are weighed against equally pathological "fantas[ies] of a reversal from the natural transition from woman to man," which "are clearly related to anatomical theories of the essential homology of male and female." "Many cases," he writes, "were recorded of women becoming men through the pressure of some great activity."19 The endnote to this large claim refers not to women, but to alligators, but as the previous note referred the reader to Laqueur's Representations article and to Greenblatt's "Fiction and Friction," we can be reasonably sure that the "many cases" in question are in fact the single case of Marie-Germaine, cited by both Paré and Montaigne. It is true that both Montaigne and Paré liken the case of Marie-Germaine to other examples; these, however, being drawn from such authors as Pliny and Ovid, scarcely seem to constitute "many cases being recorded" in the times of the authors concerned.20 Judith Brown's well-researched Immodest Acts: The Life of a Lesbian Nun in Renaissance Italy exaggerates less, but still enlarges the evidence; "in a few cases women did not just imitate men, but actually became men," she writes, citing Greenblatt.21 More recently, Valerie Traub's Desire and Anxiety: Circulations of Sexuality in Shakespearean Drama—which contains an interesting and persuasive account of Twelfth Night—claims, citing both Greenblatt and Laqueur, that fear of turning into a woman "may have been a common masculine fantasy" in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.22 Traub's critical project involves enlarging Orgel's contention that the homoerotics of the Renaissance stage enabled "fantasies of freedom" for women as well as men23 by deconstructing the hierarchy of hetero-over homo-erotic readings of the plays, and revealing, as she puts it, "the polymorphous potential of desire itself, which Shakespeare so assiduously evokes and controls." Though such potential might not seem to have much to do with women in an exclusively male theater, Traub argues that boys were available to women as objects of fantasy, and in rejecting what she characterizes as the "feminist" interpretation of the boy player's significance (that is, the boy-player as instrument of the patriarchal control of female chastity) reveals her indebtedness to Greenblatt in preferring to argue that the boy-player represented, "an embodiment of the metadramatic theme of identity itself: always a charade, a masquerade, other." Laqueur provides further support for Traub's rejection of the idea that an all-male theater in itself argues either indifference to women's intelligent participation, or fear of the effects of such participation upon the reputation of women and their families. On Laqueur's evidence Traub proposes that in spite of patriarchal control of female sexuality through the ideology of chastity and the laws regarding marriage, there seems to have been a high cultural investment in female erotic pleasure—not because women's pleasure was intrinsically desirable, but because it was thought necessary for conception to occur.24

Once again, as in Greenblatt and in Orgel, the focus on a medical discourse about the body enables a way of speaking of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century dramatic discourse, and of the position that it offered women in the audience, as exhaustively signified by its analogue, erotic arousal.

What bothers me most about these arguments is that while they seem to be historicizing and de-essentializing our ideas about the relationship of gender to sexuality, the "fantasies" and "anxieties" that they identify in early modern dramatic texts take no account at all of the way in which, in sixteenth-century society, a woman's sexual behavior was perceived to affect the honor and therefore the credit and economic power of her kinsmen.25 Nor do they consider the way in which such traditional conceptions of sexual honor, credit, and wealth were themselves being rapidly transformed by the technology of persuasion—or "credit"—that such dramatic texts as Shakespeare's represented. None of these critics appear to entertain the possibility that the capacity to plot, write, and be able to make use of the erudition and wit of a comedy such as Twelfth Night might in itself be more central to sixteenth- and seventeenth-century conceptions of what it meant to "be a man" than any theory derived from Galen. Moreover, for all the emphasis on plurality, the "polymorphous potential" and the "unmooring of desire" released by the comedies, there still seems to be a commitment to the twentieth-century "lit-crit" notion that what the comedies are really all about is individual identity. Traub explores how characters negotiate their individual desires in the plays as if they were real people and not even partly figures in a persuasive discourse or agents of a plot, while Greenblatt celebrates "the emergence of identity through the experience of erotic heat" as "this Shakespearean discovery, perfected over a six- or seven-year period from Taming to Twelfth Night."26 It seems that where literary criticism, as it was once conceived, celebrated the saturnalian energies of Shakespeare's comedies for returning us to a "natural" social and sexual order, these theorists of desire want to find a historically specific concept of "nature"—the Galenic one-sex body—that mimics what is actually their essentialized notion of culture as something which is always preoccupied with the theatrical destabilization of "identities"—identity is "always a masquerade, a charade, other." But what if the errors, confusions, and masquerades of comedy were not, in their own time, thought of as dramas of identity? And what if the way in which the plays construct sexual difference in relation to the audience crucially concerned not the sexual object-choice of men or women in the audience27, but whether or not they were able to make use of the play as a discourse, an argument, to enhance their own agency? When James Shirley wrote the preface to an edition of Beaumont and Fletcher's comedies, published in 1647, he called it the collection of the Authentick Witt that hath made Blackfriers an Academy, where the three howers spectacle while Beaumont and Fletcher were presented, were usually of more advantage to the hopefull young Heire, then a costly, dangerous, forraine Travell . . . And it cannot be denied but that the young spirits of the Time, whose Birth and Quality made them impatient of the sowrer ways of education, have from the attentive hearing of these pieces, got ground in point of wit and carriage of the most severely employed students . . . How many passable discoursing dining witts stand yet in good credit upon the bare stock of two or three of these single scenes! 28

I'd like to suggest that Shirley's final metaphor of young men as prodigals, living on the "credit" of an ability to recommend themselves to strangers, a "stock" of wit which they have learned from plays, might tell us something about the way in which Shakespeare's plays, for all that they invoke the magic of the reproductive body, nevertheless construct sexual difference by appealing to the male (because formally educated) mind.

On Not Being Deceived: Rhetoric and the Body in Twelfth Night: 2. "Nor are you therein, by my life, deceiv'd": Twelfth Night and Gl'Ingannati

My counter-argument depends on the claim that the kind of comic plot from which Shakespeare never wavered—the five-act plot derived from Terence and Plautus—was perceived in his own time to be concerned, not with the emergence of identity, but with men's discursive ability to improvise social credit, or credibility. For all its popular appeal, Shakespeare's drama had a rigorous intellectual basis in the deliberative or hypothetical structure of Terentian comedy as it was rhetorically analyzed in every grammar school.29 The rhetorical analysis of Terentian comedy, far from being a rigid intellectual straightjacket (as I was implicitly taught at school, where I learned that Shakespeare transcended his contemporaries by ignoring the classical unities) enabled the achievement of a drama that carried emotional conviction as an unfolding narrative of events—"a kind of history," as Shakespeare himself called it—by investing the representation of those events with the impression of an intelligible combination of causality and fortuitousness.30 Not only were Terentian plots themselves examples of how one might dispose an argument probably; they also offered images of male protagonists who were themselves able, in moments of crisis, to improvise a temporary source of credit (perhaps a disguise, or a fiction of being related to someone rich) that could defer disaster until the terms of the crisis had altered to bring in a fortunate conclusion. The commentaries of the fourth-century grammarian, Donatus, together with those of Melanchthon and other sixteenth-century humanists, were appended to every dition of Terence, with the effect that no schoolboy could escape noticing how the plays demonstrated that uncertain or conjectural arguments were more productive in social exchanges—because more productive of emotional credibility—than the traditional means of assuring of good faith by oaths or other tokens.31

The Terentian plot characteristically concerned an illicit sexual union between a well born young man and a prostitute, which in turn betrayed a promise made between his father and neighbor that the son should unite their houses by marrying the neighbor's daughter. Characteristically, too, the plot managed to lend emotional credibility to the highly improbable argument that the prostitute in question was, in fact, the long lost daughter of the neighbor, thereby reconciling in her person the laws of desire and those of social exchange. Donatus's commentary on Terence was discovered in 1433, and its impact on the composition of European drama evident by the early sixteenth century.

Formal effects upon sixteenth-century vernacular drama, however, were complicated by the ideological impacts of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation, both of which revolutionized attitudes to sex, marriage, and the conjugal household in Europe. For example: Terentian comedy articulates a sense in which the space of prostitution is prophylactic; a household of male, citizen relatives is not dishonored by the entry of the heroine whose desirability was initially associated with her marginal status and sexual accessibility to the young hero. The plays therefore represent a society in which official to tolerance of prostitution first sanctions the initial violation of chastity and ensures that, once attached to a citizen house-hold, the woman will be protected by the very institution that once made her vulnerable. The Reformation and the Counter-Reformation, however, brought with them an end to ideologically sanctioned prostitution, so that, as Lyndal Roper writes of Augsburg, "any sexual relationship outside marriage, and any occasion on which the sexes mingled . . . might lead to sin." The marginal status once overtly allocated to prostitutes became a covertly allocated category of suspicion embracing all women.

Nevertheless, there were differences in the way in which Catholic and Protestant Europe acknowledged this and reacted to the sexual mores of the Terentian plot. While the writers of Italian commedia erudita cynically substituted citizens' wives and daughters for the prostitutes of Roman comedy, northern humanists tempered their enthusiasm for New Comedy as a model of Latinity and eloquence with a distaste for its evident authorization of illicit financial and sexual transactions, that is, clandestine marriages and rhetorical and sartorial impostures of credit. Thus, while Ariosto was claiming to outdo Terence and Plautus with his brilliant I Suppositi in which conjectural arguments ("supposes") are manipulated by the dramatist and the heroes to facilitate and subsequently legitimize the defloration of a citizen's daughter, German and Dutch humanists were redeeming the Terentian plot of sexual and financial deception by adapting it to the New Testament parable of the talents and that of the prodigal son. The waste of money and dissipation of male sexual energy, became, in these reforming "Christian Terence" plays, analogous to the danger posed to civil society by the abuse of conjectural argument in what we might call the "technology of credit" represented by the Terentian plot.

I use the word "technology" here to stress the material impact of the pedagogic dissemination of Terentian rhetoric. A pre-capitalist society necessarily guarantees its economic exchanges—exchanges of honor and wealth—by such instruments as oaths, which bind the faith of the contracting parties. The Terentian plot dramatizes a situation in which oaths and gestures of good faith bring about such an impasse as can only be resolved by exploiting the "error" or uncertainty about motive and intention which obtains between the participants in any social transaction. At a formal level, this very exploitation of error or uncertainty was the basis of the Terentian achievement of dramatic verisimilitude. Reformation dramatists were, therefore, concerned to appropriate the power of the Terentian formula to grant verisimilitude to dramatic fantasy, or to bestow credibility upon outrageous hypotheses, without endorsing the suggestion that this rhetorical "technology of credit" be exploited to facilitate deceptive sexual and financial exchanges in real life.

Much has been made, in recent discussions of "desire" on the English Renaissance stage, of the anti-theater writers' objections to the eroticized body of the boy player. These discussions evidently misunderstand the relationship of anti-theater writing to sixteenth-century neo-Terentian drama, with disastrously simplifying effects. Thus, for example, the title of one polemic against the stage, Stephen Gosson's Playes Confuted in Five Actions does not go unnoticed, but its relevance is missed; Laura Levine calls Gosson's conception of his attack as a five-act play "confused," while Jean Howard simply notes that Gosson "uses the five-act structure of classical drama to wage war on theatre." The point is that the five act Terentian argument represented, for educated sixteenth-century men, a technology of credit or of probability which, in its dramatic form, was perceived to be implicated in an ethos of betrayal, sexual and otherwise. Gosson's title indicates a need to appropriate dramatic probability for the cause of reform, as it moves from mocking native English drama's ignorance of verisimilitude to condemning the probable arguments of Italian commedia erudita for their thematic endorsement of sexual and financial deception:

> When the soule of your playes is ... Italian baudery, or the wooing of gentlewomen, what are we taught? ... the discipline we gette by these playes is like to the justice that a certaine Schoolmaster taught in Persia, which taught his schollers to lye, and not to lye, to deceive, and not to deceive, with a distinction how they might do it to their friends, & how to their enemies; to their friends, for exercise; to their foes, in earnest. Wherein many of his pupils became so skillful by practise, by custome so bolde, that their dearest friends payde more for their learning than their enemies. I would wish the Players to beware of this kinde of schooling ... whilst they teach youthfull gentlemen how to love, and not to love ... As the mischiefe that followed that discipline of Persia enforced them to make a lawe, that young men should ever after, as householders use to instruct their families: so I trust, that when the Londoners are sufficiently beaten with the hurt of suche lessons that are learned at Plaies, if not for conscience sake, yet for shunning the mischief that may privately breake into every mans house, this methode of teaching will become so hateful, that even worldly pollicy . . . shall be driven to banish it.

Gosson, of course, had himself been a dramatist; English playwrights were not ideologically immune to the effects of the Reformation, and were themselves torn between admiration for the rhetorical proficiency of Italian commedia erudita, and unease at its explicit promotion of an ethos of imposture and deception.

George Gascoigne thus produced an exuberant translation of Ariosto's irrepessible I Suppositi but followed it with the composition of an exceptionally harsh prodigal son play in which he argued that he would hence-forth be guilty of "no Terence phrase," since "Reformed speech doth now become us best."

George Whetstone's two five-act plays concerning the exposition and punishment of illicit sex and the abuse of financial credit in a city like London were prefaced by an acknowledgment of the need for English dramatists to heed the Terentian rhetoric of probability, for the English play-wright "grounds his work on impossibilities." The problem, argued Whetstone, was that the available Continental models of a probable drama—commedia erudita and "Christian Terence"—were no use to the English dramatist: "at this daye, the Italian is so lascivious in his comedies that the worst hearers are greeved at his actions," while "the German is too holy: for he presentes on every common Stage, what Preachers should pronounce in Pulpets." As Shakespeare paid both Gascoigne and Whetstone the compliment of rewriting the plays in question, we may reasonably infer that he was aware of the difficulty of dissociating the productivity of the Terentian technology of probability from its implicit endorsement of violations of chastity and betrayals of household honor.

Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, for all its currency as a drama of the body and sexual desire, is in fact so remarkably chaste that Elizabeth Barrett Browning's friend, Anna Jameson, writing a political and feminist criticism of Shakespeare in 1832 could exclaim, "how exquisitely is the character of Viola fitted to her part, carrying through her ordeal with all inward grace and modesty!" Jameson was not being naïve or repressed about the sexual content of the play: a glance at the Italian or Roman models of any comedy by Shakespeare will reveal how consistently he chastened their arguments, displacing deep into his depiction of female "character" the signs of an inclination towards sexual betrayal that in his originals were explicit sexual acts. The lawyer John Manningham, seeing a performance of Twelfth Night at the Middle Temple in February 1602, noted that it was "much like the commedy of errors or Menachmi in Plautus, but most like and neere to that in Italian called Inganni." Although there is a play called "Inganni," Manningham was almost certainly thinking of Gl'Ingannati or "The Deceived," a play by the Accademia degli Intronati di Siena, written as an apology to the ladies for a sketch performed the previous evening, which was Twelfth Night, 1531. Gl'Ingannati seems to have enjoyed a reputation for formal excellence only second, or perhaps not even that, to Ariosto. If Machiavelli (who himself translated Terence's Andria, the play central to Donatus's analysis) could urge the Tuscans to forget their prejudice against Ferarese Ariosto, for his "gentil composizione," the French Charles Estienne, dedicating his translation of Gl'Ingannati to the Dauphin in 1549, argued that this Sienese play surpassed even Ariosto, giving the reader the impression "que si Terence mesmes l'eust composé en Italien, à peine mieux l'eust il sceu differ; inventer ou deduyer." That if Terence himself had composed it in Italian, he would hardly have known better how to express, invent or handle it.] English readers were probably aware of the play's high literary reputation; the scholarly publisher, Girolamo Ruscelli, included a collection of Italian comedies "buone degne di legersi, & d'imitarsi," [well worthy of being read and imitated] to which he appended a critical apparatus "de' modi osservati in esse da gli antichi, così Greci come Latini" [in the manner observed in the case of ancient authors, both Greek and Latin] so as to make them into a book of "eloquentia."
Behind the central plot device of both Ariosto's I Suppositi and Gl' ingannati (and remotely, therefore, behind Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew and Twelfth Night) lay the notorious play by Terence called Eunuchus, which concerns a young man's gaining access, on the pretext of being a eunuch, to the house in which a virgin is being kept, whom he proceeds to rape. The subsequent predictable discovery of her citizenship makes her eligible for marriage without making him guilty of the rape of a citizen's daughter, since the house where he performed the rape was a brothel. Renaissance versions of the plot, of course, have to deal with what we might call the "homosocial" aspect of the crime—that is, the outrage to fathers and kinsmen—since the virgin is no longer found in a house of courtesans. Thus, Polinesta's father in I Suppositi lifts the genre into pathos with his sorrow at the loss of his daughter's honor in his own house. And in Gl' Ingannati, though there is less pathos, the scandal of the daughter's seduction is perhaps even greater, due to the bizarre means by which she is left alone with a man in her bedroom (her father assumed the man was a woman dressed up; maybe it is a reminiscence of this scandalous plot that has Viola asking to be presented "as an eunuch" to Orsino's court at the beginning of Twelfth Night).

Gl' Ingannati begins with a contract between two old men, Virginio and Gherardo, whereby Gherardo is to marry Virginio's daughter, Lelia: "Ne pensar ch'io mi sia permutare di quel ch'io t'ho promesso" [Don't think I'll go back on what I've promised] says Virginio; a merchant's credit depends on keeping his word. But his daughter, Lelia—Shakespeare's Viola—has slipped away from her convent and, disguised as a page, has entered the service of Flammineo, with whom she is in love, but who is himself besotted with another, namely Gherardo's daughter, Isabella, the equivalent of Shakespeare's Olivia. Isabella receives letters and "embassies" [imbasciati] from Flammineo by means of his cute page, Fabio (Lelia in disguise) with whom she, of course, falls in love.

It is worth pointing out how much more explicit than Twelfth Night this play is about the fact that sexual desire is not gender specific. Indeed, it becomes very clear that what counts, in distinguishing those who may desire and ask, and those who must be passive, is not gender but social status. Thus, when Lelia's nurse, Clemenzia, finds out that, as Flammineo's page, she has been sleeping in the antechamber of his bedroom, she assumes he will ask her to sleep with him. And later, when Isabella's maid, Pasquella, asks Lelia, disguised as Fabio, why on earth "he" doesn't want to sleep with her mistress, Lelia-as-Fabio replies: "a me bisogna servire il padrone, intendi, Pasquella?" [I have to serve the master, you know what I mean, Pasquella?] and Pasquella does understand: "O io so ben che a tu padron non faresti dispiacere a venirci, non dormi forse con lui?" [Oh, I know very well that you don't displease your master by coming here; but you don't, by any chance, sleep with him?]. When Lelia replies, "Dio il volesse ch'io fosse tanto in gratia sua" [I wish I were so much in his favor] Pasquella is puzzled; "Oh non dormiresti piu volentieri con Isabella?" [Wouldn't you rather sleep with Isabella?], she asks. And she makes it clear, in an ensuing speech on the ephemerality of Fabio's good looks, that (as a fellow dependent herself) she regards the arrangement of sleeping with Isabella not so much as more "natural" than simply as more stable, practical, and fortunate in the long term for Fabio.

In good Terentian fashion, the denouement of the play proves that the contract between the old men is not broken, though both are fortunately deceived; their houses are united not by the impotent old Gherardo's marrying Lelia, but by the passionately consummated union of Isabella with Lelia's long-lost twin bother, Fabrizio, who, like Shakespeare's Sebastian, doesn't question his good fortune in happening accidentally upon a rich woman who ardently desires him. But where Shakespeare's Olivia finds out who her lover really is by means of the words he speaks (which, as we've seen, have been recently been read as proof of the inherent instability of gender in sixteenth-century thinking about the body), Isabella and the audience of Gl' Ingannati discover who her lover is in a speech which is more explicitly designed to "appeal to the body." Pasquella, Isabella's maid, emerges from the room in which the two old men have locked Isabella and someone who they think is the truant Lelia, in boy's clothes:

PASQUELLA:
Quei due vecchi pecoroni dicevan pur, che quel giovanetto era donna & rinserronelo in camera con Isabella mia padrona, & à me diede la chiave, io volsi entrar dentro, & veder quel facevano, & trovai che s'abbracciavano, & si baciavano insieme, io hebbi voglia di chiarirmi s'era maschio o femina. Havendolo la padrona disteso in sul letto, & chiamandomi ch'io l'aiutassi, mentre ch'ella gli teneva le mani, egli si lasciava vincere, lo sciolsi dinanzi, e a un tratto, mi sentii percuotere non so che cosa in su le mani, nè conobbi se gli era un pestaglioto [pestella], un garotta [carota], o pur quell' altra cosa, ma sia quel che si vuole, e now è cosa che habbia sentita la grandine. Come io la viddi così fatta fuggii, sorelle, & serai l'uscio, & sò che per me non vi tornarci sola, & se qualch'una di voi non me'l crede, & voglia chiarirsene, io gli prestarò la chiave.

those two old sheep insisted that young man was a woman, and shut him in the room with Isabella, my mistress, and gave me the key. I wanted to go in and see what they were doing, and, finding them embracing and kissing together, I had to satisfy myself as to whether the other was male or female. The mistress had him stretched out on her bed, and was asking me to help her, while she held him by the hands. He allowed himself to be overcome, and I undid him in front, and in one pull, I felt something hit my hand; I couldn't tell whether it was a pestle, or a carrot, or indeed something else, but whatever it was, it hadn't suffered from hailstones. When I saw how it was, girls, I fled, and locked the exit! And I know that as far as I'm concerned, I won't go back in alone, and if one of you doesn't believe me, and wants to satisfy herself, I'll lend her the key.]
[As far I understand it, they've called this comedy "The Deceived" not because they were ever deceived by you, oh no, . . . but they've called it so because there aren't many characters in the plot (favola) who don't, in the end, find themselves deceived. But there is among these deceptions one particular sort which makes me wish (for the malice I bear you) that you might be often deceived, if I were the deceiver . . . the plot is a new one . . . and is extracted from no other source than their busy pumpkin heads, from whence also came the fortunes you were allotted on Twelfth Night.]

In this context, it looks as if the most significant single departure from the Italian variants on the plot of The Eunuch in Twelfth Night is its dissociation of the effectiveness of the original imposture of credit—the original pretense of androgyny or emasculation which effectively gains access to both to the person and to the heart of the wealthy Olivia—from the identification of its triumph as explicitly sexual (Fabrizio proving his virility with Isabella), rather than chastely marital (Sebastian contracted to Olivia). To a chance member of the audience of Twelfth Night in the Middle Temple in 1601 who saw the resemblance of Shakespeare's play to Gl'Inganni or Gl'Ingannati, meaning respectively "the deceits" and "the deceived," Sebastian's speech at the end might well recall these plays' themes and titles:

So comes it, lady, you have been mistook.
But nature to her bias drew in that.
You would have been contracted to a maid;
Nor are you therein, by my life, deceiv'd:
You are betroth'd both to a maid and man.

(V.i.257-61)

"Deceiv'd" surely here recalls its Italian translation, "ingannata," and no less surely, there is an ethical distinction being made here between being "mistook" and being "deceiv'd" that turns on the question of whether or not Sebastian is a "maid." His affirmation before the audience that he is both "a maid and man" is less a signal of his inherent androgyny than an assurance that Olivia, not having experienced the same "inganno" as Isabella, remains chaste, honorable, and a prize worthy his, Sebastian's, having.

To the argument implied here—namely, that the explicit eroticism of Gl'Ingannati makes interpretations of Twelfth Night that focus exclusively on the body and sexuality look a little contrived—it could be objected that I am being literal-minded about the theatrical representation of desire. It could be argued (and I would agree) that the very reticence and fantasticality of the amorous language of Twelfth Night ensures the "circulation" of desire or of sexual energy more effectively than the gleeful voyeurism of Gl'Ingannati. If this is so, however, it must also be acknowledged that the same linguistic reticence and latency of meaning which allows us, in the 1990s, to read Twelfth Night as a celebration of the polymorphous potential of desire, equally enabled Anna Jameson in 1832 to find in Viola a paradigm of the sexual self-control that qualified women for access to education and political life. For, within Laqueur's argument, Jameson belongs to that category of nineteenth-century women who based their claims for the recognition of women's political capacity on arguments proving their inherent moral strength. If the rest of Laqueur's argument for the importance of the eighteenth-century transition from the endorsement to the denial of female orgasm has substance, then it must follow that Shakespeare's own texts belong among the discourses that have, historically, helped to construct the moral characteristics felt to be appropriate to a biology of incommensurability—sexual difference—between the male and female. And this in turn would imply that, in their own time, Shakespeare's comedies were not just—in Stephen Greenblatt's words—fictions which "participated in a larger field of sexual discourses" but were fictions of the Reformation—that is, they were actively transformative of existing sexual discourses, tending to substitute the intimation of female sexual intention for the representation of the act which would implicate both sexes equally.58

It is, in fact, possible to trace through Shakespeare's plays a consistency of strategy (though not, of course, of effect) in his chastening of the roles and language of women. Whereas in his Italian and Roman sources, the significance of the "woman's part" to the resolution of the dilemma depends upon her having had sex, in Shakespeare this significance is translated into an implicit, or uncertain argument involving her disposition to have sex, or her "sexuality." To modern readers this can give the impression of a more complex "interiority" or "character" because its doubtfulness requires our interpretation. In the fraught context of the emergent commercial theatre of sixteenth-century England, however, Shakespeare's chastening of Italian and Roman dramatic models was motivated by the need to prove that the productively deceptive arguments of a Terentian-style theatre need not, as its enemies suggested, necessarily advocate the breakdown of trust and honor by endorsing every kind of sexual and financial deception in contemporary society.59

To attempt a reading of Twelfth Night that would seriously try to take account of the play's place in the history of sex and gender would require some elaboration of how, in common with other Shakespeare plays, this comedy makes a theme of being implicated in a humanistic literary culture which, through its privileging of skill in persuasive argument, was in the process of transforming relations of economic and social dependency. Current discussions of the subversive erotics of the Renaissance stage trivialize the economic and social issues at stake in Twelfth Night and similar plays by reducing the whole of the humanist literary culture of which the theatre was a product to the most banal version of Greenblatt's "self-fashioning"—a mere "increased self-consciousness about the fashioning of human identity as a manipulable, artful process,"60 "Self-fashioning" thereby becomes synonymous with a quite unspecific notion of "theatricality," which in turn is easily assimilated to the concept of "performativity" articulated by Judith Butler in relation to the category of gender.61 The sixteenth-century investment in masculine education, which crucially enabled the very instances of "self-fashioning" or of "theatricality" so beloved of current criticism—an education which privileged the dialectical and analysis and imitation of classical texts—is simply left out of the discussion. What we have as a result is a criticism of Shakespeare, Jonson and others that is incapable of accounting for the rhetorical and affective excess distinguishing this drama of the English Renaissance from its Continental antecedents; an excess which, in the case of Twelfth Night, permits interpretations as widely divergent as those of Greenblatt, Barber, and Jameson, and which therefore (because of its contribution to the historical "instability" of the play's "identity") surely begs to be interpreted as a thematic aspect of the play's concern with disguise, deception, and "theatricality."

For an example of how even good contemporary criticism effaces the rhetorical content of the play I want to turn to Valerie Traub's argument that the meaning of Viola/Cesario resides principally in the "dual erotic investment" that the play establishes in order to "elicit the similarly polymorphous desires of the audience, whose spectator pleasure would be at least partly derived from a transgressive glimpse of multiple erotic possibilities." In order to "substantiate the play's investment in erotic duality," she continues, one can compare the language used in Viola/Cesario's two avowals of love: the first as Orsino's wooer of Olivia, and the second as s/he attempts to communicate love to Orsino. In both avowals, Viola/Cesario theatricalizes desire, using a similar language of conditionals toward both erotic objects . . . "If I did love you with my master's flame, / With such a suff'ring, such a deadly life, / In your denial I would find no sense; / I would not understand it." ... "My father had a daughter love'd a man, / As it might be, perhaps, were I a woman, I should your lordship." (my italics)62

I would not for a moment deny the existence of the "dual erotic investment" which Traub does well to point out. However, another brief glance at Gl'Ingannati will show that Shakespeare's text is more remarkable for resisting than exploiting the considerable dramatic potential of any such investment.

Reading Gl'Ingannati, Shakespeare would have come across a model for a scene between Olivia and Viola/Cesario. The scene in question requires the audience to share the voyeuristic position of Flammineo's servants who stumble across Isabella and Lelia/Fabio during an intimate exchange of words and caresses. The audience, however, knows that "Fabio" is, for the purposes of the play, a woman (though the part was probably played by a boy). For the servants, then, the scene arouses sexual feeling and a sense of scandal at the betrayal of Flammineo by the "boy" whom he loved and trusted so much; the audience, however, freed from any sense of the latter, is invited to enjoy the transgression of the scene as if it were a kind of affluence; in Traub's words, it becomes "a transgressive glimpse of multiple erotic possibilities."

Without denying the possibility of performing the equivalent scene between Olivia and Viola/Cesario in such a way as to maximize its erotic possibilities, I would want to argue that the rhetorical excess which distinguishes Shakespeare's text from the Italian model insists on a far higher level of engagement from the audience as auditors. This, in turn, reorients the dramatic meaning of the scene from pleasure in the spectacle of erotic possibility towards complicity in the act of interpretation by means of which a reader or auditor lends credibility to the figures, tropes, and fictions in the discourse of another.

Such audience complicity in the bestowal of credibility through interpretation replicates what the scene offers by way of a narrative of "desire." Olivia's desire for Viola/Cesario must become intelligible (unless we ignore the text altogether) through Viola/Cesario's progression away from formal literary models of courtship towards the affective intimacy of a more familiar mode of address, exemplified in the deservedly famous speech which begins, "Make me a willow cabin at your gate" (1.5.273). At this point we have already witnessed Olivia's unenchanted exposure of the economics of the Petrarchan argument, her parody of its facile and opportunistic movement from the praise of natural beauty to the imperatives of husbandry and reproduction: "O sir, I will not be so hard-hearted, I will give out divers schedules of my beauty" (1.5.247-48). Cesario's subsequent readiness to improvise a first-person fiction of abandonment in love represents an ability to extemporize, to seize "the gifts of moment" and so illustrate the crowning glory of classical rhetorical education.
The speech's most obvious analogue in the schoolboy literature which prepared men for such improvisations is that of the impassioned epistolary rhetoric of the women of Ovid's Heroides, whose vivid evocations of their writing, and of the cries that echo through the wild and lonely places to which they are abandoned, resemble (in their simultaneous acknowledgment of hopelessness and its contradiction by the emotions aroused in the reader) the curious emotional power tapped by Cesario's entry into a hypothetical desolation of ineffectual texts that nevertheless defy the premise of their ineffectuality. Like Dido writing "without hope to move you," or Oenone, telling Paris how she made Ida resound with howls ("uluati") at his desertion, Viola/Cesario imagines filling the vacant times and spaces of rejection with "cantons of contemned love" and "halloos" of Olivia's name, suddenly evoking a geography of loneliness in a play otherwise suggestive of houses, estates, and urbanity. The implied femininity of Cesario's hypothetically assumed persona here, however, merely complicates the already problematic dramatic hypothesis of a female "Viola" inasmuch as the prominence of Ovid's Heroides within the education syllabus for boys implied, as Warren Boutcher has noted, a relationship between the path to knowledge and . . . the mastery of the heroic genus familiaire, with its base in epistolary stories which involve—both in the telling and in the action—intimate access to and power over feminine sensibility.

The "femininity" of the genre, then, is inseparable from its implication in a plot of seduction not unlike that of Petrarchism, except that in this version "femininity" itself—understood as a peculiar susceptibility to artificially induced compassion—is the emotional catalyst of masculine rhetorical success.

Olivia's desire for Viola/Cesario becomes apparent as a response to this speech and is inseparable, in its articulation, from the material expression of belief ("credit") that would exempt the unknown stranger from providing the heraldic display (the "blazon") that would put "his" gentility beyond doubt:

"What is my parentage?"
"Above my fortunes, yet my state is well,
I am a gentleman." I'll be sworn thou art;
Thy tongue, thy face, thy limbs, actions and spirit
Do give thee five-fold blazon. Not too fast: soft! soft!
Unless the master were the man . . .

Olivia's desire motivates her affirmation of Cesario's somewhat evasive protestation of gentility on the grounds of "his" exceptional beauty, eloquence, and presence of mind. What this implies, then, is that the capacity to arouse desire resides less in the androgynous beauty of the body, than in the body conceived as the medium of elocutio ("tongue . . . face . . . limbs . . . actions . . . spirit"); that is, the apt delivery of the mind's invention. Viola/Cesario embodies the capacity of timely and well expressed speech to compel for a mere fiction credit, that is the kind of materially consequential belief (in this case, belief in matrimonial eligibility) that is rarely afforded to the "real thing."

The transgressive "glimpse" being offered to a seventeenth-century audience here, I would suggest, is less that of lesbian desire than that of the opportunity for social advancement and erotic gratification afforded by education for any servant of ability entrusted with missions of such intimate familiarity. That the entertainment of such a possibility is necessarily transgressive (though here held at bay from full recognition by the "femininity" of Viola) is evident from the care taken in the Malvolio plot to exploit the audience's revulsion at the very same idea. As a steward, Malvolio shares with Viola/Cesario the distinction of being a household servant whose "civility" of manner is qualification for a position of exceptional trust in the intimate affairs of the household. Olivia's musing, "unless the master were the man," touches the center of the play's concern with the question of social advancement by means of skills and attractions "blazoned" in the execution of service rather than properly inhering in nobility. How can such social advancement be imagined except as an individualistic pursuit of gain, a betrayal of trust, sexual honor, economic dependency, and love?

Leo Salingar and Emrys Jones have shown how comedies of the late 1590s and early 1600s are concerned with establishing the credentials of a notion of "gentility" that operates independently of the feudal structures of lineage and affinity. "The king might create a duke, but not even he could create a gentleman," writes Jones, echoing a sentiment expressed in plays of this period. Gentility thus conceived is less the effect of lineage than of a certain affluence—freedom from manual labor—combined with the type of liberal education that might contribute a civil demeanor in social exchange. The arguments of such comedies therefore require that the discursively and morally cumbersome aspects of the humanist education bequeathed by Erasmus and the grammar schools be adapted to requirements of a style and habitus such as Viola/Cesario exhibits: a non-pedantic conversational facility appropriate to the modest enterprises of urban social encounter.

Salingar sees the conflicts played out through this redefinition of humanistic "wit" in terms of an attempt to distinguish between money values and "the values of a leisure class" whose social and financial ambitions are subliminally expressed as the civilized pleasures of courtship. Jones notes in the early 1600s the "crystallisation of a new theatrical formula":

The plays in question are comedies, usually set in some fictitious vaguely foreign court, often with a double-plot of which one part may be romantic and the other more frankly comic. The comic action sometimes takes the form of a persecution, a "baiting" extended through several episodes.

About the same time as the Chamberlain's men performed Twelfth Night, the children of the Chapel staged one of the plays to which Jones here refers, The Gentleman Usher. In the predicament of its eponymous antihero, Bassiolo, the play comments interestingly on Twelfth Night, condensing different aspects of the situations in which Viola/Cesario and Malvolio find themselves. Bassiolo is, like Malvolio, the most trusted servant in the household of Count Lasso, but, like Viola/Cesario, his being familiarly confided in and befriended by a nobleman for whom he undertakes to woo Margaret, Count Lasso's daughter, immediately puts him in a position of both actual and potential betrayal of trust: Vincentio accuses him of behaving, "as if the master were the man" in an erotic sense, but he has already done so in the sense that in his contract of friendship with Vincentio, he is wooing for himself.

Chapman's is, however, a far more conservative play than Shakespeare's. Whereas Viola/Cesario's inspired improvisation on the model of the Ovidian heroic epistle actually gains the sympathetic ear and the heart of Olivia, Bassiolo's verbose and cumbersome attempt at amorous epistles merely earns him the noble lovers' contempt, serving to prove that the adaptation of a liberal education to civilized wooing can only be managed by one whose gentleness of birth is beyond dispute. The play is nevertheless concerned to argue the necessity of complementing the hunting and riding skills traditionally definitive of nobility with "wits and paper learning" of a non-pedantic kind; the Duke's ennobling of his illiterate minion, Medice, proves disastrous, arguing against the social advancement of servants who are unable to acquit themselves plausibly in noble society. At the same time, however, the play finds, in Bassiolo's dilemma between fidelity to his master, and the opportunity offered by Vincendo's pretended confidence in his rhetorical ability, that any servant so accomplished and entrusted is liable to deceive.

The fantastic unlikelihood of the plot of Twelfth Night and its apparent preoccupation with issues of gender have distracted critical attention from the play's affinity with such contemporary comedies of civility and social advancement. Yet it might well be argued that the very fantasticality of the fiction of gender in Twelfth Night constitutes the play's strategy of engagement with contemporary debates on the legitimacy of the individualistic exploitation of service in order, in Viola's own words, to "make occasion mellow."
Twelfth Night endorses the notion of rhetorical opportunism, or individual enterprise insofar as it expresses the mastery of fortune and of the occasions of civil life as the metaphorical equivalent of heroic enterprise on the high seas. Thus, for example, the rivalry between Viola and Aguecheek for the favor of Olivia is recurrently expressed in a nautical idiom. Viola is spoken of as having "trade" (3.1.76) and "commerce" (3.4.175) with Olivia, "she is the list of my voyage" says Viola (3.1.77). The hapless Aguecheek, for lack of Viola's witty invention and attractive presence, is berated for having "sailed into the north of my lady's opinion, where you will hang, like an icicle on a Dutchman's beard, unless you redeem it by some laudable attempt, either of valor or policy" (3.3.24-28). Fabian’s reference here—to a 1598 translation of Gerrit de Veer’s report of the ordeal of Dutch explorers trapped for ten months in Nova Zembla, where they "never saw, nor heard of any man"—comically imagines Aguecheek’s conversational failure both as a failure to prove his masculinity and as meriting exile altogether from the new medium of masculine self-assertion—the profitable commerce of sociability.

The sociability thus defined as heroically masculine, however, must be purposeful as well as facile; Orsino, as Feste says, is insufficiently discriminating in the object of his discourse: "I would have men of such constancy put to sea that their business might be everywhere and there intent nowhere, for that’s it always makes a good voyage of nothing" (2.4.75-78). The pervasiveness of such oceanic metaphors, as well as references to maps and narratives of discovery (Malvolio's smiling face is likened to the 1599 map which displayed the new world "as revealed by actual voyages of discovery") invests the Renaissance synonymity of "tempest" and "fortune" with specifically economic resonances. From the analogy developed between drinking and the hazards of navigation (Feste tells Olivia that a drunken man is like a drowned man—1.5.132) there emerges a chiastic narrative of rhetorical oikonomia, in which the eloquent and beautiful twins exchange near-drowning for domestic security, while the drunken and inept or irresponsible Toby and Aguecheek—initially comfortable with cakes and ale in Olivia's buttery—are finally banished, like the "knaves and fools" they prove to be, to the "wind and the rain" of Feste's song, beyond Olivia's gates.

Oikonomia is rhetorical because linguistic ability is identified with the ability to manage wealth. Maria declares of the wealthy Aguecheek that he is incompetent with his resources, he will "have but a year to all those ducats. He's a very fool, and a prodigal" (1.3.22); this failure in husbandry is then discovered at intervals during the play as Aguecheek's recurrent inability to invent plausible arguments or "reasons" for his words or actions. Aguecheek's companions are always teasing him for the reasons he cannot give; "Pourquoi?" asks Toby when Aguecheek declares his intention to leave at once, but the question bewilders the knight (1.3.89). In a later exchange Fabian joins Toby in demanding evidence of plausibility: "You must needs yield your reason, Sir Andrew" (3.2.2). The letter which Toby urges him to make "eloquent and full of invention" (3.2.41-43) turns out to be as barren as his speech: "Wonder not. . . why I do call thee [a scurvy fellow] for I will show thee no reason for't" (3.4.152-53).

When Anna Jameson praised Viola for the moral sensibility she displayed both in the propriety of her fidelity to Orsino, and in "her generous feeling for her rival Olivia," she appropriated for nineteenth-century feminism a seventeenth-century play's concern with calling into question the assumption that eloquent servants, accomplished in the provision of reasons, and entrusted with the intimate affairs of the household, are necessarily opportunists, people who deceive. The narrative rationale of the scene I have already remarked upon in Gl'Ingannati, in which Flammineo's servants spy upon Isabella and Lelia's kiss, is to enraged Flammineo against the deceitfulness of his favorite, Fabio; a hilarious scene ensures in which the probability of the kiss is itself called into doubt by the incompetence of the servants in relaying to Flammineo their evidence of Fabio's perfidy. The point here, however, is that Lelia/Fabio has kissed Isabella; one deceit leads to another, and Lelia finds herself explaining her refusal of further favors to Isabella on the grounds that "too much love" for Isabella has already led her to deceive ("ingannare") her lord. Earlier, however, Lelia/Fabio showed a singular lack of regard for Flammineo's suit, attempting by means of Pasquella to ensure that Isabella would never respond to his affections; Viola, as Jameson notes, is remarkable for resisting the temptation to do this. In Chapman's Gentleman Usher, Bassiolo, also in the position of a go-between or an ambassador between lovers, is tempted not only into exploitation of his position of trust, but into presumptions of equality and friendship with the nobleman who employs him, which the play then ridicules with all the fervor of profound social anxiety.

It becomes clear that the twinning of Sebastian and Viola, and the femininity of the latter, occurs in Shakespeare's play not simply (as in other derivatives of Terence's Eunuch) for the sake of resolving an erotic impasse by offering a means of gaining access to the cloistered woman, but for the sake of foregrounding an outrageously improbable hypothesis about the possibility of combining fidelity in service with rhetorical oikonomia—that is, the heroic exploitation of rhetorical opportunity, which typically achieves both economic security and erotic gratification. Terence Cave has noted that the final revelation of "Viola’s" identity remains merely hypothetical, contingent on an accumulation of probabilities beyond the scope of the play: "Do not embrace me till each circumstance / Of place, time, fortune do cohere and jump / That I am Viola." It could be said that the femininity of Viola is the grounds upon which the fiction of the servant Cesario can prove the success of eloquence in the narrative of social advancement that Sebastian fulfills, while at the same time ensuring this narrative remains quite untainted by what would otherwise be its precondition—the betrayal of the master by his "man." Viola/Cesario, then, represents more than the "dual erotic investment" that exhausts the meaning of Lelia/Fabio, for s/he is the means by which a seventeenth-century audience could be seduced into entertaining unawares the possibility of a positive version of Malvolio, a servant able to exploit the civility that earns the trust and favor of noblewomen to the extent of achieving the "love" that promises contractual equality. When Fabian imagines himself condemning the cross-gartered Malvolio as an "improbable fiction" on the stage, he draws attention to the self-consciousness that marks the play's violation of the Terentian rhetoric of probability, which remains so near the textual surface of Gl'Ingannati. Any audience hearing Fabian, however, must feel that the primary violation of probability lies not in the outrageousness of Malvolio's behavior, but in the very existence of the person called Viola, who represents, as Terence Cave has written, "a particularly fruitful violation of the laws of rational discourse no less than sexual decorum," and whose name performs a number of associative tricks, as it "echoes the erotic flowers and music of the opening scene, insidiously rearranges the letters of Olivia's name, and comes close to naming violation itself."

The play's erotic investment in Viola/Cesario is less, I would argue, than its investment in the violation of probability constituted by the twinship of Viola and Sebastian, which first casts the desire and emotion aroused by Cesario into extremity, and then resolves that extremity as a miraculous disproof of the betrayal of trust that would, in the ordinary circumstances of daily life, be its explanation. Thus, for example, where the sodomitic behavior of Fabrizio's traveling companion, the pedant in Gl'Ingannati, merely fuels the sexual comedy of that play, the love Antonio feels for Sebastian, while equally open to homoerotic interpretation, is not sidelined by mockery, but rendered able to share on equal terms in a dramatic climax which turns less on the nuptials that unite the two houses than on the proof that not one of the lovers of a beautiful "boy"—neither his wife, nor his master, nor his friend in need—is "therein, by my life, deceiv'd." The "hints of corruption and aggression," which, as Cave notes, recur in the play, accumulate around the common sense perception that the youthful beauty of a stranger is probably as deceitful as it is irresistibly attractive.

Certainly Orsino, having charged his lovely ambassador with the ethically problematic obligation to make "discourse" of his "dear faith" and "act" his woes, reads the apparent consequence—Cesario's contract to Olivia—as presaging the youth's career in similar deceptions: "thou dissembling cub! What wilt thou be / When time hath sown a grizzle on thy case?" (5.1.162-63). The pathos of Olivia's case is more marked, as she interprets Viola/Cesario's love for Orsino as the "fear" rightfully aroused by the consciousness of having betrayed his master. In attempting to prevent Viola/Cesario's protestation of innocence, she exposes the instability of her own grounds for belief in the youth's continued fidelity to her. "Oh, do not swear!" she begs, "Hold little faith, though thou hast too much fear" (5.1.169-170). Most moving of all, however, is Antonio's apology for being obliged by love into an extremity that makes demands of the one he loves. "What will you do, now my necessity / Makes me to ask you for my purse?" he gently enquires (3.4.342-43), only to be moved by Viola/Cesario's nonrecognition, into an outburst against the deceptiveness of the "promise" that was the boy's manner and looks (3.4.369-79).

A contemporary reader, perusing a popular anthology of the period known as The Paradysy of daynty deuises, found one poem entitled thus: "Who mindes to bring his ship to happy shore / Must care to know the lawes of wisdomes lore." By this poem he wrote, "rules of wary life," bracketing off for particular annotation a verse referring to trust in friendship. Do not bestow credit on boys, the verse advised, for, "Ful soone the boy thy frendship will despyse / And him for loue thou shalt ungrateful find." As Erica Sheen has pointed out, the protracted denouement of Cymbeline features a "boy" called Imogen who refuses to plead for the life of her savior and friend, Lucentio. His moralizing comment, "briefly die their joys / that place them on the truth of girls and boys" does nothing to assuage the audience's impatient desire to resolve his mistake, proving the "truth" that probability and versified common sense would deny. Just so here, in Twelfth Night, Antonio's sententious conclusions on beauty and deceit merely fuel the audience's desire to relieve him of the pain of believing he has loved a "most ingrateful boy" (5.1.75). In view of this, Greenblatt's observation that, at the end of the play, "Viola is still Cesario," seems not so much to argue for any specific beliefs about instability of gender, as to be a part of that complex affective structure by means of which a boy proves, most improbably, to be "true" to all the kinds of lovers he might have—right up until the end of the play.

What, then, of the play's place in a history of sex and gender? The least that should be said is that any attempt to de-essentialize and historicize gender by appealing to a Galenic theory of men and women differentiated only by degrees of body heat is of strictly limited value in the analysis of a complicated tradition of comic writing in which what distinguishes men is their privileged access to allusive and intertextual levels of meaning—in other words, their access to active participation in the historical and discursive process of defining the social roles and characteristics of either sex. But something rather more positive may be said about Twelfth Night in particular. For here once again Shakespeare has chastened the argument of a neo-Terentian play in such a way as to maximize the interpretative possibilities, and consequently the historical tenacity, of the English dramatic text.

That the meaning of the Viola/Olivia courtship for a seventeenth-century audience resided at least partly in its capacity to seduce them into condoning the social (rather than sexual) transgression elsewhere reviled by the play's mockery of Malvolio is suggested by the history of critical reaction to Shakespeare's conception of Viola. The probability of Lelia's dressing up as Fabio is established in Gl'Ingannati in an exchange with her nurse during which she admits that since being kept prisoner by soldiers, she has become sexually suspect irrespective of her conduct: ever since the sack of Rome, she says, "ne credevo poter vivere sì honestamente, che bastasse a far che la gente non havesse che dire" [I didn't see how I could live honestly enough to stop them gossiping]. In 1753 Charlotte Lennox, writing a criticism of Shakespeare, objected to the want of any similar argument of probability in relation to Viola's decision to dress as a man:

A very natural scheme, this for a beautiful and virtuous young Lady, to throw off all the modesty and Reservedness of her Sex, mix among men, herself disguised as one; and prest by no Necessity; influenced by no Passion, expose herself to all the dangerous consequences of so unworthy and shameful a Situation.

The Italian source, she notes, "is much more careful to preserve Probability" than "the Poet Shakespeare." However, by 1832 the very want of any "probable" argument for Viola's behavior (since any such would reflect upon Viola's modesty) enabled Anna Jameson to celebrate her femininity as the source of the peculiar integrity which characterizes her relations to both master and mistress. The very improbability of Viola, then, serves to break down the identification of rhetorical virtuosity (the capacity to make things probable) with the sexual conquest of women that marks the plot of the Italian play. The literal intertwining of the names of Malvolio, Olivia, and Viola has often been pointed out, but it many not be entirely fanciful to recall that the identification of "inganni" (deceptions, probable arguments) with the sexual deception that makes Isabella unchaste is signaled in the prologue of Gl'Ingannati with following innuendo:

> Ma e ci son de gli ingannati tra gli altri d'una certa sorte, che volesse Iddio, per il mal ch'io vi voglio, che voi foste ingannate spesso così voi, et io fusse l'ingannatore.

[But there is among these deceptions one particular sort which makes me wish, for the malice I bear you, that you might be often deceived, if I were the deceiver.]^89

Here "il mal ch'io vi voglio" is a kind of flirtatious joke on the euphemism for fancying someone, "ti voglio bene." In entertaining ambitious fantasies which suddenly and indecorously make the audience aware that these are also sexual fantasies about Olivia (2.5.47-48), Shakespeare's Malvolio bears the trace of the erotic "mal . . . voglio" by which Fabrizio's economic success is identified as a sexual conquest and extended through innuendo to characterize the terms upon which a female audience may be imagined capable of enjoying the argument of the play.

What was positive for seventeenth-century women about the way in which Twelfth Night addressed them, then, was due less to the "high cultural investment in female erotic pleasure . . . because it was thought necessary for conception to occur" than to its opposite:^90 the extent to which, by refusing to subject Olivia to the "mal . . . voglio" of an explicitly sexual encounter with Sebastian on the model of Isabella's with Fabrizio, Shakespeare manages to portray a heroine whose prudence, good judgment, and ability to govern others remain uncompromised even by her contract with the beautiful youth. For in marrying Sebastian, Olivia has arguably yielded to no whim, but carried out the strategic plan first made known to us by Sir Toby Belch: "she'll not match above her degree, neither in estate, years, nor wit" (1.3.106-108). Olivia never wavers from this purpose, and in providing the precedent that it elsewhere pretends to deny—marriage between a noble-woman and one beneath her—the play endorses the real-life example of the highly intelligent Katherine Brandon, Duchess of Suffolk, who, after having been married at fourteen to her forty-nine-year-old noble guardian, later decided to marry none other then her gentleman usher, who was "an accomplished gentleman, well versed in the study of the languages . . . bold in discourse, quick in repartee." There were, as Katherine Brandon's biographer commented, "many reasons why the clever and serviceable gentleman usher who conducted her business . . . should seem to the Duchess a more desirable husband than an ambitious noble."^91 Shakespeare’s play, around 1602, contributed to the undoing of the social and sexual stereotyping that would make of that last statement nothing but a dirty joke.

20 The examples Montaigne cites are those of Iphis, from Ovid, Metamorphoses IX, 793ff, and of Lucius Constistius, from Pliny, Naturalis Historia VII, iv. See Michel de Montaigne, The Complete Essays, trans. M. A. Screech (London: Penguin, 1991), 110. In his chapter of "histoires memorables de certains femmes qui sont degenerées en hommes," Ambroise Paré, Des Monstres et Prodiges, ed. Jean Céard (Geneva: Libraire Droz, 1971), includes the same example from Pliny, the story of Marie Germaine, and the example of Maria Pateca, told by João Rodrigues in Amati Lusitani Medici Physici Praestantissimi, Curationum medicinalium centuriae quatuor (Froben: Basel, 1567), 168. Needless to say, Rodrigues also cites Pliny, confirming a certain sense of circularity and repetition in the gathering of such instances. One might want to argue for a belief in the frequency of the phenomenon from Montaigne's comment, "Ce n'est pas tant de merveille que cette sort d'accident se rencontrent fréquent" [It isn't surprising that this sort of accident occurs frequently].
However, as Montaigne attributes the "accident" in question to the power of the imagination, which elsewhere in the same essay becomes responsible for unfounded beliefs in the magic that causes impotence, it is not clear how sceptically he means this. In any case, Montaigne's version of Marie-Germaine's accident does not conform to Paré's analysis, since Montaigne attributes to the power of the imagination the capacity to satisfy itself a sexual longing by producing the desired genitals of the (opposite?) sex—"si l'imagination peut en telles choses, elle est si continuellement et si vigoureusement attaché à ce sujet, que, pour n'avoir si souvent à rechoir en même pensée et âpreté de désir, elle a meilleur compte d'inorporer une fois pour toutes cette virile partie aux filles." This would seem to argue that girls did not already possess "cette virile partie." See Michel Eyquem de Montaigne, Oeuvres Complètes, ed. R. Barrai (Paris: du Seuil, 1967), 54. An excellent article by Patricia Parker, which came to my notice after I had written this article, criticizes both the functioning of medical discourse and the teleology of masculinity as a "reassuringly stable ground" in the arguments of Laqueur and Greenblatt and points to the preoccupation of Montaigne's essay with the anxiety that masculinity itself requires supplementation, to repair the "defect in sex" which is impotence. See Patricia Parker, "Gender Ideology, Gender Change: The Case of Marie Germaine," Critical Inquiry 19 (Winter, 1993), 335-64.

22 Traub, 51. This seems unlikely, since Paré explicitly says that the mutation can only go one way: "nous ne trouvons jamais en histoire veritable que d'homme aucun soit devenu femme, pour-ce que Nature tend toujours à ce qui est le plus parfaict, et non au contraire faire ce qui est parfaict devienne imparfaict" [we never find in any true history that any man whatsoever became a woman, because Nature always tends towards that which is the most perfect, and does not on the contrary make what is perfect become imperfect].

24 Traub, 103, 117, 141.

25 Thus, Traub, in her concern to refute or modify Orgel's argument that the transvestite theatre was at least in part motivated by a recognition of the value represented by female chastity, misleadingly represents the argument as being about "the fantasized dangers posed by women" (121), which obscures beyond recovery the notion that women's chastity was valuable because it affected male honor and, therefore, economic power. The latter argument has been well made in relation to "desire" in the ancient world by John Winkler, The Constraints of Desire: The Anthropology of Sex and Gender in Ancient Greece (London: Routledge, 1990), 74-75.

26 Greenblatt, 88.

27 The idea that women in the audience fell in love with the players seems to have been common enough; see Beaumont and Fletcher 1.1.46-48, of a waiting maid: "She lov'd all the Players in the last Queenes time once over: she was strook when they acted lovers, and forsook some when they plaid murtherers." Women's susceptibility to the fiction, then, seems to have been laughed at, whereas the ridicule of men turns on the degree of aptitude or otherwise with which they make use of the wit they have heard at plays.

Millar's influence is certainly traceable in Anna Jameson's Sketches in Canada, or Rambles among the Red Men (London: Longman, 1852), and is compatible with the project of The Characteristics of Women as outlined in the introductory dialogue, 20-31.

63 None of the authorities on sixteenth-century Italian drama that I consulted [Mario Baratto, La Commedia del Cinquecento (Venice, 1975); Nino Borsellino, Rozzi e Intronati (Rome, 1974); Aulo Greccio, L'Istituzione del teatro comico nel rinascimento (Naples, 1976); Marvin Herrick, Italian Comedy in the Renaissance (Urbana: U of Illinois P, 1960); Louise Clubb, Italian Drama in Shakespeare's Time (New Haven: Yale UP, 1989)] could inform me on this question of staging. However, Pamela Benson very kindly consulted the current expert on Italian theatrical production, Richard Andrews, whose reply suggested that although plays in convents had all female casts, courtesans were famous for improvising scenes in their salons, and there is some evidence that women did play at court and in some touring companies, they were unlikely to have taken parts in a play put on by a learned academy, such as the Intronati di Siena. I would like to thank Pamela Benson and Richrd Andrews for this information.

Critical Essays: Historical Criticism of Twelfth Night

Historical Criticism of Twelfth Night: Overview

Harley Granville-Barker

[In an essay originally published in 1912, Granville-Barker offers his vision for Twelfth Night as a director, beginning by describing what he believes was Shakespeare's intention for the set and how he may have written some parts such as Feste and Maria for specific actors. Barker also discusses the way he thinks Shakespeare constructed the play, suggesting that he may have originally intended a different outcome, and that on the Elizabethan stage, Viola/Cesario would have been played by a young boy, not a girl. He describes the casting choices Shakespeare may have made for other characters, including Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, Fabian, Feste and Antonio and in conclusion, describes the prose and verse of the play, defending his position that Elizabethan prose should be spoken quickly.]

Twelfth Night is classed, as to the period of its writing, with Much Ado About Nothing, As You Like It, and Henry V. But however close in date, in spirit I am very sure it is far from them. I confess to liking those other three as little as any plays he ever wrote. I find them so stodgily good, even a little (dare one say it?) vulgar, the work of a successful man who is caring most for success. I can imagine the lovers of his work losing hope in the Shakespeare of that year or two. He was thirty-five and the first impulse of his art had spent itself. He was popular. There was welcome enough, we may be sure, for as many Much Ado's and As You Like It's and jingo history pageants as he'd choose to manufacture. It was a turning point and he might have remained a popular dramatist. But from some rebirth in him that mediocre satisfaction was foregone, and, to our profit at least, came Hamlet, Macbeth, Lear, and the rest. Hamlet, perhaps, was popular, though Burbage may have claimed a just share in making it so. But I doubt if the great heart of the public would beat any more constantly towards the rarer tragedies in that century and society than it will in this. To the average man or play-goer three hundred or indeed three thousand years are as a day. While we have Shakespeare's own comment even on that "supporter to a state," Polonius (true type of the official mind. And was he not indeed Lord Chamberlain?): that where art is concerned, "He's for a jig, or a tale of bawdry, or he sleeps."

Twelfth Night is, to me, the last play of Shakespeare's golden age. I feel happy ease in the writing, and find much happy carelessness in the putting together. It is akin to the Two Gentlemen of Verona (compare Viola and Julia), it echoes a little to the same tune as the sweeter parts of the Merchant of Venice, and its comic spirit is the spirit of the Falstaff scenes of Henry IV, that are to my taste the truest comedy he wrote.
There is much to show that the play was designed for performance upon a bare platform stage without traverses or inner rooms or the like. It has the virtues of this method, swiftness and cleanness of writing and simple directness of arrangement even where the plot is least simple. It takes full advantage of the method's convenience. The scene changes constantly from anywhere suitable to anywhere else that is equally so. The time of the play's action is any time that suits the author as he goes along. Scenery is an inconvenience. I am pretty sure that Shakespeare's performance went through without a break. Certainly its conventional arrangement into five acts for the printing of the Folio is neither by Shakespeare's nor any other sensitive hand; it is shockingly bad. If one must have intervals (as the discomforts of most theatres demand), I think the play falls as easily into the three divisions I have marked as any. [Intervals after II, iii and IV, i.]

I believe the play was written with a special cast in mind. Who was Shakespeare's clown, a sweet-voiced singer and something much more than a comic actor? He wrote Feste for him, and later the Fool in Lear. At least, I can conceive no dramatist risking the writing of such parts unless he knew he had a man to play them. And why a diminutive Maria—Penthesilea, the youngest wren of nine—unless it was only that the actor of the part was to be such a very small boy? I have cudgelled my brains to discover why Maria, as Maria, should be tiny, and finding no reason have ignored the point.

I believe too (this is a commonplace of criticism) that the plan of the play was altered in the writing of it. Shakespeare sets out upon a passionate love romance, perseveres in this until (one detects the moment, it is that jolly midnight revel) Malvolio, Sir Toby and Sir Andrew completely capture him. Even then, perhaps, Maria's notable revenge on the affectioned ass is still to be kept within bounds. But two scenes later he begins to elaborate the new idea. The character of Fabian is added to take Feste's share of the rough practical joke and set him free for subtler wit. Then Shakespeare lets fling and works out the humorous business to his heart's content. That done, little enough space is left him if the play is to be over at the proper hour, and, it may be (if the play was being prepared for an occasion, the famous festivity in the Middle Temple Hall or another), there was little enough time to finish writing it in either. From any cause, we certainly have a scandalously ill-arranged and ill-written last scene, the despair of any stage manager. But one can discover, I believe, amid the chaos scraps of the play he first meant to write. Olivia suffers not so much by the midway change of plan, for it is about her house that the later action of the play proceeds, and she is on her author's hands. It is on Orsino, that interesting romantic, that the blow falls.

Why should I not, had I the heart to do it,
Like to the Egyptian thief at point of death,
Kill what I love?—a savage jealousy
That sometime savours nobly.

On that fine fury of his—shamefully reduced to those few lines—I believe the last part of the play was to have hung. It is too good a theme to have been meant to be so wasted. And the revelation of Olivia's marriage to his page (as he supposes), his reconciliation with her, and the more vital discovery that his comradely love for Viola is worth more to him after all than any high-sounding passion, is now all muddled up with the final rounding off of the comic relief. The character suffers severely. Orsino remains a finely interesting figure; he might have been a magnificent one. But there, it was Shakespeare's way to come out on the other side of his romance.

The most important aspect of the play must be viewed, to view it rightly, with Elizabethan eyes. Viola was played, and was meant to be played, by a boy. See what this involves. To that original audience the strain of make-believe in the matter ended just where for us it most begins, at Viola's entrance as a page. Shakespeare's audience saw Cesario without effort as Orsino sees him; more importantly they saw him as Olivia sees him; indeed it was over Olivia they had most to make believe. One feels at once how this affects the sympathy and balance of the love scenes of the play. One sees how dramatically right is the delicate still grace of the dialogue between Orsino and Cesario, and how possible it makes the more outspoken passion of the scenes with Olivia. Give to Olivia, as we must do now, all the value of her sex, and to the supposed Cesario none of the value of his, we are naturally quite unmoved by the business. Olivia looks a fool. And it is the common practice for actresses of Viola to seize every chance of reminding the audience that they are girls dressed up, to impress on one moreover, by childish by-play as to legs and petticoats or the absence of them, that this is the play's supreme joke. Now Shakespeare has devised one most carefully placed soliloquy where we are to be forcibly reminded that Cesario is Viola; in it he has as carefully divided the comic from the serious side of the matter. That scene played, Viola, who does not do her best, as far as the passages with Olivia are concerned, to make us believe, as Olivia believes, that she is a man, shows, to my mind, a lack of imagination and is guilty of dramatic bad manners, knocking, for the sake of a little laughter, the whole of the play's romantic plot on the head.

Let me explain briefly the interpretation I favour of four or five other points.

I do not think that Sir Toby is meant for nothing but a bestial sot. He is a gentleman by birth, or he would not be Olivia's uncle (or cousin, if that is the relationship). He has been, it would seem, a soldier. He is a drinker, and while idleness leads him to excess, the boredom of Olivia's drawing-room, where she sits solitary in her mourning, drives him to such jolly companions as he can find: Maria and Fabian and the Fool. He is a poor relation, and has been dear to Sir Andrew some two thousand strong or so (poor Sir Andrew), but as to that he might say he was but anticipating his commission as matrimonial agent. Now, dull though Olivia's house may be, it is free quarters. He is, it is seems, in some danger of losing them, but if only by good luck he could see Sir Andrew installed there as master! Not perhaps all one could wish for in an uncle; but to found an interpretation of Sir Toby only upon a study of his unfortunate surname is, I think, for the actor to give us both less and more than Shakespeare meant.

I do not believe that Sir Andrew is meant for a cretinous idiot. His accomplishments may not quite stand to Sir Toby's boast of them; alas! the three or four languages, word for word without book, seem to end at "Dieu vous garde, Monsieur." But Sir Andrew, as he would be if he could—the scholar to no purpose, the fine fellow to no end, in short the perfect gentleman—is still the ideal of better men than he who yet can find nothing better to do. One can meet a score of Sir Andrews, in greater or less perfection, any day after a west-end London lunch, doing, what I believe is called, a slope down Bond.

Fabian, I think, is not a young man, for he hardly treats Sir Toby as his senior, he is the cautious one of the practical jokers, and he has the courage to speak out to Olivia at the end. He treats Sir Andrew with a certain respect. He is a family retainer of some sort; from his talk he has to do with horses and dogs.

Feste, I feel, is not a young man either. There runs through all he says and does that vein of irony by which we may so often mark one of life's self-acknowledged failures. We gather that in those days, for a man of parts without character and with more wit than sense, there was a kindly refuge from the world's struggle as an allowed fool. Nowadays we no longer put them in livery.

I believe Antonio to be an exact picture of an Elizabethan seaman-adventurer, and Orsino's view of him to be just such as a Spanish grandee would have taken of Drake. "Notable pirate" and "salt-water thief," he calls him.

A bawbling vessel was he captain of,
For shallow draught and bulk unprizable;
With which such scathful grapple did he make
With the most noble bottom of our fleet,
That very envy and the tongue of loss
Cried fame and honour on him.
And Antonio is a passionate fellow as those west countrymen were. I am always reminded of him by the story of Richard Grenville chewing a wineglass in his rage.

The keynote of the poetry of the play are that it is passionate and it is exquisite. It is life, I believe, as Shakespeare glimpsed it with the eye of his genius in that half-Italianised court of Elizabeth. Orsino, Olivia, Antonio, Sebastian, Viola are passionate all, and conscious of the worth of their passion in terms of beauty. To have one's full laugh at the play's comedy is no longer possible, even for an audience of Elizabethan experts. Though the humour that is set in character is humour still, so much of the salt of it, its play upon the time and place, can have no savour for us. Instead we have learned editors disputing over the existence and meaning of jokes at which the simplest soul was meant to laugh unthinkingly. I would cut out nothing else, but I think I am justified in cutting those pathetic survivals.

Finally, as to the speaking of the verse and prose. The prose is mostly simple and straightforward. True, he could no more resist a fine-sounding word than, as has been said, he could resist a pun. They abound, but if we have any taste for the flavour of a language he makes us delight in them equally. There is none of that difficult involuted decoration for its own sake in which he revelled in the later plays. The verse is still regular, still lyrical in its inspiration, and it should I think be spoken swiftly . . .

I think that all Elizabethan dramatic verse must be spoken swiftly, and nothing can make me think otherwise. My fellow workers acting in The Winter's Tale were accused by some people (only by some) of gabbling. I readily take that accusation on myself, and I deny it. Gabbling implies hasty speech, but our ideal was speed, nor was the speed universal, nor, but in a dozen well-defined passages, really so great. Unexpected it was, I don't doubt; and once exceed the legal limit, as well accuse you of seventy miles an hour as twenty-one. But I call in question the evidence of mere policemen-critics. I question a little their expertness of hearing, a little too their quickness of understanding Elizabethan English not at its easiest, just a little their lack of delight in anything that is not as they thought it would be, and I suggest that it is more difficult than they think to look and listen and remember and appraise all in the same flash of time. But be all the shortcomings on one side and that side ours, it is still no proof that the thing come short of is not the right thing. That is the important point to determine, and for much criticism that has been helpful in amending what we did and making clearer what we should strive towards— I tender thanks.

The Winter's Tale, as I see its writing, is complex, vivid, abundant in the variety of its mood and pace and colour, now disordered, now at rest, the product of a mind rapid, changing, and over-full. I believe its interpretation should express all that. Twelfth Night is quite other. Daily, as we rehearse together, I learn more what it is and should be; the working together of the theatre is a fine thing. But, as a man is asked to name his stroke at billiards, I will even now commit myself to this: its serious mood is passionate, its verse is lyrical, the speaking of it needs swiftness and fine tone; not rush, but rhythm, constant and compelling. And now I wait contentedly to be told that less rhythmic speaking of Shakespeare has never been heard.

Historical Criticism of Twelfth Night: Celebration and Festivity

The themes of celebration and festivity were inherent in Shakespeare's sources; the incorporation of the Twelfth Night holiday was probably suggested by the Italian play Gl'Ingannati, which contained a reference to La Notte di Beffania, the Epiphany. However, recent criticism has reached past the surface gaiety suggested in the title, and delved into themes behind the temporary release of a celebration.
Michael Taylor

[Taylor compares the passive posturing of Orsino, who reflects the acceptance of events shaped by a carefree or festive approach, to the more active stance of Viola, who aptly captures the essence of the subtitle, "What You Will." Olivia and Orsino both retreat from reality in their respective emotional indulgences: Orsino's in unrequited love and Olivia's in grief for her brother. The critic contends that Malvolio, however, believes he can change his reality through sheer force of will and therefore also acts according to the subtitle in his quest for greatness.]

Although the exact chronology of Shakespeare's plays is still in dispute, on the available evidence most commentators think Twelfth Night to be the last of the Romantic Comedies, close in time to Hamlet. The piquancy of this association has not gone unnoticed, and there is occasionally an anachronistic ring to critical judgements on Twelfth Night, caught best by the one that thrusts Hamlet's greatness upon Malvolio. Yet the dilemma which confounds the tragic protagonist appears also to disturb the equanimity of those in the comedy who, like him, balk at what seem to them excessively difficult situations, and who, like him also, are unable to end their troubles simply by opposing them. Even in indulgent Illyria, retreat into languor or knock-about-comedy does not muffle entirely the clamorous demands from the real world for decisions to be made and actions taken. Over the play hangs Sir Toby's great question, "Is it a world to hide virtues in?" (I.3.117-118).

In many ways, of course, Illyria, unlike Hamlet’s Denmark, offers its aristocratic inhabitants a life freed from the obligation to exercise their virtues. The kind of licence that the play's main title conveys can be enjoyed at its most untrammelled in the simple indulgences of the sub-plot. Although Sir Toby has as much contempt for his drinking companion, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, as he has for his puritan enemy, Malvolio, Sir Andrew's naive conception of the good life lies at the heart of their activity: "it rather consists of eating and drinking" (II.3.10-11). If it were not for Maria, who hatches the plot against Malvolio, the sub-plot would have little to offer other than the spectacle of aimless roistering. Despite Sir Toby's noisy contempt for "the modest limits of order" (I.3.8), or his lack of respect for place, persons, and time (to echo Malvolio's accusation), his belligerent claim to the hedonistic life does not amount to very much. The festive spirit, given free reign on Twelfth Night, depends here, as elsewhere in the play, upon an essential passivity on the part of its adherents.

Passivity in the guise of a carefree enjoyment of the good things of life may be more tolerable than in the form it takes with Orsino, whose contribution to a Twelfth Night philosophy has nothing to recommend it. Of all Shakespeare's romantic heroes his role must surely be the most difficult for any actor to make attractive. Supine in his passion, Orsino conducts his love-affair with Olivia through emissaries, Valentine initially, and then Viola as Cesario. This leaves him free to contemplate the tyrant sway of his "love-thoughts" from which in fact he longs to escape, or says he does: "And my desires, like fell and cruel hounds / E'er since pursue me" (I.1.23-24). Unable to act, he cannot take responsibility for his own feelings, as his figure indicates, divorcing himself from them as though they were external agents sent to plague him. He seems no more able to translate words into deeds than Olivia's other suitor, Sir Andrew, whom he also resembles, though on a more highly poetic plane, in his vacillation and instability of opinion. In the space of some ninety lines in Act II, Orsino moves from a conception of himself as devoted to the "constant image of the creature / That is beloved" (II.4.18-19) through an attack on the inconstancy of men's affections when compared with women's (II.4.32-34) to an attack on women's inconstancy in love when compared with men:

> Alas, their love may be called appetite,
> No motion of the liver but the palate,
> That suffers surfeit, cloyment, and revolt.
> (II.4.96-98)

Orsino's patronizing regret, here, for the crudity of women's love for men not only contradicts his recent opinion as to "giddy and unfirm" masculine fancies, but does so in language which cannot but remind us of the play's opening lines, where he appeals on his own behalf for a medicinal "surfeiting" in order that his "appetite may sicken and so die" (I.1.3). "Surfeit, cloyment, and revolt," in fact, constitute the cycle from whose paralyzing influence Orsino escapes only in his marriage to Viola.

Subject to every fleeting whim, what can someone like Orsino do? He cannot do much more than talk about what he might do, or, at best, demand that others do urgently for him what he can only urgently demand them to do. "Be clamorous and leap all civil bounds" (I.4.20) he urges Viola, for (in a prophetic line) "It shall become thee well to act my woes" (I.4.25). "What shall I do?" (V.1.109) he asks Olivia, whose reply nicely balances courtesy and contempt: "Even what it please my lord, that shall become him" (V.1.110). Although his question may not be so inane as Sir Andrew's "What is 'pourquoi'? Do, or not do?" (I.3.83), between them they voice in comic fashion the alternative which faces Hamlet: do, or not do. In both their cases (unlike his), any attempt to take decisive action is doomed to be comically ineffectual. When Orsino discovers that Olivia believes herself to be in love with Cesario he indulges his fury in self-dramatization and empty threats:

    Why should I not, had I the heart to do it,
      Like to th'Egyptian thief at point of death,
    Kill what I love?
(V.1.111-113)

Such bombast circumstance gives way to a recognition of impotence (though still phrased bombastically): "Live you the marble-breasted tyrant still" (V.1.118).

Indolence, passivity and impotence are constitutive of a Twelfth Night philosophy: care must be, indeed, the enemy of this life. With Viola's entry onto Twelfth Night's stage, the emphasis shifts temporarily (to return each time she returns) to a meaning of the play's sub-title, "What You Will" which offers itself as a genuine alternative to the main title. She supplies what those idling through an Illyrian Twelfth Night lack: direction, willed purpose, persistence and decisiveness. "I'll serve this duke" (I.2.55) she says when we meet her first, indicating how much more than simply an Orsinian lament was her original question: "And what should I do in Illyria?" (I.2.3). In her disguise as Cesario, she obeys Orsino's instructions to the letter, much to Malvolio's discomfiture. "He's fortified against any denial" (I.5.138-139) Malvolio complains to an intrigued Olivia, "He'll speak with you, will you or no" (I.5.147-148). How much her purposefulness becomes her is indicated, of course, in Olivia's admiring, "You might do much" (I.5.263). In these circumstances, Viola's perplexity over Olivia's continued rejection of Orsino's suit does not extend beyond herself. We can see quite clearly why her active involvement in Illyrian affairs should in a trice break down Olivia's self-denying and artificial barriers against natural feeling. "Even so quickly may one catch the plague?" (I.5.281) wonders Olivia. In these circumstances, even so.

Having caught it Olivia does not retire into sweet beds of flowers, even though she suffers the same treatment from Viola that she has been according Orsino. Her resilience here does not come as a total surprise to us, for she has displayed, from the outset, her own brand of willed purpose. In her misplaced determination to mourn her brother's death for seven years, we acknowledge a strength of will, however perverse. Valentine's caustic account to Orsino of her decision grasps its comic impropriety:

    But like a cloistress she will veiled walk,
      And water once a day her chamber round
    With eye-offending brine all this to season
    A brother's dead love, which she would keep fresh
      And lasting in her sad remembrance.
(I.1.29-33)
Valentine reduces Olivia's daily expression of devotion to an unthinking exercise in the art of sad remembrance, as mechanical as watering flowers, except that the salt in Olivia's tears hurts her eyes. His metaphor from preserving meat, the ambiguity in "eye-offending" and his pointed use of the transferred epithet ("a brother's dead love") tell us why Olivia might well have to strain hard for her tears. Her persistence is unnatural and foolish, a stubborn exertion of the misdirected will.

A determination to pursue a course of action, no matter how fatuous, obviously provides no real alternative to an indulgence of inertia. Olivia's activity in memory of her dead brother resembles Orsino's languor in behalf of love: each a retreat from reality. In Shakespeare's presentation of Malvolio (whose name means "bad will"), his conviction that reality can be transformed by an exercise of the will overwhelms all his notions of social decorum and subdues his common-sense. Malvolio has no intention of hiding his virtues, for he is, in Maria's words, "the best persuaded of himself; so crammed as he thinks, with excellencies that it is his grounds of faith that all that look on him love him" (II.3.136-139). Maria's trick against him exploits this supreme conceit, relying on Malvolio's strength of will to pursue inanity to excess and surfeit. Her letter cleverly appeals to his "blood" and "spirit," asking him to inure himself "to what thou art like to be, cast thy humble slough and appear fresh" (II.5.135-137). Unlike Orsino, Malvolio finds nothing difficult nor distasteful in the activities demanded of him, despite their demeaning tricks of singularity:

Be opposite with a kinsman, surly with servants.
Let thy tongue tang arguments of state;
put thyself into the trick of singularity . . .
Remember who commended thy yellow stockings and wished to see thee ever cross-gartered.
(II.5.137-141)

Malvolio's performance exceeds expectation. Only a man blindly convinced of his own worth, assured that in no circumstances can he possibly appear ridiculous, could parade himself in this manner. Arrogantly self-willed, Malvolio, more extremely than Olivia, brings the notion of self-assertion in the play's sub-title into greater disrepute than Sir Toby the license implicit in "Twelfth Night." The letter speaks to his deepest convictions about himself, especially in one of its last injunctions: "Go to, thou art made, if thou desir'st to be so" (II.5.142-143) [my italics], releasing in him a flood of "wills":

I will be proud, I will read politic authors,
I will baffle Sir Toby, I will wash off gross acquaintance,
I will be point-devise, the very man.
(II.5.148-150)

Such a rhapsody, despite his insistence on Jove's benign intervention, places Malvolio squarely in the second and third of the three categories of greatness the letter describes: "Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon 'em" (II.5.132-134).

Thad Jenkins Logan
Logan explores the darker side of the carnival atmosphere of Twelfth Night, arguing that in the night world of the play, festivity has lost its innocence. He identifies the theme of the main plot as sexual, and the subplot, revelry, explaining that sexuality and revelry are the "two faces of the Saturnalian experience." The critic contends that the characters of the play are able to lose themselves in festivity because they, with the exception of Feste and Malvolio, are young and wealthy and literally carefree. Malvolio plays the parental role, and true to the reversal which underlies Saturnalian festivity, is imprisoned, just as those natural impulses of restraint are locked up and ignored during the pursuits of pleasure. Feste links the plots and suggests through his melancholy songs that festivity isn’t as satisfying as it appears. Logan maintains that in Twelfth Night, love has nothing to do with personality and that Shakespeare intends to demonstrate to his audience through removing natural limits in the stage world that Saturnian festivity taken to its final extreme is not reconcilable with social or moral norms, and results in violence and indiscriminate passion.

In Twelfth Night Shakespeare presents us with a world given over to pleasure, intoxication, and freedom. Any accurate interpretation must acknowledge the thematic importance of festivity, and critics like Barber, Leslie Hotson, L. G. Salingar, and John Hollander have provided valuable insights in this respect. Yet none of these critics has dealt quite adequately with the particular nature of festivity in this play, and my concentration on the dark side of the carnival world of Twelfth Night should be viewed as a supplement to their interpretations. It is clear that festive experience permits of distinctions: a New Year’s Eve party, a Christmas dinner, and a wedding are all festive occasions, but constitute different experiences. Similarly, from a point of view of structure, the formal features which lead Barber to characterize a comedy as “festive” may be discovered in many plays, but crucial differences among the plays exist within that framework. The experience of Twelfth Night is very different from that of As You Like It or Midsummer Night’s Dream, plays in which a critic may find similar dramatic elements and a number of formal analogues; I conceive the identifying, distinctive experience of Twelfth Night to be a function of the nature of festivity in that play. As its title suggests, the world of this play is a night world, and festivity here has lost its innocence.

Leslie Hotson has noted [in The First Night of Twelfth Night, 1954] that the subtitle "what you will" recalls the motto of the Abbaye de Theleme: "fay ce que vouldras." The phrase suggests that a fundamental concern of the play is what [David Horowitz, Shakespeare: An Existential View (London: Tavistock, 1965)] has called "multiple pleasures and wills to pleasure." Jan Kott, in a brilliant though idiosyncratic assessment of Twelfth Night, asserts that sex is the theme of the play ["Shakespeare’s Bitter Arcadia," in Shakespeare Our Contemporary, 1964]; this is accurate enough but it is incomplete, since the secondary plot is highly significant in terms of stage time, and that plot is not primarily centered on sexuality, but on a set of drives that have to do with food, drink, song, dance, and fun. "Revelry" is probably as good a term as any to describe these particular sorts of pleasure, and I will use it in this essay to refer specifically to them. The relationship between the two plots is, in part, dependent on the fact that revelry and eroticism are closely allied; they are the two faces of Saturnalian experience. Twelfth Night, then, is an anatomy of festivity which focuses in the main plot on sexuality and in the sub-plot on revelry; the subtitle implies that these are what we, the audience, want.

It is crucial to recognize that the play makes an appeal to our own drives toward pleasure, toward liberation from the restraints of ordinary life. This is not, finally, an immoral play, but its authentic morality can only be discovered if we are willing to make a descent into the night world: its meaning remains opaque if we insist on seeing at every moment in every play a conservative, Apollonian Shakespeare. (We will do well to remember that Dionysus is the presiding genius of the theater.) Twelfth Night is not an enticement to licentious behavior, but it is an invitation to participate imaginatively in a Saturnalian feast.

A pervasive atmosphere of liberty and license is established by the opening scenes. The first thing we recognize about Illyria is that it is a world of privilege and leisure in which the aristocracy are at play. Goddard, whose vision of the play is in many ways similar to my own, calls Illyria "a counterfeit Elysium" [in The Meaning of Shakespeare, 1954], and characterizes its citizens as parasitical pleasure-seekers, partly on the grounds that any aristocratic society is founded on "the unrecognized labors of others". Certainly, there are only two characters in the play who seem to have any work to do: they are Feste and Malvolio, whose positions in the social world will be discussed at greater length; for most of the characters, leisure is a way of life. There are no rude mechanicals here. Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, and Maria are clearly not members of the lower class, although the conventions of comedy and Shakespeare’s usual practices have sometimes led directors to make that mistake about them. That the characters of the sub-plot are themselves members of the Aristocracy is a significant feature of this play. Olivia and Orsino are at the very top of the social hierarchy; they are young, rich, elegant, and fashionable. The captain who rescues Viola suggests something of their éclat in his initial description of Orsino [quotations from The Riverside Shakespeare (1974)]:

> And then 'twas fresh in murmur (as you know, > What great ones do, the less will prattle of)
> That he did seek the love of fair Olivia.
> (I.ii.32-34)

Even the shipwrecked twins are well-off; Sebastian is amply provided for by the doting Antonio upon his arrival in Illyria, and Viola has somehow emerged from the sea with enough gold to pay the captain "bounteously."

The wealth and social position of the characters are important in several ways and should be established clearly in production; besides setting the action in a framework of aristocratic values, pleasures, and mores, they contribute a great deal to a sense of liberation and license. Characters are, in part, free to pursue "what they will" because they can afford to do so. The financial conditions upon which Illyrian revelry depends are made explicit by Sir Toby: "Let's to bed, knight. Thou hadst need send for more money" (II.iii.182 and 183). Along with economic freedom, the social status of the main characters allows them to pursue pleasure according to their fancy. Orsino is attended by courtiers who provide him with music, and presumably with "sweet beds of flow'rs," on command; Olivia speaks to Cesario/Sebastian from a position of power, arranging rendezvous as she chooses. Her disorderly kinsman and his guest may be threatened by her displeasure, but they are apparently in no danger from any sort of civil authority; in the brawl that follows the practical joke played on Viola and Sir Andrew, it is only the outsider, Antonio, who is arrested.

Political power is, in fact, vested in Orsino; as the Duke of Illyria, he might be expected to function as the parent-figure in Northrop Frye's model of the structure of comedy ["The Mythos of Spring: Comedy" in Anatomy of Criticism, 1957]. From his first speech, however, it becomes clear that Orsino is not going to embody principles of law, order, and restraint in this comic world. In fact, there are no parents at all in Illyria, as Joseph Summers has cogently noted [in "The Masks of Twelfth Night" in The University of Kansas City Review, 1955]. Here, the social order is in the hands of youth, and wealth and power are at the service of youth's pursuit of pleasure.

It is Malvolio, of course, who fills the dramatic functions of the senex and the blocking figure, but what is curious about Malvolio in this respect is that he is a servant of Olivia. In a comic world noticeably lacking parents, Malvolio becomes a parent figure insofar as he performs some characteristic parental roles: it is he who tells the revellers to be quiet and go to bed. Yet Malvolio is a remarkably ineffective blocking figure; he shows himself powerless to control Sir Toby and Maria, much less to inhibit the actions of the lovers. The figure who stands for law and order in this play is not only made the butt of practical jokes, but is, in the structure of the play's society, only an employee. As such, he has no real authority: his "parenting" may be made use of by Olivia when it is convenient, and dispensed with when it is not. No one is morally or legally compelled to obey Malvolio; certainly no one is inclined to do so, nor is anyone inclined to share his stolid, earnest, workaday consciousness.

In the course of the play, the sort of consciousness that Malvolio embodies is literally locked away in the dark. His imprisonment is a striking emblem of the psychic reversal that underlies Saturnalian festivity: impulses that are normally repressed are liberated, while the controls of the super-ego are temporarily held in check. What gives Illyria its distinctive atmosphere is our sense that in this world such a reversal is a way of life. For most of the characters, everyday is holiday. Festivity is the norm here, and misrule is the order of the night.
The audience of Twelfth Night participates imaginatively in an experience of psychic liberation, but does not share the "madness" of the Illyrians; in Freudian terms, our ego and super-ego continue to function normally. There are modes of awareness available to us that are not available to the characters (we hold, for example, the keys to all riddles of identity in this play), and we retain an integrity of consciousness that the characters do not. Freud, of course, conceived of art as a transformation of unconscious fantasy material into a publicly acceptable form; while a Freudian theory of art tends to be limited and reductive, it provides a useful model for an audience's experience of Twelfth Night. Fantasies of love and anarchy, given free in Illyria, are presented on the stage, made present for our contemplation as well as our imaginative participation. It is as though we are allowed to be at once asleep and awake; our own fantasies, "what we will," are newly discovered to us. The sorts of things we learn about the night-world of the psyche are profoundly disturbing. Festivity turns out to be fraught with dangers and complications: Eros mocks the individual; Dionysius is a god of pain as well as a god of pleasure.

According to Leslie Hotson, for Shakespeare and his original audience "what the Dalmatian-Croatian Illyria brought to mind was thoughts of wild riot and drunkenness." In the sub-plot of Twelfth Night, as in the Bacchic rites, what riot and drunkenness lead to are violence and cruelty. Among all Shakespeare's comedies, it is only in Twelfth Night and As You Like It that there is literally blood on the stage. It is characteristic of the violence in the former play to be artificial in the sense of being invented by the characters themselves rather than necessitated by the movement of the plot or brought in from outside the comic world by a villain. In As You Like It, for instance, violence is created by the wicked Duke Frederick or by the encounter of man and nature. Because the violence of Twelfth Night, at least that which we see on the stage, is directly or indirectly effected by an appetite for diversion, there is always an element of superfluous about it that is curiously disturbing; it is like the underside of play. Violence in this play is optional, chosen, "what we will."

Freud has taught us that cruelty is the genesis of practical jokes. Whether or not Malvolio deserves his treatment at the hands of Maria, it seems to me that her sadistic impulses towards him are obvious. Once he has been gulled into smiles and yellow stockings, her response to him is "I can hardly forbear hurling things at him" (III.ii.81). Her "sportful malice" creates a web of illusion that is, up to a point, very funny indeed. Yet from the moment Malvolio cries out, "they have laid me here in hideous darkness" (IV.ii.29 and 30), he begins to claim a share of the audience's sympathy. His plight is too close to our own nightmare fears, his language too evocative, for us to feel quite comfortable laughing at him. The feeling that the joke has gone too far is voiced by Sir Toby: "I would we were well rid of this knavery" (IV.ii.67-68). The game threatens to come real: "We shall make him mad indeed," objects Fabian, to which Maria responds, "The house will be the quieter" (III.iv.133-34). She has, she says, "dogg'd him like his murtherer" (III.ii.76-77), and she is in earnest in her perpetration of psychic violence. That Maria bears the name of the Virgin is another example of the reversal characteristic of Saturnalian festivity.

Once Malvolio has fallen prey to the machinations of the revellers and to his own fantasies, Sir Toby's idea of a good time is to set Cesario and Sir Andrew at one another. He does not, of course, expect blood to be spilled—certainly not his own—but he has not reckoned with encountering the energies of Sebastian. Energy is precisely what he does encounter, however, and it leaves him and his companion broken and bloody. The play discovers to us the fact that festive revelry is likely to unleash psychic forces that are not easily controlled. In the metaphorical language of stage action, the wounded revellers function both in terms of myth and in terms of quotidian experience: in one sense, they are suffering the predictable consequences of a drunken brawl; in another, they remind us that the rites of Bacchus culminate in bloodshed.

There is within the play world one character who provides an ironic commentary on revelry, who seems to know that the pursuit of pleasure can be destructive, and who leads the audience toward a recognition of the emptiness of festive excess. Paradoxically, this is Feste the jester, whose name and office closely associate him with the festive experience. Festivity, as I have suggested, is the conceptual and experiential link between the sub-plot and the main plot; similarly, Feste acts in the play as a link between different sets of characters, moving freely from one group to another, like the spirit of festivity incarnate in the world of Illyria. But oddly, festivity itself, as incarnate in Feste, seems to participate in the principle of reversal characteristic of the play, and hover on the verge of becoming its opposite.

As Feste moves through the world of Illyria, he challenges our assumptions about festivity and foolery; he suggests not only that the fool is the only sane person in this world, but also that festivity is not as satisfying an experience as we might imagine. All three of his songs direct our attention to aspects of experience we might prefer to forget: death, the swift passage of time, and the fact that, on the whole, life is likely to bring us more pain than pleasure. Feste does not often amuse us, or the other characters; we do not often laugh with him—he does not give us occasion to do so. He seems to be, on the whole, rather an unhappy fellow. He is first discovered to us as an employee who may be dismissed; like Malvolio, Feste is a professional. Festivity is work for him, and it is evidently work which has become tiresome. He appears on stage as though he is returning from a long absence; his first words are "Let her hang me!" in response to Maria's scolding that his absence has displeased Olivia. It is easy to imagine Feste played as though he were disillusioned, cynical, and bored. Olivia herself calls him "a dry fool," says he grows dishonest, and tells him "your fooling grows old, and people dislike it" (I.v.110). Feste is distanced from the other inhabitants of Illyria because he is immune to the lures of drink, love, fantasy, and the distortions they create: he seems to have known these things and come out the other side. The festive experience is his trade; it holds no mysteries for him, and no delights.

Feste and Malvolio are, as we might expect, antagonists. They quarrel early in the play, and in the last scene Feste recalls that quarrel, taking special pleasure in Malvolio's humiliation and the part he has played in it. There seems to be a good deal of personal rancor in his "And thus the whirligig of time brings in his revenges" (V.i.376, 377). The experience of dislike is not a common one in Shakespeare's comedies, and its appearance here is disturbing. Feste also does not like Viola, who makes a serious mistake about his nature; "I warrant thou art a merry fellow, and car'st for nothing." His response is a cold one: "Not so, sir, I do care for something; but in my conscience, sir, I do not care for you. If that be to care for nothing, sir, I would it would make you invisible" (III.i.26-30). The straightforward statement of dislike, of a motiveless personal hostility, sounds a new note in the comic world; it is, of course, Feste who at the end of the play will lead us out of that world.

There is a similar moment of "dis-integration" when Sir Toby reveals his true feelings about Sir Andrew: "Will you help?—an ass-head and a coxcomb and a knave, a thin-fac'd knave, a gull!" (V.i.206-207). There is never much sense of a human community established in Twelfth Night. Friendship is not a significant structural feature of the main plot, as it is in Midsummer Night's Dream and As You Like It. The revellers' fellowship is broken by the end of the play, and they do not participate in the happy ending. We are, admittedly, told that Sir Toby has married Maria, but we do not see them together on stage at the end. Antonio, so far as we can tell from the script, is never released from arrest, and Malvolio leaves the stage in anger. Critical notions that the end of the play is a vision of harmony and communal integration seem to me totally unjustified. A social community based on charitable love is never created in Twelfth Night; here, erotic love does not become a figure for charity, and marriage does not symbolize a universal harmony.

"What is love?" asks Feste. The conclusions we are led toward by the action of Twelfth Night are not, on the whole, happy ones. Sexuality in Illyria is mysterious and illusive. "What are we? What would we?" are questions the play sets for its audience. In Feste's lyric, love is the immediate gratification of desire: "Then come kiss me sweet and twenty." The play, however, begins with a stalemate: desire is frustrated, and fantasies conflict. Orsino wants Olivia, Olivia "will admit no kind of suit." It is the characteristic situation of courtly love; the roles Olivia and Orsino choose to play are familiar ones. In the course of the play, Shakespeare leads us from conventional modalities of love to a discovery of other erotic truths. This discovery is effected by the relationship of the four lovers as it is played out in the stage-world.
Part of the extraordinary appeal of Viola and Sebastian (and they have been almost as attractive to critics as to the characters in the play) comes from their air of innocence. Both Olivia and Orsino explicitly use the word "youth" on almost every occasion when they speak to or about Cesario. The twins bring a special vernal quality into the play; it is their appearance that breaks the stalemate established in the first scene. They are, in a sense, the green world. A significant number of critics assume that they teach Olivia and Orsino the meaning of love, and redeem the world into which they enter. I believe that such an interpretation does not sufficiently acknowledge our experience of the erotic aspects of the play. It is important, first of all, to notice that both Viola and Sebastian are androgynous.

Throughout the play we are compelled to pay attention to Viola's shifting sexual identity. We see her first as a girl, and watch her make decisions about how to present herself to the world; the idea of disguise thus becomes prominent, and entails the awareness that we ordinarily determine gender by dress, by appearance. The possibility of disguise suggests that there is something arbitrary about identity, and a disguise that involves a change of gender similarly suggests that our apprehension of sexual identity is mutable and susceptible to illusion. After her first scene, Viola never again appears to us as anything but a boy; unlike Rosalind, she does not re-assume her "woman's weeds" at the end of the play. A number of lines in the play draw attention to her disguise. The most notable is Orsino's description:

Diana's lip is not more smooth and rubious; thy small pipe
Is as the maiden's organ, shrill and sound,
And all is semblative a woman's part.
(I.iv.31-34)

A modern audience perceives this as a moment in which Orsino is close to discovering the "truth" about Cesario; Shakespeare, however, must have written the lines assuming that Orsino would deliver them to a boy disguised as a girl disguised as a boy. Viola, in fact, seems to be both a boy and a girl, and is romantically involved with both a man and a woman.

Sebastian also combines characteristics of both genders. Although I have remarked on his energy, Sebastian says of himself (on parting with Antonio), "I am yet so near the manners of my mother, that upon the least occasion more mine eyes will tell tales of me" (II.i.40-42). In relation to both Antonio and Olivia, Sebastian takes a passive, classically feminine role; he enjoys their attentions, and allows them to present him with lavish gifts. Now in one sense Antonio is a nurturing parent-figure, and again the principle of reversal is operative; the parent is subservient to the child: "If you will not murther me for my love," cries Antonio, "let me be your servant" (II.i.35-36). Antonio not only speaks to Sebastian like a doting parent, however, but also like a lover. Against Sebastian's wishes, he has followed him to Illyria:

I could not stay behind you. My desire (More sharp than filed steel) did spur me forth,
And not all love to see you (though so much As might have drawn one to a longer voyage)
But jealousy what might befall your travel.
(III.iii 4-8)

Like Viola, Sebastian is involved in erotic relationships with both a man and a woman.

The twins' androgyny may be, as some critics have suggested, related to their youth and innocence, but it also makes any romantic relationship into which they enter suspect. As soon as Viola/Cesario becomes an object of desire, we are drawn into the night world. Insofar as Viola is a girl, her encounters with Olivia inevitably suggest lesbianism; insofar as Cesario is a boy, all his relations with Orsino suggest homosexuality. Barber, in attempting to deal with this issue, assures us that "with sexual as with other relations, it is when the normal is secure that playful aberration is benign [in Shakespeare's Festive Comedy, 1959].” Undoubtedly, but what sexual relation can we perceive as normal in Illyria?

What we see on stage in the course of the play is a delirious erotic chase; Viola pursues Orsino who pursues Olivia who pursues both Viola and Sebastian, who is pursued by Antonio. Salingar has noted [in "The Design of Twelfth Night" in Shakespeare Quarterly, 1958] that "the main action of Twelfth Night, then, is planned with a suggestive likeness to a revel." Indeed. And the sort of revel it is most like is an orgy. Ordinarily, sexual experience is private, and involves two partners. In orgiastic experience, the number of possible sexual partners is multiplied, and distinctions of gender become less important. On the stage, we see Sebastian erotically linked with Antonio and Olivia, Orsino with Cesario and Olivia, Viola with Orsino and Olivia, Olivia with Viola and Sebastian. For the spectators of this "whirligig," and for the characters caught up in it, the complexities of eroticism in Illyria are dizzying.

There never is, needless to say, a real orgy; the playwright is in control of the revels, after all, and the comedy ends in marriage; sexual energy is channelled into appropriate social institutions. In Barber's words, "delusions and misapprehensions are resolved by the finding of objects appropriate to passions." Well, yes. Orsino marries Cesario, who loves him, and Olivia marries a man. But by this time passions have so slipped their moorings in terms of objects of desire (who, for example, does Olivia love?) that this finding of objects appropriate to passions seems rather like a game of musical chairs. My point is that the marriages at the end of Twelfth Night do not convince us that sexuality is ever ordered and controlled with regard to the individual in society.

In the final scene Olivia and Orsino claim their partners. There is no doubt, from an audience's perspective, who is in control here: Olivia and Orsino are older and they possess social status that the twins do not; they further control the scene in the special theatrical sense of having most of the lines. Olivia has already, by the last scene, engineered a marriage with the complaisant Sebastian. Having effected her own wedding by sheer force of will, it is Olivia who moves at the end of the play to arrange the betrothal of Viola and Orsino:

My Lord, so please you, these things further thought on,
To think me well a sister as a wife,
One day shall crown th' alliance on't, so please you,
Here at my house and at my proper cost.
(V.i.316-19)

Orsino embraces her offer, and takes Viola's hand. It is important to remember that if we saw this scene in a theater, we would see him take Cesario's hand; the actor is still dressed as a boy, as he is some moments later when Orsino leads him from the stage.

Throughout the play, Olivia and Orsino are self-absorbed, self-willed and self-indulgent creatures: there is no evidence that they change significantly as a result of their encounters with the twins. Orsino's last words, like his first, are about himself: "But when in other habits you are seen, / Orsino's mistress, and his fancy's queen" (V.i.387-88). He is still speaking of "fancy." Orsino's anagnorisis seems to involve only the recognition that if he cannot have Olivia he may as well take Cesario: "I shall have share in this most happy wrack" (V.i.266). Similarly, there is no reason for an audience to believe that Olivia has made meaningful discoveries about the nature of love. If she was headstrong and reckless in loving Cesario, it is hard to see her as docile and prudent in her relations with Sebastian. At the end of the play, as at the beginning, Olivia is doing precisely what she wants to do.

While Olivia and Orsino have not really learned anything about love during the play, we in the audience have. As I have suggested earlier, when external obstacles to the pursuit of love are removed, as they are in Illyria, it is the nature of passion itself that lovers must contend with. "Bright things come to confusion" readily enough in our world without the interference of blocking figures. Love, first of all, can be unrequited. It is, horribly enough, possible to love someone who—for no good reason—just does not return that love. Olivia makes it perfectly clear:

I cannot love him,
Yet I suppose him virtuous, know him noble,
Of great estate, of fresh and stainless youth;
In voices well divulg'd, free, learn'd, and valiant,
And in dimension, and the shape of nature,
A gracious person. But yet I cannot love him.
(I.v.257-62)

Orsino responds, "I cannot be so answer'd," and continues to long for what he cannot have in a particularly elegant, "poetical" fashion. Olivia, faced with rejection by Cesario, takes a more active approach; her "headstrong potent fault" finds expression in direct, aggressive confrontation with Cesario. It is Viola whose response to loving without requital has become best known:

She never told her love,
But let concealement like a worm i' the bud
Feed on her damask cheek; she pin'd in thought,
And with a green and yellow melancholy
She sate like Patience on a monument,
Smiling at grief.
(II.iv.110-15)

It has been argued that this is not really an accurate description of Viola; perhaps it is exaggerated, but certainly Viola's reaction to loving one who loves another is of this same kind; she waits for "Time" to resolve a painful situation made more painful by her concealed identity. It seems to me very peculiar to regard this as a norm or an ideal, as some critics suggest.

At last, of course, Viola has her reward; Orsino's love for Olivia, which could "give no place, bide no delay," suddenly turns to her. That love can so turn is another of its characteristics that Twelfth Night discovers to us; again, it is an old truth. Here, in a comic structure, love's capriciousness works toward a comic resolution of the plot. Orsino can, after all, love Viola; Olivia can just as well marry Sebastian as Cesario. Yet Dr. Johnson's objection [in Johnson as a Critic, 1973] to Olivia's marriage is, as one might expect, lucid and to the point. Only in myth and ritual are twins the same person, and while the stage world is, in part, a mythic realm, theater—and Shakespeare's theater in particular—is closely bound to the empirical, naturalistic world the audience inhabits. In that frame of reference, Olivia abandons her vow of chastity to pursue the first new man she meets, marries his (her) twin brother by mistake, and seems willing to transfer her affections to a man she does not know because he looks like the one she fell in love with.

The crucial point is this: at the end of the play we perceive that love really has little or nothing to do with personality. It is, as Kott has said of love in As You Like It, an electric current that passes through the bodies of men and women, boys and girls. Passion violates identity. That this is true in terms of the individual's consciousness is a truism. "Ourselves we do not owe," cries Olivia, succumbing to her feelings for Cesario. The action of Twelfth Night suggests that it is not only the personality of the lover that is disrupted by passion: it is personality itself, the whole concept of unique, distinct identity. Cesario, the beloved, is both Viola and Sebastian; it really doesn't matter. Olivia and Viola are ultimately as interchangeable as their names suggest. As in Spenser's Garden of Adonis, forms change, but Form remains; here, however, the "Form" is not a structure or a pattern, but energy, energy which propels individuals, sometimes against their will, toward others who may or may not be so moved. Such, it seems to me, is love in Twelfth Night.
Shakespeare has made similar suggestions about the nature of love in As You Like It and Midsummer Night's Dream, plays which also deal with psychic liberation; yet these plays do not lead us to a dark vision of the psyche. Nor do they have the melancholy tone of Twelfth Night; the language of this comedy is unusual in being not bawdy but grim. There are remarkably few ribald puns in Twelfth Night; by my count, there are twenty-nine references to madness in the play, twenty-two references to disease, twenty-five to devilry, and thirty-seven to destruction and death. The play's somber language would seem to be at odds with its festive structure; in my view, the structure and language are particularly compatible given the nature of festivity in Twelfth Night.

One difference between Illyria and the Wood of Athens is that in the wood, powerful and ultimately benevolent beings exist to set things right, beings who are intimately allied with, indeed embodiments of, the natural world. Illyria is a city, not a forest. In Twelfth Night, unlike As You Like It and Midsummer Night's Dream, festivity is divorced from pastoral, and this is crucially important to our experience of the play, since it means that sexuality is not perceived in relation to nature.

The concept of nature which the Renaissance inherited from the Middle Ages made a distinction between material phenomena (natura naturata) and an organizing principle (natura naturans); the latter was conceived as a structuring energy which, under Divine Providence, brought the physical phenomena into existence and patterned their being. As a manifestation of natura naturans, sexuality may wreak havoc in individual lives, but pursues its own ends of fertility and generation. Thus, as in Midsummer Night's Dream, a loss of identity can result from being subsumed in forces greater than the conscious self; personality may be blurred or erased by these forces, but finally they are beneficent in that they drive towards the preservation of life. The multiple marriages at the end of As You Like It provoke even from Jacques the comment (the realization), "these couples are coming to the ark." But in Twelfth Night, the absence of pastoral distances festivity from fertility, just as the absence of bawdry distances sexuality from a simple, homely pleasure that all humans share with the beasts. Illyria is beautiful, aristocratic, and sterile.

Festivity in Twelfth Night is divorced not only from nature, but, as I have indicated, from occasion. It is not a temporary release from social restraints but a permanent condition. The Forest of Arden and the Wood of Athens are places into which people enter in the course of the play and from which they will return; there is, to paraphrase Ralph Berry, "no escape from Illyria." The marriages there do not seem to place erotic love in a community, or to anchor it in a social life where impulses are ordered—not necessarily repressed, but controlled and contained.

That ordering, in a healthy society, provides more, rather than less individual freedom; the ability to control drives and impulses means, for the individual, freedom from the tyranny of the unconscious, while societal restraints ultimately protect the individual from the tyranny of others. The real tragedy of Malvolio lies in the fact that in this play the principle of order has become too rigid and too perverse to accommodate pleasure. Of course we laugh at him, he is ridiculous, yet his expulsion from the comic world brings an end to "Shakespeare's Festive Comedy," since it means that sobriety and intoxication, parents and children, workday and holiday, restraint and release, cannot be reconciled. In this way, Malvolio's exit is as disturbing as Mercade's entrance in Love's Labours Lost with his message of death. We feel, in the audience, the necessity of somehow making peace with him, and he is gone. His last line must certainly include everyone in the theater.

The play itself has discovered to us the dangers of life without the principle of order that Malvolio stands for; Feste's final song serves as a vivid reminder. The Rabelaisian ideal of freedom (the Abbaye de Theleme) only is possible when human nature can be trusted; doing what we will can be a horror if the forces that drive us are dark. In Twelfth Night Shakespeare leads us to explore the possibility that our drives to pleasure are ultimately irreconcilable with social and moral norms of goodness; it is the antithesis of As You Like It, which works from the hypothesis that people are basically good at heart. In As You Like It, the characters and the audience arrive at a restoration of the world; in \textit{Twelfth Night}, what the characters and the audience come to are the limits of festival, and at that extremity are violence and indiscriminate passion.

The play does not so much tell us but show us that these are what we want. It is the audience who finally approve, with their laughter and applause, the actions of the characters. I do not mean to suggest that we should not laugh and applaud, or that we should become a community of Malvolios, hostile to pleasure. This is a very funny play, and nearly all the characters—certainly including Orsino and Olivia— are enormously appealing. That is just the point. What I am suggesting is this: to delight in the pranks of the revellers is to participate vicariously in a form of Dionysian frenzy; to assent to the ending, to confirm it as a "happy" one, is to embrace the possibility of erotic love as transpersonal and trans-sexual. But the play does not wholeheartedly confirm the value of Saturnalian pleasure; if it is not sentimentalized in production, if festivity is allowed to reach its limits, then the play itself will create an awareness that "what we will" is potentially dark and dangerous.

\section*{Historical Criticism of Twelfth Night: Role Playing and Problems of Identity}

\textbf{J. Dennis Huston}

[Huston outlines a number of "unanswered problems" in Twelfth Night. Among these are the juxtaposition of scenes which take place three months apart, Viola's puzzling reaction to the appearance of her brother, and the lack of any resolution to the matter of Antonio's imprisonment. The critic maintains that these questions arise from the sense of detachment the play creates in its audience by presenting Illyria as a kind of fairy-tale world. Huston goes on to offer a psychological analysis of Viola's masculine disguise, describing it in terms of an "identity crisis" brought about by her belief that her twin brother has died and by her arrival in a foreign land. According to Huston, Viola is reluctant to embrace her sexual identity in this new world and finds a sense of security and "masculine freedom" by adopting the identity of her lost brother.]

One of the most perplexing difficulties confronting a reader of \textit{Twelfth Night}, or any other Shakespearean play, is how to deal with what might be called its residual problems, those testy questions that critical analyses ignore or leave unanswered. Some such problems, indigenous to Shakespearean drama, are really unanswerable. And \textit{Twelfth Night} has its share of these. Partly the condition of Shakespeare's text is to blame. We shall never know, for instance, whether the fourth stanza of Feste's final song is as it should be: there surely Shakespeare's, and Feste's, sense of context is hardly given just representation by the sentence fragment passed on in the text. But, just as surely, conjecture about this problem is essentially fruitless, since the content of the stanza is clear enough without textual emendation. The bed that should be the still, fixed center of a generatively fruitful marriage is instead fractured by the drunk's unproductive activity and, like him, spun out into the unstable perimeter of one-night stands, and falls, in the company of other tosspots.

Partly, too, insoluble problems are a necessary result of the way Shakespeare wrote—swiftly and commercially, so that accuracy of petty detail is sometimes sacrificed to more pressing immediate effects. The contradictory double time scheme in \textit{Twelfth Night} is, as a consequence, neither very noticeable nor very important. It hardly matters that Sebastian and Viola collide spatially when they are temporally almost three months apart. Superficially, they meet at the same time, for Viola has served Orsino during the three months that Sebastian has accompanied Antonio with "not a minute's vacancy" (V.i.98) [quotations from the \textit{Complete Works of Shakespeare}, ed. Hardin Craig (1951)]. Viola is, however, first sent as an emissary to Olivia only three days after her arrival in Orsino's court, and her return journey to that court is interrupted by the scene in which Sebastian takes leave of Antonio after a stay of three months, though the length of this stay is not revealed until we have forgotten its technical impossibility. Shakespeare is not so much anticipating the modern movie technique of the flash-forward as he is sacrificing consistency of detail to thematic effect, by assuring his audience that Sebastian lives, that Olivia's love can find a suitable object, and that all of the intricately interwoven complications of plot are under the guiding and beneficent control of a dramatist who means to bring them eventually to a harmonious conclusion. If in the process he can successfully employ one of his favorite dramatic sleights of hand, double time, that is only further proof of his suprahuman powers as creator.

Mostly, though, unanswered problems in Twelfth Night evolve out of the very nature of the dramatic form itself, with its carefully delimited boundaries of action and character. Such boundaries may appear almost unlimited, as the controversial complexity of a world like Hamlet's proves, but such complexity is the result of carefully controlled exclusion: we do not notice boundaries because we do not look for them. Fascinated by what we see and hear of Hamlet, we forget that what we see and hear of him is all there is. As a consequence, we often ignore problems that the dramatist ignores, although they could never pass unnoticed in real life. We may wonder briefly how Horatio could have remained a month at Elsinore without ever meeting Hamlet, and why everyone in Denmark has conveniently forgotten that Hamlet is the real heir to his father's throne, but we dismiss such queries as quibbles. Shakespeare does not worry about them, so why should we?

There are similar kinds of delitescent boundaries to the action of Twelfth Night. For example, Viola changes her plans for disguise between the time we first see her and the time she arrives at Orsino's court, where she appears as a page, not a eunuch. Her brother likewise alters his purpose after his initial appearance, for although he takes leave of Antonio specifically to go to Orsino's court, he next appears as a casual sight-seer who has apparently put aside all thoughts of count and court. Finally, Olivia could hardly marry Sebastian while confused about his identity, because the error would be exposed during the exchange of vows. Even in his euphoric state of wonder, Sebastian would have to recognize that he was not "Cesario."

But the reader fastidious enough to worry about problems like these must also wonder if he is not perhaps throwing in his lot with the likes of Pope's dunces and digging around in the fertile soil of Shakespeare's plays merely to turn up grubs and worms and bits of hair. Still, the plain fact about grubs and worms is that they often indicate where the soil is richest: trivial problems are not the only ones left unanswered in Twelfth Night. Others more substantial linger and tease us out of thought until, like Malvolio struggling to decode the cryptic content of Maria's letter, we think we glimpse the figure of a grander, yet undisclosed, design. For instance, why is Viola, who is at least once called Sebastian and who has hoped from the first that her brother is not really drowned, so slow to realize that he is in Illyria? And why, when she finally sees him, does she initiate such an unnecessarily long and artificial recognition scene? What happens to Antonio, who is conspicuously ignored in the closing speeches of pardon? How are we to interpret Orsino's insistent desire to see Viola in feminine dress before accepting her as a woman? And finally, as a corollary to this question, we might wonder just how we are supposed to feel about the betrothal of this vain, self-serving Duke to such an energetic and interesting heroine.

These questions do overreach the boundaries of explicit action in Twelfth Night, but the play itself encourages this kind of conjecturing by repeatedly calling forth the Renaissance equivalent of the Verfremdungseffekt. Almost never is the audience allowed to forget that it is watching a play whose world is manufactured out of the shaping imagination of the dramatist. That is why Sebastian first appears so early in the play, even at the cost of temporal consistency; that is why Malvolio, enthralled by Maria's letter, does not notice his boisterous deceivers, who are near enough to hear him clearly as he reads; and that is why Fabian interrupts the gulling of Malvolio to exclaim, "If this were played upon a stage now, I could condemn it as an improbable fiction" (III.iv.140-41). In addition, there are other less obvious, but equally important, promptings to detachment. Riddles and puns are dominant figures of speech in the language of Feste and Viola, who use them in part to signal their detachment from the restrictive roles forced upon them in Illyria. And in the process their detachment is passed on to the audience, which is similarly encouraged to view the action critically from its own, even broader, perspective. Even the playwright's cursory suggestions about the geography of Illyria distance it from actual human experience by locating it somewhere in the middle distance between fairyland and reality.

At first the world of the play seems insulated like the setting of a fairy tale, which, even when its action is supposedly wide-ranging, presents us with a realm that is everywhere the same—ravaged by the same kind of giant, dragon, or wicked stepmother. Here the sea, through its mythical associations with tempest, leviathan, and chaos, laps at the edges of the land and people grounded there, threatening imminent dissolution. It already has robbed this world of considerable masculine force and left its women exposed and isolated. Sebastian has apparently drowned, and Viola is shipwrecked on a strange shore. Olivia's father and brother have died, and while her uncle drowns his days and nights in drink, she is undergoing a sea-change of her own by closing up her house and heart in order to "water once a day her chamber round / With eye-offending brine" (I.i.29-30). Even the ruling Duke is figuratively paralyzed by a love that, like the sea, swallows all that it encounters.

This world, too, seems characterized by the psychological simplicity of the bedtime story, where human motives are transparent and actions exaggerated. The Duke cares for nothing but his love or love; Olivia has resolved to honor her brother's memory by shutting herself off from the sun for seven years; and her uncle just as foolishly insulates himself against an outside world of time and responsibility by drunkenly obliterating all distinctions between late and betimes. Then there is Viola—orphaned, shipwrecked, and washed up on a strange shore—clearly an identifiable personage from fairy tale: she is the quester, the young, untested hero of uncertain origins who has come to rejuvenate the wasteland and heal its languishing, impotent ruler. To emphasize her apparently mythical role, Shakespeare makes her introduction as simply direct as "once upon a time" and her motivation as transparent as fairyland love: "What country, friends, is this? . . . Who governs here? . . . Orsino! I have heard my father name him: / He was a bachelor then" (I.ii.1, 24, 28-29). Then, further identifying her with the questing hero, Shakespeare dresses her as a young man and sends her to court, in both senses of the word.

But as the action of the play moves inland from the sea, situation and motivation become much more complicated, and the sharp outlines of the fairy-tale world dissolve. In its place appear the vague perimeters of the realm on the other side of Illyria from the sea. There men do not open their arms and gates to shipwrecked strangers; they shut them tightly for fear of knaves and thieves. There revelers who drink through the night cannot forever playfully catch the sounds of morning by claiming to be up betimes: they must eventually confront the jarring dissonances of the morning after the night before. And there marriage is not the promise of joy lived happily ever afterwards; it is a perilous undertaking which all too often ends in misunderstanding and sorrow. This world on the other side of Illyria is less well known to the characters than to the audience, which, after all, inhabits it daily and has come to the play partly in flight from its wind and rain. But the play will not let the audience forget it altogether; Feste is there to remind it that such a world indelibly marks the souls of those who have been there, even if they can regularly return to the realm of imagination and play. Like the audience, Feste is thus a participant in two worlds. And, also like it, he enters and exits from the realm outside Illyria.

At his entrance the first thing we hear of him is that he has been away, and his habitual detachment from the action of the play suggests that the world he has been visiting still has him partly in its grasp. There he has learned that language shifts meaning according to context and that, as a result, boundaries are no longer distinct: "That that is is" (IV.ii.17) at one time, but at another "Nothing that is so is so" (IV.ii.9). Like language, then, philosophy becomes for Feste a cheveril glove that can be turned at will to conceal wear and tear; from almost all that goes on around him he maintains a measure of detachment. Only once in the drama is he so completely drawn into an action that he does not manage to retain a degree of aloofness from it: he mistakes Sebastian for Viola-Cesario. And then his error may signal a confusion of identity that belongs as much to psychological complexity and the realm of the audience as to dramatic irony and the world of Illyria.
Feste's exit, though, is even more obviously out from Illyria into the world of the audience. In his closing lyric he sings of experience removed from, but relevant to, that of the play. Here also we are presented with fool's play, a closed house, revelry, and marriage, but what we are given is really the underside—or, in the spatial terms suggested by the play, the other side—of the human experience depicted in the drama. For Feste's talk of closed houses that remain locked up against outsiders, of revelry followed by collapse, and of marriage blighted by the failure of expectation can perhaps be taken as a comment upon the apparently harmonious resolution of the plot. At the very least, the song encourages speculation about a conclusion where closed houses are opened up and revelry is ceremonialized in multiple marriages, and where in the process so many troublesome questions are left unanswered.

Finally, a further complication to the original simplicity of story line and character is presented by the entrance of Sebastian, whose manner and dress resemble Viola's and whose situation is almost an exact parallel to hers: saved by a ship captain and lamenting the loss of his twin, he sets out to seek his fortune at Orsino's court. Now suddenly there are two questing heroes spawned by the same sea, appraised in the same clothes, and bound for the same court. And now too the problems facing the audience, as well as the Illyrians, are compounded almost fourfold, for with Sebastian's introduction come also the knotty questions of Viola's reluctance to admit him living to her consciousness, double time, Antonio's captivity, and Orsino's insistence on redressing his page before acknowledging her identity as woman. Sebastian's presence is no doubt dramatically necessary, since he is needed to satisfy Olivia, but for her a man like Antonio might have served just as well: all that is really necessary is someone radically different from the languishing Orsino. Why then bring on Sebastian? Shakespeare is not inalterably bound to use twins just because his source does. Once early in his dramatic career he added a set of twins to a plot borrowed from Plautus; here he might just as easily have taken one away and avoided some of the dramatic problems precipitated by Sebastian's appearance. But of course he never meant to avoid them, because what surely drew him to the story in the first place was the very presence of the twins; it is one of the few details in the source he does not alter.

Since the time of the Roman theater, separated twins have provided the dramatist with a wealth of ready-made possibilities for comedy nourished by misunderstanding and mistaken identity, and Shakespeare was hardly one to throw away a dramatic formula of proven worth. But the real reason he may have chosen to retain the twins from the source story has to do with mistaken—or uncertain—identity in a more complex way, for in this respect, as in so many things, he apparently anticipated some of the discoveries of modern psychology. Or if he did not actually anticipate them, he at least created a dramatic world expansive enough to hold them in suspension. For a moment let me, like Feste, enter the world of Twelfth Night from the side weathered by wind and rain.

One of the foremost concerns of modern psychoanalytic study—for theorists as radically different as R. D. Laing and Erik Erikson—is with problems of identity. "The patient of today," Erikson writes, [in Childhood and Society (1963)] "suffers most under the problem of what he should believe in and who he should—or, indeed, might—be or become. . . The study of identity, then, becomes as strategic in our time as the study of sexuality was in Freud's time." Erikson suggests that modern man can expand his understanding of this problem by studying its manifestations in history, for in singular moments man's struggle with identity, if he is such a man as Luther or Gandhi, has unleashed forces of immeasurable creativity and reshaped his world. But Erikson does not draw his examples of identity crises from history alone. He finds them also in art, and particularly in Shakespeare's tragedies, which give us remarkably lifelike accounts of man's struggle to understand and fulfill his sense of identity. The most obvious example is Hamlet. For surely what Hamlet experiences as he struggles to integrate his remembrance of things past with a present time that seems out of joint is, in the language of contemporary psychology, an acute identity crisis. Repeatedly he reaches out for an identity that just as repeatedly dissolves before his self-lacerating violence:

What a piece of work is a man! . . .
And yet, to me, what is this quintessence of dust?
(II.ii.314-22)

O, what a rogue and peasant slave am I!
(II.ii.576)

To be, or not to be: that is the question. . .
(III.i.56)

What should such fellows as I do crawling between earth and heaven?
(III.i. 130-32)

Shakespeare's interest in problems of identity is not restricted to his tragic drama, however. It is also recognizable as a concern in his comedies, where many of the problems that rack Hamlet are filtered through a different mode and mood. For instance, Shakespeare's comic heroines are often, like Hamlet, fatherless: Viola and Portia have lost their fathers to death, Rosalind has seen hers banished, and Beatrice and Helena are conspicuously fatherless in dramatic worlds where fathers play important roles. Sometimes, also like Hamlet, these heroines are called to answer the intransigent demands of their fathers' decrees: Hermia must wed Demetrius or choose between death and a nunnery, and Kate must marry if ever she is to escape endless unflattering comparisons with her sister. Portia's situation is most obviously like Hamlet's; the charge impressed by her father upon her comes from beyond the grave. Cut loose from a childhood identity secured by paternal protection, these heroines, also like the Danish Prince, soon discover the vulnerability of their newly exposed positions: Rosalind is banished under threat of death, Helena is abandoned in the enchanted wood, and Viola is stranded upon a strange shore.

In such a position Hamlet depends upon disguise to protect himself against violation of either the physical or psychological kind, and the heroines do the same thing. Most often they hide their sex, both literally and figuratively, behind the disguise of a page, with at least a twofold purpose. First, the disguise protects them from sexual attack; second, it secures for them a physical freedom that is the complementary corollary to their sudden vulnerability: without a father each is also without a circumscribed identity as a child and thus free to venture out into the broader world of adult responsibility and ultimately to choose a husband. Sometimes the disguise that these heroines wear is not consciously assumed, but even then it bespeaks a desire to enjoy the freedom associated with adulthood, particularly with the masculine role in the adult world. Kate and Beatrice do not actually dress themselves as young men; they just become masculinely independent and aggressive—by openly rebelling against the conventional feminine behavior expected of them.

No doubt there are other interesting similarities between the experiences of Hamlet and many of Shakespeare's heroines. Both undergo physical journeys that are related to psychological transportations; both are complemented by friends, often traveling companions, who speak for more socially conventional attitudes; and both experience setbacks in love which encourage doubt about the faithfulness, and ultimately about the very identity, of the loved one. To point out such similarities is not to argue that Shakespeare's comic heroines are really like Hamlet. Between them there is a world of difference: the difference between a comic and a tragic universe, between recreative psychic play and constrictive psychic paralysis, and, finally, between life and death. What is important about these similarities, from my point of view, is that they testify to Shakespeare's abiding concern with different forms of identity crisis. One such crisis is depicted in Twelfth Night, and it begins with Viola, stranded upon the shore.

Behind her is the sea of lost identity, which has washed away the foundations of her previous existence. Gone is her childhood tie to family, for her father is dead, her mother never to be heard of, and her brother apparently drowned. Gone too is Messaline, country of her birth, now so insulated by the perilous sea of experience that she cannot even think of returning there. Her world lies all before her, in thoughts of marriage.
and fulfilled sexual identity: "Orsino! I have heard my father name him: / He was a bachelor then" (I.ii.28-29).

It is not by accident that she remembers her father as she thinks of Orsino, for she is in the process of turning from the security of parental protection to the uncertainty of sexual affection; but because the world of sexuality is also associated with pain and death—as Feste's first puns about hanging and Viola's later ones about dying emphasize—Viola is reluctant to commit herself completely to this new world. Her thoughts stray from Orsino to the softer figure of Olivia: "O that I served that lady / And might not be delivered to the world, / Till I had made mine own occasion mellow . . ." (I.ii.41-43). But occasion is not altogether under her control—Olivia will admit no kind of suit—and Viola is forced back to her original idea. She resolves to serve the Duke, though not yet with a clearly defined sexual identity. At first she thinks that she can obliterate all sexual considerations by appearing to Orsino as a eunuch; but once within his sphere of influence, she may sense that sexlessness is impossible and, still uncertain about the consequences of her female identity, adopts the disguise of a page to secure a measure of freedom and mobility. But what Viola is also doing by donning this disguise is providing herself with freedom in its manifestation as time.

In Shakespeare's Festive Comedy (1959), C. L. Barber made us aware of how important the concept of holiday is to Shakespearean comedy as a whole, where dramatic worlds often mirror the freedom of festival time when traditional rules are overturned and restrictions abandoned. But this kind of freedom is not limited to Shakespeare's dramatic universe in general; it may also find expression in the psyches of particular characters: an unloosening of bonds without may be matched by an equivalent unloosening of bonds within, and for similar reasons. In a time of revelry the state buys long-term obedience at the cost of short-term license; in the process of play the psyche often does the same thing, by temporarily putting away its usual restraints. The purpose of such a psychic holiday is obvious: it gives rein to impulses and energies in the psyche that might otherwise build to explosive proportions, and at the same time it allows for experimentation with, and maturation of, developing forms of identity.

In the development of the integrated human personality, modern psychoanalytic study suggests, the most important such psychic holiday occurs during adolescence. Erikson calls it a "psychosocial moratorium" and describes its crucial importance to adolescent girls:

> woman's life too contains ... a sanctioned period of delay of adult functioning. The maturing girl. . . may venture into "outer space" with a bearing and a curiosity which often appears hermaphroditic if not outright "masculine." A special ambulatory dimension is thus added to the inventory of her spatial behavior . . . the young girl tries out a variety of possible identifications with the phallic-ambulatory male.

What is most interesting about this analysis, from my perspective, is its relevance to Viola. Here is an account of psychic development that includes newly acquired freedom, adventure into a realm formerly unknown, uncertain sexual identity with a tendency toward hermaphroditic and masculine behavior, and experimentation with a variety of identifications—all important components of Viola's experience in Illyria. Much of the action of Twelfth Night can thus be viewed as the depiction of an adolescent identity crisis in Viola, who is struggling with the problems of transition from childhood to adulthood. And, as if to focus attention on this crisis, Shakespeare has compounded it by putting Viola in an isolated position, where she cannot turn back to parental guidance for help. She is, in short, subjected to the tyranny of freedom; liberated from her past, she must play out different roles in order to discover what her mature identity is to be in the future: to discover who she is, she has to discover also who she is not.

First she attempts to put problems of sexuality aside by proclaiming herself a eunuch, but that plan is apparently rejected as soon as she gets close enough to discover that sexual impulses cannot be negated merely by proclamation. It is an idea that Shakespeare used twice before as the starting point for comedy—in Love's Labour's Lost and The Taming of the Shrew—and would use again with more serious overtones in Measure for Measure. Here, however, it is passed over quickly in Viola's experience because it is going to be given much more thorough treatment in the characterization of Olivia.

The next role that Viola assumes, and is least inclined to put away at the end, is the one obviously associated with her disguise. It is what Erikson, in talking about the adolescent female in general, calls her "identifications with the phallic-ambulatory male"—ambulatory because she tries out the freedom of movement that society generally denies young women, phallic because such freedom and mobility enable her to penetrate into realms of experience previously unknown. In her disguise as a young man Viola is free to move first from the seashore to the court and then back and forth between the court and Olivia's house. In addition, the increasingly phallic nature of her activity in this disguise is suggested by the progression from her penetration by stealth into Orsino's court, through her more obvious verbal and psychological assault of Olivia, to her blatant confrontation of Sir Andrew with the ultimately phallic weapon, the sword. Of course both Sir Andrew and Viola assume their roles as duelists with the greatest reluctance because they are, finally, not fitted to their usurped masculine attire. Though for obviously different reasons, each is inadequately equipped to deal with the manifold social, sexual, and psychological responsibilities of mature masculine identity. But each can discover his inadequacies only by playing out his assumed role to its inevitable conclusion.

Viola must do so because her initial freedom is accompanied by a concomitant confusion of sexual identity. Partly this is a result of conflicts attending her situation in general, for confusion of sexual identity is a common problem for a young woman trying to decide who and what she is, and will become. During such time, Erikson writes [in Identity, Youth and Crisis], "the young person does not feel himself clearly to be a member of one sex or the other," and she may as a consequence experiment with a variety of sexual identities. But mostly Viola's confusion of identity results from the fact that she is a twin. Since she and Sebastian, as twins, together constitute "A natural perspective, that is and not" (V.i.224)—an apparent singleness of identity within a doubleness of form—her sense of self must necessarily include a sense of other self that is her brother. Thus when he is apparently lost, she faces the psychic extinction of debilitating inaction. In almost her first speech Viola describes the feeling of paralysis that threatens to accompany the loss of her brother; without him she wonders if she can do anything: "And what should I do in Illyria? / My brother he is in Elysium" (I.ii.3-4). As a woman, then, she may imagine herself psychically incomplete, because her female identity does not take adequate account of her missing male counterpart. Perhaps to compensate for this feeling, Viola attempts to integrate Sebastian's masculinility into her own personality: she dons his clothes and moves with the freedom characteristic of a young man. She does not, however, like her forerunner in the source story, assume her brother's name, because she is not trying to obliterate her own feminine identity; she is not trying to become Sebastian. Instead, her intention is to secure for herself a temporary psychic holiday in order to try out various modes of behavior before settling on the finality of adult commitment. She does not understand the action in these terms, but the language of delay appears recurrently in her thoughts:

O that I served that lady
And might not be delivered to the world,
Till I had made mine own occasion mellow,
What my estate is!
(I.ii.41-44)

What else may hap to time I will commit;
Only shape thou thy silence to my wit.
(I.ii.60-61)

O time! thou must untangle this, not I;
It is too hard a knot for me to untie!
(II.ii.41-42)
In her choice of name Viola emphasizes the tenuousness of her position, because "Cesario" suggests, among other things, premature birth, delivery into a world before the attainment of full growth. Whether its sound also suggests Arion on the sea, and thereby Sebastian as he is described by Viola's nameless ship captain, is a matter of conjecture. Such a suggestion, though, would underscore the idea that Viola, in putting on her disguise as Cesario, is attempting to integrate aspects of Sebastian's personality into her own. It might also help to explain why Viola is later so reluctant to recognize Sebastian as an entity unto himself. Having lived so long with him as part of her personality, she may be unconsciously hesitant to admit him to the outside world again, partly because he will then no longer be under her psychic management and partly because his reappearance signals the end to her period of play: she must then put away her masculine usurped attire, and with it a mobility and masculine freedom that she will never know again.

It is no wonder that she may experience this kind of unconscious reaction to surrendering her masculine freedom, since the only clearly feminine role she tries on as Cesario is hardly more suited to her developing sexual identity than the role of eunuch. And, like her identity as eunuch, its expression is confined to language, not action. The role is that of the silent, passive, long-suffering female, and it significantly involves time, not as delay for the germination of action, but as permanent entrapment in inaction and grief:

My father had a daughter loved a man,
she pined in thought,
And with a green and yellow melancholy
She sat like patience on a monument,
Smiling at grief.

Viola may be silent about her love for Orsino—though in moments like this one she no doubt hopes he will penetrate her disguise—but she hardly sits like patience on a monument. Instead, she counters her sorrow with the almost constant activity in "outer space" that goes with her disguise as a young man. In this respect she provides a marked contrast to other characters in the play who respond to love by various kinds of withdrawal. For instance, Olivia first expresses her love for her dead brother by withdrawing into her house and closing out even the sun. Then later, when she has decided to put aside her mourning veil, she sends a servant after Cesario and bids him come to her, where they may confer in private. Even her courtship of Sebastian is essentially an act of withdrawal: what she really wants to do with her lover-husband is lock him up within her own private inner space—in her house, in her church, in her bedroom, and ultimately in her body. But during such withdrawal she at least admits another person, even if her union with him is constrictively possessive. Orsino and Malvolio cannot do even that, because their idea of love is really just a form of self-involvement. Their erotic fantasies leave no room for another person—only for a self-generated image of that person. As a result, each ultimately calls for the absolute privacy of autistic isolation. "I myself am best / When least in company" (I.iv.37-38), Orsino assures his servants, while Malvolio, as is his habit, is a good deal blunter: "let me enjoy my private" (III.iv.99). Shakespeare's pun here—it is surely his and not Malvolio's—is also instructive because it emphasizes the kind of adolescent constrictiveness that logically results from such a self-serving approach to love. Like Malvolio's other Freudian slip about winding his watch and "play [ing] with my—some rich jewel" (II.v.66), it directs us to the essentially masturbatory nature of his, and Orsino's, withdrawal. Locked in the love of vain, self-generated images, each experiences figuratively what it is Malvolio's misfortune to endure literally; imprisonment in darkness with only the self for company.

Malvolio's imprisonment, though, does more than draw attention to his and the Duke's limitations as lovers; it also gives explicit dramatic expression to a motif of implicit thematic importance throughout: entrapment. Few characters in Twelfth Night escape imprisonment of one kind or another. The most obvious victims besides Malvolio are Viola's rescuer and Antonio, who are locked forever in the limbo of indefinite incarceration. Before the ship captain can be released, Malvolio has to be relocated and pacified; before Antonio can be freed, he must be pardoned by Orsino. Neither captive is in an enviable position, for Malvolio’s promise of revenge attests to an uncompromising bitterness hardly compatible with the reconciliations characteristic of comic resolutions, and Orsino’s failure to grant Antonio pardon is almost as conspicuous as the silence of Duke Antonio in the last scene of The Tempest. Both may be versions in the comic mode of Iago’s "From this time forth I never will speak word" (Othello V.ii.304), an intransigent refusal to communicate with those whose values one cannot accept. Whether the audience is supposed to be consciously aware of such problems is a debatable question, though surely some measure of awareness is generated by the Duke’s order to pursue Malvolio and by Antonio’s presence on the stage. What cannot be denied, however, is the fact that such problems focus attention on other examples of imprisonment, both voluntary and involuntary, in the play.

Olivia is for a time locked in her house, while Sebastian is confined first at Antonio’s and then at Olivia’s. Sir Andrew and Sir Toby, rebelling against the confinement of Olivia’s exaggerated mourning plan, become imprisoned in another kind of excess as the monotonous circularity of their early-morning catch suggests. Orsino and Malvolio, each in his own special way, are trapped in self-generated, autistic love. Even Feste and Viola, who are the most mobile of Illyria’s inhabitants, are ultimately constricted by their Illyrian dress. The Fool, continually forced to adjust to the tastes of his superiors, faces as the price of possible failure the ultimate form of constriction: "my lady will hang thee for thy absence" (I.v.3-4). And Viola, who first dons the disguise of Cesario in order to secure a greater measure of freedom, finds that disguise ever more restricting until at last it threatens her with both confinement and self-annihilation: "Cesario, husband, stay" (V.i.146).

Such suggestions of entrapment qualify the happiness of the resolution. In a world so marked by constriction, marriage may also appear as another form of imprisonment, particularly when it is entered upon in such haste and for such foolish reasons. Olivia does not even know the name of her husband, Sir Toby has married Maria to repay her for gulling Malvolio, and Orsino is betrothed to Viola because he liked her when she was a boy. To the end his concerns are with surface judgments and self-generated images of the loved one: before recognizing Viola as a woman he must see her in feminine dress, and even then his intention is to make her his fancy’s queen. Perhaps as testimony to the precariousness of this union, to the violence that can at any moment transform Orsino’s totalitarian commitment from love to hate, is the figure of Antonio, whose faithful, vigorous love has not, like Viola’s, been at last rewarded by Orsino’s grace. Antonio’s fate, we know, can become hers if the outlines of her character do not match the figures of Orsino’s fancy: "Why should I not, had I the heart to do it, / Like to the Egyptian thief at point of death, / Kill what I love?" (V.i.120-22). Momentarily the energies of such potential violence threaten the apparent order of the resolution, but they are quickly pushed back down beneath the surface of things by the happy ending. In Viola’s action, however, there is perhaps some evidence of uncertainty. She ignores Antonio, as if she were afraid to recognize what his presence at her betrothal means. More noticeably, she seems to draw out the recognition scene with her brother interminably, as if, reluctant to discard her disguise, she were luxuriating for a few last, precious moments in the play world of masculine freedom. She talks about putting on her woman’s weeds, but about this problem there is more than the necessary amount of talk, and less than the necessary amount of action. Then, at the end, she is strangely silent, as if she were fondly remembering all that is past. She might, though, for all we know, be joyfully anticipating the future and her role as Orsino’s fancy’s queen. If so, we wish her luck; but we cannot share her optimism, because we remember that Twelfth Night marks the conclusion of revelry and is always succeeded, as Feste reminds us, by a long season of wind and rain.

Historical Criticism of Twelfth Night: Language and Communication

Ralph Berry

[Berry contends that the action in Twelfth Night centers on acts of communication—formal messages being sent and received. Most of these, in the critic's view, are not "true" communication: Olivia's message to Orsino in the first act, for example, is really an announcement to herself of her intention to continue mourning her brother. The letter that fools Malvolio is another instance of a message that fails to convey truth. In contrast, the critic describes Malvolio's message to Olivia from his confinement as the single act of true communication in the play.]

The burden of the theme of fantasy and reality is entrusted to a particular device: the message. The action of Twelfth Night is in great part the business, literal and symbolic, of communication. Each Act sees one or more formal messages—I do not count informal and oral bringing of news. They constitute the archetypal action of the play.

The first scene contains an important message: Olivia to Orsino, a declaration of her absurd vow to mourn her brother for seven years. It is not a true communication, merely the publication of a fantasy; the "message" is a self-to-self statement. The same is true of Orsino's reply to Viola (I, 4); he, too, is announcing his own fantasy: "Surprise her with discourse of my dear faith; / It shall become thee well to act my woes." (1, 4, 24-25) The resonance of "act" is suggestive. Still, the nuncio's function is faithfully carried out by Viola:

I will on with my speech in your praise and then show you the heart of my message. . . . Tell me your mind I am a messenger. (I, 5, 181-2 . . . 194-5)

Viola has the understanding and intelligence for the discharge of her office. Even so, Olivia and Orsino cannot be said to communicate. The matter is repeated with greater emphasis and clarity in II, 4, when Orsino again sends his declaration of love. He is simply not interested in any answer but acceptance.

Viola: But if she cannot love you, sir?
Duke: I cannot be so answered
(II, 4, 86-87)

In other words, he will not accept the realities of the situation. It is a manifesto of noncommunication. Olivia's message to Viola (II, 2) is no more satisfactory. The messenger, Malvolio, has no idea of what is going on, but Viola immediately apprehends the situation: "She loves me sure." (II, 2, 21) The fault lies in the sender, prey to another species of illusion.

The play's main pseudo-message is the letter, supposedly from Olivia to Malvolio. His fantasy has been penetrated, and the "message" is no more than an inflation of his hopes. The scene in which Malvolio discovers the letter is, in addition to its other qualities, pure symbolist drama. The point is that Malvolio goes for a walk in the sun.

Maria: He has been yonder i' the sun practicing behavior to his own shadow this half hour.
(II, 5, 14-15)

And "sun," in the terms of this play, is the associate of folly. Feste makes the connection, to Viola: "Foolery, sir, does walk about the orb like the sun; it shines everywhere." (III, 1, 37-38) The connection is in any case... confirmed by IV, 2 (the structural balance to II, 5, in the design of Twelfth Night), which presents the complementary paradox of reason in darkness. So Malvolio's journey into illusion takes the form of a walk in the sun.

Thus the comic business develops the serious concern of Twelfth Night, the fallibility of human communication. And the variations on this theme continue in Act III, through Sir Andrew's letter to Viola/Cesario. That letter is totally misconceived, a triumph of noncommunication. Sir Andrew has misjudged the situation, the identity of his addressee, his language—and to crown all, his message is not even delivered. His effort ranks with Malvolio's as the non-message of the play. Sir Toby (whose role now contrasts with Viola, the ideal messenger) delivers orally two lying messages, to Viola and Sir Andrew. Their purpose is merely deception. But Sir Toby's view of the essence of correspondence has already been made plain in his advice to Sir Andrew in III, 2: the key word is "lies." (III, 2, 40)

That is as far as Twelfth Night can go in its variations on failure of communication. The remainder of the play shows a struggling toward the light. Act IV, 2 is the critical scene. It reveals a Malvolio purged of fantasy, and striving only to make contact with the realities of the world. Matched with the sunfilled garden of II, 5, the cell completes the pairing of symbolist scenes. The darkness that figures ignorance—a form of illusion—closes about Malvolio, but his mind is clear:

> Malvolio: I am not mad, Sir Topas I say to you this house is dark.
> Clown: Madman, thou errest. I say there is no darkness but ignorance, in which thou art more puzzled than the Egyptians in their fog.
> Malvolio: I say this house is as dark as ignorance, though ignorance were as dark as hell; and I say there was never man thus abused. I am no more mad than you are. Make the trial of it in any constant question

Malvolio's attempts to penetrate the darkness are obstructed by the clown's feignings. But Malvolio has regained a human dignity, that of a man as disciplined guardian of his faculties. His language is controlled and just: "I think nobly of the soul and in no way approve his opinion." (IV, 2, 54-55) And he has, at last, a full grasp of the priorities of human needs. "Good fool, some ink, paper, and light; and convey what I will set down to my lady." (IV, 2, 106-108) The light of reason, a just message to compose, and the means of communication, he can command. The clown cannot refuse his cooperation.

And this message, from Malvolio to Olivia, is the apotheosis of the final Act. It is the message of a man in full possession of his senses and the situation; it is mediated, not by the clown (his tone, as he himself seems to feel, would be wrong) but by the nondescript and "neutral" Fabian; it finds an understanding audience, both the Duke ("This savors not much of distraction," V, 1, 304) and Olivia, "He hath been most notoriously abused." (V, 1, 368) Malvolio's letter has the distinction of being—of all the formal messages in Twelfth Night—the only true communication. It is the only occasion in the play when the human mind, unencumbered by fantasy, reaches out toward another human mind and finds its message fairly delivered, understandingly received, and answered. All the other messages are deceptions or self-illusions.

The principals, however, are not compelled to face reality in the same way as Malvolio. Orsino, the premier fantasist, merely switches faces in his image of the dream-woman. His first impulse on learning of Viola's sex is "let me see thee in thy woman's weeds" (V, 1, 265); and the unabashed auto-eroticism of his humor is underscored in his final words to Viola: "But when in other habits you are seen, / Orsino's mistress and his fancy's queen." (V, 1, 376-377) For "fancy," read "fantasy." His last line is a poised, ambiguous phrase. Will Viola control his fantasy, or embody it? One cannot prophesy. Olivia, too, is doubtless well off with the sensible Sebastian, but the "most extracting frenzy of mine own" (V, 1, 273) testifies to her susceptibility to the caprice of passion. As for the others, Sir Andrew's fantasy is ended. He had rather than forty pound he were at home; the phrase is a calculated multiplication of his earlier desire to exchange forty shillings for the trappings of folly. (II, 3, 18-19) His anagnorisis is to hear the truth from Sir Toby: "Will you help? An ass-head and a coxcomb and a knave, a thin-faced knave, a gull?" (V, 1, 198-199) We do not know his reactions; the audience will be able to savor his horrified face; but that truth, as with others in the play, must continue to fester. Sir Toby himself has married Maria "In recom pense thereof . . ." (V, 1, 354), and in view of Maria's talents and shrewishness one is inclined to regard "recompense" as a pregnant word.

And there remains Malvolio. Here, I think, the critics have overcompensated. We have been told with considerable frequency of late years that one ought not to feel at all sorry for him, that he deserved all he got, that Elizabethan audiences would have laughed at his final disgrace, and that compassion is a nineteenth century invention anyway. No doubt all this is true. Elizabethan audiences, like modern ones, can never have been lacking in those who find only the most exquisite humor in the final "I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you." But I don't think it really matters whether one feels sorry for Malvolio, or not. The point, surely, is that he is there. Malvolio is an unassimilable element, a part of what is conceived to be the structure of comedy, that refuses to participate in the final dance. That dance is a gavotte of the realists coolly taking on the fantasists; it is scarcely the "communal integration" of the sentimentalists. The "golden time" that Orsino speaks of sounds hollowly.

The play as a whole is a masterly exposition of theme through device, that is to say of form. If we agree that the theme of Twelfth Night is reality and illusion, then this theme, obviously, is expressed through disguise, deception, and error. But the action of Twelfth Night, as I have shown, consists of a succession of pseudo-messages, products of the world of illusion. And it incorporates two scenes of startling theater, in which Malvolio receives, and sends, a message. At these points, the scenes of sunlight and of darkness, the symbolism of the drama becomes overt. Yet they are only the most compelling manifestation of an action that, in Shakespeare's way, is always reaching toward symbolism. The literal events generate their further meanings.

The form of Twelfth Night, as I maintain, should govern our interpretation. The open-ended invitation of the subtitle is no reason for disregarding the structure of the play. Its atmosphere one can in part ascribe to a particular production, and this will vary very greatly. Yet I think W. H. Auden [in The Dyer's Hand, 1962] is right to sense the "inverted commas around the 'fun.'" This stems from the nature of the action, and the questions left in the air concerning the principals. Exposure to reality has, in different ways, involved pain for the "comic" characters; Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, and Malvolio. But for Orsino and Olivia, the ending is illusion condoned. To speak of "unmasking" is surely misleading, for they have begun neither to understand nor confront their problems; nor need they. The cynicism of Twelfth Night lies in its acceptance of the truths that fantasy need not bring unhappiness, not exposure to reality happiness. The preoccupation with illusion and reality, madness and sanity, wisdom and folly, points unmistakably toward King Lear. The synthesis of theme and device could not be repeated within the genre of comedy.

Elizabeth M. Yearling

[Yearling contends that in Twelfth Night, language communicates truth, despite the play's deliberate deceptions and wordplay. Choice of language helps to convey a sense of character: Viola's ability to adapt to changing circumstances, for example, is reflected in her speech, which varies from courtly compliments to "rude jargon" depending on to whom she is speaking. Sir Toby mixes colloquial expressions with elaborate language, reflecting his "disorder" as a knight with questionable habits. Malvolio, even when he is alone, chooses pretentious words, reflecting his egotism. Yearling goes on to show how language supports a thematic contrast of the play: throughout Twelfth Night, characters abruptly switch from elaborate, indirect speech to short, direct, action-focused sentences, reflecting the contrast between the make-believe world of
By the late sixteenth century, it had become fashionable to decry eloquence and to praise plain, unassuming style. But theory has to be tested in practice. The greatest practitioner of the period, Shakespeare, had been to be a playwright, and drama, where the author does not directly address readers or audience, has its special problems. The dramatist needs many styles, not just one plain style. He can allow his villains to exploit deceptive words, but he must also find words for his heroes and heroines, who usually need to speak more than Cordelia's "nothing." He cannot embark on a diction which expresses the essence of things. Spenser's technique is a matter for the study, often—as with his spelling—for eye rather than ear. Shakespeare has to find ways of communicating truth which are more complex than any theoretical straightforward relationship of word and subject-matter.

His problems are aired—semi-seriously—in Twelfth Night. Half-way through the play, Viola and Feste meet and jest about words and meaning (3.1.1-60). The significance of their exchange is uncertain. T. W. Craik writes [in the Preface to Twelfth Night, New Arden, (1975)] that the encounter sounds like "a warming-up after a theatrical interval." Yet this is the only meeting between Shakespeare's heroine and his fool. Their quibbling shows the two-facedness of words. Feste comments on how quickly "the wrong side" of a sentence "may be turned outward." His own punning on Viola's description of words as "wanton"—"equivocal"—turns to absurdity the idea that words equal things. He worries about his sister's name since "her name's a word, and to dally with that word might make my sister wanton." He uses his theory that "words are very rascals" to avoid justifying his opinion, for "words are grown so false, I am loath to prove reason with them." The debate itself embodies the slipperness of words, and the confusion is compounded when Feste admits to being Olivia's "corrupter of words." His trade is to use words deceptively, and what he says cannot be trusted. Shakespeare makes it difficult to take the scene seriously.

Yet often in Twelfth Night he shows words to be frivolous, conventional, or false. Apart from Feste's comments there is Olivia's remark about the poetical being "the more like to be feigned" (1.5.197) [quotations from New Arden Shakespeare (1975)]. Occasionally characters use words as mere decoration. The most blatant example is Sir Andrew, who stores useful vocabulary such as the "odours," "pregnant," and "vouchsafed," of Viola's greeting to Olivia (3.1.92). Feste punctures words which he finds swollen. "Vent thy folly somewhere else," Sebastian snaps incautiously, and is punished by some sarcastic variations on "vent" which must cure him of the verb (4.1.10-17). Feste's mockery can conceal further jokes. To Viola he remarks, "who you are and what you would are out of my welkin. I might say 'element', but the word is overworn" (3.1.58-60). "Welkin" too is an old-fashioned, poetic word. The overworn noun "element" is used by several characters, from Viola to Malvolio. A time-bomb has been set for Malvolio's pompous "I am not of your element" (3.4.125).

But tired or inflated vocabulary brings us to one of the play's complexities. A rich source of chiche was the language of compliment, the store of polite but often insincere coutesies which came naturally to the well-bred but had to be taught to the uncourtly in manuals which suggested the right phrases for wooing and suing. And it is the heroine who is the play's main speaker in this fossilized, conventional style. Olivia rejects Viola's address.

Cesario is your servant's name, fair princess.

Olivia.
My servant, sir? 'Twas never merry world
Since lowly feigning was called compliment:
Y'are servant to the Count Orsino, youth.

She could also have criticized the fashionable epithet, "fair."
Viola justified her use of "servant" by explaining the word literally:

And he is yours, and his must needs be yours.

The sentence Viola turns into a neat excuse was still paraded as a compliment half-way through the century, in Philomusus's The Academy of Compliments (1646): "Sir, I am the servant of your servants" (p. 74). And Viola's "vouchsafed," so admired by Sir Andrew, is something of an affectation. The verb "vouchsafe" means "grant in a condescending manner" and was appropriate between subject and monarch but less fitting in other relationships. Its use is mocked as over-deferential by many Elizabethan and Jacobean dramatists. Much of Viola's language, especially to Olivia, is affected, courtly, artificial, not the style we expect of a Shakespearian heroine. But Shakespeare exploits this conventional speech brilliantly. In act 1, scene 5, Viola's speeches in praise of Olivia are full of stock poetic phrases: "red and white," "cruell'st she alive," "sighs of fire," "call upon my soul," "contemned love" (11. 242-80). She borrows the standard phraseology of the sonnet-writers. But she also mocks herself. She worries about whether she is speaking to the right woman, and claims she is anxious to complete her penned speech. The scene turns on Viola's semi-serious use of conventional vocabulary and images, her knowledge of what she is doing, and our share in that knowledge. Yet there is more. The stereotyped language conveys a considerable depth of feeling. "'Tis beauty truly blent" is a genuine appreciation of Olivia's beauty and of Viola's task as a rival. "Make me a willow cabin . . ." is a powerful love speech. The strength and truth of feeling make it wrong to concentrate on the cliches and stock motifs, or on the speech's deception. Viola uses words devalued by over-exposure; she speaks them as Cesario, whose existence is illusory, but their emotion convinces. We must add to Olivia's remark that the poetical is "like to be feigned," Touchstone's ambiguous words in As You Like It: "the truest poetry is the most feigning" (3.3.16).

Viola's poetry shows us Shakespeare's success in using falsehood to communicate truth. She deceives Olivia. Yet the audience, though undeceived, receives from the same language a sense of shared and genuine emotion. There is another way in which Viola's words communicate a truth. Her style expresses her nature. She is a linguistic chameleon who adapts her style to her companion. Her vocabulary ranges from courtly compliment to rude jargon (1.5.205). But her variousness is not just verbal: her nature is to deal confidently with sudden changes. And the assumed registers, coupled often with sincere feelings, capture the blend of truth and illusion which Viola represents. It is difficult not to see a convincing personality breaking through the polite fiction which is Cesario. This is most notable in Viola's discussion of love with Orsino in act 2, scene 4, but even the play's less spectacular passages can take us below Cesario's surface. After Antonio, in the belief that she is Sebastian, has interrupted her reluctant duelling, he asks for his money:

Viola.
What money, sir?
For the fair kindness you have show'd me here,
And part being prompted by your present trouble,
Out of my lean and low ability
I'll lend you something
My having is not much;
I'll make division of my present with you.
Hold, there's half my coffer.

(3.4.349-55)

The last line echoes, with an important difference, Antonio's "Hold, sir, here's my purse" (3.3.38). Antonio's was a gift of unqualified generosity to a friend. Viola's is a carefully thought-out loan to a helpful but puzzling stranger. She moves slowly towards the offer. "I'll lend" is preceded by a series of subordinate clauses and phrases outlining her reasons and stressing her poverty. "My having is not much" repeats the content of the line before, and adds to our impression that Viola feels an uncomfortable need to justify herself. Her next speech contrasts in its vehemence. Antonio reminds Viola of his former "kindnesses."

Viola.
I know of none,
Nor know I you by voice or any feature.
I hate ingratitude more in a man
Than lying, vainness, babbling drunkenness,
Or any taint of vice whose strong corruption Inhabits our frail blood.

There is no delay in reaching the point here. The verbs come first, several of them, forcefully stating an immediate reaction. We are persuaded that the speaker is not the illusory Cesario. No courteous surface falsifies these emotions.

Although Twelfth Night includes Feste's scepticism and many instances of verbal folly and deception, Shakespeare's practice encourages a positive belief in the power of words. Character and theme emerge from the nature of the words and the way they are combined. Here we are a little closer to the Platonic theory of names. Several characters in Twelfth Night have an individual vocabulary and syntax. Orsino's relatively short part in the play contains a high proportion of new and often slightly pompous words. In act 1, scene 4, he praises Viola's youthful appearance: "Diana's lip / Is not more smooth and rubious; / And all is semblative a woman's part" (1.31-4). In act 2, scene 4, he contributes "cloyment" to the stodgy line, "That suffers surfeit, cloyment, and revolt" (1.100). Act 5, scene 1 brings more new vocabulary—"baubling" and "un-prizable" describe Antonio's ship (11. 52-3); Olivia, the "marble-breasted" tyrant (1. 122), casts his faith to "non-regardance" (1. 119). New words are common in Orsino's vocabulary, especially words of several syllables ending in suffixes. His syntax is appropriate. Barbara Hardy notes his long sentences and sustained images, characteristics which are marked in the first scene. He uses little colloquial, easy speech.

Sir Toby is an interesting contrast. He also invents long words "substractors" (1.3.34), "consanguineous" (2.3.78), "interceptor" (3.4.224). And his syntax is mannered. He teases Sir Andrew: "Wherefore are these things hid? Wherefore have these gifts a curtain before 'em? Are they like to take dust, like Mistress Mall's picture? Why dost thou not go to church in a galliard, and come home in a coranto?" (1.122-6). The rhetorical questions and repeated "wherefore" are part of a complete repetition of meaning in the first two questions, and there is syntactical balance in the last sentence. Sir Toby likes to put nouns in pairs, which sometimes alliterate: "they are scoundrels and substractors" (1.3.34); "he's a coward and a coistrel" (1.3.40). But Sir Toby's long words and patterned syntax are not enough to elevate his speech. His long words occur in prose, not verse, and their use undercuts their impressiveness: "subtractor" is a nonce-word meaning "detractor" and it sounds like a drunken fumbling for words. Another good word to tumble over is "consanguineous" which is accompanied by a gentle parody of the scholar's habit of pairing foreign imports with simpler words: "Am not I consanguineous? Am I not of her blood?" M. M. Mahood notes that "exquisite" (2.3.142) is "a difficult word for the drunken knights to get their tongues round." The same must be true of Sir Toby's compliment to Maria: "Good night, Penthesilea" (2.3.177). The polysyllables are undermined by being spoken drunkenly, and also by the company they keep, since Sir Toby's speeches contain popular phrases and words of low origin. He is recorded as the first literary user of "bum-baily" (3.4.178), the meanest kind of bailiff, a title which must have been current in the least reputable areas of London. His first words are "What a plague" (1.3.1); he tells Malvolio to "Sneck up!" (2.3.94); he uses the vulgar phrase "call me cut" (2.3.187), and colloquial words such as "coistrel" (1.3.40) He is also the play's most frequent user of the second person pronoun "thou" instead of the more formal "you."
Sir Toby's speech mixes impressive vocabulary and mannered syntax with colloquial words. It reflects his disorder but at the same time a certain openness to experience. Malvolio's language indicates constraint. He introduces fewer new words than either Orsino or Sir Toby, but his mouth is full of pompous phrases and long words without the poetry of Orsino or the colloquialism of Sir Toby. He is at his worst in contemplation, in the letter scene (2.5.23-179). Inflated vocabulary is not simply a public front but is his very nature. "A look round" becomes "a demure travel of regard," "what do these letters mean?" becomes "what should that alphabetical position portend?" Long abstract words abound: "there is no consonancy in the sequel; that suffers under probation." The homelier words of his tirade in act 2, scene 3 are there only to signify his disgust: "Have you no wit, manners, nor honesty, but to gabble like tinkers at this time of night? Do ye make an ale-house of my lady's house, that ye squeak out your coziers' catches without any mitigation or remorse of voice?" (11. 88-92). His style is noun-laden: nouns come in strings or separated by the preposition "of." The change when he woos Olivia (3.4.17-55) is interesting. He is still pompous and noun-obsessed—"this does make some obstruction in the blood"—but he throws in the fashionable word "sweet" and quotes fragments of popular songs: "Please one, and please all," "Ay, sweetheart, and I'll come to thee." Here he uses the familiar "thou," unthinkable from a servant to his lady. The visible changes in appearance and behaviour are accompanied by more subtle changes in his language.

Other characters have personal styles. Sir Andrew, magpie-like, purloins impressive words, misuses long words (5.1.179-80), and tends to echo the speaker before him (1.3.62-3, 2.3.56). Feste parodies his superiors' polysyllables: "I did impeticos thy gratillity" (2.3.27). He demands Olivia's attention to Malvolio's letter with the words "perpend, my princess" (5.1.298), mocking—M. P. Tilley argues—the style of Cambyses [in "Shakespeare and his Ridicule of Cambyses", Modern Language Notes, 24 (1909), 244-7, p. 244]. And he produces nonsense names, "Pigrogromitus" (2.3.23), "Quinapalus" (1.5.33). His verbal whimsy complicates the debate about words. His attacks on words and their falsehood tell us more about Feste than about words.

When we read or hear Twelfth Night we learn about the characters by attending to their vocabulary and syntax. Besides expressing character, the words and sentence structure can also clarify themes. One of the play's contrasts is between holiday and the work-a-day world. Although the title suggests festivity, recent criticism has qualified C. L. Barber's treatment of Twelfth Night as a festive comedy. Many modern critics dwell on the play's melancholy mood, but in more positive opposition to festivity are the characters' working lives. Sir Toby and Sir Andrew hope that life "consists of eating and drinking" (2.3.11-12), but their fellows have more to do. Even Orsino, who has let his dukedom rule itself, at last resumes his function as ruler and magistrate. Viola is kept hard at work, Feste too—and when he is absent without leave he is threatened with dismissal. Malvolio and Maria have duties in Olivia's household, and Olivia has that household to organize (4.3.16-20).

The contrast between holiday and work results in an interesting structural device. There are repeated movements from musing or conversation back to some necessary task. These shifts are embodied in the dialogue, and centre on Viola. It is easy to note the difference between the first scene's languor and the second scene's sense of purpose, but even within scene 2 there is a distinct change of mood. Viola and the Captain discuss her brother's fate and she is encouraged to hope for his safety:

Mine own escape unfoldeth to my hope,
Whereeto thy speech serves for authority,
The like of him.
(1.2.19-21)

The lines are in verse, the first has a formal old-fashioned -eth verb ending, and the object is delayed by a subordinate clause. Viola then switches to practical questions about her present situation: "Know'st thou this country?" "Who governs here?" The crisper -s ending for the third-person verb belongs with the simple questions and short prose lines which contrast with the Captain's verse replies. Viola's interest in what has or may have happened to her brother is superseded by a need to sort out her own affairs, and her style changes correspondingly. She installs herself in Orsino's service. As his attendant she has opportunities for leisurely talk, but she keeps remembering there are things to be done. In act 1, scene 5, she is Orsino's messenger to Olivia. At first she fences with Olivia but she suddenly returns to duty:

Olivia. Are you a comedian?
Viola. No, my profound heart: and yet, by the very fangs of malice
I swear, I am not that I play.
Are you the lady of the house?

Her ambiguity about herself is accompanied by an obscure oath. With her question, the conversation becomes more straightforward, only to hide in wordplay again.

Olivia. If I do not usurp myself, I am.
Viola. Most certain, if you are she, you do usurp yourself:
for what is yours to bestow is not yours to reserve

Viola's quibble is followed by an explanation both antithetical and cryptic. But then she changes to short statement—"But this is from my commission"—and a plain declaration of intent: "I will on with my speech in your praise, and then show you the heart of my message" (1.5.183-92). Similarly her debate with Feste is interrupted by the direct question, "Is thy lady within." Here too the preceding sentence is syntactically more elaborate and plays on words. Feste prays that Jove might send Cesario a beard and Viola replies: "By my troth, I'll tell thee, I am almost sick for one, [Aside] though I would not have it grow on my chin" (3.1.45-9).

In act 2, scene 4, the discussion of love with Orsino, and the story of Cesario's "sister," draw to a close with Viola's

I am all the daughters of my father's house,
And all the brothers too: and yet I know not.

The riddle is couched in repeated phrase-patterns—"all the daughters," "all the brothers"—followed by a virtual aside. After this we are bound to read a meditative pause till Viola sharply changes the subject: "Sir, shall I to this lady?" (2.4.121-3). On each of these occasions brief statements and questions replace more complex syntax, often punning or patterned. Viola delights in conversation and jesting debate but is aware of her present duty.

Other characters move similarly into action. Olivia's style in act 1, scene 5 also involves syntactical contrasts although her questions are misleadingly direct. She lingers over jokes such as the inventory of her beauty, but follows with a pertinent question. "Were you sent hither to praise me?" (1.5.252-3). She continues with what seem to be the same sort of inquiries: "How does he love me?" "Why, what would you?" "What is your parentage?" (11. 258, 271, and 281). She is pursuing what has become important to her, but she has moved from the interview's business—Orsino—to Cesario-Viola, and she stops herself with crisp commands and statements which are more to the immediate purpose.

Get you to your lord
I cannot love him: let him send no more,
Unless, perchance, you come to me again,
To tell me how he takes it. Fare you well:
I thank you for your pains: spend this for me.
(1.5.283-7)
The short clauses emphasize her business-like manner. The syntax is more flowing only in the lines where she provides for a return by Cesario, who distracts her from the task of rejecting Orsino, and she couches these lines in the conditional. The lingering "unless" added to the brusque "let him send no more" captures her feelings. During her second meeting with Viola, Olivia's ears recall her from distracting thoughts.

O world, how apt the poor are to be proud!
If one should be a prey, how much the better
To fall before the lion than the Wolf! [Clock strikes.]
The clock upbraids me with the waste of time.
Be not afraid, good youth, I will not have you,
And yet when wit and youth is come to harvest,
Your wife is like to reap a proper man
There lies your way, due west
(3.1.129-36)

Again complex writing—subordination, apostrophe, extended metaphor—accompanies the musing. Simple statements interrupt it. We may compare with Olivia's "waste of time" the First Officer's short, impatient sentences when his prisoner Antonio procrastinates: "What's that to us? The time goes by. Away!" (3.4.373). These people do not have all the time in the world. Tasks and duties press on them. Even Sebastian, who has nothing in particular to do in Illyria, is not prepared just to stand talking to Antonio. Again the transition is sudden; again questions replace conditionals and balanced phrases.

But were my worth, as is my conscience, firm,
You should find better dealing. What's to do?
Shall we go see the relics of this town?

Note especially "What's to do?" He is later caught up in Olivia's urge to action when she decides to marry him. His meditative speech, "This is the air, that is the glorious sun" (4.3.1 ff.), is cut off by her arrival with a request formed like a command: "Blame not this haste of mine" (4.3.22).

Orsino's resumption of office is the most elaborate change in the speed of action. At last he comes to woo Olivia himself. But before he can talk to her he is brought some work. The officers enter with Antonio, and Orsino's questioning of that "notable pirate" is interrupted by Olivia's arrival. For the audience this is their first meeting. The Duke's reaction is oddly mechanical:

Here comes the Countess: now heaven walks on earth
But for thee, fellow—fellow, thy words are madness
(5.1.95-6)

Orsino's "but" sets the matter in hand against his response to Olivia. Compare these words with the equivalent passage in William Burnaby's eighteenth-century revision of the play. There the Duke has more to say about the woman he loves:

Now Heav'n walks on Earth, and Beauty round Invades us all! Each glance devotes a Slave,
And every step, she treads upon a heart,
All of the Skies, but pitty you have brought.

Burnaby's addition is heavy-handed but shows he was aware that Orsino's brief welcome in the original is a little strange. It could be argued that since Orsino seems more interested in his own moods than in Olivia, he can offer only a commonplace compliment when he actually meets her, and then directs his attention to the Antonio-Cesario conflict which fascinates him. But this is not what happens. Olivia is Orsino's business.
When she appears he is needed as a magistrate and after acknowledging her briskly he returns to his case.
Then, just as briskly, he quashes Antonio's complaint and reserves judgement, so that he can attend to his main concern:

But for thee, fellow—fellow, thy words are madness.
Three months this youth hath tended upon me;
But more of that anon. Take him aside.
(II. 96-8)

Again simple, brusque statements announce Orsino's despatching of business, and another "but" emphasizes the transitions and oppositions of the passage. Soon, Orsino resumes his polysyllables and complex sentences.

The words and syntax of Twelfth Night are interesting for what they say and for what they are. The nature of the characters' vocabulary tells us something about them; the sentence structure also exposes the characters and their moods, and points at thematic oppositions. Even if their surface meaning is deceptive, words can still communicate truthfully. Yet we are also told that words deceive. And here we might note a recurring syntactic pattern which embodies the deceptions of Twelfth Night. Earlier I quoted "I am not that I play" from Viola's first encounter with Olivia. This takes up her request to the Captain, "Conceal me what I am" (1.2.53) and prefigures a cryptic exchange with Olivia in act 3, scene 1:

    Olivia.
    I prithee tell me what thou think'st of me.
    Viola.
    That you do think you are not what you are.
    Olivia.
    If I think so, I think the same of you.
    Viola.
    Then think you right; I am not what I am.
(11. 140-3)

The setting of negative against positive in conjunction with the verb "to be" is repeated at the end of the play when Orsino finds Sebastian and Viola forming "A natural perspective, that is, and is not!" (5.1.215). And it is mocked in Feste's joking: "That that is, is': so, I, being Master Parson, am Master Parson; for what is 'that' but 'that'? and 'is' but 'is'?" (4.2.15-17). In fact here, that that is, is not. Feste is more accurate, but without knowing it, when he tells Sebastian, whom he mistakes for Cesario, "Nothing that is so, is so" (4.1.8-9). The repeated formula captures the confusion of actuality and fiction which these characters experience. Again the syntax tells us a truth while agreeing that words and events themselves can lie.

We cannot be certain about reality and falsehood when the genuine emotion of "My father had a daughter loved a man" can move us so. Shakespeare's achievement with language in Twelfth Night is to encapsulate the conflict of truth and illusion, and to remind us that facts and truth are not necessarily the same, that the truest poetry often is the most feigning.

Historical Criticism of Twelfth Night: Viola and Olivia

Lydia Forbes

[Forbes illustrates Shakespeare's theme of disguise versus self-deception throughout the story of Viola. Viola is presented as a purposeful young woman who sets out to achieve her goal through any means. She recognizes the scope of her abilities and consents to disguise to buy herself time. Likewise, Olivia adopts the veil of mourning to keep Orsino at bay, who spends most of the play lost in self-delusion, and therefore is unsuitable for her. Viola judges Olivia by what she has heard of her and proceeds to romance Olivia in a way that cannot be successful for Orsino. Consequently, Viola's approach to Olivia wins her not to the Duke, but to Viola. The critic maintains that Olivia is a reasonable woman and perceives Viola to be a match for her in independence and wit, yet Olivia confuses Viola and Sebastian because of her deeper intuitive sense. Olivia perceives similar qualities of spirit in both Sebastian and Cesario: Sebastian matches Cesario in integrity, but is as impetuous as Viola is patient.]

. . . The story of the nobly born Viola, disguised as the page boy, "Cesario," is usually considered the principal plot of Twelfth Night. She sets her heart on the Duke Orsino of Illyria, and finally weds him. He is a good man and worthy of her, but temporarily so confused by a romantically far-fetched notion of love that he would not be able to appreciate her in her own feminine dress.

Beside this story we have a series of events engineered by a gentlewoman, Maria, attendant on the Countess Olivia. Maria's aim is to marry Olivia's uncle, Sir Toby Belch. By pretending to gratify Sir Toby's desire to be revenged on the officious steward, Malvolio, Maria succeeds in getting Sir Toby so far out of favor with his niece that he marries Maria in order to remain a member of the household.

Linking these two patterns, the Lady Olivia, as the unresponsive object of Orsino's attentions, moves briskly but with dignity, and an outstanding appreciation of honesty in respect to both the good and the bad.

In the opening scene of the play the audience is regaled with the full exuberance and verbal confusion that deception and self-delusion bring about. It is like a musical opening by Brahms, in which the themes are developed before they are stated. With the second scene, austere and isolated on the seacoast, the premises and the thesis of the play are demonstrated. The sea-captain, who rescues Viola from the shipwreck and brings her ashore in Illyria, describes the country and what he knows of its people. Viola gives us her own measure and his in her famous lines:

There is a fair behavior in thee captain;
    And though that nature with a beauteous wall
    Doth oft close in pollution, yet of thee
    I will believe thou hast a mind that suits
    With this thy fair and outward character.
    (I.ii.45)

While an ironic contrast exists between Viola's speech and her intention to disguise herself, her recognition of her own limitations and her own "fair behavior" after real peril clear the unreal atmosphere of the opening scene, and also put the following extravagances of Sir Toby and Sir Andrew in their place.

Viola's charm and wit and continual self-consciousness about her own disguise help us understand the people she is dealing with. She is so reasonable and patient that when she trusts someone we are persuaded that her faith is justified. Only the unreasonable in human nature forces her to disguise herself. As a woman of her position, and in such a situation, she could not be a free agent, so she dresses like her brother and calls herself "Cesario." She, like Olivia, needs time to get her bearings after a calamity in her family. She and Olivia Viola's first thought after being rescued is the hopeful one that her brother may also have survived. Her second thought is that she must now act on her own account. She has no family here. Since she has apparently heard of Orsino as a possible husband, she becomes a page in his household, to see for herself whether he might fill the bill. Though her deception serves her well, before the play is done Viola admits that disguise is, in fact, a "wickedness" wherein "the pregnant enemy [i.e. the Devil] does much."

The portrait of Viola shows that Shakespeare, in writing a stylized play, does not prevent his characters from coming alive. Their energy does not seem confined by any pattern, but occasionally the pattern becomes so clear that characterization takes second place. The two sea-captains who rescue Viola and Sebastian are a case in point. Shakespeare makes them both men of profound integrity. Antonio, who rescues Sebastian, scorns any disguise even though he knows his life is in danger here, and he is arrested by Orsino's men. Viola's nameless rescuer goes so far as to help her to disguise herself, and keeps her secret even when he is "in durance at Malvolio's suit." Both honest, both imprisoned in this odd land, these two men of the sea make a strong and arbitrary contrast to the prevailing distortions of life on shore in Illyria.

The first sight of Orsino, the Duke, should be as different from the first sound, as Viola's swaggering costume is from her very feminine nature. The reader of the play sees only the Duke's fantastic words, the actor will show the outward form of Orsino, who, in the last act, says to the sea-captain Antonio

That face of his I do remember well,
Yet, when I saw it last, it was besmear'd
As black as Vulcan in the smoke of war:
A bawbling vessel was the captain of,
For shallow draught and bulk unprizable;
With which most scathful grapple did he make
With the most noble bottom of our fleet,
That very envy and the tongue of loss
Cried fame and honor on him.
(V.i.55)

This Duke, who can recognize so well the quality of Antonio, is "noble in nature as in name." Yet for the greater part of the play he is baffled and deluded. Imagining that he is in love with Olivia, he feels both exalted and harassed by his "desires." He grants that he does not prize her riches, but he cannot see that he does not even prize her. Her beauty and her sex arouse in him a kind of emotion, conceit and mixed metaphor which he enjoys and thinks he needs so desperately that, at the end, he cries out for the heart to kill Olivia rather than lose her. So strong can the shape of fancy become!

By the fourth scene, Orsino has actually fallen in love with Viola. She wins him "liver and all" in the second act by talking to him in his own "fantastical" way. Her disguise lets him become devoted, without being confused by the erratic passions he associates with love of woman. That devotion is clear in one of the most comic moments in the last act, when his greeting to Olivia: "Now heaven walks on earth" is followed abruptly by a return to the puzzle of Antonio's identification of Cesario. The only sudden change in Orsino at the end of the play is his loss of the delusion that he loves Olivia.

Olivia's message to Orsino in the opening scene, refusing his suit, should seem like too much protestation, even without the benefit of hindsight. Here is a girl who is suddenly left all alone to manage the affairs of a great estate. She is saddled with her father's younger brother—a liability—and with an importunate neighbor who insists that she wed. She cannot accept him; so she publicly exaggerates out of all reason her natural grief at the death of her brother, so as to keep the unwelcome suitor at arm's length.
Viola, as Orsino's ambassador to Olivia, cannot help judging Olivia by what she has heard, and by the rebuffs encountered at the Countess's gate. To Viola, Olivia is like the subject of Shakespeare's 94th sonnet, one of those who "moving others, are themselves as stone," who take care to be "the lords and owners of their faces." Viola calls her "too proud" when Olivia's unveiling and itemizing of her face emphasize this attitude. There is certainly further deception, conscious or unconscious, by Viola in this first dialogue between these ladies. Viola carries out her master's orders to woo Olivia in a way that cannot succeed.

Viola's wit and aplomb, her independence and scorn for her own well-conned flowery speech are at once congenial to Olivia. When Viola, in exasperation, pulls out all the stops on her own natural poetry, Olivia dives into her bag of tricks to win "him." She tries to give "him" money, she sends "him" a ring, she wonders, when all her pleading seems to no avail: "How shall I feast him—what bestow of him—For youth is bought more oft than begged or borrowed."

Olivia is very young, then, and probably slight of figure to be suitably matched to "Cesario." Anyone as competent as she shows herself to be, as Sebastian notes that she is, and as a mistress would have to be to suit Malvolio, would not mismatch herself. She has been forced to grow up quickly in the last months, and her discovery of her own capabilities has gone to her head. But, since she is reasonable as well as practical, she can see that she is being swept off her feet and put suddenly into the position she has always objected to in Orsino (that of unrequited lover). This forces her to conceal her own nature from herself, to speak of "enchantment," and say in most un-Olivia-like tones these lines, which are noticeably difficult to say naturally:

Fate, show thy force: ourselves we do not owe;
What is decreed must be, and be this so.
(I.v.331)

However this may comfort her, she does not actually leave to Fate anything which she can manage.

At her second visit as Cesario, careful to seem more courtly, formal and remote than the first time, Viola is met by the full storm of Olivia's recklessness. This is not only caused by passion, but by intuitive uneasiness:

Olivia.
Stay: I prithee, tell me what thou think'st of me.
Viola.
That you do think you are not what you are.
Olivia.
If I think so, I think the same of you.
Viola.
Then think you right: I am not what I am.
Olivia.
I would you were as I would have you be.
(III.i.151)

Sebastian, Viola's twin, is exactly what Olivia would have him be.

The most fundamental consideration in the relationship between "seems" and "is" arises with the confusion of Sebastian and Viola. When Olivia mistakes Sebastian for "Cesario," she is seeing the same spirit in both. Her eye is not stopped at the surface by any probable difference of height and voice. She did not fall in love with a physique. This is a difficult theatrical problem, certainly, but one to be tackled with bravado rather than coyness, because it is more than a casual assumption of the plot—it is a considered criticism of what we are accustomed to call "real," the facade. Olivia must be consistently shown as a person who is wary of letting her eye be "too great a flatterer for [her] mind." Her intuitive summing up of people is always made at a deeper level than this. As for the confusion of Antonio in mistaking Cesario for Sebastian, I believe that the only assumption the actor can make is that that honest stalwart could never entertain the suspicion of a disguise. He is far too much upset by the overwhelming sin of ingratitude to notice any surface changes in his erstwhile idol.

Sebastian has as much romantic venturesomeness, courage, charm and—all important to this play—integrity as Viola. But in his astonishing impetuosity he is a mirror image, rather than a copy, of his twin's equally astonishing patience. Their intentions are the same, their ways of carrying them out are very different.

Two such spirits as Viola and Sebastian are required as "fitting climax to the swelling act" which in the end unmasks all the characters of this play. They are needed by Olivia and Orsino as mates of the appropriate sex. They are used by Shakespeare to emphasize "what a piece of work is man".

Cynthia Lewis

[Lewis positions Antonio as a Christ figure against which Viola's moral growth, the central concern of the play, is measured throughout Twelfth Night. Viola demonstrates sacrificial qualities early in the play, but they only come to fruition through her service and ultimate sacrifice to Orsino. Her major obstacle is her fear of losing control, but her salvation, the critic asserts, is her clear-sightedness. This quality is demonstrated in Viola's interpretation of Olivia returning the ring she claimed Viola left behind as opposed to Malvolio's cloudy reasoning when attempting to decipher the letter he thinks is from Olivia. Antonio's example of sacrificing himself for Cesario, whom he believes to be Sebastian, is compared with Viola's sacrifice, when she offers to take the punishment Orsino who would like to deal to Olivia. The critic links the ideal sacrifice to the manifestation of the Messiah in the Epiphany and asserts that Christian love informs romantic love in the play.]

Viola's characterization throughout Twelfth Night reveals that the play concerns itself fundamentally with her moral growth. Shakespeare continually plays Viola off the other characters to illustrate how far she has come and how much farther she has to go. Initially, she has all the makings of an Antonio. She generously rewards first the sea captain and then Feste (I.ii.18, III.i.43), and she lashes out at ingratitude when Antonio accuses her of it (III.iv.354-57). Her willingness to woo another woman for the man she loves also indicates her magnanimity.

Yet she often appears self-absorbed. Nowhere is this trait clearer than when she offers Antonio only half her coffer (III.iv.345-47). Next to the total altruism that Antonio showed Sebastian in the preceding scene (III.iii.38), Viola's reserve seems downright stingy. Granted, Viola is not rich; nor does she even know Antonio. Her giving anything at all under these circumstances could thus be admired. But the contrast between the two characters is evident: Viola is willing to go far for someone else, but only so far. Similarly, Viola has good reason in III.iv to be stunned by the sudden possibility that Sebastian may yet live and thus to ignore Antonio's arrest; but Antonio, having intervened to save her life, surely deserves more attention from Viola/Cesario than she gives. Even if Viola exits at the close of this scene in pursuit of Antonio and the officers, she apparently does so not to aid Antonio but to discover more about Sebastian's history.

This key episode in which Viola and Antonio are contrasted reveals the major obstacle that Viola must surmount before she can grow to love completely: fear of losing control. That she loves both her brother and her master is obvious to us, but a great deal of the potential and actual destructiveness in Twelfth Night arises from Viola's refusal to expose herself openly to others—to give herself away. She is consistently associated with walls—barriers to love—throughout the play. Her disguise becomes an emblem of her and others' fear: many such walls appear in the play and must be let down or broken through before genuine love can be enjoyed. Orsino uses cliched love language to put a safe distance between himself and Olivia (e.g., I.i); Viola refers to the hypocrisy of most people, who hide their wickedness behind the "beautuous wall" of appearance (I.ii.48); Viola herself attempts to use language like Orsino's in wooing Olivia and in protecting herself, until she finds it will not shield her well (e.g., II.ii); Olivia hides in her house and behind her wit and her veil (II.ii, etc.). The spirit of Epiphany, represented by Antonio's willingness to manifest his true self for the sake of another, is stifled behind these barriers.

Viola's brilliant repartee with Feste demonstrates her capacity for folly, for letting go and enjoying another's company (III.i.1-59). Admiring his wit, she expresses appreciation for its wisdom and thus signals her own association with Christlike folly and her own understanding that folly comes in two forms: "For folly that he wisely shows is fit, / But wise men, folly-fall'n, quite taint their wit" (III.i.67-68). But when Feste cuts gently at Orsino's folly (11. 39-41), Viola resists hearing more: "Nay, and thou pass upon me, I'll no more with thee" (11. 42-43). Viola here seems reluctant to acknowledge the value of Feste's remarks. For a long time she appears unable either to admit that Orsino's attraction to Olivia is not genuine love or to deal directly with her feelings for Orsino. Her reaction to Feste's song in II.iv exemplifies the poor judgment that results from her infatuation. "Come away, come away, death" has got to be some of the most morbid verse ever set to music, as Feste kindly suggests to Orsino (II.iv.73-78), and the music that accompanies it would be anything but cheering. But Viola identifies with its gloom: "It gives a very echo to the seat / Where Love is thron'd" (II.iv.21-22). Viola's exaggerated sympathy for Orsino's pain mirrors his self-indulgence.

In its irrationality, Viola's love for Orsino resembles Antonio's love for Sebastian and Olivia's for Viola/Cesario. It is potentially good folly. But enclosed within her, it waxes overly melancholic. When she can express it in even veiled language, as she does in II.iv, it regains some of its health:

Vio. My father had a daughter lov'd a man
As it might be perhaps, were I a woman,
I should your lordship.
Duke. And what's her history?
Vio. A blank, my lord; she never told her love,
But let concealment like a worm i' th' bud
Feed on her damask cheek; she pin'd in thought,
And with a green and yellow melancholy
She sate like Patience on a monument,
Smiling at grief. Was not this love indeed?
(11. 107-15)

Perhaps because this passage demands that Viola objectify her feelings, it is less self-pitying than her attraction to Feste's song. Furthermore, Viola's hidden love at least eventually permits her to instruct Orsino:

Vio. But if she [Olivia] cannot love you, sir?
Duke. I cannot be so answer'd.
Vio. Sooth, but you must
(II.iv.87-88)

Yet Viola herself realizes that secret longings fester within, "like a worm i' th' bud." The self must be honestly exposed to survive; Viola must reveal her inner self to become fully human.

Another of Viola's potential virtues emerges as she is compared and contrasted with Malvolio. In much the same way that Malvolio seeks to unravel the letter he finds in II.v, Viola tries to read the significance of the allegedly returned ring in II.ii. The concept linking the two scenes is interpretation. On this score Viola obviously does much better than Malvolio. Her vision is not so dreamy-eyed as to obscure the true meaning of receiving the ring, whereas poor Malvolio's hopes absolutely blind him to the facts. Viola's visionary quality—composed of a clear-sightedness like Feste's and a power like Antonio's to perceive how others feel—will guide her through the snarls to come. Yet on this point too she fudges, when she thrusts all responsibility onto an external force: "O time, thou must untangle this, not I, / It is too hard a knot for me t' untie" (II.i.40-41). Notwithstanding the partial truth of this statement, Viola will sooner or later have to participate in shaping her own life. Time can and does help, but it requires a cooperation from her, a total commitment of herself to love.

Whether or not Viola learns how to make such an investment directly from Antonio, the sea captain's dramatic purpose is to provide such an example, and Viola comes to reflect his behavior. The turning point for her, when all the potentially fine qualities we have seen in her come together, is also the heart of the play. It comes in her answer to Orsino's angry threat on her life:

I'll sacrifice the lamb that I do love,
To spite a raven's heart within a dove.
(V.i.130-31)

The Christian implications of the "sacrificial lamb" ought to ring clear, and Viola's sudden "willingness" to give not just some, but all, endows her with new virtue:

And I most jocund, apt, and willingly,
To do you rest, a thousand deaths would die.
(11.132-33)

Like Antonio, who has earlier offered to protect her with his life (III.iv.312-14), Viola now substitutes herself for Olivia, in order to give Orsino "rest." She gladly takes upon herself the punishment through which Orsino would "spite" another. Here lies the Epiphany in Twelfth Night, where the meaning of Christ's birth, His sacrifice for humanity, manifests itself in the actions of human beings. Viola's commitment of her life to love is the wisest folly she can pursue. To dismiss all barriers to love, to disregard even the welfare of one's physical being, is divine.

Viola's altruistic attitude toward love, which alludes to a Christian ideal, permits spiritual love and romantic love to be linked in Twelfth Night. Ultimately, we are not shown a world in which different types of love—say, physical and non-physical—are qualitatively different or are opposed. Rather, Christian love, as epitomized in Antonio, works itself into the worldliest of relationships through the four lovers, principally Viola, as well as through Feste. Thus, Christian love can inform romantic love, and the two comic traditions that shape the play—the romantic and the serious—are joined compatibly as Viola grows to become more like Antonio. Significantly, in this final scene Olivia also grows to accept Viola/Cesario as a "sister" and Orsino as her brother (11. 326, 317). The good folly that is well on its way to triumphing over all is not limited to romantic love, but leads to general good will and fellowship.

 Appropriately, after Viola's declaration of devotion to Orsino, the majority of the characters are in some respect set free. Viola's self-sacrifice is not the single twist in the plot that accounts for every subsequent revelation: many other actions, like Sebastian's entrance (1. 208), intervene before Viola's true identity is discovered. But Viola's new openness to love sets a tone early in the scene for the series of manifestations and apparent miracles to follow. The twins are reunited; the four lovers are rightly matched; the sea captain who has possession of Viola's clothes is "enlarged" (1. 278); and Malvolio is "deliver'd" (I. 315), though that does not guarantee his freedom, which only he can claim for himself. Even Fabian, caught up in the "wonder" of "this present hour," freely confesses the joke on Malvolio and tries to ease the tension between the revelers and the steward (11. 355-68). "Golden time" is ripe for love like Antonio's.
But the play's problematic nature persists to the end, modifying and augmenting the harmonious resolution. For instance, what of Antonio? Are we to assume that Orsino will also set him free? It seems rather that the question of Antonio's future, like so many other questions at the closing, is left dangling for a reason. Interestingly, the other salient loose end here is that Viola has still not removed her disguise by the time Twelfth Night is finished. These two details do more than blur the play's resolution, as do questions about whether Malvolio will repair his ruined pride and whether Maria will help curb her new husband's former excesses. Most importantly, these unresolved elements involve the audience's sense of responsibility in determining their own future. Indeed, Act V would not challenge us morally if it clearly and simply showed that all ended well. Twelfth Night finally asks us whether we will make all well by divesting ourselves of the walls around us that shut out love like Antonio's and keep it imprisoned. Will we embrace the spirit of Epiphany, which shapes the play throughout, and thus free Christian love in our own world? By agreeing to, we will, in effect, liberate Antonio and change as radically as if we moved, along with Viola, from male to female. When Twelfth Night closes, it has already "pleased" us, as Feste promises (V.i.408). If it is also going to teach us when the "play is done" (1. 407), then we must respond to it by unveiling.

Douglas H. Parker

[Parker outlines the parallels between Olivia and Viola in Twelfth Night, regarding them as non-genetic twins. He begins by describing the similarities between the characters: their loss of fathers and brothers, their respective disguises, and their pursuit of unrequited love. Viola relates to Olivia's inability to love Orsino because of her own inability to love Olivia. In her frustration with the situation, she communicates to them both the consequences of refusing to accept love. The critic demonstrates how Olivia and Viola are intellectual equals and that Olivia falls in love with Viola because of the qualities in herself that she sees Viola mirror back. The women also recognize that they are both intellectually bested by Feste, accept it with good humor, and are the only two in the play who can appreciate Feste's wit. Finally the critic considers the etymology of their names, explains why Olivia is not suffering from melancholy, and comments on the fitting conclusion that Viola and Olivia should become sisters-in-law.]

. . . Shakespeare stresses the non-genetic twinning between Olivia and Viola at many points in the play in a number of ways: certain situations in which one character finds herself are mirrored in the other character's situations; particular scenes in which one character appears are repeated with slight variation for the other, or events in individual scenes in which both appear show remarkable similarities; and, finally, the outcome of the action of the play is essentially identical for both.

That Shakespeare wants us to regard Viola and Olivia's relationship as an important and close one is clear from the number of scenes in which the two appear in conversation together. No other pair of characters in the play has as many meetings stretching over as many lines as these two. Initially they meet in I.v. when Viola comes to Olivia's house to sue on Orsino's behalf; here the conversation lasts for about 150 lines; at the end of this scene we first recognize Olivia's developing love for Viola [quotations from Lothian and Craik's New Arden edition]. They meet again in III.i. and try to deal with Olivia's love for Orsino's messenger; here the conversation runs to some 70 lines. And finally, their third and shortest meeting occurs in III.iv. where the matter of Olivia's love is again discussed for about 20 lines. These frequent encounters encourage us to feel that, if Sebastian had not appeared on the scene to satisfy Olivia's love, the two women might have gone on meeting indefinitely, for at the end of this final meeting Olivia encourages Viola to "come again tomorrow" (III.iv.218).

But the relationship between the two is far closer than a series of three meetings between them can suggest. In many of the play's situations, Viola and Olivia are identical characters: both have experienced the death of fathers; both think they have experienced the recent death of brothers. Both initially appear before the members of Illyrian society in disguise which serves a double function, even though the stress placed on each function differs for each woman. We learn early in the play from Valentine that out of respect for her recently dead brother, Olivia is "veiled" (I.i.28), and later we see this for ourselves in her first meeting with Viola. Olivia's veil serves as an obvious sign of her mourning; however, it also serves, secondarily, as a type of disguise, since it allows her to hide her face from Orsino's suitors thereby letting them know that their master is not for her. The fact that Olivia is prepared to lift her veil so quickly in Viola's presence indicates that her vow of seven years' mourning is as much an attempt to discourage Orsino's love pleas as it is an outward sign of grief. This is not to say that her sorrow for her brother's death is insincere; it is only to say that her grief is an interior sentiment which in these peculiar circumstances needs to be manifested in an outward fashion to encourage the Duke to credit it as valid. Hence Olivia's veil and the daily tearful watering of her chamber are not obvious indications, as many critics suggest, that Olivia is wallowing in melancholy as the Duke is in love; they are, rather, necessary props used to convince a love-struck Duke, who surrounds himself with his own props in the form of music and "sweet beds of flowers" (I.i.40) that her sorrow is sincere. In short, Olivia shows herself to be an admirable judge of Orsino's character by choosing his own methods of validating his experiences to convince him of the sincerity of her own. In this respect, Olivia, like Viola, has a sophisticated awareness of the importance of disguise in dealing with life's problems. And like Viola who, while sincerely mourning the death of her brother is, nevertheless, aware that she must deal with the new situation in which she finds herself after the shipwreck, since she is now a stranger in a strange land— and certainly unlike the inactive, prostrate figure of the love-struck Orsino—Olivia is also intent on imposing an order on her life, evident in her attempt early in the play to bring Sir Toby to heel (I.iii.) and to discover the whereabouts of the derelict Feste (I.v.). In short, while Orsino's love renders him "unstaid and skittish in all motions" (II.iv.18), Viola and Olivia's grief does not overwhelm them to the point that it becomes an obsession preventing them from carrying on with the necessary business of living one's life.

Viola, too, appears in disguise in the initial scenes of the play, and her male disguise, as purposeful as Olivia's veil, is used to protect her from the unknown dangers of a foreign country. But like Olivia's, Viola's disguise also serves as a sign of her mourning, if for no one but herself, since her physical resemblance to her brother coupled with her male attire must make her appear, to herself at least, very much like Sebastian. In fact, in III.iv, in soliloquy, she mentions that as Cesario she copies her brother, stating

I my brother know
Yet living in my glass; even such and so
In favour was my brother, and he went Still in this fashion, colour, ornament,
For him I imitate.
(389-93)

For Viola, as much as for Olivia, these disguises initially both protect them from dangers of one sort or another, and also permit them to legitimately keep their brothers' memories "fresh / And lasting, in ... [their] sad remembrance" (I.i.31-32).

The entire love situation in which Olivia and Viola find themselves entangled is also very similar. As is often the case in romantic comedy, both fall in love rapidly, Olivia after her first meeting with Viola, and Viola after only three days in Orsino's company. However, in this latter case, Shakespeare makes the three-day span seem as instantaneous as Olivia's more sudden love affliction by sacrificing chronological time to dramatic time. Although we hear from Valentine at the beginning of I.iv. that the Duke "hath known . . . [Viola] but three days" (3), their first actual stage encounter to which the audience is privy occurs in this same scene, and, as a result, Viola's love for the Duke seems as sudden as Olivia's for Viola. Both women must also endure unrequited love: despite the love tokens that each receives, Olivia cannot love Orsino any more than Viola can Olivia. And, further, just as Viola acts as the Duke's emissary, informing Olivia why she should love Orsino, Olivia herself, quite inadvertently no doubt, plays the same role as Viola as she informs her and us the audience about Orsino's inherent worthiness as a husband. Lest Orsino has left a bad taste in the audience's mouth after his first horribly self-indulgent appearance, and lest, as a result, we cannot understand the commonsensical Viola's passion for him, Olivia tells us that even though she cannot love him, she supposes him virtuous . . . noble,

Of great estate, of fresh and stainless youth;
In voices well divulg'd, free, learn'd, and valiant,
And in dimension, and the shape of nature,
A gracious person.
(I.v.262-66)

Expecting to find Viola in I.v. suing on Orsino's behalf, the audience not only discovers this, but also the more unexpected, dramatically delightful event of Olivia serving as Orsino's spokesman and thereby mirroring Viola's role as go-between.

Viola's sense of the closeness of the two apparently hopeless love relationships is evident at a couple of points in the play. She is poignantly aware and understanding of Olivia's inability to love Orsino because she feels such an inability herself in her relationship with Olivia. Even though it is a sexual barrier that separates Olivia and Viola in contrast to an emotional one that separates Olivia and Orsino, the audience feels Viola mirroring her own frustration with Olivia's persistence when she says to the tenacious Orsino after he encourages her once again to return to Olivia to plead on his behalf: "But if she cannot love you, sir?" (II.iv.88). Also, in the same scene, perhaps reflecting on the apparent hopelessness of her own love for Orsino, she tells the Duke a story of a woman (actually Viola herself) who never told her love,

But let concealment like a worm i' th' bud
Feed on her damask cheek: she pin'd in thought,
And with a green and yellow melancholy
She sat like Patience on a monument,
Smiling at grief.
(II.iv.111-16)

This sad commentary on the loveless life, with its emphasis on death and decay, mirrors an earlier warning that Viola gave Olivia about her refusal to accept love—a warning which Shakespeare had given time and again in his sonnet sequence. Complimenting Olivia on her beauty, and, at the same time, encouraging her to capitalize on it while she can, she states:

'Tis beauty truly blent, whose red and white Nature's own sweet and cunning hand laid on.
Lady, you are the cruellest she alive
If you will lead these graces to the grave
And leave the world no copy.
(I.v.241-46)

It is interesting to note the important similarities between these two speeches. The reference to the decay of female beauty is poignantly expressed in both; Viola's "damask cheek" in the first passage finds its counterpart in the second in the reference to Olivia's "red and white" beauty. Both images clearly refer to the feminine complexion and both are interchangeable commonplaces in Renaissance love poetry. The image of the "worm i' th' bud" is less metaphorically expressed in the second passage through the reference to the "grave" as the final and inevitable resting place of all earthly beauty. And finally, there is an admonitory tone present in both passages even though it is more obliquely expressed in the first. In the first passage Viola, although addressing Orsino, seems to be telling herself that pining in thought, rather than acting by expressing her love to Orsino, could lead to a life of unfulfilled wishes ending in death, as the reference to "monument" suggests. In the second passage she more straightforwardly warns Olivia that the inevitable result of not acknowledging and accepting love is personal annihilation and "the grave."

In summary, in Olivia's and Viola's love situations, Shakespeare keeps the reader's mind fixed on the way in which each female reflects or mirrors the other's character, actions, or predicaments. The initial disguises of the two are clear mirrors of each other as each woman uses masking both to defend herself from unwanted advances or happenings and to serve as appropriate symbols of mourning reflecting a true inner grief. Further, each woman can be seen fulfilling the role of go-between for Orsino. As Viola confronts Olivia to sue on Orsino's behalf, so Olivia, through her complimentary comments on Orsino's character, assures Viola and the audience of his worthiness as a future husband. And finally, Viola herself, commenting in two different speeches on the nature of the two major female love patterns, sees a close relationship between her situation and Olivia's which Shakespeare stresses by using similar images, a similar admonitory tone, and by drawing similar conclusions.

Certain scenes in the play also emphasize the twin relationship that I see in Viola and Olivia. In the early part of the first meeting between the two women, Olivia shows anger at Viola's behaviour and asks why she began her conversation "rudely" (I.v.215). Viola's reply stresses the mirroring that runs through the play by making clear that she simply responded in kind to the reception she received at Olivia's hands; she states: "The rudeness that hath appeared in me have I learned from my entertainment" (217-18). Indeed, this entire first meeting between the two women is remarkable for the skill that each shows in conversing with the other, proving that each possesses a sharp wit. Initially the conversation begins with a display of verbal wit conducted in prose by both women. The ironically posturing Petrarchan love messenger, Viola, gets as good as she gives from the determined lady of the house, Olivia, whose true skill at repartee becomes evident when the messenger introduces the imagery of the religion of love. Both instinctively seem to recognize when the witty prologue to this first meeting concludes, for after this initial period of feeling each other out, both immediately switch from prose to poetry, a switch which indicates a movement that Berry characterizes [in Shakespeare's Comedies: Exploration in Form (1972)] as one from "the language of fencing and social deception" to "the language of truth and intensely felt emotion." Unlike so many of the other scenes in this play where one character takes advantage of or capitalizes on the linguistic or personality weaknesses of another, there is no sense that there is a clear victor-victim relationship at the end of this scene. This is a conversation between intellectual equals with no clear winner emerging at its conclusion. And the fact that by the end of the scene Olivia has fallen in love with the messenger seems to prove the point that the two women are alike; after Viola exits, Olivia comments on Viola's character as revealed in this scene by stating that "Thy tongue, thy face, thy limbs, actions, and spirit / Do give thee five-fold blazon" (I.v.296-97). Earlier she had ironically catalogued her own beauty in a not entirely dissimilar way when she assured Viola that she would "give out divers schedules of my beauty" (247-48). That Shakespeare wants us to see that Olivia falls in love with Viola in this scene because she recognizes in her aspects of herself is evident in his uses of the word "blazon" to describe Viola's beauty and "schedules of beauty" to describe Olivia's. On the surface of it, there seems to be no apparent similarity between the two expressions, "blazon" being glossed in most editions as heraldic insignia, and "schedules" as written statements. But, in fact, the word "blazon" also has a more general meaning which the OED gives as "a description or record of any kind; esp. a record of virtues or excellencies," and adds the further meaning of "publication." Taken in this more general sense, Viola's "fivefold blazon" can be seen as the beauty she publicly displays or "publishes" in Olivia's presence; in other words, Viola's qualities serve as an obvious record of her virtues just as Olivia's qualities are ones that she ironically intends to make public by giving out "divers schedules," that is, written statements or publications of them. That Olivia should talk about the public demonstration of her beauty and then go on to describe Viola's in essentially the same terms, makes the point clear: at the end of this scene, Olivia has come to love Viola because she sees herself mirrored in her, a mirroring which we, the audience, have also been made to see through the skillful and equal ironic verbal exchanges that have occurred in the scene. If it is, therefore, valid to claim that Olivia falls in love with Viola because the latter is, in fact, her alter ego—a view which Plato's Aristophanes would have no trouble accepting—then a new interpretation of Olivia's final words in this scene emerges. When, at the end of this scene, Olivia claims that "ourselves we do not owe" (314), she means, no doubt, as the traditional gloss of the lines states, that there are greater powers beyond us which seem to direct, shape and control us despite ourselves; but in the light of my interpretation of this scene, which sees Olivia's love for Viola emerging because of the similarities she comes to recognize between them, the line might also suggest Olivia's new awareness that her self is not something owned or possessed solely by her; it is, in fact, also part of her new love in whom she has just glimpsed characteristics of her own person.

In terms of the characters involved, methods of argumentation used and sentiments expressed by both Viola and Olivia, two other scenes in the play emphasize the character twinning with which this essay is concerned. Feste's catechizing of Olivia in I.v. in which he proves his mistress a "fool" for the undue grief she feels over the death of her brother, is mirrored in his extended verbal victory over Viola in III.i, which Viola recognizes as a type of instruction in the power and versatility of language. In the first exchange with Olivia, Feste's victory over his mistress is merely a verbal one; although by asking her the right questions he can demonstrate to her why she should not mourn her brother's death knowing his soul to be in heaven, he, nevertheless, cannot convince Olivia or the audience that her grief is unnecessary. The profound emotional effects of death go well beyond the logical conclusions derived from this form of verbal catechizing. One can find very little true consolation in Feste's argument, even as one admires its logic. The same phenomenon is evident in his exchange with Viola in III.i. Words once again appear to be infinitely capable of meaning what Feste wants them to as the skillful word crafter, or "corrupter of words" as he calls himself (37), attains victory over Viola by disabling her expectations—as he does Olivia's—and showing her his skill at turning language to his advantage. One example from this scene will suffice to make the point. When Feste tells Viola that he lives "by the church" and she asks him "Art thou a churchman?" his response undermines her line of thought. He answers:

   No such matter, sir.
   I do live by the church, for
   I do live at my house, and my house doth stand by the church. (5-7)

While we cannot help admiring Feste's skillful response here—as we admired his rational and verbal victory over Olivia—we must, at the same time, recognize that he is not really answering Viola's question—as earlier he was not truly convincing Olivia or us of her folly. In both cases he is merely using the symbols of thought—language itself—as tools for a clever but essentially specious game of verbal one-upmanship. What is interesting and important to notice is the women's almost identical responses to Feste's victory in each of these scenes. In Feste's exchange with Olivia, the dour steward of her household, Malvolio, is outraged at what he regards as Feste's impertinence. Obviously failing to see that Feste's victory is merely verbal and not substantial, he regards the clown's behaviour as insufferable. Olivia, clearly recognizing the true nature of Feste's "victory," takes his catechizing in the spirit in which it was intended and comments on Feste's effects:

   There is no slander in an allowed fool, though he do nothing but rail, nor no railing in a known discreet man, though he do nothing but reprove. (I.v.93-96)

In a similar vein, at the conclusion of her exchange with Feste, Viola fleshes out Olivia's comment by analyzing the skill of the "allowed fool," a skill which Olivia has shown that she understands implicitly in the lines just quoted. Viola states:

   This fellow is wise enough to play the fool,
   And to do that well, craves a kind of wit.
He must observe their mood on whom he jests,
The quality of persons, and the time,
And like the haggard, check at every feather
That comes before his eye. This is a practice
As full of labour as a wise man's art:
For folly that he wisely shows is fit;
But wise men, folly-fall'n, quite taint their wit.

(III.i.61-69)

Of all the characters in the play, only these two women seem truly capable of appreciating Feste's verbal skill. Orsino, of course, is interested in Feste as well, but on a much more superficial and selfish level: he enjoys Feste's singing abilities because they help sustain his love mood. Viola and Olivia's good-spirited "defeats" at the clown's hands plus their comments on the witty fool's talents following these defeats, indicate their shared view of his gifts, and, in Olivia's case, at least, give support to Feste's words about his mistress to Viola when he states that "the Lady Olivia has no folly" (III.i.33). This telling comment lets us know how the wise Feste regards Olivia, and also indicates how seriously he must have taken his attempt to prove her a fool.

The sentiments expressed by both women at the conclusion of two other scenes in the play also add to the mirroring pattern that I have been tracing. At the end of I.v after Olivia has fallen in love with Viola, and, as a result, added another complication to her life, she is still level-headed enough to recognize how very much other forces are in control of an individual's situation. Hoping that her love might develop, and yet aware of her own impotence in making the outcome match her desires, she addresses fate:

Fate, show thy force; ourselves we do not owe
What is decreed, must be; and be this so.

(I.v.314-15)

Viola expresses a similar notion at the end of II.ii. Again, like Olivia earlier, Viola is contemplating her various love entanglements. And again, like Olivia, she is prudent enough to see how powerless she is to shape her own destiny in the face of these entanglements. As a result, she places her faith in time as Olivia has earlier placed hers in fate:

O time, thou must untangle this, not I,
It is too hard a knot for me t'untie.

(II.ii.39-40)

This faith in powers beyond themselves proves valid for both women at the end of the play where the final series of mirroring events occurs. It is not enough to state—as many others have—that the apparently hopeless love relationships work themselves out satisfactorily for Viola and Olivia. This is only the most obvious example of mirroring. What is also important to recognize is that Viola's happy recovery of her brother Sebastian is also found in Olivia's situation. Fate has indeed proven itself generous to Olivia as time has to Viola. For by steadfastly refusing to marry Orsino throughout the play, Olivia has managed by the play's end not only to marry the husband of her dreams, but also to recover a brother in the person of Orsino. That this recovery is at least as important as the marriage is evident in the way in which Shakespeare stresses the notion near the play's conclusion. Once the comic complications have been resolved, Olivia encourages Orsino "To think me as well a sister, as a wife" (V.i.316), and a few lines later Orsino complies by addressing his former beloved as "sweet sister" (383). These numerous similarities between Shakespeare's two principal female characters in Twelfth Night strike me as more than fortuitous; there are far too many of them and they are far too closely related to be attributed solely to chance. Besides, Shakespeare seems to be deliberately directing the reader's attention to this second pair of twins in his play not only through the various mirroring situations and scenes mentioned above, but also through their very names: both names etymologically derive from similar aspects of animate nature—Olivia's name originates with the olive plant and Viola's with the flower violet. Schleiner states [in "Orsino and Viola: Are the Names of Serious Character in Twelfth Night Meaningful?" Shakespeare Studies, 16 (1983)] that both of these flowers "possibly refer to purgatives" which might suggest the part that both characters play in purging the drama of its comic complications: Viola by constantly sounding the note of common sense and Olivia through her constant refusal to marry Orsino, which, of course, permits Viola to finally have him, thereby creating the play's happy ending. Is it, then, altogether surprising in light of these connections between the two women that each name—Viola and Olivia—should be essentially an anagram of the other?

In conclusion, Shakespeare's major female characters in Twelfth Night, despite their passports and their parentage, possess a dramatic kinship which makes each stand head and shoulders above the Illyrian folly in the play. If, as some credulous critics suggest, Olivia is "addicted to a melancholy" (II.v.202-03) because of the death of her brother, the spectators never see it. We only hear that she waters "once a day her chamber round / "With eye-offending brine / All this to season / A brother's dead love" (I.i.29-31) from Valentine, Orsino's go-between, who has received the information from Olivia's handmaid. Further, melancholia in this period was generally regarded as a debilitating mental disease which left its victims free to do very little more than ponder their obsessive bitterness—witness, for instance, Hamlet and Jaques. As I have suggested earlier, Olivia is clearly concerned about the state of her household, the condition of Sir Toby and the whereabouts of Feste, concerns which would not enter the mind of a true melancholic. What we can truly speak of is Olivia's sadness which is clearly legitimate and understandable, and which, as I have suggested, mirrors Viola's. It is a sadness brought about by unrequited love just as Viola's is. Against the charges of self-deceit, one might counter that a self-deceived woman could scarcely hold out as long as Olivia does against Orsino's persistent wooing which, we sense, has been going on long before the play even opens. Further, the suggestion that Olivia will not marry Orsino because by doing so she would be marrying above her station, does not sound like the sentiment of a self-deceived person. As I have suggested above, she is no more self-deceived than Viola. Finally, it is through her refusal to marry Orsino that Olivia, as much as Viola or Sebastian, helps bring the play to a happy conclusion by throwing Viola into Orsino's arms thereby fulfilling Viola's wishes. By contributing to the play's resolution, Olivia shows herself to be in the tradition of other enlightened Shakespearean female figures: the four ladies in Love's Labour's Lost, Rosalind in As You Like It and, of course, Viola in this play.

From the beginning of Twelfth Night we, as well as Viola, know that Olivia's love for Viola is doomed to failure because of the sex they share by nature. What we need to learn, however, is that this marriage of bodies which cannot be actualized, does not prevent Shakespeare from depicting a "marriage of true minds" between Olivia and Viola. It is, therefore, a fitting climax to this play that at its end each woman should become the other's sister-in-law since throughout both have been, as I hope I have shown, sisters in sentiment, intellect, and spirit.

Historical Criticism of Twelfth Night: Malvolio

Malvolio has intrigued critics more than any other character in Twelfth Night. In the seventeenth century, Charles I was so taken by Malvolio's mistreatment that he changed the name of the play in the Second Folio to "Malvolio."

Melvin Seiden

[Seiden examines Malvolio's role in the comic strategy of Twelfth Night, which is, the critic asserts, to divert the burden of comic scrutiny away from the festive lovers, and to lend a puritanical air which in contrast...
heightens the overriding sense of gaiety in the play. In the society of Illyria, Malvolio represents the new bourgeois, and is placed in conflict with the degenerate aristocracy of Sir Toby and Sir Andrew, and not with the patrician lovers, as other commentators have argued. On the contrary, Seiden explains that Malvolio strives to uphold the social standards of Olivia’s household, by which he lives and earns his keep, and is threatened by any subversion of the system. In principle, he is opposed to frivolity and to endow Malvolio with a sense of humor, as some readers have mused, would serve to make him into a tragic figure, clearly not what Shakespeare had intended. Seiden claims that Malvolio plays the bad cop not out of an excessive sense of self-love, as other critics have suggested, but out of an underdeveloped sense of self. He enforces restraint because he lacks an independent spirit within himself, and suffers an inferiority complex as a result. In conclusion, Seiden compares the comic strategies of Twelfth Night to a typical catharsis in a Shakespearean tragedy and contrasts the fate of Malvolio to that of Falstaff in Henry IV. While the clown Falstaff was sacrificed as the world of comedy gave way to the reinstitution of normal life, Malvolio, who represents law and order in Illyria, was not heralded as the returning patron of seriousness and work, but at the finale remained unsatisfied and discredited, a scapegoat sacrificed to the gods of comedy.

The miraculous, domesticated and made to serve the strategems of the dramatist, is one of the staples of comedy, especially that of Shakespeare. We recognize its power and beauty in the neatly-contrived and swiftly-executed denouement whereby the necessary "happy ending" is consummated. It is no less miraculous that the three lovers of Twelfth Night persistently escape involvement in the embarrassments and humiliations of the comic hurly-burly, and since this less obtrusive aspect of comic magic can lead us to a better understanding of what Shakespeare is up to in this play, we must examine its significance.

In the character of Falstaff and in the punitive comedy of Jonson one finds a curious phenomenon. Falstaff, Volpone, Subtle, and Face are comic impresarios; they cause others to appear ridiculous, thus ingratiating themselves without having to undergo as patients the comic action that, as agents, they have unleashed upon others. But the appetite for comedy that they have awakened in us is voracious and one not easily or quickly satisfied. Soon we want to see these impresarios sacrificed on altars of their own making. Jonson exploits this expectation, manipulating it to arouse suspense, and finally satisfying it by heaping on the heads of the comedy-makers comic punishments more extreme (and delightful to us) than anything that they, as agents, had been able to inflict on their victims. One might expect, therefore, that the pristine status of the three lovers would in a similar fashion arouse comic expectations and desires that could be fulfilled only at their expense.

Shakespeare’s grand strategy is to divert the current of our expectations into another channel, to provide us with another object for our promiscuous and destructive laughter in the figure of Malvolio. One can enumerate the various vices of Malvolio that make him a fair target, a worthy object of comic deflation. These will tell us what is ludicrous and laughable in Malvolio. But if we are concerned with the more interesting question of Malvolio's raison d'être, the answer must surely be that he exists so that Shakespeare’s lovers may preserve their status free from the nothing-if-not-critical comic scrutiny which would otherwise expose their romantic pretensions to the withering winds of laughter. It is not Sir Andrew Aguecheek and Sir Toby Belch, patricians manque, who are the true surrogates for the comic "tragedies" that are never permitted to embroil the lovers, but the puritan Malvolio. He is the scapegoat; he is the man who undergoes a sacrificial comic death so that they may live unscathed; he is the man whom, because of offensive seriousness (made to appear an antithetical ridiculousness) allows what is also ludicrous in the lovers to maintain its soberfaced pretense of impregnable seriousness.

Malvolio stands condemned of a mean, life-denying, but nevertheless principled utilitarianism. Shakespeare wants to excite our antipathy to Malvolio’s anti-comic sobriety, his sour bourgeois version of Aristotle’s ethical golden mean, and he provides us with many appropriate occasions for venting our antipathies. What Shakespeare does not want us to recognize, and what becomes clear once we are no longer involved emotionally in the play, is the fact that just as Malvolio is a creature of utility for his mistress Olivia, winning for his assiduous services only scorn and abuse, so for his creator Malvolio becomes an infinitely serviceable comic instrument. We recognize that without Malvolio the comedy of Twelfth Night would be impoverished; I would go farther and argue that without him the comedy, the play as a whole, would not work, and it is precisely this indebtedness to Malvolio's multifarious utilitarianism that Shakespeare cannot acknowledge, since we are not meant to see what the old magician has up his sleeve or in his hat.

The social issues involved in the struggle between Malvolio's code of calculating utility and the comic values suggested by the title of the play (the bacchanalia, before the holiday ends) are not as clear as some critics have made them out to be. Tallying Malvolio's traits, we have no trouble seeing what these stand for. He is efficient, music-hating, fun-denying, power-seeking, austere, pompous, officious, and melancholy—in short, he is a Puritan and, in the first decade of the seventeenth century, an un-version of the man of the future, the petty bourgeois. Curiously, however, these values are not pitted against the lovers' aristocratic ones; the conflict is not between Malvolio's excessively rigid and stifling code of responsibility and that of love, leisure, music, sensibility, elegance, and the higher irresponsibility. Shakespeare is particularly careful to avoid representing a direct clash between Malvolio and his aristocratic betters. He is gulled, baited, and scourged by Maria and Feste, socially his inferiors, who are aided by Sir Toby and Sir Andrew, and the latter are grossly perverted specimens of nobility. We need not look any farther than Falstaff to see that for Shakespeare the fallen aristocrat can be morally worse than the erect man of lower degree. The idea of a social hierarchy necessitates such a judgment. The good man of the middle ranks is likely to have only middling virtues and vices, but he is at least in his proper place. The degenerate, of whatever rank, threatens the whole of the great chain of being.

The conflict in Twelfth Night is then between aristocracy at its worst (Toby and Aguecheek, aided by the roisterers)—perverted, and thus the antithesis of what is implied in the ideal of noblesse oblige—and a representative of the new bourgeoisie presented in its most perfect archetypal form, since Malvolio, whatever else he is not, is true to the principles he represents. He has a radical existential authenticity; he is the quintessential bourgeois.

Shakespeare's overt—but I think questionable—point is that in its purest manifestation such dour puritanism is worse even than the corrupt patrician irresponsibility of the Belches and Aguecheeks. The point that he is at some pains to conceal—or rather, what he wishes to avoid making a point of—is that he must avoid challenging the values of the patrician lovers with those of Malvolio.

Why? For one thing, the antithesis between Malvolio's grubby puritanism and the lovers' exquisite manners is not the unequivocal conflict between beauty and the beast that so many of our critics have made it out to be. We all recognize that Malvolio stands for work, order, duty, sobriety—everything, in short, that permits a society to function. Olivia clearly recognizes this. She understands that Malvolio's stewardship is necessary to the functioning of her household. As steward, then, Malvolio represents the police force: law and order. The love-making, the sweet melancholy of long leisure hours spent in contemplation, the delight in music, the poeticizing of life—all this is possible because of the mean prose of Malvolio's labors as a steward.

In the modern world, Marxist propaganda describes the police force as a contemptible tool of the capitalist system. More than that, the Marxist has tried to win over the police force to its revolutionary side by pointing up a social irony: the police, it is said, are themselves exploited by the very system which they uphold. One can imagine the Marxist pamphlet which says to the police of the capitalist states: "With every brutality you inflict upon the poor, the ignorant, the socially impotent, you brutalize yourselves; in suppressing the have-nots you only enslave those who would liberate you." One doubts whether such appeals have ever won many recruits to the revolutionary cause. Pride in work—no matter what the work may be—seems to be more deeprooted and compelling than any doubts or scruples the worker may feel about the utility or morality of his work. So it is with Malvolio. His arrogance is not the swollen amour-propre it seems to be. Clearly this is a man who believes in work and in particular in his own work. He is fanatically conscientious in trying to enforce law and order, not as the play so slyly makes us believe merely because he is temperamentally... opposed to fun and play, but because he is also by principle antagonistic to whatever threatens to subvert the orderly social machinery of his mistress's household.

We in America have made a cult of that ambiguous virtue we call "a sense of humor." And so one hears it said, "If only Malvolio had a sense of humor, it would be possible to like him a little." What is being asked for here is that Malvolio be critical and detached, able to view his policeman's job skeptically and perhaps with the saving grace of an irony that would puncture the hypocrisies inherent in the job itself and his own seriousness. But this is impossible. Such a Malvolio would be a deeply divided man. Having the insight to see that in being Olivia's lackey he demeans himself and makes himself an object of contempt, Malvolio would indeed become what he comes perilously close to being in that extraordinary scene in which he suffers Feste's catechistic torments—a tragic figure. The so-called romantic critics assert that in this bitter, punitive scene, ending with the victim's impotent oath, "I'll be reveng'd on the whole pack of you!" Malvolio is in fact something like a tragic figure. But romantic critics and those who dismiss this view of Malvolio as sentimentality agree that it cannot have been Shakespeare's intention (or, seeking to avoid the dread intentional fallacy: that of the play) to endow Malvolio with tragic stature. Granting Malvolio the complex attitudes of a man with a sense of humor could all too easily engender tragic consequences.

There is in the American army the standard type of the supply or mess sergeant who is officious, bossy, and what is most damning, niggardly in dispensing food or clothing. "You'd think the stuff was his!" the indignant soldier cries out when his request for more (of whatever it is that he wants more of) has been turned down. The poor soldier sees only the irrationality of the sergeant's identifying his interest with Theirs (the army, the government, the taxpayers of America). From Their point of view, as expressed, say, by the officer who represents authority, it is precisely this identification between the underling, who has nothing to gain by being parsimonious, and constituted authority that makes a good supply sergeant or mess sergeant. The officer will soon want to get rid of the sergeant who recognizes that the stuff isn't his and acts accordingly.

Olivia, it can be assumed, would be the first to be displeased by a Malvolio who, winking broadly at Toby, had said, "Dost thou think because I must feign a steward's virtue I desire not the joys of cakes and ale?" Malvolio's frigid personality reflects his stern policies, and these are his mistress's. He is her surrogate, her cop; he is all superego in a libidinous society; and as we all come round to saying when we must justify whatever it is we do, Malvolio might have said, "That is what I'm paid to do." Malvolio, like the petty Nazi hireling defending himself at the Nuremberg trials, would have had to be a revolutionary to be different from what he was—not just a better man, but a radical critic of the society that created him, gave him employment, and provided sustenance.

Early in the play, in answer to Malvolio's contempt for the verbal tomfoolery with which Feste amuses his mistress, Olivia sums up Malvolio's chief vice neatly (and famously) in the line: "O, you are sick of self-love, Malvolio, and taste with a distemper'd appetite." The tag has stuck. Self-love seems to explain almost everything. But does it? Is Malvolio's behavior that of a man who, thinking well of himself, thinks poorly of others? One ought not answer Yes too quickly.

A common schematic analysis of the theme of love in Twelfth Night is the following: all of the major characters, with the exception of Viola, are seen to be motivated by some heretical or distorted version of love. Orsino is in love with love itself, Olivia is in love with grief, Malvolio is smitten with self-love, and only Viola expresses true—that is, a properly directed and controlled—love. In this account, Malvolio's narcissistic love disables him from loving others.

Now it is certainly true that more than anything else it is the passionless, calculating, mercenary fashion in which Malvolio responds to the imaginary love of his mistress that makes him so repugnant. Despite the social impropriety, we might forgive him were he to court his mistress with passion. If he were a man by love possessed, unable to control an imperious passion, he would be the type of the romantic sinner we have no difficulty forgiving. And, so far as the proprieties are concerned, it is no accident that the witty Maria, blessed because she is a wit, is fortunate enough to marry above her station. Only a twentieth century reader of the play, his mind corrupted by democratic and psychological principles alien to the world of Twelfth Night, will question Maria's good luck. For the Elizabethan, it cannot have much mattered that Toby is an ass; even as ass, if affiliated with nobility, may be a good catch for one of the downstairs folk. The point then is that Shakespeare's social hierarchy can, for comic purposes, be flexible enough to permit one of those who has ingratiated herself to us by ingeniously performing her role as maker of comedy the good fortune of succeeding as a social climber.

Malvolio's social climbing is therefore not evil per se. In comedy, success is conferred only upon those who please us by aiding and abetting the flow of the comedy. Malvolio is the very embodiment of the anti-comic spirit and the failure of his social climbing is due not simply or primarily to the immorality and impiety of the aim itself, but to his not having as it were bribed us by affording us comic pleasure. If Malvolio had been an agent of joy and comic abandon, Shakespeare would have had little difficulty in winning the sympathy of his audience for a man who at play's end inherits rather than becomes, as he does become, dispossessed.

The critics agree that Malvolio is a loveless Snopes, and the orthodox view, based on Olivia's judgment, is that inflated self-love incapacitates him for loving others. I want to suggest that what seems to Olivia to be self-love in Malvolio is more likely to be a deficiency of self-esteem. Like all those whose work is primarily that of imposing discipline, coercing obedience, enforcing respect and orderly behavior, checking "the natural man" in whatever guise he may assume with the "civilizing" force of control, constraint, and censorship, Malvolio is well suited to this job precisely because he does not possess a well developed, assertive ego. Plato as well as Freud recognized that the natural man within us calls out Yes, Yes, to the heart's deepest desires, and, whether it be called Reason or the Superego, that which makes possible comity among men must depend heavily upon the negation of these disruptive, antisocial desires. In the dialectical tension between the impatient affirmations of freedom and the unfeeling restraints of society every man must work out his own never perfectly satisfactory compromise. Those whose social roles require, as does Malvolio's, that they be constantly saying no to others must first learn to be deaf to the alluring siren songs within themselves.
Whoever does any of society's police work must either be able to silence the powerful voice of self within himself or be so constituted as to have few or weak urgings of the kind that lead to independence of character and freedom of behavior.

If Malvolio loved himself more one can imagine him loving his policeman's work less. If this seeming self-love were genuine, Malvolio might have allowed himself to be caught up in the fun, the irresponsible high jinks, the holiday mood of the revelers. True self-love, witnessing the privileged hedonism of irresponsibility says, "Why should I be excluded? Why must I be the servant of fasting while others feast?"
Malvolio earns the enmity of the other members of Olivia's household because his over-assertiveness seems to them to be an excess of self-love. To us, this aggressive and sullen wielding of authority and the peacock air of superiority are likely to seem the very opposite of what they pretend to be: not the firm conviction of integrity but a self-destructive sense of inferiority. Malvolio acts and talks like one whose show of strength is only a fantasy, the purpose of which is to abrogate a reality that is all weakness and self-contempt. It is no accident that in the first great scene of Malvolio's comic humiliation, where he is ensnared into ludicrous courtship of his mistress, it is precisely the fantasist in Malvolio that is played upon so outrageously and brilliantly by Maria and the other wits. And, if it be objected that the motives we impute to Malvolio are too serious, too sympathetic, the reply must be that we do not necessarily sympathize more with a self-deceived puritan than a simple moral bully, and, comedy or no comedy, Malvolio is a serious character; it is precisely his seriousness that we are asked to see as comic in the context of the others' horse-play. It seems perfectly legitimate and appropriate temporarily to remove that seriousness from its comic context and consider it seriously.
I have described the comic strategies of Twelfth Night as devious. It can also be said that they are curiously unShakespearean. In particular, I refer to the emotional and moral implications of the mechanism for resolving a comic action that is analogous to catharsis in tragedy.

It is a commonplace of the critical tradition to find in Shakespeare's Falstaff the embodiment of the comic spirit. Modern scholarship has tended to reinforce this tradition by showing that Falstaff derives from the character of Vice or Riot in the medieval morality plays. Because he is Riot, Falstaff represents the principle of the transvaluation of all normal values. The comedy of the Henry IV plays inheres precisely in the subverting of the normal, sane, responsible, ordered, workaday world. One can describe this opposition between the comic and the non-comic worlds in an almost endless series of antinomies—moral, social, political, psychological; but no matter how Falstaff's comic nature is described, one is inevitably led to the recognition that the fundamental differentiating trait is in his radical transvaluating of conventional values and attitudes.

Because more than being an impresario of comedy, Falstaff is comedy, it is inevitable that Falstaff be banished, purged, symbolically sacrificed after he has outlived his comic usefulness. The pattern of the Henry IV plays seems to be an archetypal one: the sane, sober, unmagical world of work and duty is turned topsy-turvy by comic anarchy; comic anarchy flourishes, evoking in us pleasure and wonder; the forces representing what most of us unphilosophically think of as "reality" reassert themselves, thus re-establishing a world that, whatever else it may be, is always a non-comic one.

This re-establishing of a non-comic world is, of course, equivalent to the return to a non-tragic world in tragic works. Indeed, the whole pattern is more than similar in comedy and tragedy: in both there is a radical overturning of that gray reality we all know best, followed by a return to equilibrium at every level at which the disharmony and disequilibrium had previously existed. What comedy and tragedy have in common is that in both a kind of insanity (one terrible, the other delightful) has been allowed to reign and is then purged.

Everything that has given us pleasure in Henry IV took place under the aegis of Falstaff. No wonder we are saddened and perhaps even indignant when we are forced to witness the humiliation of the fantastic creature that made all of this possible. The tensions of tragedy become increasingly intolerable and we demand that they be resolved. But we want the holidaying of comedy to go on and on—in our dreams, even forever. In both cases, however, we understand that life always provides a Fortinbras to insure that man and society will survive and that, for a similar but antithetical reason, King Henrys, judges, wives, babies, and empty cupboards contrive to bring the raptures of a comic holiday to an end.

There is no Falstaff in Twelfth Night; there are only those grossly inferior comedians, Feste, Maria, Toby, and Aguecheek and—quintessential antagonist to everything that Falstaff is and represents, that harsh and melancholy voice of the anti-comic spirit: Malvolio.

How clever of Shakespeare to get us to believe that puritanism is bad or ugly—so at least hundreds of college students of Shakespeare have unanimously believed—when in fact Malvolio's fundamental sin (I am tempted to say his only sin) is that in his very being he threatens the comic, holiday world that Maria, Feste and company are so gaily creating. It is irrelevant that Shakespeare the man may have loathed puritanism and everything it stood for. In this play, Malvolio's puritanism is a pretext, a convenient catch-all for traits and attitudes inimical to the lovely anarchy of comedy. He must be humiliated, gulled, baited, scourged, made to suffer the melancholy consequences of his melancholy personality, and, above all, rendered impotent so that the fever of comedy can range with full potency. If Malvolio is not the perfect mythic scapegoat, where in our literature does one find a figure who can be called a scapegoat? No, it simply will not do to say that one is sentimentalizing in describing Malvolio as a scapegoat sacrificed to the amoral, bacchanalian gods of comedy. To insist upon Malvolio's sacrificial status is not to excuse or justify his clearly repugnant personality. Least of all is it a covert plea for sympathy. Malvolio's function is to "die" a kind of comic death so that comedy may live. And so, throughout the play we see him "dying" in various ways. However, the immense—and in my opinion, unsatisfactorily resolved—problem arises when the comedy itself, as is always the case, must "die." What does—what can—the dramatist do with Malvolio at that point?

The logic that ought to impose itself upon Shakespeare would seem to be as follows: since the reestablishing of the non-comic world in Henry IV requires the literal and symbolic sacrificing of the patron of riot and comedy who is Falstaff, the same strategic necessities in Twelfth Night ought to allow Malvolio, by virtue of his antithetical role, to come into his own with the "dying" of the comedy. He is the patron of the non-comic and it would seem natural that he should preside over the re-establishment of the hegemony of the non-comic that ends the play. But Shakespeare has provided himself with no machinery and aroused in us no expectations that would permit Malvolio to receive the blessing of a magic (and thus appropriately comic) and symbolic rebirth. Lodged uncomfortably at the center of this genial, loving, musical comedy is the harsh, unpurged punitive fate of Malvolio. Olivia says, "He hath been most notoriously abus'd"; and that is the only soft chord in the dissonant Malvolio music.

Let us be perfectly clear about this point. If Shakespeare is "unfair" in his treatment of Malvolio it is not in the severity of the punishments meted out to him during the course of the play; it is in Shakespeare's trying to have it both ways. Denier of comedy and its claims that Malvolio is, by comedy's standards he "deserves" his fate, but, when the resolution of the action itself denies, negates, "kills" the comedy, one expects that with the return to the world that Malvolio has been immolated for upholding, Malvolio himself will have his day. But Malvolio has been totally discredited in serving this world. He is like the politician who lives to see his name become anathema while the principles that soiled his good name, having once been defeated, return triumphantly. But these principles, miraculously, are no longer associated with the man who gave them their name.

Malvolio is Shakespeare's comic Coriolanus, a man beset by the wolves who are his enemies and the jackals who are or ought to be his friends. In America no one loves a cop—even when he's called a policeman. In Illyria the natives are apparently no different, and even light-hearted Illyrian comedy turns out to be a cannibalistic affair, at bottom.

David Willbern

[Wilbern discusses the carnal side of Twelfth Night, asserting that Malvolio's repressed desire is reciprocal to the lover's indulgence. The critic maintains that Malvolio's social aspirations are motivated by a desire to sleep with Olivia. However, as Malvolio fails to keep separate his covert desire from his overt behavior, he is undone by his desire, and becomes the butt of the merrymakers' fun. The critic considers Shakespeare's wordplay in the letter supposedly from Olivia, suggesting that it provides insight into the psychology of Malvolio the censor, and into Shakespeare's erotic play with language. Malvolio's actions after his gulling resemble someone who is possessed, which is explained by the critic as a parallel to the basic scheme of a medieval Morality Play. The critic also considers the tension created by Malvolio in the final act, pointing out that it is typical of Shakespearean comedies to leave elements of irresolution in the finale. Willbern speculates on the hidden meaning of the cryptogram Sir Andrew questions, explaining that it represents a secret carnality at the heart of the play. He points out that festivity and loss are presented as reciprocal, and erotic desire and symbolic death are intermixed, creating a tone of romantic melancholy. Finally he compares Feste and Malvolio as symbolic brothers.]

Malvolio, that humorless steward, sick of merrymakers and self-love, seems almost a stranger to the festive world of Illyria. His very first words reveal his acrimonious opinion of Feste, the soul of festivity [quotations from The Riverside Shakespeare, 1974]:

Everything about Malvolio's character sets him apart from frivolity.

Even his vocabulary isolates Malvolio. When he chastises a rowdy Sir Toby by demanding "Is there no respect of place, person, nor time in you?" Toby quips, "We did keep time, sir, in our catches" (II. iii. 91-94). For the solemn steward and the carousing knight, the word "time" has different meanings. Malvolio hears only a cacophonous violation of decorum; Toby hears only melody and lyrics. When, a few lines later, Toby and Feste "converse" with Malvolio in song, Malvolio simply does not understand (II. iii. 102 ff.).

But while Malvolio may have no use for festivity, festivity has considerable use for him. In the paragraphs that follow, I shall consider the steward's collision with the merrymakers, the nature of the damage he suffers, and its relevance to the general theme of festivity.

When Malvolio falls into Maria's cunning trap and makes his sole concession to frivolity by donning yellow cross-garters, the desires he has previously hidden beneath a staid composure suddenly emerge exultant. On the surface Malvolio's wish is to be a social climber, "to be Count Malvolio." Yet there is a deeper desire here, and even though cross-gartering "does make some obstruction in the blood," as he complains, it does not obstruct an unwitting expression of the steward's strongest yearning: to sleep with his lady Olivia. In the forged letter scene, he alludes to a daydream of "having come from a day-bed, where I have left Olivia sleeping" (II. v. 48-49). And he jumps eagerly at an imagined opportunity when Olivia, thinking that a man who dresses so oddly and smiles so incessantly must be deranged, suggests rest: "Wilt thou go to bed, Malvolio?" she asks. "To bed?" he exclaims. "Ay, sweet heart, and I'll come to thee" (III. iv. 29-31).

But Malvolio's latent sexual wishes are also evident in his reading of the forged letter. While his fantasy of leaving Olivia in their shared day-bed is romantic enough, his remark to Toby about fortune "having cast me on your niece" (II. v. 69-70) may be less so, and his spelling lesson betrays the crudest carnality. "By my life," he swears, "this is my lady's hand. These be her very c's, her u's, and her t's, and thus makes she her great P's." After thus spelling out the carnal focus of his fantasies, he sounds out the word itself, hidden within a term of disdain: "It is, in contempt of question, her hand" (II. v. 86-88). It must have been important to Shakespeare that the bawdy secret be heard, for Andrew immediately repeats, "Her c's, her u's, and her t's: Why that?"

Some fine and famous Shakespeareans have been unable or unwilling to hear the answer to this question. Arthur Innes reasoned in 1895 [in A New Variorum Edition of Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, or, What you Will, 1901] that "probably Shakespeare merely named letters that would sound well." [In The Complete Works of Shakespeare, 1971], G. L. Kittredge considered Andrew's question "impossible to answer." Once the bawdy note is sounded, of course, the question is embarrassingly easy to answer.

In one sense, the event illustrates Shakespeare's insight into the psychology of the bluenose censor, secretly fascinated by and desirous of the eroticism he contemns. But it may also demonstrate Shakespeare's playful insight into his own wordplay, so frequently erotic. As the body lies at the basis of metaphor, bawdiness is basic to much punning: playing around with language.

But Malvolio is not playing; he is being played, for a fool. His hidden desire emerges, but only cryptically. Later, Feste, with his characteristically well-disguised perspicacity, mockingly underscores Malvolio's latent wantonness. "Sir Topas, Sir Topas, good Sir Topas," cries Malvolio from his prison, "Go to my lady." To which the dissembling Feste replies, "Out, hyperbolical fiend! how vexest thou this man! Talkest thou nothing but of ladies?" (IV. ii. 23-26). Until his surrender to festivity, Malvolio's black suit and anti-comic bearing have concealed his "fiend"; now it is out in the open.

Up to the moment of his fall, Malvolio had been able to keep his overt behavior and his covert desires neatly separate, thereby maintaining the condition he had earlier demanded of Toby the reveler: "If you can separate yourself and your misdemeanors, you are welcome to the house" (II. iii. 98-99). But Malvolio's careful division between act and desire, reason and fantasy, collapses when he falls into Maria's trap, even though he himself is certain he has maintained it yet. "I do not now fool myself," he asserts, "to let imagination jade me, for every reason excites to this, that my lady loves me" (II. v. 164-65). From the inverted perspective in which reason "excites" rather than informs, Malvolio finds the way to shape the letter in terms of himself, and then to reform himself in terms of the letter: "M. O. A. I. ... If I could make that resemble something in me!" (II. v. 109-20). It requires only a little "crush" to make the fit. Excited by false reasons, his reason fails him. His "madness" is thus his conviction that he is not mad, his illusion of maintaining control over circumstances when in fact he has lost control. "O peace!" Fabian cautions the impatient Andrew as they watch Malvolio drawing the net more tightly about himself: "Now he's deeply in. Look how imagination blows him" (II. v. 42-43). As he cleverly deciphers the forged letter, Malvolio believes that his supreme reason is shaping his destiny: "Thou art made," he reads, "if thou desir'st to be so" (II. v. 155). Instead of making him, however, his desire unmakes him. His efforts to reform his image lead to disgrace: a fall from grace which is not only personal and social, but has spiritual resonance as well.

Feste is not merely joking when he refers to Malvolio's "fiend." For indeed, the steward behaves, as Toby and Maria maliciously observe, as though he were "possessed." Maria claims that "Yond gull Malvolio is turn'd heathen, a very renegado; for there is no Christian that means to be sav'd by believing rightly can ever believe such impossible passages of grossness. He's in yellow stockings" (III. ii. 69-73). Malvolio's plight is comical, of course, but there is an undercurrent of seriousness throughout. Malvolio surely means to be saved by believing rightly, but erroneous beliefs and impure desires have placed his soul in precarious balance. A bit of Feste's seeming nonsense clarifies the situation. After paralleling himself and Malvolio (incarcerated) with the medieval figures of Vice and Devil, Feste departs with a song whose final line is "Adieu, goodman devil" (IV. u. 120-31). A typical Festean riddle, the phrase makes appropriate sense. It is a syntactic representation of the basic Morality Play scheme: "man" is centered between "good" and "devil" and should turn in the right direction, "a Dieu." This moment of mini-allegory prefigures Feste's later banter with Orsino, when the Duke tells the clown, "O, you give me ill counsel," and Feste continues: "Put your grace in your pocket, sir, for this once, and let your flesh and blood obey it" (V. i. 31-33). Feste's counsel echoes the voice of the archdeceiver, perched on his victim's left shoulder: "let your flesh and blood run free," he advises, "just for this once. Don't worry about your soul, just hide it and the possibility of grace away temporarily, 'in your pocket, sir.'" Such brief transgressions, however, will not be forgotten. "Pleasure will be paid," Feste reminds us, "one time or another" (II. iv. 70-71).

The underlying seriousness of Malvolio's fall is further suggested by the nature of the punishment he suffers. On one level, he is imprisoned for the "madness" of being rigidly sane in a frivolous world. On another level, his humbling is a direct rebuke to his social-climbing aspirations. On a yet deeper level, he is punished for his hidden concupiscence, with the punishment combining various symbolic "deaths." Malvolio is not only mortified; metaphorically he is also mortally assaulted, killed, and buried. "I have dogg'd him," gloats Toby, "like his murtherer" (III. ii. 76). The steward who wanted to possess his lady is instead thrown into a small dark hole; having wished for a bed, he finds a grave. He complains to Feste, the singer of "Come away, come away, death, / And in sad cypress let me be laid" (II. iv. 51-52), saying that "they have laid me here in hideous darkness" (IV. ii. 29-30) Malvolio does symbolically "die," but not as he had hoped; his is not the sexual death of Feste's ambiguous song, but the comic scapegoat death of a victimized gull.

Even when released from his symbolic cell, however, the unrepentant steward refuses to participate in the lovers' celebrations. Faced again with merriment, he steadfastly clings to sobriety. His letter to Olivia from his cell—signed, accurately, "the madly-us'd Malvolio"— is calm, reasonable, and correctly descriptive of his treatment (V. i. 302-11). His only request is "Tell me why."

> Why have you suffer'd me to be imprison'd,
> Kept in a dark house, visited by the priest,
> And made the most notorious geek and gull
> That e'er invention play'd on? Tell me why!
> (V. i. 341-44)

He receives no answer, and although Olivia promises him future justice, he is not appeased. The steward who earlier declared to Toby, Maria, and Fabian, "I am not of your element" (III. iv. 124), is thus alone at play's end. While Feste remains to sing his lovely and melancholy song, Malvolio exits, snarling promised revenge.

As Malvolio departs, he leaves behind an unresolved conclusion to the play, taking with him the key to any clear resolution. For all its conventional comic devices of repaired unions, the ending of Twelfth Night is indeterminate. We look for the settlement of disputes and the reunion of fragmented relationships, "confirm'd by mutual joinder of their hands," as the priest says of Olivia and Sebastian (V. i. 157). But though the final scene of Twelfth Night is in fact constructed so as to allow "mutual joinder," no such resolution occurs. The prolonged hesitation of Viola and Sebastian to identify each other which includes a careful scrutiny of all the evidence (names, sex, moles, age, clothing) finally results not in any embrace of recognition but in Viola's odd provision of postponement:

> Do not embrace me till each circumstance
> Of place, time, fortune, do cohere and jump
> That I am Viola.
> (V. i. 251-53)

One expects a coherence of circumstance place, time, and fortune at the conclusion of a successful comedy—and Twelfth Night has often been viewed as a paradigm of the form. But Shakespeare deliberately defers a denouement, and the play ends before we see one enacted. Viola maintains that the resumption of her true identity depends upon the old captain who brought her to Illyria, the captain who has kept her "maiden weeds." The captain, however, has been jailed by Malvolio, "upon some action" (V. i. 275-76). Malvolio is therefore essential to a final resolution of the plot; the ultimate coherence of time and circumstance depends upon the mistreated gull. When he stalks out, swearing revenge, he also disrupts the plot, refusing to fulfill his essential role in the final "mutual joinder." Orsino commands, "Pursue him and entreat him to a peace; he hath not told us of the captain yet" (V. i. 380-81). But we hear no more from Malvolio, nor from anyone else, for the play almost immediately concludes, with the loose ends of its unfinished plot knotted abruptly into Feste's final song.

Similar gestures of irresolution occur at the end of almost all of Shakespeare's comedies—as though he was habitually skeptical of the resolutions the genre typically provided. Whether through hints of failed marriage at the end of As You Like It, or the sudden mournful disruption at the end of Love's Labor's Lost, or the preposterous rapid-fire revelations at the end of Cymbeline, Shakespeare usually complicates the conventional comic ending, stressing the fragility of its artifice. As Feste's concluding song suggests in Twelfth Night, the momentary pleasures of plays and other toys are only transient episodes in a larger season of folly, thievery, drunkenness, and old age. To the extent that the tidy finales of conventional comedies deny such larger, extradramatic realities, Shakespeare seems to have been uneasy with them: the ending of The Tempest is his final manifestation of this uneasiness.

An aspect of Shakespeare's distrust of romantic conventions underlies Malvolio's spelling lesson, to return to that scene for a moment. I want to ask Andrew Aguecheek's question once more, and offer a speculative answer. "Her c's, her u's, and her t's: why that?" Why, indeed? Why does Shakespeare so carefully embed this grossest of verbal improprieties in a play which even Eric Partridge [in Shakespeare's Bawdy, (1968)] calls "the cleanest comedy except *A Midsummer Night's Dream"?"

One answer involves what Shakespeare evidently considered the natural and undeniable bases of human behavior. The romantic comedy of Twelfth Night transmutes our basic appetites, sublimating carnal hunger into romantic yearning: food becomes music, as Orsino's opening speech reveals (but melancholy music, with "a dying fall"). Twelfth Night enacts an elaborate dance around a central core of carnality, which Malvolio's unconscious cryptogram literally spells out. The idealized festivity of Twelfth Night is to its secret erotic core as the innocent Maypole dance is to the symbol around which it revolves—except that the joys and celebrations of Maygames are muted in Shakespeare's play by wintry, "dying" tones of mourning and loss. Erotic desire and symbolic death intermix throughout the play, creating a continuous undertone of romantic melancholy best personified in the figure of Feste. Festivity and loss are presented as reciprocal: carnival is a farewell to the carnal (carne-vale).

What makes Twelfth Night ultimately so melancholy, however, is not the sounding of these baser tones in the music of love, but the futile (albeit beautiful) effort spent trying to deny the facts of desire and death with the artificial toys of romantic wish-fulfillment. Finally it won't work. In retrospect, the festive fantasy of innocent indulgence looks like another version of the puritanical Malvolio's effort to deny or repudiate base carnal desire. Illyria's romanticism is psychologically reciprocal to Malvolio's rigidity and restraint: both represent denials and sublimations. Feste's final song seems to admit the futility of both defenses against the real world.

For all their mutual antipathy, Malvolio and Feste are symbolic brothers: both estranged from yet integral to the festive yet melancholy world of Illyria. To achieve a comic world of reunion and restoration, it is necessary to omit or deny or banish their respective melancholies. But, since melancholy preceded and prompted the merriment, this is impossible. Malvolio therefore retreats to his threats of vengeance, Feste to his ambiguous lyric. Finally both characters withdraw from the comic world. But without them and the impulses of restraint and love they represent, that comic world has no motivation, no "reason" for being.

At Malvolio's fall we laughed all. Yet without the (scape) goat, there would have been no carnival to provide either the fall or the merriment attending it.

Historical Criticism of Twelfth Night: Feste

Alan S. Downer

Downer examines Feste's role as the fool in Twelfth Night, which allows Feste to speak freely and peel away the pretenses of the other characters. He is a pivotal figure in the play, and his presence elevates the play above the level of a mere romantic farce. Feste operates in each of the three subplots to round off the action of the play: first, Orsino must understand the nature of true love so he may marry Viola; second, Malvolio's inflated sense of self must be punctured; and third, Sebastian must take Viola's place in Olivia's heart. By speaking the truth, he ensures that his lord and lady will not be fools, and he closes the play with a song.

... Feste is disguised both in costume and in behavior. His suit is motley, the uniform of the Fool, and he carries the tabor and perhaps the bauble as his badge of office. When, however, Olivia calls him a fool-and we must return to this scene again-he points out that "cucculus non facit monachum [the cowl doesn't make the monk]." And as the man inside the monk's robe may be anything but a monk in spirit, so he, Feste, wears not motley in his brain. His disguise, like Viola's, is a kind of protection; he is an allowed fool and may speak frankly what other men, in other disguises, must say only to themselves. ...
Feste's whole art and function depend upon his talents as a "notable corrupter of words," and he has much wisdom to utter on what we should probably call the problem of semantics. He concludes one wit combat by declaring that "words are grown so false that I am loath to prove reason with them." In many ways he is the central figure of the play, the symbol of its meaning. The plot could get on without him, no doubt; his practical function as message-bearer could be taken over by Fabian, who has little enough to keep him busy. But he is no mere embellishment. Without Feste, Twelfth Night would not be the enduring comedy it is but another romantic farce like The Comedy of Errors. Twelfth Night is Feste's night.

The Fool is as conventional in Shakespearean comedy as the intriguing slave or parasite in Plautus or Moliere. But, while Feste shares some of the characteristics of Tranio-Phormio-Sganarelle, he does not, like them, dazzle our eyes by juggling the elements of the plot into a complex pattern which only he can sort out for the necessary fortunate conclusion. Until the last act of the play, he does little but jest or sing. But for all his failure to take a positive part in the intrigue-emphasized perhaps when he drops out of the baiting of Malvolio—for all that he is not, that is to say, a protagonist, he nonetheless propounds the theme which gives Twelfth Night its unity and makes a single work of art out of what might have been a gorgeous patchwork.

A brief examination of the matter of the comedy will suggest the basis for such a conclusion. Twelfth Night is compounded of two, perhaps three, "plots," more or less independent actions, each of which must be rounded off before the play is concluded. In the first, Duke Orsino's eyes must be opened to the true nature of love that he may marry Viola; in the second, Malvolio must be reduced from the deluded superman to fallible humanity; in the third, which is closely tied with the first, Sebastian must be substituted for Viola in the affections of Olivia.

The structure is skilfully contrived not only to keep all three plots going and maintain a reasonable connection among them but to emphasize the similarity of their themes. Like most panoramic drama, the play may be divided into three organic movements rather than the meaningless editorial division into five acts. The first of these movements, from the introduction of Orsino to Viola's discovery that she has charmed Olivia (I, 1-II, 3), is concerned almost exclusively with establishing the triangular love affair. Toby, Andrew, and Maria are brought on to whet our appetites for their plot, and, just before the movement ends, Sebastian appears that we may be reassured all will come right before the play is over. However, we should note a speech of Feste's made to Maria during his first appearance (I, 5), in which he refers obliquely to the common subject of the separate actions: "If Sir Toby would leave drinking, thou wert as witty a piece of Eve's flesh as any in Illyria." If all were as it should be and according to the order of nature, Toby would wed Maria. But Toby drinks, and the Duke loves Olivia, and Olivia (as we shall see in a moment) loves Viola. All most unnatural.

In the second movement (II, 3-IV, I) the love triangle remains unchanged, and the trapping of Malvolio occupies most of the action. We observe the offense for which he is to be punished, the plotting of revenge, and the success of the scheme. Sebastian has again made only a token appearance, but in the final scene of the movement (III, 4) all three actions are brought together with the greatest of ease as the deluded Malvolio is handed over to Toby, and Andrew and Viola are inveigled into a duel from which both are rescued by the intervention and arrest of Sebastian's friend, Antonio.

The final movement, the last two acts of the play, is in a sense Sebastian's. Mistaken for Viola, he brings about a fortunate unknotting of the love tangle, rescues his friend Antonio from the clutches of the Duke, and forces a confession of their machinations from Toby and company. The point to notice here is that Feste is the character who, innocently enough, drives Sebastian into Olivia's arms. It is Feste's only direct contribution to the action of the play; it is also the single decisive action which cuts the comic knot; and it is a visual dramatic symbol of his relationship to the whole play. It is the action of a man whose professional function is to perceive and declare the true state of affairs in the face of scorn, threats, and discouragement from the self-deluded. Shakespeare has in fact prepared us for this action at several important points earlier in the play.
On his first appearance, with Maria, Feste demonstrates not only that he is able to more than hold his own in a wit combat but that he is shrewd enough to see the true state of affairs in the household. A moment later, with the license of an allowed fool, he is demonstrating to Olivia the folly of her resolution to withdraw from the world for seven years in mourning for her brother.

FESTE: Good madonna, why mournest thou?
OLIVIA: Good fool, for my brother's death.
FESTE: I think his soul is in hell, madonna.
OLIVIA: I know his soul is in heaven, fool.
FESTE: The more fool, madonna, to mourn for your brother's soul, being in heaven.
Taken away the fool, gentlemen
[I, 5, 72-78].

The little passage is in the most artificial of dialogue forms, stichomythia, and it is perhaps only a bit of logic-chopping, but it presents the common-sense view of a sentimental and un-Christian attitude. The exposure of Olivia takes place in the first movement of the play. In the second movement Feste undertakes to tell the Duke a few plain truths, but, since the undeceiving of the mighty is ticklish business, he goes about it in an oblique manner.

Shakespeare has introduced the Duke in a most ambiguous way. To him falls an opening speech as rich in texture and sound as any love poetry in the language. To him also falls an attitude that cannot fail to win both our admiration and our exasperation. We admire his constancy, that is, but are somewhat impatient with his refusal to "take his answer." Further, if we accept him at his own evaluation as presented in his speeches, his sudden switch to Viola in the last scene becomes pure comic convention without reason or meaning, a botched-up happy ending.

But, if we have been beguiled by our own sentimentality into sympathy with the Duke, Feste will set us right, and most particularly in that romantic scene (II, 4) where he has been thrust in to sing the song which Viola seems not prepared to perform. It is as early in the morning as the love-smitten Duke would arise from bed. He enters, calling at once for music, and requests Cesario (that is, Viola) for that "old and antique song" they heard last night. While his servant Curio goes in search of Feste to sing it, Orsino proceeds to analyze it for us. The description is famous and explicit:

It is old and plain,
The spinsters and the knitters in the sun,
And the free maids that weave their thread with bones,
Do use to chant it. It is silly sooth,
And dallies with the innocence of love
Like the old age
[II, 4, 44-49].

That is, a simple song, presumably a folk song or ballad, fit accompaniment to a household task. It is a love song, but not impassioned, not from the point of view of fervent youth. It dallies with the harmless pleasure of love as if the experience were but the memory of the old, a memory recollected in tranquillity. Whereupon Feste sings:

Come away, come away, death,
And in sad cypress let me be laid.
Fly away, fly away, breath,
I'm slain by a fair cruel maid
My shroud of white, stuck all with yew,
O prepare it! My part of death, no one so true
Did share it.

In the second stanza the love imagery becomes more extravagant.

Not a flower, not a flower sweet,
On my black coffin let there be strown;
Not a friend, not a friend greet
My poor corpse, where my bones shall be thrown.
A thousand, thousand sighs to save,
Lay me, O where Sad, true lover ne'er find my grave,
To weep there.

Without the original music, which cannot be traced, it is impossible to say for certain, but, from the striking difference between the song as anticipated and the song as sung, Feste seems to have been mocking, indirectly, the Duke's passion. "Come away, death" is indeed a love song, but it can hardly be said to dally with the innocence of love. This would explain the Duke's abrupt, "There's for thy pains," and his immediate dismissal, not only of the singer, but of his entire court. Perhaps he is afraid that there may have been some sniggering behind his back as Feste sang. There is just a hint in the play that his household is a little wearied of his unavailing pursuit of Olivia.

And Feste, going off, dares a parting thrust. "Now the melancholy god protect thee," he says, and bids him put to sea to make a good voyage of nothing. In this scene, I suggest, Feste "exposes" the Duke as he has earlier exposed Olivia. By mocking them both, he points out that their loves are sentimental and foolish. And the Duke, unlike Olivia, is angry. He dismisses his attendants and sends Viola once more to "same sovereign cruelty," with a stubborn determination to act out the role he has cast himself in.

With this as a clue to his character, the actor of course has it in his power to make evident the Duke's melancholy, his fashionable love-sickness, from the start. In the first scene, even in his gorgeous opening set-piece, he is plainly worshiping love for its own sake and fostering his emotion for sentimental purposes. His first words demand that the music play on, that he may experience again his pleasurable mood of Thwarted Lover. For all the beauty of the verse, the attitude is distinctly unhealthy. He must have music for his love to feed on, even upon arising in the morning; or, for a substitute, a garden of sweet-scented flowers. And is he not, like Romeo in the throes of puppy love for the equally unresponsive Rosaline, "best when least in company"?

The parallel exposing of Malvolio, which is capped by Feste in the third movement, is the clearest statement of the theme in action, since it is unencumbered by romantic love, an element which can blind an audience to the true state of affairs as effectively as it can blind the romantic lovers. Malvolio, in this play, is plain text.

As Olivia's steward he is sufficiently in charge of her affairs to bring suit against a sea captain for dereliction of duty; as her butler, he is ready with falsehoods to defend her privacy; as her would-be husband, he has prepared schemes for the proper and efficient conduct of their household. These are all admirable traits for his several capacities: the alert businessman, the devoted servant, the careful husband. But there is a fault in him, an obvious fault. There is something too much of the cold gaze from half-shut eyes down the prominent beak, something too much of the demure travel of regard. Malvolio would not only be virtuous, he would have others so, and he would define the term. It is a cause of delight to discover that the elegant creature with snow-broth in his veins, so superior to the drunken carousing of Toby, the witty trifling of Feste, the dalliance of Olivia—that this man of virtue is only human, like ourselves. And in this exposure, that the whirligig of time may bring his revenges, Feste is permitted to play the visually dominant part.
The action is so arranged that, of all the conspirators, only Feste has a scene alone with Malvolio, in which, for nobody's pleasure but his own, he teases and torments the benighted steward and reduces the proud man to a state of wretched groveling: "I tell thee," cries Malvolio at last, "I am as well in my wits as any man in Illyria," and Feste replies, "Well-a-day that you were, sir."

This does not seem to be idly spoken. Feste is saying that he wishes Malvolio were not sick of self-love but like a normal Illyrian. Like Toby, for example, who would go to church in a galliard and return in a coranto, and whose fair round belly symbolizes his philosophy, that there is a place for cakes and ale even in a world turning Puritan. The point is made simply and emphatically, with Feste solus on the stage, and Malvolio perhaps clamoring behind the Judas window of the stage door: the Elizabethan equivalent of a motion-picture close-up-on Feste.

Thus it is Feste's function in both parts of the action to make plain to the audience the artificial, foolish attitudes of the principal figures. Malvolio loves himself, Orsino loves love, and Olivia loves a ghost. This, says Feste, is unnatural, against common sense. In this similarity of situation and Feste's single-minded attitude in each case lies the unity of Twelfth Night, its theme.

Feste states it clearly. Since he is primarily a singing fool, he states it in song:

What is love? 'Tis not hereafter;
    Present mirth hath present laughter. . . .
    Youth's a stuff will not endure.

Feste's philosophy is as old as the hills, as old as the comic attitude, the acceptance of the facts of life. His philosophy, however, goes somewhat deeper than a mere sentimental optimism.

Journeys end in lovers' meeting
    Every wise man's son doth know.

As a wise man's son, or as an understanding fool, he sees to it that there shall be a meeting of true lovers at the end of the journey of Viola and Sebastian. In his scene with Malvolio he even discards his priestly disguise and appears in his own motley to restore the vision of the self-blinded man. And, by his introduction of Sebastian to Olivia, he makes possible the shedding of all disguises both physical and spiritual at the denouement.

Critical opinion has been somewhat divided about Feste. There is general agreement about his remarkable clean-spokenness; he has been called the merriest of Shakespeare's fools, and the loneliest. He has been taken to be the symbol of misrule that governs the Twelfth Night activities. Yet, when the recognition scene is over, all the characters romantically paired off, Malvolio reduced to a very human bellow-"I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you!"-and Feste prepares to sing his foolish little epilogue, does he not seem to be something more than merry, or lonely, or the spirit of misrule?

Observe him, alone on the great stage which is the emptier for the departure of the grandly dressed ladies and gentlemen who have crowded it during the last scene, and the quieter after the vigorous excitement that attended the denouement: the twins united, the marriage and betrothal, the explosion of Malvolio, the brawling of Andrew and Toby. Feste is perhaps older than the other characters, "a fool that the Lady Olivia's father took much delight in." But he has been, for a fool, a rather quiet character; no loud, bawdy jokes and very little slapstick. His brain is not parti-colored: cucullus non facit monachum. As Viola observes:

This fellow's wise enough to play the fool,
    And to do that well craves a kind of wit.
```
He must observe their mood on whom he jests
The quality of persons and the time,
Not, like the haggard, check at every feather
That comes before his eye.
This is a practice
As full of labor as a wise man's art.

It is the function of this fool to speak the truth, however quizzically he must phrase it. It is his task to persuade his lord and lady not to be fools. It is the task of comedy, too.

And now he is alone. Now he sings his lonely, foolish song:

When that I was and a little tiny boy
With hey, ho, the wind and the rain, etc.

Perhaps it is not so foolish. There is one constant thing in this world, he says, the facts of nature, the wind and the rain that raineth every day. Thieves may be shut out and evil men by bars and locks but not the rain that raineth every day. Like a true jester, he makes a little joke out of his moral. When he took a wife, he planned to be master in his own house, but nature defeated him, for it is the order of nature that men shall be henpecked, and suffer from hangovers, as surely as the rain shall fall. He emphasizes the antiquity of his wisdom:

A great while ago, the world began
With hey, ho, the wind and the rain.

Then, with a quizzical smile, as if to say, "I have made my point, or the comedy has made it for me; no need to quote history-"he slips into the epilogue pattern we have been awaiting:

But that's all one, our play is done,
And we'll strive to please you every day.

It is, after all, as he reminds us, just a play. But it has its purpose for being, just as the great tragedies have. Twelfth Night is Feste's night, and we may look to be well edified when the Fool delivers the Madmen.

Joan Hartwig

[Hartwig analyzes the relationship between Malvolio and Feste, suggesting that while Feste claims Malvolio's humiliation is "the whirligig of time" bringing its revenge back on Malvolio, it is really the result of Feste and Maria manipulating Malvolio by human means to achieve their own revenge. While Malvolio praises divine intervention when he finds the letter, believing that what Fate has decreed must be, he fails to anticipate the intrusion of Feste and Maria. When Malvolio is faced with the discrepancy between what he wants, and what really is, he refuses to broaden his spectrum of reality and is confronted by the possibility of madness. In the same way that Feste manipulates Malvolio into an unpredictable position, so comic providence leads the audience to an unexpected finale.]

Shakespeare's plays frequently counterpose the powers of human and of suprahuman will, and the antithesis usually generates a definition of natures, both human and suprahuman. These definitions vary, however, according to the play. For instance, Hamlet's "providence" does not seem the same as the darker, equivocating power that encourages Macbeth to pit his will against a larger order; and these controls differ from Diana and Apollo in the later plays, Pericles and The Winter's Tale. Furthermore, Hamlet's submission and Macbeth's submission to non-human controls (if indeed they do submit their individual wills) cannot be understood as the same action or even to imply the same kind of human vision.

Many of the conflicts of Twelfth Night seem to be concerned with the contest between human will and suprahuman control; yet, the latter manifests itself in various ways and is called different names by the characters themselves. As each contest between the human will and another designer works itself out, the involved characters recognize that their will is fulfilled, but not according to their planning. The individual's will is finally secondary to a design that benevolently, but unpredictably, accords with what he truly desires.
For example, when Olivia, at the end of Act I, implores Fate to accord with her will in allowing her love for Cesario to flourish, she has no idea that her will must be circumvented for her own happiness. Yet the substitution of Sebastian for Cesario in her love fulfills her wishes more appropriately than her own design could have done. Inversely, when Duke Orsino says in the opening scene that he expects to replace Olivia's brother in her "debt of love," he doesn't realize that literally he will become her "brother" (I.i.34-40)

As the closing moments of the play bring Olivia and the Duke together on the stage for the only time, she says to him, "think me as well a sister as a wife" (V.i.307); and the Duke responds in kind: "Madam, I am most apt
t' embrace your offer," and a bit later, "Meantime, sweet sister, / We will not part from hence" (V.i.310, 373-74). The Duke had not understood the literal force of his prediction, but his early statement of his hope plants a subtle suggestion for the audience. When the play's action accords with Duke Orsino's "will," the discrepancy between intention and fulfillment is a delightful irony which points again to the fact that "what you will" may be realized, but under conditions which the human will cannot manipulate. Orsino's desire to love and be loved, on the other hand, is fulfilled by his fancy's true queen, Viola, more appropriately than his design for Olivia would have allowed.

The one character whose true desires are not fulfilled in the play is Malvolio. His hope to gain Olivia in marriage results in public humiliation at the hands of Feste, who takes obvious satisfaction in being able to throw Malvolio's former haughty words back at him under their new context of Malvolio's demonstrated foolishness:

> Why, 'some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrown upon them.' I was one, sir, in this interlude, one Sir Topas, sir; but that's all one. 'By the Lord, fool, I am not mad!' But do you remember, 'Madam, why laugh you at such a barren rascal? An you smile not, he's gagged?' And thus the whirligig of time brings in his revenges.
(V.i.360-66)

Feste's assertion that the "whirligig of time" has brought this revenge upon Malvolio neglects the fact that Maria has been the instigator and Feste the enforcer of the plot to harass Malvolio. Time's design, insofar as Malvolio is concerned, depends upon Maria's and Feste's will, which differs significantly from a central point that the main plot makes—that human will is not the controller of events. The characters in the main plot learn from the play's confusing action that human designs are frequently inadequate for securing "what you will,"
and that a design outside their control brings fulfillment in unexpected ways. Feste's fallacy, of course, makes the results of the subplot seem to be the same as the results of the main plot, but Time's revenges on Malvolio are primarily human revenges, and this particular measure for measure is thoroughly within human control.
Feste's justice allows no mitigation for missing the mark in human action; and the incipient cruelty that his precise justice manifests is felt, apparently, by other characters in the play.

When Olivia and her company hear Malvolio's case, she responds with compassion: "Alas, poor fool, how have they baffled thee! . . . He hath been most notoriously abused" (V.i.359, 368). Duke Orsino, upon hearing Malvolio's letter of explanation, comments, "This savors not much of distraction" (V.i.304). And even Sir Toby has become uneasy about the harsh treatment of Malvolio in the imprisonment scene: "I would we were well rid of this knavery. If he may be conveniently delivered, I would he were; for I am now so far in offense with my niece that I cannot pursue with any safety this sport to the upshot” (IV.ii.66-70). Actually, to place the responses into this sequence reverses the play’s order; and we should consider the fact that Shakespeare builds toward a compassionate comment, with Olivia’s statement climaxing an unwillingness to condone the actions of Feste and Maria in gulling Malvolio—at least in its last phase. Feste’s exact form of justice without mercy has always characterized revenge, and even the word “revenge” is stressed by several of the characters in the subplot. When Maria voices her apparently spontaneous plot to gull Malvolio, she says:

The devil a Puritan that he is... the best persuaded of himself; so crammed, as he thinks, with, excellencies that it is his grounds of faith that all that look on him love him; and on that vice in him will my revenge find notable cause to work. (II.iii.134-40)

Maria's successful implementation of her "revenge" elicits Sir Toby's total admiration. At the end of II.v, he exclaims, "I could marry this wench for this device" (168), and when Maria appears soon thereafter, he asks, "Wilt thou set thy foot o’ my neck?" (174). The battlefield image of the victor and the victim is mockheroic, of course; but in the final scene Fabian testifies to its literal fruition: "Maria writ / The letter, at Sir Toby’s great importance, / In recompense whereof he hath married her" (V.i.352-54). Sir Toby's submission to Maria’s will is a comic parallel for two actions: the pairing off of lovers, and the submission of the individual’s will to a design other than his own. Yet the inclusion of a parodic version of marriage-harmony in the subplot does not fully ease discomfort of the subplot’s conclusion. Fabian tries to smooth it away when he suggests that the "sportful malice" of gulling Malvolio "may rather pluck on laughter than revenge" (V.i.355-58). Neither Feste nor Malvolio seems to be convinced, however. Feste's "whirligig of time brings in his revenges," and Malvolio quits the stage with, "I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you!" (V.i.366-67). The forgiveness that should conclude the comic pattern is "notoriously" missing from the subplot and cannot be absorbed successfully by the Duke’s line, "Pursue him and entreat him to a peace." Malvolio seems unlikely to return. The major differences between the subplot and the main plot is clearest at this dramatic moment: revenge is a human action that destroys; love, graced by the sanction of a higher providence, creates a "golden time."

Feste's "whirligig" seems to be a parody of Fortune’s wheel in its inevitable turning, particularly with its suggestions of giddy swiftness and change. It provides a perfect image for the wild but symmetrical comic conclusion of the play’s action. Feste’s speech which includes it gives the appearance of completion to a mad cycle of events over which no human had much control. Only in Malvolio’s case was human control of events evident. In her forged letter, Maria caters to Malvolio’s "will" and, by encouraging him to accept his own interpretation of circumstances as his desire dictates, she leads him not only into foolishness, but also into a defense of his sanity. The discrepancy between Malvolio’s assumption that fortune is leading him on his way and the fact that Maria is in charge of his fate manifests itself clearly in the juxtaposition of her directions to the revelers (as she leaves the stage) with Malvolio’s lines as he enters:

MARIA. Get ye all three into the box tree. . . . Observe him, for the love of mockery; for I know this letter ’will make a contemplative idiot of him. Close, in the name of jesting. [The others hide] Lie thou there [throws down a letter]; for here comes the trout that must be caught with tickling. Exit.

Enter Malvolio.

MALVOLIO. ’Tis but fortune, all is fortune. Maria once told me she [Olivia] did affect me. (II.v. 13-22)

The gulling of Malvolio which follows is hilariously funny, partly because Malvolio brings it all on himself. Even before he finds the letter, his assumptions of rank and his plans for putting Sir Toby in his place elicit volatile responses from the box tree. And after he finds the forged letter, Malvolio's self-aggrandizing interpretations of the often cryptic statements evoke howls of glee mixed with the already disdainful laughter. The comedy of this scene is simple in its objective exploitation of Malvolio's self-love, and Malvolio becomes an appropriately comic butt. The audience's hilarity is probably more controlled than Sir Toby's and the box tree audience's excessive laughter; still, we are united in laughing at Malvolio's foolishness. And when Malvolio appears in his yellow stockings and cross-garters, the visual comedy encourages a total release in the fun of the game-Malvolio is gulled and we need not feel the least bit guilty, because he is marvelously unaware of his own foolishness. Oblivious to any reality but his own, Malvolio thinks he is irresistibly appealing with his repugnant dress and his continuous smiles-so contrary to his usual solemnity-and Olivia concludes that he has gone mad. "Why, this is very midsummer madness," she says, and, then, as she is leaving to receive Cesario, she commends Malvolio to Maria's care.

Good Maria, let this fellow be looked to.
Where's my cousin Toby?
Let some of my people have a special care of him.
I would not have him miscarry for the half of my dowry.
III.iv.55-58)

Malvolio misconstrues Olivia's generous concern as amorous passion and he thanks Jove for contriving circumstances so appropriately:

I have limed her; but it is Jove's doing, and Jove make me thankful. . . .
Nothing that can be can come between me and the full prospect of my hopes.
Well, Jove, not I, is the doer of this, and he is to be thanked.
(III.iv.68-77)

Malvolio's scrupulous praise of a higher designer than himself is a parodic echo of Olivia's earlier submission to Fate after she has begun to love Cesario: "What is decreed must be-and be this so!" (I.v.297). The impulses underlying Malvolio's speech (and to some extent, Olivia's speech as well) exert opposite pulls: Malvolio wants to attribute control of circumstances to Jove at the same time he wants divine identity. He attempts to simulate foreknowledge through predictive assertion: "Nothing that can be can come between me and the full prospect of my hopes." As long as events are in the hands of a non-human control, man cannot destroy or divert the predetermined order. But Malvolio cannot foresee the vindictive wit of Maria (often pronounced "Moriah"), nor can Olivia foresee the necessary substitution of Sebastian for Viola-Cesario. Each must learn that he, like the characters he wishes to control, is subject to an unpredictable will not his own. Precisely at this moment-when the character is forced to see a discrepancy between what he "wills" and what "is"-the possibility that he is mad confronts him.

Feste seems to adopt the disguise of Sir Topas to convince Malvolio that he is mad, and the imprisonment scene evokes a different response than the letter that exploits Malvolio by encouraging him to wear yellow stockings and cross-garters. In the earlier phase of the gulling, Malvolio is a comic butt after the fashion of Sir Andrew Aguecheek, unaware of his foolishness; however, imprisoned, Malvolio is a helpless victim, fully aware that he is being abused. With Olivia, his extraordinary costume and perpetual smiles make him a visible clown, and, as a result, he even seems good-humored. But with Maria and Feste in the imprisonment scene, he is not visible; we only hear him and his protestations of abuse. These different visual presentations produce a notable difference in comic effect because visual comedy often changes a serious tone in the dialogue.

In the imprisonment scene, Sir Topas keeps insisting that things are not as Malvolio perceives them; but Malvolio refuses to admit a discrepancy between what he perceives and reality. Accordingly, Malvolio insists that he is not mad.
Malvolio within.

MALVOLIO. Who calls there?

CLOWN. Sir Topas the curate, who comes to visit Malvolio the lunatic. . . .

MALVOLIO. Sir Topas, never was man thus wronged. Good Sir Topas, do not think I am mad. They have laid me here in hideous darkness.

CLOWN. Fie, thou dishonest Satan. I call thee by the most modest terms, for I am one of those gentle ones that will use the devil himself with courtesy. Say'st thou that house is dark?

MALVOLIO. As hell, Sir Topas.

CLOWN. Why, it hath bay windows transparent as barricadoes, and the clerestories toward the south north are as lustrous as ebony, and yet complainest thou of obstruction?

MALVOLIO. I am not mad, Sir Topas I say to you this house is dark.

CLOWN. Madman, thou errest. I say there is no darkness but ignorance, in which thou art more puzzled than the Egyptians in their fog.

MALVOLIO. I say this house is as dark as ignorance, though ignorance were as dark as hell; and I say there was never man thus abused. I am no more mad than you are.

(IV.ii.20-48)

In the darkness of his prison, Malvolio literally is unable to see, and Feste makes the most of the symbolic implications of Malvolio's blindness. The audience perceives with Feste that the house is not dark (that hypothetical Globe audience would have been able to see the literal daylight in the playhouse), yet the audience also knows that Malvolio is being "abused" because he cannot see the light. The audience is therefore led to a double awareness of values in this scene: we are able to absorb the emblematic significance of Malvolio's separation from good-humored sanity and to know at the same time that Malvolio is not mad in the literal way that Feste, Maria, and Sir Toby insist. Although the literal action engenders the emblematic awareness, the literal action does not necessarily support the emblematic meaning. This pull in two opposite directions occurs simultaneously and places the audience in a slightly uncomfortable position. We prefer to move in one direction or in the other. Yet it seems that here Shakespeare asks us to forgo the either-or alternatives and to hold contradictory impressions together. Malvolio cannot be dismissed as a simple comic butt when his trial in the dark has such severe implications.

The ambiguities of his situation are clear to everyone except Malvolio, but he rigidly maintains his single point of view. Because he refuses to allow more than his own narrowed focus, he is emblematically an appropriate butt for the harsh comic action that blots out his power to see as well as to act. He must ultimately depend upon the fool to bring him "ink, paper, and light" so that he may extricate himself from his prison, a situation which would have seemed to Malvolio earlier in the play "mad" indeed. Feste thus does force Malvolio to act against his will in submitting to the fool, but Malvolio fails to change his attitudes. Malvolio remains a literalist-Feste's visual disguise is for the audience so that we can see as well as hear the ambiguities of his performance, a point that Maria brings into focus when she says "Thou mightest have done this without thy beard and gown. He sees thee not" (IV.ii.63-64).

In the very next scene, Sebastian presents a contrast which delineates even more clearly the narrowness of Malvolio's response to an uncontrollable situation. Sebastian, too, confronts the possibility that he is mad: his situation in Illyria is anything but under his control.

This is the air; that is the glorious sun;
This pearl she gave me, I do feel't and see't;
And though 'tis wonder that enwraps me thus,
Yet 'tis not madness. . . .
For though my soul disputes well with my sense
That this may be some error, but no madness,
Yet doth this accident and flood of fortune
So far exceed all instance, all discourse,
That I am ready to distrust mine eyes
And wrangle with my reason that persuades me
To any other trust but that I am mad, Or else the lady's mad.

(IV. iii. 1-16: my italics)

Sebastian's pile of contrasting conjunctions ("though," "yet," "but") underlines his hesitance to form a final judgment, unlike Malvolio, whose point of view never changes despite the onslaught of unmanageable circumstances. The contradictions of his sensory perceptions lead Sebastian to a state of "wonder" in which he is able to suspend reason and delay judgment, and this signifies a flexibility of perception which Malvolio cannot attain. Malvolio is not stirred by the discrepancies of experience to consider that appearances may not be reality; but Sebastian can appreciate the undefinable workings of a power beyond the evident. Sebastian's ability to sense the "wonder" in a world where cause and effect have been severed gives him a stature that Malvolio cannot achieve. Yet the difference between them is due to the source of their manipulation as well as to their response. Sebastian is manipulated by Fate or by Fortune; Malvolio, by Maria and Feste. Human manipulators parody suprahuman control and because they do, Maria and Feste define both levels of action.

Feste, Maria, and Sir Toby are all in a set and predictable world of sporting gullery, and the rules for their games are known. Feste's "whirligig" associates Time with a toy (perhaps even with an instrument of torture) and limits Time to human terms of punishment. On the other hand, the Time that Viola addresses does untie her problematic knot of disguise. Feste's attribution of revenge to this "whirligig of Time" points up the difference between the two controls. The whirligig becomes a parodic substitute for the larger providence that other characters talk about under other titles: Time, Jove, Fate, Fortune, or Chance. Significantly, Malvolio's humiliation is the only humanly designed action that fulfills itself as planned. The subplot performs its parody in many other ways, but in Feste's summary "whirligig" it displays the double vision that Shakespearean parody typically provides. The foibles of the romantics in Illyria are seen in their reduced terms through Sir Toby, Maria, and Sir Andrew, but the limitations of the parodic characters also heighten by contrast the expansive and expanding world of the play. Love, not revenge, is celebrated.

But even Feste's whirligig takes another spin and does not stop at revenge: in the play's final song the playwright extends an embrace to his audience. Feste's song creates an ambiguity of perspective which fuses the actual world with an ideal one: "the rain it raineth every day" is hardly the world described by the play. Romantic Illyria seems to have little to do with such realistic intrusions. Yet, the recognition of continuous rain is in itself an excess—it does not rain every day in the actual world, at least not in the same place. Thus, the pessimistic excess of the song balances the optimistic excesses of the romance world of Illyria; neither excess accurately reflects the actual world. Despite the apparent progress the song describes of a man’s growing from infancy to maturity and to old age, it remains something of an enigma. The ambiguities of the first four stanzas build to a contrast of direct statements in the final stanza.

A great while ago the world begun,
With hey, ho, the wind and the rain;
But that's all one, our play is done,
And we'll strive to please you every day.

The first line of this stanza seems to imply that the world has its own, independent design; and it also suggests that man's actions must take their place and find meaning within this larger and older pattern. The specific meaning of that larger design, however, remains concealed within the previous ambiguities of Feste's song. His philosophic pretensions to explain that design are comically vague and he knows it. He tosses them aside to speak directly to the audience: "But that's all one, our play is done." This is the same phrase Feste uses with Malvolio in his summary speech in Act V: "I was one, sir, in this interlude, one Sir Topas, sir; but that's all one." In both cases, Feste avoids an explanation.
Turning to the audience and shattering the dramatic illusion is typical in epilogues, but Feste's inclusion of the audience into his consciousness of the play as a metaphor for actual experience has a special significance here. Throughout Twelfth Night, Feste has engaged various characters in dialogues of self-determination. In one game of wit, he points out that Olivia is a fool "to mourn for your Brother's soul, being in heaven" (I.v. 65-66). By his irrefutable logic, he wins Olivia's favor and her tacit agreement that her mourning has been overdone. The Duke also is subject to Feste's evaluation in two scenes. Following his performance, upon the Duke's request, of a sad song of unrequited love, Feste leaves a paradoxical benediction:

Now the melancholy god protect thee, and the tailor make thy doublet of changeable taffeta, for thy mind is a very opal. I would have men of such constancy put to sea, that their business might be everything, and their intent everywhere; for that's it that always makes a good voyage of nothing. (II.iv.72-77)

And later, when the Duke is approaching Olivia's house, Feste encounters him with one of his typically unique and audaciously applied truisms:

DUKE. I know thee well. How dost thou, my good fellow?
CLOWN. Truly, sir, the better for my foes, and the worse for my friends.
DUKE. Just the contrary: the better for thy friends.
CLOWN. No, sir, the worse.
DUKE. How can that be?
CLOWN. Marry, sir, they praise me and make an ass of me. Now my foes tell me plainly I am an ass; so that by my foes, sir, I profit in the knowledge of myself, and by my friends I am abused; so that, conclusions to be as kisses, if your four negatives make your two affirmatives, why then, the worse for my friends, and the better for my foes.
(V.i.9-20)

The Duke has in fact lacked some knowledge of himself, and Feste's pointed remark makes it clear that he is using his role as fool to point up the true foolishness of others. In the prison scene with Malvolio, Feste provides a confusing game of switching identities from the Clown to Sir Topas. In each situation, Feste provides the other person with a different perspective for seeing himself. Thus, it is more than merely appropriate that at the end of the play Feste engages the audience in its own definition of self. By asking them to look at their participation in the dramatic illusion, Feste is requesting them to recognize their own desire for humanly willed happiness.

The playwright, like the comic providence in the play, has understood "what we will" and has led us to a pleasurable fulfillment of our desires, but in ways which we could not have foreseen or controlled. The substitution of the final line, "And we'll strive to please you every day," for the refrain, "For the rain it raineth every day," is a crucial change. Like the incremental repetition in the folk ballad, this pessimistic refrain has built a dynamic tension which is released in the recognition that the play is an actual experience in the lives of the audience, even though it is enacted in an imagined world. The players, and the playwright who arranges them, are engaged in an ongoing effort to please the audience. The providential design remains incomplete within the play's action and only promises a "golden time"; similarly, the playwright promises further delightful experiences for his audience. The subplot's action, on the other hand, is limited within the framework of revenge: the revenge of the subplot characters elicits Malvolio's cry for revenge.

Malvolio is the only one who refuses to see himself in a subservient position to a larger design. And possibly because that design is too small, we cannot feel that his abuse and final exclusion from the happy community of lovers and friends allows the golden time to be fulfilled within the play. Feste's manipulation of Malvolio resembles the playwright's manipulation of his audience's will, but in such a reduced way that we cannot avoid seeing the difference between merely human revenge and the larger benevolence that controls the play's
The earliest account of Twelfth Night on the stage comes from the diary of the barrister John Manningham, who witnessed a performance of a play entitled "Twelve night or what you will" at the Middle Temple on 2 February 1602. Scholars assume that the play was enacted by Shakespeare's company, the LORD CHAMBERLAIN'S MEN. Manningham singled out for particular praise the character of Malvolio, whose deception he described as "a good device," thereby prefiguring the most dominant trend in the staging of Twelfth Night for the next four centuries. In the reign of King James I there were two further presentations of the play, both of them at court. The first was performed by the KING'S MEN on 6 April 1618; when the play was next performed, in 1623, it was known simply by the name of its most popular character, Malvolio. With the reopening of the theaters after the Restoration (1660), an adaptation of Twelfth Night was performed several times by Sir William D'Avenant's company, the Duke of York's Men. The celebrated diarist Samuel Pepys witnessed three different performances of the play between 1661 and 1669, none of which he praised. Scholars suggest that the romantic nature of the comedy failed to suit the tastes of the late seventeenth century. In the eighteenth century, however, Twelfth Night became established as a popular favorite on the London stage. David Garrick presented the play at DRURY LANE in January 1741. The cast included Kitty Clive as Olivia, Hannah Pritchard as Viola, and Charles Macklin as Malvolio, a role which he enacted with acclaim for many years after. Throughout the rest of the century Twelfth Night was performed on a yearly basis at Drury Lane and COVENT GARDEN, where the principal actor invariably took the part of Malvolio.

The early nineteenth century witnessed profound changes in the interpretation of Shakespearean drama by prominent actor-managers. In particular, emphasis was placed on the playwright's fusion of festive, musical, and spectacular elements. This trend was inaugurated by Frederick Reynolds, who in 1820 presented an operatic adaptation of Twelfth Night at Covent Garden. The text was heavily interpolated and embellished with musical interludes derived from The Sonnets, The Tempest, and Venus and Adonis, among other Shakespearean works. The emphasis on pageantry and music in Twelfth Night persisted in the nineteenth century, but was subjected to noteworthy refinements by successive actor-managers. Samuel Phelps, the actor-manager of SADLER'S WELLS, staged noteworthy productions in 1847 and 1858. Presenting Malvolio as a Spanish Golden Age hidalgo, Phelps transformed the steward into what a reviewer in the Weekly Dispatch described as a figure of "frozen calm" and "solidified presumption." In September 1850 Charles Kean presented a scenically lavish revival of the play at the NEW PRINCESS THEATRE, with his wife, Ellen Tree, winning acclaim in the role of Viola. Far more visually stunning, however, was Henry Irving's 1884 production at the LYCEUM THEATRE. Irving cut the music and songs of the play, employing instead spectacular scenery comprised of sixteen different set designs. Irving himself took the role of Malvolio, portraying the character as a Spanish Golden Age figure reminiscent of Don Quixote. He eschewed a comic interpretation of the role, highlighting rather what he perceived to be the character's tragic nuances. Thus, Malvolio's scene in the "dark house" (Act IV), was played, according to William Archer, in a "nerveless state of prostrate dejection." Frank Benson commented that Irving's conception of the role compromised the casting of the other performances: "the ladies were too mature and, what was almost equally disastrous, the comedians were not funny; the sprightly Feste was played as a decrepit old man and Fabian was the brightest spark of the plotters." During the first performance of this production the audience responded with apathy until the finale, when Irving was interrupted by booing and hissing. Although Ellen Terry rendered the role of Viola admirably later in the season, her first night's performance was hampered by illness. Irving later took the production to America, where, despite having replaced half the cast members, the play similarly failed to please audiences.

In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries there were several notable revivals of Twelfth Night on both sides of the Atlantic. Augustin Daly's staging of the play, which opened at Daly's Theatre in New York in 1893, was accounted one of the director's greatest successes. Taking extreme liberties with the text, Daly cut approximately six hundred lines from the play in order to purge it of elements that might compromise its "poetry" and "beauty." He additionally transposed and rearranged the musical scenes in the work, employing as an introduction to the first act a group of fishermen and peasants singing "Come unto these yellow sands." Daly promoted the pageantry of the play by using the elaborate costumes of Graham Robertson and by staging such memorable scenic effects as a violent storm and a moonlit rose garden. The play itself consisted of only four acts, and the character of Malvolio was reduced to the dungeon scene in Act IV. This production was in full sympathy with contemporary taste and was well received both in America and in London the following year. Ada Rehan's Viola was considered a highlight of this staging. William Winter wrote "Viola is a woman of deep sensibility: and that way Miss Rehan has comprehended and reproduced her, permitting a certain wistful sadness to glimmer through the gauze of kindly vivacity." For George Bernard Shaw, who deprecated Daly's handling of the text, Rehan's performance was the sole redeeming feature of the production: "the moment she strikes up the true Shakespearian music, and feels her way to her part altogether by her sense of that music, the play returns to life and all the magic is there." In 1894 the production opened at Daly's Theatre in London, where Rehan played Viola for 119 performances.

In 1897 William Poel presented Twelfth Night at the Middle Temple in a revival that sought to present a faithful Elizabethan version of the play. Influenced by later stage traditions, however, Poel also emphasized the musical nature of Shakespeare's language and cast the principal roles with operatic vocal ranges in mind. Malvolio, for example, was cast as a baritone, Viola as a mezzo-soprano, and Orsino as a tenor. Similarly, the American producer E. H. Sothern attempted an historically accurate presentation of Twelfth Night in productions in New York and London in 1905 and 1907 respectively. By contrast, Herbert Beerbohm Tree's 1901 production at HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE represented the zenith of the Victorian preoccupation with spectacle. Olivia's garden, for example, was rendered by Hawes Craven to imitate an elaborate picture in Country Life. In his portrayal of Malvolio, Tree departed from tradition by focusing on the farcical nature of the role. Shaw praised Tree's striking appearance as an "intolerably condescending blue-eyed peacock with a red twirl of beard." Another experimental approach to the interpretation of character was inaugurated by Harley GranvilleBarker's 1912 production at the Savoy Theatre. Henry Ainley gave a complex rendering of Malvolio as a simultaneously conceited and pathetic middle-aged figure. Similarly, Hayden Coffin's Feste centered on the role's melancholic undertones, an interpretation that was to become influential in later revivals of the play.

After a period of approximately twenty years during which Twelfth Night was infrequently staged, the play was revived in several notable productions at the OLD VIC THEATRE in the 1930s and 1940s. In 1932 Edith Evans gave a memorable portrayal of Viola in a production directed by Harcourt Williams. Five years later, Tyrone Guthrie staged a presentation of the play that featured a hyperbolic portrayal of Sir Toby Belch by Laurence Olivier; Alec Guinness as Sir Andrew Aguecheek; and Jessica Tandy as both Viola and Sebastian. Guinness revived the play for the 1948-49 season, focusing the drama on a grief-stricken Feste played by Robert Eddison. This staging was additionally considered noteworthy for the use of Michael Warre's revolving stage and the commanding presence of Cedric Hardwicke in the role of Sir Toby Belch. Kenneth Tynan maintained that "for delicacy of insight and shady, cock-eyed charm I have seen no performance in Shakespearian comedy much better than this."

One of the most prominent American productions at this time was the Theatre Guild's presentation at the St. James Theatre, New York, in the 1940-41 season. This production was directed by Margaret Webster and starred Maurice Evans as Malvolio, a performance that departed from tradition in making use of a Cockney accent. Euphemia Van Rensselaer Wyatt commented that "Olivia's majordomo emerges as the correct British butler." Grenville Vernon enthused over this performance, maintaining that "Mr. Evans reaches the peak of his accomplishment in the most subtle, most beautifully articulated performance of the part I have ever seen." Joseph Wood Krutch, however, asserted that Evans's comic portrayal debased the role and was "false to Shakespeare's conception." Another portrayal that received mixed reviews was that of Helen Hayes in the part of Viola. Krutch argued that "so far as she herself is concerned there is in truth, very little left to be desired." Stark Young, by contrast, criticized her delivery of Shakespeare's blank verse, maintaining that she turned "most of all that poetic treasure into mere chirpy prose." Similarly, Rosamond Gilder commented that Hayes's performance lacked spontaneity and that only once or twice did she "release the full lyric loveliness of the part." Critics generally agreed that the production provided a splendid evening's entertainment, while nevertheless judging Webster's direction to have emphasized lively stage business at the expense of poetic interpretation.

In the 1950s several productions attempted to unify the comic and melancholic strains in Twelfth Night. Hugh Hunt's revival at the Old Vic in 1950 avoided traditional approaches to the play's opening by employing mournful music in the first scene and by presenting an Illyria swathed in decayed grandeur. In commenting on the sets of Roger Furse, Richard David noted that "the Illyrian streets had the peeling and water-worn dignity of a side-canal in Venice." Hunt nevertheless infused his staging with a degree of liveliness, especially in the crowd scenes and musical interludes. The focal point of the production's comedy was Roger Livesey's portrayal of Sir Toby Belch, which T. C. Worsley praised as a "rich, bursting Sir Toby, who never misses an opportunity for a bit of business, but never gives us too much." Paul Rogers's Malvolio, which similarly contained an element of buffoonery, was less well received. J. C. Trewin found the performance "strangely out of the picture here." By contrast, Peggy Ashcroft's Viola was accorded general praise, with Trewin maintaining that "it is long since I have seen a Viola so fitted to the play." In judging the production as a whole, critics tended to deprecate Hunt's reliance upon low comedy. John Gielgud's 1955 production at the SHAKESPEARE MEMORIAL THEATRE was likewise received with muted praise, despite the central performances of Laurence Olivier as Malvolio and Vivien Leigh as Viola. This staging also featured a witty, gay Feste, played by Paul Daneman, and a sombre Sir Toby Belch, enacted by Richard Burton. Despite a strong cast, critics charged Gielgud with failing to unify the romantic comedy of the play within his production's espousal of realistic characterization. This was particularly apparent in Olivier's Malvolio, which presented the steward as a self-made man who had carefully studied aristocratic ways and speech. Olivier lent the character a degree of seriousness and dignity that critics found wholly original. The reviewer for The Times nevertheless noted that this interpretation resulted in the miscarriage of Malvolio's comic scenes.

Tyrone Guthrie's production at the STRATFORD FESTIVAL, Ontario, in 1957 succeeded in integrating the romantic and comic plots of the drama. Critics such as Henry Hewes felt this had been achieved by a careful fleshing out of the comic roles. In praising Christopher Plummer's portrayal of Sir Andrew Aguecheek, for example, Hewes commented that "making Shakespeare's clowns into real people instead of mere affectations has the advantage of keeping the audience ready to laugh as they see each new situation approaching." Guthrie further innovated in his handling of Feste, played by Bruno Gerussi, who became, according to Arnold Edinborough, "a sad, ageing fool full of the pathos of his position where he is retained not for his wit but for his length of service." A similar sensitivity to the romantic roles characterized the production. Edinborough maintained that "as the bright-eyed and shrewdly naive Viola, Siobhan McKenna was entrancing and her swaggering self-importance was beautifully undermined by the sensitive playing of Frances Hyland as Olivia."

In the following year there were two notable revivals of the play. Michael Benthall directed a romantic and bitter-sweet Twelfth Night at the Old Vic that nevertheless provided an element of farce in Judi Dench's portrayal of Maria. Despite praising the sets and costumes, which evoked the early eighteenth century, critics generally felt that the production was poorly paced and unsatisfying. Peter Hall's revival at the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre was rather more successful. Hall sought to give equal weight to the comic lightness and melancholic heaviness in the drama through a combination of visual effects and innovative characterization. Lila de Nobili's set designs were described by Robert Speaight as "a rich symphony in russet," and the court of Illyria was reminiscent of Charles II's, with costumes patterned after the portraits of Van Dyck and Rubens. Most noteworthy among the principal roles was Geraldine McEwan's Olivia, which portrayed the Countess as a sharply satirical figure incapable of seriousness. While this staging pleased audiences, critics such as Roy Walker voiced certain objections: "This was a Twelfth Night that did not altogether succeed, but a production that continually threw fresh light on a comedy about which most of us have long ceased to think freshly." By contrast, Jack Landau's 1960 AMERICAN SHAKESPEARE FESTIVAL production was much less ambitious. Seeking to make Twelfth Night accessible to an audience unfamiliar with seeing Shakespearean plays on the stage, Landau set the play in a Victorian seaside town, thereby eliciting unintended comparisons with the operettas of Gilbert and Sullivan.

The latter part of the 1960s witnessed two notable RSC productions, each of which exemplified opposing trends in interpreting the play. Clifford Williams's 1966 revival dispensed with a serious approach to Twelfth Night, "presenting it," wrote the critic for The Times, "as a hard-edged almost Italianate comedy firmly steeled against pathos and poetry." For this very reason, most critics responded without enthusiasm to the production. Hilary Spurling maintained that the set design, which evoked the Italian High Renaissance, lacked the fanciful quality typically associated with Shakespeare's Illyria. Additionally, most critics felt the performances to have been unmemorable. J. C. Trewin asserted that "Mr. Williams has been at pains … to mock the affectionate of Orsino (Alan Howard) and of Olivia (Estelle Kohler), the first a near-burlesque of romantic passion, the second a mere kitten." Jeremy Kingston, however, praised the strong performances of Diana Rigg as Viola and Ian Holm as Malvolio, hailing them as the "chief pleasures of the evening." Despite wishing for a tenderer Twelfth Night, Robert Speaight concluded that "it would be priggish not to admit that this production was enormously diverting, even if now and then it won its laughs at rather too high a price." John Barton's 1969-70 production took the very different course of providing what Gareth Lloyd Evans termed a "gravely lyrical interpretation of Shakespeare's work that derived from the text itself." Irving Wardle qualified his praise by stating "this not the funniest or most inventive Twelfth Night I have seen; but I can remember no production that held all the comedy's elements in such harmony." For many critics, the focal point of the production was Emrys James's Feste, which Simon Gray declared "a theatrical triumph." Donald Sinden's Malvolio was similarly praised by the majority of commentators. Speaight noted that Sinden's handling of the role in the vein of high comedy left "the right bitterness in the mouth when the play's flight from realism might have seemed too precipitate." In judging the production as a whole, Benedict Nightingale concluded that it was "Barton's peculiar and perverse achievement to send us out of Shakespeare's 'happiest comedy' feeling that neither [Olivia and Orsino] nor anyone else will live happily ever after."

In the period 1974-75 two productions on either side of the Atlantic offered markedly different interpretations of Twelfth Night. In 1974 Peter Gill's directorial debut with the RSC presented a sexually charged revival of the play that was dominated by the image of Narcissus. A portrait of the self-absorbed youth, gazing at his reflection in a pool of water, was the focus of designer William Dudley's otherwise spare set, and served as a continuous reminder to the audience of the themes of ambiguous sexuality and erotic self-deception. For Michael Billington, this resulted in a production that was "curiously short on social and human detail." This was further accentuated by what critics generally felt were the uncomic performances of Patricia Hayes as Maria, Frank Thornton as Sir Andrew Ague-cheek and Ron Pember as Feste. Additionally, Jane Lapotaire's androgynous rendering of Viola was faulted by Irving Wardle for serving solely as "a blank screen on to which others project their fantasies." At the 1975 Stratford Festival in Ontario David Jones's production was deemed by critics to have steered a moderate course between the excessively romantic stagings of the nineteenth century and the more cynical interpretations of such twentieth-century directors as Tyrone Guthrie. Clive Barnes characterized Jones as "one of the new-style British classics directors who are original without being outlandish and place the simple, yet imaginative interpretation of the playwright's concept as absolutely paramount." This exceptionally successful production of Twelfth Night highlighted the play's themes of love and identity, particularly as expressed through the characters of Malvolio, played by Brian Bedford, and Viola, played by Kathleen Widdoes. Bedford presented Malvolio as a prim, self-righteous puritan and played directly to the audience. Berners W. Jackson likened the actor to a virtuoso musician playing "upon a cacophonous instrument, directly manipulating the responses, not only of the whole group, but also of individuals."

Many revivals of Twelfth Night in recent decades have employed the seasonal setting of the play as a guiding metaphor of the drama's action. Terry Hands's 1979 RSC production, for example, opened with an Illyria shrouded in winter and closed with the arrival of spring. This threw into relief the centrality of the play's romantic relationships, which critics agreed were rendered with energy. Benedict Nightingale commented, "in Illyria love is a sudden and alarming affliction, a variety of glandular fever virulent enough to send the mercury racing up and over the humiliation threshold." In particular, Gareth Thomas's Orsino and Kate Nicholls's Olivia were faulted for indulging in hyperbolic emotion. J. C. Trewin asserted that "we know that Orsino and Olivia are given to excess, but it was long since they had been acted with more resolute and superfluous vigour." Even more contentious was David Mamet's 1980 production of Twelfth Night at the Circle Repertory Theatre, New York, which also made use of a winter setting. This revival engendered heated critical comment for its bold use of costuming. Adopting an anachronistic approach that clothed characters in garb from a variety of centuries, Mamet explained that he allowed the actors themselves to choose the costumes that they felt were appropriate for their characters. Many critics asserted that this directorial choice was nothing more than an irresponsible gimmick. Michael Bertin, however, argued that it was "a fine intuition into the play's heart," explaining that "uniformity in costuming is ... a relatively modern innovation." This production further elicited contrary responses regarding Marshall W. Mason's performance as Malvolio. John Simon described Mason's Malvolio as "a prissy antiques salesman trying to screw up his courage to turn a trick on Central Park West," while Bertin characterized the performance as "elegant and reserved." Lindsay Crouse, by contrast, won unanimous approval for her rendering of Viola, which Edith Oliver hailed as "the best I've ever seen," noting that the actress spoke "her poetry ... as easily as breathing, never slighting its music or emotion or force."

In the same year as Mamet's production, the BBC Television version of Twelfth Night was aired in both the United Kingdom and the United States. Reviewers on either side of the Atlantic found John Gome's direction of the drama to have been competent but not outstanding. Although, G. M. Pearce described it as "cheerful" and "vigorous," and Maurice Charney called it "modest but very satisfying," almost all commentators concurred that the production failed to achieve a unique interpretation of the drama.

In the 1980s, several productions of Twelfth Night strove with varying degrees of success to achieve an interpretation of the play that transcended traditional approaches. John Caird's 1983-84 production with the RSC was viewed by the majority of critics as the summation of the twentieth-century preoccupation with the play's melancholy. As Irving Wardle stated, "quite a deal of poison has been seeping into this play ... but John Caird's production is the first I have seen that projects Twelfth Night as an all-out dark comedy." Set in the Jacobean period, the production accentuated a sense of decay and confinement by employing a ruined garden, rusting gates, and a mortuary chapel as components of the set designs. For many commentators, the strengths of this revival were the musical score of Iona Sekacz and the performances of the principal actors. Nicholas Shrimpton hailed Gemma Jones's Maria as "the most original piece of characterization in the production ... this was a high-spirited, horsey girl from a country background, now living in reduced circumstances as a paid companion." Additionally, Emrys James's Malvolio was praised for its fresh power by several critics. Richard Findlater asserted "this Malvolio is odious, even dangerous, in his moment of naked triumph, taken with splendid comic brio, and nakedly hurt in his hour of humiliation." Wilford Leach's New York Shakespeare Festival production in 1986 generated far more hostile responses from reviewers. Mel Gussow explained that it was not "a question of liberties taken but of abandonment of the play's essential nature as one of the most irresistible of Shakespeare's comedies." This production advocated an approach to the play that stressed elements of low comedy and farce. Actors were clothed in Renaissance dress, and the set featured a revolving platform with a central stage tower that flashed "Welcome to Illyria." The butt of critical disapproval, however, was directed towards the central performances. Tony Azito's clownish rendering of Feste failed to tap into any of the role's deeper significance. Gussow described him as a "body in motion but out of sync with his character." Kim Greist's rendering of Viola fared slightly better. John Simon asserted "Miss Greist cannot act very much … but she has a tolerable voice, is not deliberately offensive, and tries hard." The sole performance to receive a modicum of praise was F. Murray Abraham's Malvolio. John Beaufort mirrored the opinions of most commentators in writing that Abraham projected "the fussy aplomb and self-infatuation that make the censorious steward all too susceptible to the cruel trick played on him."

In 1987 two English revivals of Twelfth Night returned to the use of seasonal stage effects. Bill Alexander's RSC production set the play in an Illyria that resembled a sun-drenched Greek island. While Michael Ratcliffe maintained that "there can rarely have been a version of this disturbing comedy so bland, humourless and cold," Gary O'Connor hailed the production as "outstanding," commenting that the use of dazzling white architectural motifs in the set design accentuated "the confusion woven by illusion and self-illusion." The most controversial aspect of this staging was Antony Sher's Malvolio. Sher, whose costume was reminiscent of the liturgical garb of an Orthodox priest, took seriously the possibility that Malvolio becomes mad as a result of his confinement in the "dark room." For Stanley Wells, this portrayal was ultimately a failure. He maintained: "Sher technically as brilliant as ever, allows the effort to be both funny and original to take precedence over the establishment of a credible character who believes in himself." Taking the opposing view, O'Connor lavishly praised the performance as "a gloriously infected piece of work," asserting that the actor's comic excess was "beautifully judged in its degree." In contrast to Alexander's staging, Kenneth Branagh's production with the Renaissance Theatre Company set Twelfth Night in a wintry Illyria that evoked the England of Charles Dickens. H. R. Woudhuysen cautioned, however, that this was not "the Dickens of Pickwick or A Christmas Carol but of Bleak House and Little Dorrit, where secrecy and tragedy will eventually give birth to revelation and joy."

Making full use of the play's seasonal associations, the set of the Riverside Studios featured a Christmas tree and a snowy cemetery in the center stage that was used for Malvolio's imprisonment. Critics generally approved of the director's sole liberty with the text: Branagh transposed the first and second scenes of the drama in order to combine the charm of the play with its underlying strangeness. Audiences and critics were pleased with Branagh's direction; Kenneth Hurren declared it to have been "quite the most enjoyable production of the comedy I have seen for decades."

In recent years Twelfth Night has continued to prove popular on the stage. The productions of Peter Hall and Ian Judge have further demonstrated a shift away from the general trend in the theater of imposing anachronistic ideological meanings on Shakespeare's works. Peter Hall's 1991 production at the Playhouse Theatre, for example, intentionally avoided any allusion to contemporary social and political concerns. Critical opinion varied markedly as to the success of Hall's approach. Peter J. Smith argued that the production "failed to satisfy," despite having "captured both the magic and the melancholy of the script." Similarly, Eric Sams maintained that the staging was hampered by a lack of direction. Bernard Levin, by contrast, lavishly praised Hall's shaping of the drama, making particular mention of the cast's sensitivity to Shakespearean diction. Hall set the play in the Caroline period, and the stage designs presented an Illyria that Christopher Edwards described as a "glorious autumnal prospect—apple trees and falling brown leaves—which dips down to a stretch of mist-shrouded water." Among the performances, Eric Porter's Malvolio proved the subject of controversy. Irving Wardle, for example, maintained that nobody would shed any tears for Porter's "fatuously capering Malvolio," while Michael Coveney took the contrary position that "there is simply no better Malvolio in the world than Eric Porter." Ian Judge's 1994 RSC production was similarly faulted by several critics for a lack of depth, although it charmed the majority of commentators with what Irving Wardle termed its "fresh and truthful detail." The set design featured a wintry Jacobean representation of the city of Stratford-upon-Avon itself. Judge explained: "When I look through the hedges of New Place or sit in the gardens of Hall's Croft, I understand Illyria." The director emphasized the comic and wistful nature of the play, thereby softening its melancholic elements. Russell Jackson maintained that "theatregoers who prefer their comic worlds a little more romantic may find this tame, and it will be too sentimental for those who want more bite in their comedy."

Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 26): Reviews And Retrospective Accounts Of Selected Productions

PRODUCTION:

Henry Irving • Lyceum Theatre • 1884

BACKGROUND:

One of the most visually stunning renderings of the play in the nineteenth century, Irving's Twelfth Night was shorn of the text's music and songs but embellished with lavish scenery comprised of sixteen different sets. Irving himself played the part of Malvolio, who became the drama's focus, and eschewed a comic approach to the character, highlighting the steward's tragic nuances instead. Irving was dressed as a Spanish Golden Age figure reminiscent of Don Quixote, and rendered the scene in the "dark house" (Act IV) in what William Archer described as a "nerveless state of prostrate dejection." Frank Benson commented that Irving's conception of the role compromised the casting of the other performances: "the ladies were too mature and, what was equally disastrous, the comedians were not funny; the sprightly Feste was played as a decrepit old man and Fabian was the brightest spark of the plotter's." During the first performance of the production, the audience responded with apathy until the finale, when Irving was interrupted by booing and hissing. Although Ellen Terry rendered the role of Viola admirably later in the season, her first night's performance was hampered by illness. Other members of the cast included William Terriss as Orsino; David Fisher as Sir Toby Belch; Francis Wyatt as Sir Andrew Aguecheek; and Rose Leclercq as Olivia. Irving later took the play to America, where, despite having replaced half the cast, the play similarly failed to please audiences.

COMMENTARY:

Illustrated London News (review date 18 July 1884)

A by no means inconsiderable advantage was enjoyed by Mr. Irving in ordaining the scenery, costumes, and general decorations of his superb revival of Twelfth Night in the circumstance that he was not tied in any sense to time as regarded the dressing of his characters and their architectural surroundings; nor, to any great extent, was he hampered by the exigencies of place. "A city in Illyria and the seacoast near it" is a geographical expression sufficiently elastic. With regard to the "seacoast," it is enough that it should have a generally Adriatic aspect; while "a city in Illyria," when it is considered that ancient Illyricum comprised apart of the modern Croatia, the whole of Dalmatia, nearly the whole of Bosnia, and part of Albania, and that modern Illyria includes Carinthia, Carniola, Istria, Croatia, Ragusa, and Dalmatia, might present, indifferently, a Teutonic, an Italian, a Greek, a Turkish, or a simply savage Slavonic appearance. All these characteristics are possessed by Trieste, the modern capital of Illyria, which in the way of conflicting styles of architecture and varied picturesqueness of costume is as cosmopolitan as Odessa, but in which the predominant key of colour, language, and manners is undoubtedly Italian. In Shakespeare's time, however, where now is the imposing and prosperous city of Trieste was probably only a humble fishing-village. The more ancient town of Ragusa, in Dalmatia, would present a more satisfactory ideal of an Adriatic seaport, liable to be visited by corsairs, and near which might be a ducal palace and the stately mansion of such a highly-born dame as Olivia. For the rest, it must be remembered that in the generation between the Dark Ages and the Renaissance Illyria passed successively through the hands of the Venetians, the Hungarians, and the Turks—that is to say, from a condition of high civilisation among its upper classes to one of downright barbarism.

Mr. Irving has chosen the Venetian period as best suited for the illustration of Twelfth Night, and although there is a slight suspicion of Orientalism in the garb of the minstrels who so ravish the soul of the aesthetic Orsino, and there is an element of Slavonic wildness and uncouthness in the array of the guards who make their appearance in the last scene, the costumes and the architecture belong essentially to the period of the Venetian domination; that is to say, the sumptuous garments in which Mr. Irving has clad his company are such of which the analogues might have been found in England at a time when the Court of Elizabeth had reached its apogee of splendour. Orsino's palace and Viola's scarcely less palatial villa are sumptuously Palladian in style; while the art of landscape gardening, as pursued in Illyria three hundred years ago, appears to have reached a very high pitch of excellence. The sea-coast scenes, the court-yard of Olivia's house, the terrace, Olivia's garden, are painted by Mr. Hawes Craven; Orsino's palace, the road near Olivia's house, and the cloisters thereof, are from the pencil of Mr. W. Telbin; while Mr. W. Hann has painted the orchard scene; Mr T. W. Hall the last scene, before Olivia's house; and Mr. J. Selby Hall the scene including the dungeon in which Malvolio is immured. As a succession of beautiful pictures, the mise en scène of Twelfth Night is equal to any of the far-famed Lyceum revivals; but as a spectacle it is certainly not so brilliant nor so imposing as Romeo and Juliet or Much Ado About Nothing, or even as The Cup. As regards stage management, one of Mr. Irving's highest claims to commendation must be that he has not overloaded a merry comedy, dependent for acceptance on the ingenuity of its plot and the wit of its dialogue, with superfluous ornament.

William Archer (review date August 1884)

I.

Towards the close of 1601, or perhaps a little earlier, a new play named Twelfth Night Or what you will, was announced on the placards of the Blackfriars Theatre. It was by the most popular playwright of the time, and was doubtless looked forward to with interest by the playgoing world. Eccentric titles were the order of the day, and this one promised an airy comedy, after the fashion of a fantasy by the same author, which had perhaps preceded it in the spring of the year—As You Like It, to wit. For the first performance the prices were no doubt doubled, and 10/ or 12/ may have come into the treasury. It was probably repeated some few times, but it clearly created no great sensation. No contemporary author alludes to it with praise or blame, and it does not even seem to have been pirated. It leaves only one small trace on the records of the time, due to its having been selected (partly, perhaps, on account of its scenic simplicity) for performance in the Middle Temple Hall, on February 2nd, 1602. Manningham, the young Templar whose diary gives us this information, does not seem to have heard of it before, and treats it as the merest triviality. It probably served its author's purpose, in affording a relief from the heavier tragic, historic, and melodramatic matters which formed the staple theatrical fare of the day. Having run its little course, it was relegated to the ordinary repertory of the theatre, to be revived as occasion demanded; and, so far as the public was concerned, it passed out of sight, out of mind.

After a lapse of nearly three centuries the same play is produced at the leading theatre of London. It is a subject of eager speculation in all classes of society for weeks before-hand. Its first night is chronicled by a hundred pens as minutely, and in some cases as heroically, as a national victory. Telegraphic accounts of the great event fly to all ends of the earth. For at least a year to come the production will be a standing topic of conversation at the aesthetic teas of two nations. The manager has probably spent on it as much as would have built and fitted Burbage's Globe and Blackfriars, and Alleyn's Fortune to boot; he will probably reap from it as much as Shakespeare earned in his whole career, enough to buy New Place and a coat-of-arms, and found a family three times over.
It is the fashion to speculate on Shakespeare's astonishment could he see the luxury and completeness of illusion with which his plays are now put on the stage. I sometimes wonder whether he would not be even more surprised at the bare fact of his plays holding the stage at all.

Let us examine Shakespeare's own definition of the function of the drama—"to show the very age and body of the time his form and pressure." A definition this which every one accepts without demur. But it is one thing to accept a maxim, and another thing to act and think up to it. We do not in our drama show the age and body of the time his form and pressure, any more than we turn the left cheek to him who smites us on the right. And did Shakespeare himself obey his own precept any better than we? Assuredly not. He imaged the mere externals of Elizabethan life, because the limited historic sense of his time cared nothing for painstaking reconstructions of the manners of distant ages and nations; but he had no eye for the social, political, or religious tendencies of his day: America scarcely existed for him, the Reformation was not, no one had less foreboding than he of the coming baptism in blood of our infant democracy. What he did was to show the age and body of all time his form and pressure; in other words, to see and interpret the spirit of man, unconditioned by time and space, as the great art of the Italian Renaissance had seen and interpreted his body. This he did through the medium of fables gathered from many sources—classical and national history, northern legend and southern romance. On the graver subjects he lavished his genius as a dramatist and his metaphysical clairvoyance; the lighter themes he treated as a humorist and master of lyric fantasy. Apart from anachronistic allusions, no single play of his is one whit more relevant to the material interests of the Elizabethan age than it is to the problems of today. He was not even a practically influential satirist, as Ben Jonson aspired to be. A tendency-play—and no serious play which answers to Hamlet's ideal can quite escape an infusion of tendency—is scarcely to be found in his theatre. If such a play exists, it is Coriolanus, in which one seems unwillingly to trace a personal sympathy with violent aristocratic reaction.

The English drama has never really succeeded in showing the age and body of the time his form and pressure. That is the formula of realism, not to say naturalism. We may have done better, but that particular thing we have never done. In modern France, Germany, and Scandinavia, it has been, and is being, done; it has been done to a certain extent in English fiction; but in the drama, no. We have had to content ourselves with mere social satire of varying merit, from Congreve and Sheridan to Robertson and Byron. We oscillate between farce and melodrama; probably we shall never have a great realistic drama. There seems to be something in the national character that forbids it.

Since the theatre, then, is to be a mere place of pastime, we have but to examine what sort of pastime is on the whole most entertaining and least objectionable. And here Shakespearean comedy, illustrated with all the artistic perfection attainable, certainly takes a high rank.

Our Asmodeus-Shakespeare would, on reflection, cease to wonder at finding the passing fantasy of 1601 regenerated and glorified in 1884. He would see in it an aesthetic plaything as good as any other and better than most—a thing of mere beauty, and therefore a joy for ever. Utility passes away, but beauty remains. Just because Shakespeare did not show the age and body of his time its form and pressure, his plays, in so far as they have the perennial gift of pure beauty, are acceptable to a generation which does not care, or dare, to see its own form and pressure on the stage. A realistic drama will never become classical in the sense of being equally relevant, or irrelevant, to all ages. Hamlet, as we know, acted up to his own ideal, and gave "The Murder of Gonzago" a distinct tendency; for which reason, no doubt, it failed to hold the stage, and has not been since revived at the Danish court. But Hamlet's creator was unconcerned as to whether or no the time was out of joint, or at least did not feel himself born to set it right. Therefore it is that his fantastic plays have a right to the first place on a stage which holds itself aloof from the serious problems of life, and is, as Mr. Matthew Arnold has pointed out, in its essence fantastic.

II.
Beauty and humour, then, are the two imperishable elements for which we have to look in estimating the claim of a Shakespearean comedy to hold the stage. In both qualities Twelfth Night ranks high, if not highest, among its fellows. It has practically only one competitor, As You Like It, in which I, for my part, find the beauty fresher, robust, less evanescent on the stage, and the humour at once less obsolete and more intimately blended with the beauty; but this is a mere individual impression, a question of "as you like it," and nothing more. Two other fantastic comedies, A Midsummer Night's Dream and The Tempest, are put out of court by the inherent impossibility of adequate stage presentation. A Winter's Tale, whose fourth act is beyond question the most exquisite of all, is marred by the repulsiveness, or at any rate the total unbeatulness, of some of its opening passages. The grouping together of these five plays may be thought arbitrary, since in the first two the supernatural plays no open part as it does in the other three. But this objection is grounded on the letter, not on the spirit. Who shall lay down the boundary between the land of faery and the land of fantasy? It is merely the line on one side of which the spirits are visible, while on the other they play their pranks unseen. Puck is as active in Illyria as in Attica, though we see him only in his works; Ariel is as much at home in Arden as in the Enchanted Island. Who does not feel that the air of our Twelfth Night Illyria is full of influences quite absent from the atmosphere of Much Ado or of The Merchant of Venice? This distinction cannot be too strongly insisted on, for it involves the question of what critical standard we are to apply. Our moral judgments are as inapplicable to Twelfth Night as to an Arabian Night; Much Ado, on the other hand, should stand the ethical test as well as Middle-march—if it does not, so much the worse.

The elements of beauty and of humour are kept very much apart in Twelfth Night. It contains two actions in one frame—a romantic intrigue borrowed from Italy, and a pair of practical jokes, or "good practices," as Mr. Manningham hath it, invented by Shakespeare. These two actions can be said really to touch at only one point, and then, as it were, unwillingly; for it is where Viola's blade crosses Sir Andrew's. It shows how potent is the name of Shakespeare to conjure up a mist before the eyes of criticism, when we find rationalistic German critics like Bulthaupt—critics whom the orthodox Shakespearologists regard as mere pagans—dwelling upon the admirable unity of Twelfth Night as a reason why it, more than any of its fellows, should hold the German stage. The prosaic analysis of Benedix contains a great deal more truth. The play has just as much unity as two spheres in contact.

The history of the romantic intrigue is curious, and affords one example of Charles Kingsley's somewhat rash generalisation as to Shakespeare's "truly divine instinct for finding honey where others found poison." The sister disguised in male attire and mistaken for her twin-brother appears in Cinthio's Hecatommithi, but it is in Bandello that the tale first takes the shape we know. Here we have the sister acting as page to the man she loves, and sent by him on embassies of love to an obdurate fair one, who becomes enamoured of the ambassadress, and ultimately falls by mistake into the arms of a twin-brother of the supposed page. Bandello's tale is rambling and very licentious, burdened with heavy fathers, confidants, and the other stock figures of the Italian bourgeois life it depicts, the separation of the brother and sister being supposed to take place at the sack of Rome. Belleforest simply translates and condenses Bandello; and to Belleforest Barnaby Rich seems to have gone for his tale of Apolonius and Silla, included in Riche his Farewell to Militane profession, published in 1581. That Shakespeare borrowed mainly from Rich cannot be doubted. He may possibly have known Bandello's tale, and all or any of the three Italian comedies (two called Gl'Inganni and the third Gl'Ingannati) founded upon it. Hunter makes out a tolerable case in favour of his having known Gl'Ingannati, the strongest point in it being the probability that the title of Twelfth Night was suggested to him by an allusion in the preface to "la Notte di Beffan." But he took little from any one but Rich. It was Rich who changed the characters of the tale from Italian bourgeois into romantic dukes and dames; it was Rich who placed the scene by the sea and introduced a shipwreck, though not as the means of the separation between Silla and Silvio. Strangely enough Rich had greatly improved upon Bandello's tale, introducing a novel comic motive towards the close, and bringing about the revelation of his heroine's sex better than any of his predecessors. This modification, however, involved two scenes of such immodesty as Beaumont and Fletcher would have revelled in. Not so Shakespeare, who rejected them even at the sacrifice of a certain amount of constructive finish. The change is due to a refined sense of tone and keeping which he did not always evince so clearly. He felt that the love which breathes through the play must be "highfantastical," and that its grosser phenomena must for the nonce be ignored. In a fairy tale everything must be sensuous, nothing sensual; and Twelfth Night is a fairy tale.

This well understood, all the crudities and absurdities of the romance become so many inseparable characteristics of the form. The exact likeness between Viola and Sebastian, extending even to the fashion and colour of their clothes; Olivia's sudden love for Viola; the complaisant philosophy with which Sebastian consents to marry a woman he has never seen before; the Duke's barbarous whim of sacrificing "the lamb that he doth love, to spite a raven's heart within a dove;" the failure of Viola and Sebastian instantly to recognise one another—all these details are bad drama but good fairy tale. And how fresh and exquisite, how gracious and stately, are the figures which move through these fantastic mazes! Viola is a shade more ethereal and fragile than Rosalind; to take an illustration suggested by their two names, she is as a violet to a moss-rose. "Ganymede" would probably have done more credit to his "swashing, martial outside" in the duel with Sir Andrew than did the shrivelledly sensitive "Cesario." For the rest they are equally modest, yet equally frank, equally self-reliant, yet equally womanly. Olivia is a model of the gracious chatelaine, even while she is a victim to the mischievous love-philtres of the unseen Puck of the play. Lamb's remark on the tone in which she should "trifle a leisure sentence or two" with the Clown, instead of "setting her wits at him" to "vie conceits with him in down-right emulation," is not the least happy in the happiest of his criticisms. What a princely carriage has the languid egoist Orsino, in whose mouth the poet has placed some of his loveliest snatches of verbal melody! What a fine fresh buoyancy of youth do we find in Sebastian! How pleasant is the bluff tenderness of the old seaman Antonio! The play begins with a symphony, and ends with a song, and should, on the stage, be steeped in music. It is a fugue of graceful fantasies.

So much for the fairy tale: now for the farce. Its construction is entirely Shakespeare's, and affords a good specimen of his manner. Given the pompously fatuous character of Malvolio, the "practise" put upon him is a very simple invention. Much more ingenuity is shown in the second practical joke of the duel, with its recoil upon the head of its perpetrator through the intervention of Sebastian. All these scenes—the scene of the letter, of the cross-garters, of the duel and its consequences—are theatrically effective by reason of their skilful dialogue, which a little judicious pruning renders fairly comprehensible to modern ears. On the other hand there are many passages which can at no time have been reasonably good dialogue—such as the first meeting between Maria and Sir Andrew, and several of the scenes in which the Clown is concerned. Such inane word-strainings may have been true to nature, since the professional fools of the day, bound to be funny at all hazards, must often have resorted to them; but they are none the less puerile, and should drop away on the modern stage to the great advantage of all concerned. Feste is, on the whole, one of the shallowest of Shakespeare's jesters. When he says of himself that he is not Olivia's fool, but her corrupter of words, there is more than a spice of truth in the remark. Compared with Touchstone, he sinks into absolute insignificance. The parts can scarcely have been written for the same actor; Touchstone was probably designed for a comedian of authoritative genius, Feste for a mere singing clown.

As to the other characters in this portion of the play, only one of them, Malvolio, presents any difficulties. Of Sir Toby Belch and Sir Andrew Aguecheek, it is an old remark, but none the less a true one, that the former is a vulgarised Falstaff, the latter a caricatured Slender. It is to be noted that in the chronological sequence Twelfth Night follows almost immediately the two parts of Henry IV and The Merry Wives of Windsor. Shakespeare doubtless found the popularity of these types unexhausted, and, moreover, he had probably the actors of Sir John and Slender ready to hand. He accordingly deprived the knight of his consummate intellectual supremacy of scoundrelism, giving him a somewhat weaker head for liquor, and a somewhat stronger heart for fighting; he added to Slender a dash of Ben Jonson's Master Stephen; and he placed the two figures in his fairy Illyria as he had formerly placed Bottom, Snout, and Starveling in his fairy Attica. Knight's explanation of the presence of these English roysterers in Illyria, by supposing Olivia's mother to have been an English-woman, sister to Sir Toby, is one of the most amusing naïvetés in the apologetics of Shakespearology.
And lastly, of Malvolio. I confess that he has always been to me one of the most puzzling of Shakespeare's creations. The theory, so popular with German, and with some English, commentators, which makes of him a satirical type of the Puritan as Shakespeare conceived him, will not hold ground for a moment. It is founded on one or two detached speeches wrested from their context. Maria says of him that "he is sometimes a kind of a Puritan," only to say in the next breath that "the devil a Puritan" is he; and when Sir Andrew expresses a desire to beat him, Sir Toby derisively asks, "What, for being a Puritan? Thy exquisite reason, dear knight?" Is it likely that Shakespeare was himself guilty of the stupidity which even Sir Toby ridicules in his gull? Yet Kreyssig, as a rule one of the most commonsense commentators, does not hesitate to speak as if the poet, in this character, took revenge for the Puritan attacks upon his craft, as Molière, in Tartuffe, lashed his enemies the bigots. If this was Shakespeare's intention, he must have been a blundering satirist, for there is nothing of the typical Puritan in Malvolio. He carries out his lady's orders in remonstrating with her kinsman for making her house a noisy tavern, and by so doing he draws down upon himself the vengeance of the leagued spirits of misrule. If it be Puritanism to do his duty as a man of sense and a faithful steward in attempting to put a stop to drunken ribaldry, then the poet seems rather to eulogise than to satirise Puritanism. On the other hand, his misfortunes, so far as he is himself responsible for them, spring from defects by no means characteristically Puritan. Spiritual pride is the besetting sin of the "unco' guid"; it is physical vanity which leads Malvolio so readily to swallow his tormentors' bait. A scorn, real or affected, for the things of this life is the mark of the Puritan; Malvolio, however little taste he may have for the gross "cakes and ale" of the boon companions, has not the slightest desire to conceal his worldliness beneath a mask of other-worldliness. But such argument is futile. No one who reads the play without a preconceived theory can find in Malvolio the smallest trace of the zealot. All that can by any stretch of language be called Puritanism in his conduct redounds entirely to his honour.

To me it seems that Shakespeare, in drawing him, had not so clear an idea as usual of the precise phase of character he wished to represent. He was more concerned to obtain comic effects than to create a consistent, closely-observed type. We do not know Malvolio as we know Polonius, Jacques, Mercutio, Dogberry. This may be a mere personal impression, but I seem to trace in the commentators something of the uncertainty which has always troubled me with reference to his character. The very fact that he has been so grievously misinterpreted proves that there is a certain vagueness in his characterisation. Lamb has drawn with his usual delicacy of insight the externals, so to speak, of the part, has left directions for all coming generations of actors (happy whoso can follow them!); but his hints as to how the best comic value is to be extracted from the stage-personage throw little light upon the inward structure, the psychological basis, of the character. If I may hazard a theory, I should say that he is not a Puritan but a Philistine. The radical defect of his nature is a Jack of that sense of humour which is the safety-valve of all our little insanities, preventing even the most expensive egoism from altogether overinflating us. He takes himself and the world too seriously. He has no intuition for the incongruous and grotesque, to put the drag upon his egoistic fantasy, "sick of self-love." His face, not only smileless itself but contemptuous of mirth in others, has acted as a damper upon the humour of the sprightly Maria and the jovial Sir Toby; he has taken a set pleasure in putting the poor Clown out of countenance by receiving bis quips with a stolid gravity. Hence the rancour of the humorists against a fundamentally antagonistic nature; hence, perhaps, their whim of making him crown his absurdities by wearing a forced smile, a grimace more incongruous with his pompous personality than even cross-garters or yellow stockings. He is a being, in short, to whom the world, with all its shows and forms, is intensely real and profoundly respectable. He has no sense of its littleness, its evanescence, without which he can have no true sense of its greatness and its mystery. In common life this absorption in the shows of things manifests itself in a deficient feeling for proportion and contrast. He has no sense of humour—that is the head and front of his offending.

That his punishment, strictly considered, is excessive to the point of barbarity, cannot, I think, be doubted; but the air of the fairy tale interpenetrates the farce, and we do not demand a strict apportionment of justice either poetical or practical. It is certain that no sense of painful injustice has generally been found to interfere with the pleasure to be derived from the play, which has, until of late years, been popular on the English stage, while German critics agree in regarding it as the comedy which, on the whole, retains most vitality for modern audiences. Nor can we doubt that its attractiveness on the stage has hitherto been due to the farce rather than to the fairy tale, whose iridescent beauties are apt to be lost in the harsh light of the theatre. Whether he clearly defined his character or not, Shakespeare evidently succeeded in making of Malvolio an effective comic figure.

III.

How, then, is Twelfth Night treated at the Lyceum? Is the fairy tale brought into prominence, or the farce? or do they receive equal justice? It may be said at once that the fairy tale comes off the better of the two, but that even it meets with somewhat inadequate treatment.

Not, certainly, as regards externals. Mr. Irving and his scenic artists seem to have recognised, consciously or instinctively, that they had to deal with a Kingdom of Kennaquhere, unrecorded in history, undiscoverable in geography, which must, before all else, be sumptuous and summery. The action moves through no less than thirteen scenes, seven of which take up, if not the full stage, at least a considerable part of its depth. In a popular German arrangement of the play two "sets" are made to suffice; but this is a false and inartistic economy. It is useless to talk of overburdening the action with decoration. This criticism might apply to Romeo and Juliet, but in Twelfth Night there is practically no action to be overburdened. The richer and more varied the background, the fuller is the sensuous satisfaction we receive from the whole. The Lyceum Illyria is a land where ornate Renaissance palaces with their cool balconies and colonnades and their mazy arabesque traceries, look forth among groves of palms, and plantains, and orangetrees, and cedars, over halcyon seas dotted with bird-like feluccas and high-proved fishing-boats. There is even in some scenes, such as that in Orsino's palace, an apparently intentional effort to indicate a semi-magic light, neither that of common day nor of any visible lamp, torch, or candle, but a suffused rich radiance contrasting exquisitely with the blue moonlight in the background.

The light and colour of the play is thus successfully presented, but one all-important element is lacking from its atmosphere—the music which should permeate it—

> Like the sweet south
> That breathes upon a bank of violets,
> Stealing, and giving odour.
> [I. ii. 5-7]

It is to be regretted that Mr. Irving's arrangement, otherwise unobjectionable, removes Shakespeare's opening scene from its initial position. The first line of the play, as it stands in the text, strikes the key-note of all that is to follow:—

> If music be the food of love, play on,
> Give me excess of it.

Mr. Irving and his musical director do not take this hint. They not only eliminate the Clown's two songs—lyrics so exquisite that one feels the criticism impertinent which proves one and probably both of them to be popular songs merely quoted by Shakespeare—but they stint us of the bursts of instrumental melody which might, and should, greet us at every turn.

Four characters move through the simple figure of the fairy tale—Viola and Orsino, Olivia and Sebastian. About Miss Ellen Terry's Viola there is certainly a peculiar charm. It is not the Viola either of tradition or of imagination; it lacks warmth and colour and soft youthfulness. As we first see her standing on the seawashed rocks in the lurid sunset, her stately figure might be that of an abandoned Ariadne or an expectant Calypso; no one would ever suspect her to represent Viola. But when she assumes the white silk and gold-embroidered tunic with the white mantle draped negligently over her arm, we feel that we are in the presence of an individual creation, if not of the very Viola our fancy painted. This is a Viola not "painted" at all, but delicately carved in alabaster. It seems as through Patience had come down from her monument, and, still smiling at grief with distant wistful eyes, mingled for a season in the motley doings of men. Shakespeare's Viola has certainly a greater store of healthy animal spirits than this delicate, sylph-like creature; but she cannot have a lighter, airier grace, or, on occasion, a more refined and yet incisive humour. It seemed to me that Miss Terry's worst mannerisms, her love of studied attitude, and her singsong ill-emphasised delivery of verse, had almost disappeared. It will one day be recognised, I think, that her Viola is a vast improvement on her Beatrice, and in fact the best of her Shakespearean parts. Mr. Terriss, unfortunately, is a most inadequate Orsino. The dreamy egoist, wrapped up in his fantastic passion, and luxuriating in the languor of its "aromatic pain," is quite beyond the conception, or at least beyond the powers of execution, of this fatally beautiful actor. His sins are mainly of omission—lack of largeness of manner and music of utterance—but at one point he is positively and painfully wrong, namely, in the bantering tone he assumes on the revelation of Viola's sex. The Olivia, Miss Rose Leclercq, lacks, if not distinction, at least nobility of manner, and is conventional though not unpleasing. Mr. F. Terry, who plays Sebastian, resembles his sister sufficiently to make the comedy of errors not incredible, and that is as much as can be expected. His acting is manly and pleasant enough.

More music, and more aptly chosen, as well as a more musical more melancholy Orsino—these are the elements required to make the presentation of the fairy tale well-nigh ideal. As it is, the Viola makes it very charming. Let us now turn to the farce.

It would have been little less than miraculous had the characters of Sir Toby and Sir Andrew appealed very forcibly to the audience. One cannot but remember how, on the first night of Much Ado, Dogberry and Verges, characters much easier to play and of humours much less obsolete, were voted bores and hindrances to the action. Here, indeed, there is no particular action to obstruct, the two knights being themselves leading figures in one of the two intrigues; but it would have demanded the rarest combination of comic force and finesse to make them fully credible and comprehensible to a modern audience. Now it so happens that in casting these parts Mr. Irving has made a grave mistake, and spoiled the little chance they had of acquiring new vitality for a new and sophisticated generation. Sir Toby is played by Mr. David Fisher, an admirable comedian who, twenty years ago, might have made much of the character. As it is, he quite lacks the breadth and robustness of manner which are the first essentials for a part of the sort. Sir Toby is a large-limbed, large-bellied, large-voiced toper, certainly not past the fifth of the seven ages. To give him the least touch of senility is to strike at the foundation of the character, which surely consists of irrepressible, overmastering animal spirits. There is an in-decision in Mr. Fisher's manner, a lack of robustness and rotundity absolutely fatal to its effect. Mr. Wyatt as Sir Andrew is hopelessly out of his element, so hopelessly that criticism knows not where to begin or end, and can only assert broadly that he does not come within a hundred miles of the character. Mr. Wyat as Sir Andrew is hopelessly out of his element, so hopelessly that criticism knows not where to begin or end, and can only assert broadly that he does not come within a hundred miles of the character. It would be unjust to lay the ineffectiveness of the Clown entirely at Mr. Calhaem's door, but his forced and mechanical fooling, without a trace of spontaneous fantasy, certainly did not succeed in bringing poor Feste home to the humorous sympathies of the audience. Miss Louisa Payne was a tolerable Maria, but even had she possessed much greater natural gifts for the part, she alone could not have infused the proper spirit into the scenes of the carouse and the conspiracy. Thus those passages whose mere remembrance was like an electric shock to the mind of Charles Lamb, as he thought of Dodd and Suett and the elder Palmer, now pass before our weary eyes like the melancholy ghosts of what once was comedy.

But what of Malvolio? Did not Mr. Irving redeem these scenes from barrenness? He did in a measure, for the opening scenes of his performance were admirable; but at the close there came a sudden declension which had well-nigh wrecked the fortunes of the revival.
In the scene of his first appearance Mr. Irving's manner had much of that "Spanish loftiness" which so delighted Lamb in Bensley's conception of the part. He was the self-sufficient, sternly-formal, Jack-in-office to the life. The rebuke to the revellers, again, was an excellent specimen of his artistic method, for not only was his playing good, but its effect was heightened by a marvellously spectral night-dress and a scenic arrangement which threw into relief the grim grotesqueness of his appearance. His soliloquy before finding the letter was addressed too much to the audience, and throughout this scene his face showed one of the defects of its qualities in the shape of an inability to assume a sufficiently stolid and immovable self-consequence. When an absence of humorous expression is required to give a speech its full comic effect, Mr. Irving's restless eye-brows and obliquely twinkling eyes do him a disservice. In all his comic creations a semi-sardonic archness is the prevailing expression of his face, and when this breaks through the Castilian gravity of Malvolio, as he not seldom allows it to do, the effect is peculiarly inappropriate. Whatever may have been Shakespeare's precise intention, he certainly did not mean Malvolio to be arch. When he appears before Olivia, however, in his cross-gartered yellow stockings, the comedy lies in an assumption of the very archness which is not in his nature, and here Mr. Irving's expression is appropriate enough. From this point forward he is throughout in error. The scene of the dark room and the concluding scene are no doubt peculiarly difficult, but to treat them in a tone of serious tragedy is to introduce a discord so crying that it jarred even on the not very fastidiously critical ear of the Lyceum audience. There is a buoyancy of self-esteem about Malvolio which would necessarily prevent his collapsing into such a nerveless state of prostrate dejection as that in which Mr. Irving exhibits him, stretched on the straw of a dungeon worthy of Fidelio. The play should, after all, be treated as a comedy; if Mr. Irving could not hit the true comedy tone in these scenes he had better have erred on the side of farce than on that of melodrama. The short scene of his appearance before the Duke and Olivia in the last act was a mere repetition of his Shylock; he went off like the baffled villain of melodrama, not the befooled fantast of comedy. The mistake was all the more surprising in that it was unintelligent.

There can be no doubt that the straw which clung to Mr. Irving's dress from the mad-house scene was the last straw which broke the patience of a certain section of the first-night audience, already tried by the grave inadequacies of the comic portions of the play. The groans which interrupted his speech fell like thunder from a clear sky, and naturally bewildered him not a little. To complain so loudly of one or two mistakes of detail certainly showed an un-philosophic irritation, perhaps due to the baking July atmosphere. I, for one, should regret it less if I could trace in it the beginnings of a serious reaction against the exclusive cultivation of what Mr. Irving frankly calls "the ancient drama" at the Lyceum.
cadences of the familiar verses lingering in the ear, one hesitates to admit that the performance had its dull moments and that these were very dull. It will not do, either, to attribute this dullness to the vapidity of the Elizabethan small-talk—the slang of the poet's day—which besprinkles the speeches of that droll old vagabond, Sir Toby, and his companion rogues. When we go to see a Shakespearean play acted we would not lose a word of Shakespeare's that has not grown with lapse of centuries too coarse for modern ears and, moreover, the actors treated the quaint passages of the text with facility, as if they were used to it, as indeed they are. But the performance lacked variety and bustle in some parts, and although the cast was nicely balanced and harmonious, there were no characters exceedingly well acted except the Viola of Miss Terry and the Malvolio of Mr. Irving, and these two in a very different degree.

For the Viola was redolent with the charm of the actress, and was not only beautiful to the eye, but infused with the spirit of the poem in which she figures, and graced by intellectual power and womanly devotion. Indeed, we do not hesitate to place Miss Terry's Viola beside her Beatrice, as one of the performances in which her temperament enables her to conspicuously shine. Her conception of the character, as may be imagined, is not founded altogether upon tradition, although she has accepted what pleases her of the old, and subjected it to her own admirable methods. The earlier scenes with the sea Captain and Orsino were natural, but in these the actress was noticeably subdued: her sorrow for the loss of Sebastian took the form of dejection, and there was a plaintive wail in the delivery of the lines:

What do I in Illyria!
My brother, he's in elysium.

But from the moment of the first encounter with Olivia, Viola was vivacious or tender by turns, sparkling with woman's wit or sorrowing o'er her untold love. The love scene with the Duke has surely never been rendered with more beauty, and the lines beginning "She never told her love," were given with much feeling and no striving for effect, the surreptitious dashing away of a tear, as the lament for the imaginary sister was finished, being the only gesture added by way of emphasis. On the other hand; the duel scene was deliciously droll, and the wonderment and scarce formulated hope that Sebastian has been saved, in the subsequent passages were depicted with delightful effect.

Mr. Irving's Malvolio is a striking and interesting impersonation. His makeup is excellent, and the overweening egotism of Olivia's steward is shown with many skillful touches. The interruption of the revelers, in act II., and the famous letter scene may be cited as the two passages in which this Malvolio is seen to the best advantage, the interpretation of the incoherent nonsense of the mysterious billet being marked by quaint comicality and imperturbable complacency. Mr. Irving does not force the character out of its proper place in the play by over-elaboration, and if there is any fault to be found with the impersonation it is because it lacks variety, both in speech and action. This was the fault also of some of the other actors in last night's performance. Miss Payne, for instance, was a merry Maria, but she was too inclined to pitch her speech in one key, and therefore produced a monotonous effect. Mr. Wenman as Sir Toby, and Mr. Forbes as Ague-cheek, although their impersonations were otherwise meritorious, had the same fault. Mr. Alexander was Orsino, Miss Emery Olivia, and Mr. Howe Antonio. Mr. S. Johnson was the clown, and sang the verses at the conclusion of the play.

When that I was a little boy,

William Winter (review date 19 November 1884)

[This review was first published in the New York Tribune on 19 November 1884.]
There is an uncertainty of dramatic drift in the comedy of the Twelfth Night—a kind of whimsical recklessness, sufficiently denoted in the subtitle, What You Will—which, in practical experience, has generally had the effect of making this piece a little tiresome upon the stage. Nobody can care much for anything that it contains, aside from the gentle, piquant, lovely character of Viola; and the charm of this is not essentially dramatic, but resides almost exclusively in the delicious sweetness of her temperament as displayed under the mournful light of her patient and outwardly cheerful resignation to the pangs of unrequited love. There is but little dramatic incident in her experience or of dramatic effect in the development of either her story or her character. The love-lorn Orsino—a gentleman far too easily reconciled to the loss of one love, so that at last he may obtain another—is almost insipid. The episode of Sir Toby and Sir Andrew is little more than a tipsy frolic. Malvolio, though strong and complex as a character, interests rather as a curiously carved and grotesque image of humanity than as a typical man: he amuses and he stimulates analytic reflection upon the possible oddities of human nature, but he does not awaken sympathy. The discomfiture of "an affectioned ass" and "contemplative fool" is a comic spectacle, and yet the laughter to which it incites is rebuked by a kind of humane regret that any man should be so absurd, and should, in his infinity of conceit, encounter such cruel treatment. As often-as the Twelfth Night has been seen here (and it has been seen often since the old days of Burton), it has proved a trial to patience, except for two or three impressive beauties. Mr. Irving's revival of it, although distinguished by rare beauty of scenery and fidelity of detail in dress and "business," met with the usual fortune of calm respect. Its chief features were Miss Ellen Terry as Viola and Mr. Irving as Malvolio—the latter being the first embodiment of this eccentric person seen here of late years, or since the time of Walcot and Gilbert in the character, that has made him an actual human creature, capable of feeling passion and of suffering pain as well as of causing mirth and pointing a moral. Mr. Irving presented him with distinctness and firm execution, and with a wealth of subtle mechanism. Miss Terry in Viola was a beautiful image of boy-like grace, and she delivered the text with a fine intelligence that penetrated and illumined every line. But her performance had little of that half-concealed sadness which, mingled with Viola's glee, makes her pathetic as well as bewitching. Sweet without insipidity and gay without coquetry, Viola is the most piquant female character in Shakespeare, and, excepting Imogen, the most tender and delicious of his women. She is ture but not intense; ardent but not powerful. She loves and she suffers; but she is bright, gentle, and submissive, and she typifies neither misery nor passion. Shakespeare's lapses from verse into prose are always significant because always made to serve a purpose in the art of acting; and it is notable that he seldom allows Viola to speak aught else than the language of poetry. She is a rarefied character, slighter alike in mind and will than Rosalind, though kindred with that luxuriant, sparkling, beauty, but equally affectionate and noble, and more lovely. There is not much of the character, but it is as precious as diamonds. The chief dramatic necessity in the acting of Viola would seem to be the revelation of her wistful sadness, her rueful, charming melancholy, under the repose of innocent glee—the half-checked tear that is momentarily visible through the guileless, patient, unselfish, eager smile of childlike happiness. Miss Terry's expeditious treatment of the part gave such emphasis to its brilliancy as quite concealed its sorrow. But, while deficient in the transparency of acting, it was a delightful image of gladness, sweetness, and beauty.

Frank Benson (essay date 1939)

Irving had far too strong a personality for Malvolio. To the best of my recollection his Malvolio was distinctly a gentleman, not a buffoon; he was dignified, not heavy. It was inconceivable that that commanding presence should be a mere steward. He looked like some great Spanish hidalgo—a painting of Velazquez; never could he have become the butt of his fellow-servants. For surely Malvolio graduated in the kitchen or the buttery; he is an old retainer, privileged as old servants are and abusing that privilege as so often they do, domineering over the rest of the staff till he provokes them to revolt. He apes the manners of his superiors with the inevitably grotesque results. With Irving one felt it impossible that he could have superiors. There is no element of greatness in Malvolio, only meanness; there is no intellect, merely a numskull, he is a proper butt for the rest of the household. But in Irving's hands the part became so transmuted that you marvelled how they dared, and no doubt having some such notion in his mind, he cast the play unfortunately; the ladies were too mature and, what was almost equally disastrous, the comedians were not funny; the sprightly Feste was played as a decrepit old man and Fabian was the brightest spark of the plotters. They were indeed a pusillanimous crowd who, one felt, would shrink abashed at the frown of this majestic Malvolio; one could never imagine him their gull. His scenes with Olivia were marked of course with the most courtly grace; with Cesario he was duly arrogant, but with his fellow-servants he was so masterful as to defeat comedy altogether. In the final scene: 'I'll be revenged on the whole pack of ye!' one felt he would, and the whole gossamer fabric of the play was rent. Malvolio should gain sympathy, for mere peacocking hardly deserved the humiliation he suffered, but this is no case for tragic intensity and Irving in a passion suggested no less. But, though possibly marred by the elaboration of eccentric touches, it was an excellent performance.

At the end of the performance on the first night there was an unusual demonstration. Strong as the anti-Irvingites were, I do not believe that there was anything in the nature of an organized opposition. I believe that the pit and gallery were frankly bored with the performance and disappointed to see their favourite actor in a part so inadequate and one, moreover, that could never suit him, and they expressed their dissatisfaction in the usual ill-mannered way, though I am bound to say I prefer that to the stony silence that greets failure across the Atlantic and across the Channel.

Irving for once was irritated out of his calm and in his perfectly dignified speech of remonstrance—though he had done better to have faced the situation in smiling silence—he used an illuminating phrase; he spoke of his company 'having exercised their abilities on one of the most difficult of Shakespeare's plays. 'I cannot help thinking that it was the very simplicity of Twelfth Night that baffled Irving; he had prepared it looking all the time for profundities that he imagined must be eluding him. He was always at his best when faced with introspective and psychological difficulties; he sought them in vain in Twelfth Night for the simple reason that they are not there.

I have felt it very keenly being 'at odds', so to speak, with my old manager and most venerated Chief, so I have looked up old verdicts of professional critics hoping to find one well argued in opposition to my own opinion and I think I have found it in Mr. William Winter's review of the production when it had reached New York. Mr. Winter wrote:

> The formalism of Malvolio, his scrupulous cleanliness, his precise demeanour, his constitutional habit of routine, his inordinate self-complacency—over which, nevertheless, his judgment keeps a kind of watch—his sensitiveness of self-love, his condition of being real in all that he feels and suffers—these attributes Mr. Irving combined into a distinct and rounded personality, of which the humour is—as it should be—wholly unconscious. His sustained preservation of the identity was especially impressive, and he was most characteristic in his dry, distinctly articulated, unconsciously pompous delivery of the text.

This compares feebly with Charles Lamb's panegyric on Bensley in the part, but I always felt that the mild humours of Twelfth Night and the gentlemanly puritanism of Bensley's Malvolio were just of a piece with the smiling spirit of the gentle Elia; the subdued chuckle becomes him; it is impossible to conceive him indulging the vulgarity of a guffaw.

I have said above that I did not consider Malvolio worthy of Irving. That is the fact. He was, to use a metaphor, so great an athlete that only the highest hurdle, the broadest ditch was worthy of his attempting. He needed stimulating by difficulties, easy conquests were beneath him: the complexities of a Glo'ster or an Iago challenged all his intellectual forces and ensured his greatest triumphs; the purely physical was beyond him and my metaphor of the athlete cannot be literally applied; the madness of Lear out-thundering the storm; the call to arms by Macbeth, the towering rage of Othello were beyond his physical strength. But who could surpass him in tenderness to Cordelia? Whoever has more subtly indicated the disintegration of spirit in Macbeth?—or shown us the innate nobility of the Moor in his defence before the Senate? It was so always with Irving; no matter what part he attempted he gave you always something to think about, there was always some one great outstanding point of originality if not of inspiration in his performance. It is for that reason that his memory lives; that even in these days when the theatre tosses like a rudderless ship in stormy seas without a chart and without a skipper we still remember him who guided her fortunes so skilfully and steered her into the happy haven of respect and dignity.

His artistic conscience was more highly developed than that of any of his predecessors. His singleness of purpose, his profound respect for his calling, taught the world to respect it also, and under his leadership it gained a higher place in the world's estimation than it had ever known or is like to know again. He identified himself with all that was finest, all that was most artistic, all that was most progressive in an age of remarkable expansions and developments. He brought the Theatre into line with the other arts by his association with artists, writers, and musicians, such as Rossetti and Burne-Jones, Tennyson and Swin-burne, Sullivan and German.

My first introduction to him was characteristic. He had come to see our performance of the Agamemnon. "This Greek play of yours," said Irving," said Irving, "was most interesting and if you will let me say so remarkably carried out. Should you think seriously of the stage as a profession I will do my best for you." What had appealed to him was the selflessness of the players and the simplicity of the production. When I decided shortly afterwards to try my fortunes in the theatre I went to him and the result was my appearance as Paris in Romeo and Juliet. From the first I was impressed by his dynamic force. Nobody could work with him without catching the spirit of his enthusiasm, which penetrated to every department. He was indefatigable. In the days when I knew him first he lived not only for the theatre (that was true of all his life) but in the theatre. No detail escaped him and no detail was insignificant.

In truth Irving was the Lyceum; his complete knowledge of his craft and of its every tradition gave him an authority that no one ever attempted to dispute.

To return to Malvolio: Ellen Terry says in her book that Irving's performance was 'fine and dignified, but not good for the play,' which corresponds exactly with my own impression. All that Irving did was 'fine,' so fine that, at times, it came near to defeating his end. Doctor Primrose, for example, was too fine for a country parson; Lesurques again was too fine for the bourgeois son of a village post-master in the same way that Malvolio was certainly too fine for the servants' hall. His dignity pervaded his personality—exuded from it, and for many made him unapproachable. This was their loss, for it deprived them of knowledge of the man—of his innate gentleness and kindliness, qualities that made him so staunch a friend and won for him the reputation not only of a great actor but a manager, reliable, just and liberal in all his dealings.

Nothing impressed me more than the story of Ellen Terry's interview after the Abbey Service in October 1905. "What have you to say of him?" asked the interviewer. "He was a great actor, a great friend and a good man," she answered. "What more is there to say?" What more' indeed!

Laurence Irving (essay date 1951)

Twelfth Night was produced on July 8th [1884]. Londoners were enduring a heat wave and those of them who made up the audience at the Lyceum were inclined to be as sultry as the night. Irving had spared no pains to match the decorative beauty of his Much Ado—perhaps in this respect he erred in overloading delicate comedy with stage effects. His Malvolio was the outcome of long and original study, for he had never seen the play performed. Phelps had revived the play at Sadler's Wells in 1848; his Malvolio was a masterpiece of make-up and elaborately studied; nevertheless, he did not appear in the part again. Lamb, in his vivid appreciation of Robert Bensley's performance of Malvolio at the end of the eighteenth century, recorded that the actor came near to being the perfect Don Quixote. Many critics drew this parallel in writing of Irving's performance, proving that either he or they had been polishing up their Elia. Undoubtedly Irving interpreted the part in the light of Bensley's conception of a steward whose 'bearing was lofty, a little above his station but probably not much above his deserts'.

Irving must have been bewildered by the contrary opinions his Malvolio provoked. Those critics, who usually handled him harshly, now applauded him, while his adulators hung their heads, embarrassed by their unaccustomed tepidity. For certain, his instinct as a producer had failed him. Afterwards, he confessed to Ellen Terry that he should have engaged three great comedians to play the clowns. As it was, their shortcomings were fatal to the balance of the play, even if the Victorian audience had been ready to be amused by the robust humours of Sir Andrew and Sir Toby.

Ellen Terry should have been, and indeed became, a perfect Viola. But on the first night she was sick with pain from a whitlow in her thumb, had her arm in a sling and was forced to play many of her scenes sitting down. Had not Stoker's brother, a doctor, lanced her thumb during the performance, blood-poisoning might well have caused the loss of her arm.

All these misfortunes and the marked apathy of the audience did not prepare Irving for the demonstration of disapproval which greeted his appearance before the curtain at the end of the play. His speech was interrupted by booing and hissing from the pit and gallery—a sound as painful and unfamiliar to the faithful in the more expensive parts of the house as cat-calls would be to worshippers in a cathedral. For once the gods were demonstrative but not appreciative; the effect upon their humble servant was galvanic. He rounded upon the malcontents and sharply rebuked them, expressing his bewilderment at the presence in his theatre of a strange element which he was at a loss to understand. In defence of his fellow-players, he asked how a company 'of earnest comedians—sober, clean and word-perfect' could fail to have given gratification and pleasure. Though, in his fury, his sense of humour deserted him—for of all men he would have been the last to offer the hygienic or moral excellence of an actor as an excuse for his poor performance—he quelled the rebels and, with his final appeal—'In your smiles we are happy, prithee smile upon us'—he restored the traditional rapture of a Lyceum first night.

Though Twelfth Night ran until the end of the limited season, public interest in it steadily waned. Archer, who praised Irving's performance as 'always adequate and sometimes masterly', particularly in those scenes which seemed to puzzle most of his colleagues, put his finger on what was probably the cause of the play's unpopularity. 'Queen Elizabeth,' he wrote, 'is more dead than Queen Anne. The spirit of her age is not alive in the public … who are, after all, but the abstract and brief chronicle of the tastes and habits of the times.' Even though the text had to some extent been expurgated, a Victorian audience were unable to relish in public the bawdy innuendos over which they might chuckle in private. Moreover, even the most ardent lovers of Shakespeare can find his clowns, when they are not well played, infinitely boring. The very qualities which made Irving's Malvolio one of his most memorable parts to playgoers of discernment, bewildered the ordinary public to whom comedy and tragedy were two entirely separate things. They delighted in Irving's clowning, but when they found themselves moved to tears by Malvolio's imprisonment, which he rendered tragic and piteful, they failed to see that it was the very perfection of high comedy.

Charles H. Shattuck (essay date 1987)

Irving’s Twelfth Night was unfortunately short-lived. At the end of the first London performance (July 8, 1884), the unbelievable happened: when Irving stepped forward to deliver his customary opening night address to the audience, he was interrupted by a scattering of boos and hisses. Startled and angered, he treated the audience to a scolding, which of course helped not at all. Some of the critics, attempting to account for the audience’s displeasure, blamed Irving’s Malvolio as “too tragical.” Irving himself, speaking to friends, blamed the “failure” on the lack of great comedians to play Sir Toby and his circle—indeed, he replaced half a dozen of the company before bringing Twelfth Night to America. Secretly, though, he seems to have doubted his own rendition of Malvolio. This was a pity, for by many accounts his Malvolio was superb. Joseph Knight of the Athenaeum called it "the best Malvolio the stage has seen." According to William Winter [in his Henry Irving, 1885], Irving was the first in modern times to make Malvolio "an actual human being, capable of feeling passion and suffering pain as well as causing mirth."

He made himself up to look as much as possible like Don Quixote—his tall gaunt figure clad in close-fitting black satin with gold stripes, with diamonds in his ears, the chain of office around his neck, and in his hand a long slender staff which he swung erratically. He was nearly bald; his eyebrows, painted high on his forehead, gave him a constant look of superciliousness (or surprise); his cheeks were sallow and sunken; he wore a skimpy brown mustache twisted at the ends, and a narrow pointed beard. Malvolio being such an extravagant creature, Irving’s naturally grotesque physical movements and vocal quirks could enhance his characterization rather than damage it. And since Malvolio is utterly self-centered, deliberative—"alone," so to speak—Irving could move through the language of the part freely and according to his own patterns, without destroying Shakespearean patterns of pentameter verse or speedy-witty prose. Malvolio is a "slow" role, affording countless opportunities for the "delicate touches" of behavior that were central to Irving’s ideas about acting. This Malvolio was a man of parts and breeding, intensely aware of his superiority. Irving did not gag or play for easy laughs, but was desperately in earnest at every moment, and thus profoundly amusing. Unfortunately, as a result of his self-distrust, Irving not only abandoned Twelfth Night after its run in America, but never again undertook a comic role in Shakespeare.

Ellen Terry, who played the boy Cesario charmingly in her cream-colored satin tunic and a little blue cap that rode perkily on her golden curls, was not unhappy when the play was dropped from Irving's repertory. She thought the production as a whole was "dull, lumpy, and heavy." She may have noted the wonderment of several American critics that she and Irving had both let themselves be consigned to such relatively "unimportant" parts, and this would have confirmed her own recognition that Viola cannot take command of the situation she is thrust into. Then, too, in America at least, she was bested by a ghostly competitor—Adelaide Neilson, so lately dead, whose lovely Viola haunted the memory of the reviewers. The Herald critic thought it fair to note that Miss Terry had other parts "more exacting, more pathetic, and even more merry."

Scenically this Twelfth Night—with its array of seascapes, ravines, luxurious gardens, mansions à la Palladio, and a gloomy dungeon for Malvolio’s imprisonment—was not only splendid in itself, but occasion for the Spirit of the Times to attempt to shame our American managers into emulating Irving’s production methods. Nothing like it had ever been seen upon the New York stage until Mr. Irving came—but "the public will hereafter insist that the same completeness of accessories and unity of action shall be displayed by all professionals, and the sooner the Irving system is generally adopted the better for all concerned.… Mr. Irving has shown us that what our own managers have claimed to be impossible is easily done with the requisite tact and taste and skill."

PRODUCTION:

Augustin Daly •Daly's Theatre, New York •1893-94
Daly's staging of the play, which opened at Daly's Theatre in New York, was accounted one of the director's greatest successes. Taking extreme liberties with the text, Daly cut approximately six hundred lines from the play to purge it of elements that might compromise its "poetry" and "beauty." He additionally transposed and rearranged the musical scenes in the work, employing as an introduction to the first act a group of fishermen and peasants singing "Come unto these yellow sands." Daly promoted the pageantry of the play by using the elaborate costumes of Graham Robertson and by staging such memorable scenic effects as a violent storm and a moonlit rose garden. The play itself consisted of only four acts, and the character of Malvolio was reduced to the dungeon scene in Act IV. This production was in full sympathy with contemporary taste and was well received both in America and in London the following year. Ada Rehan's Viola was considered a highlight of this staging. William Winter wrote "Viola is a woman of deep sensibility: and that way Miss Rehan has comprehended and reproduced her, permitting a certain wistful sadness to glimmer through the gauze of kindly vivacity." For George Bernard Shaw, who deprecated Daly's handling of the text, Rehan's performance was the sole redeeming feature of the production: "the moment she strikes up the true Shakespearian music, and feels her way to her part altogether by her sense of that music, the play returns to life and all the magic is there." The other performances were generally considered to have been undistinguished and included Creston Clarke as Orsino, James Lewis as Sir Toby Belch, George Clarke as Malvolio, and Lloyd Daubigny as Feste. In 1894 the production opened at Daly's Theatre in London, where Rehan played Viola for 119 performances.

COMMENTARY:

William Winter (review date 22 February 1893)

"I'll serve this Duke." In those simple words the bereaved and shipwrecked Viola, who must begin life anew, reveals something more than her intention, because she also reveals the steadfast quality—blending patient endurance with buoyant self-control—of her lovely character. Concerning the Duke Orsino she knows only that he is reputed noble; that he is a bachelor, and that he loves the Lady Olivia, who is mourning the death of her father and brothers, and will admit no one to her presence. Viola is not impelled by passion, or by sentiment, or even by curiosity. She must find a new home, and she must obtain subsistence. Her first impulse is to serve the Lady Olivia; but that plan is rejected as impracticable. She will seek service in the household of the Duke—for she can sing, and can speak to him in many sorts of music—and she will hide her sex, and proceed thither in disguise. A happy chance has saved her from the sea, and meanwhile the same happy chance may also have saved Sebastian, her brother. She will be hopeful and will go forward, and the events of her future shall be trusted to propitious time. She is a sweet, constant woman, and she is especially blessed with that cheerful courage, as to worldly fortune, for which good women are usually more remarkable than men. And she is young, handsome, alluring, and—quite consciously—well fitted to prove victorious.

In Twelfth Night the dramatic art of Shakespeare, always felicitous, operates with an indolent ease that is delightful. The touch is invariably light. The mood—now tender, now joyous—is invariably natural, careless, seemingly almost indifferent. You are provided with all essential knowledge as to the two households of Orsino and Olivia; and yet you hardly perceive how it was that you came to know them, or how it is that they are made to dwell in your mind as pictorial and typical of so much diversified character, so much human nature, and so much representative experience. The scene is shifted frequently from one house to the other, but not with violence or caprice. The changes come about simply and aptly. The persons, almost imperceptibly, drift into their places and into your acquaintance and favor. The style varies, with charming flexibility, from verse to prose, and back again from prose to verse, preserving an absolute harmony with the variations of the theme. All is unforced. All is free and careless—a profusion of wild flowers—an ordered medley of whimsicality, and drollery, and sentiment, and grace, with abundance of kindly satire and a wealth of genial philosophy involved in it. Both the houses are stately, and over both the poet has thrown a hale of romance. In the palace of Orsino that Prince is suffering with the melancholy of hopeless love. In the sober hall of Olivia that cloistered beauty is suffering with grief for her dead brother and father. At the side of Orsino stands the disguised Viola—the page Caesario—love-lorn for her master's favor. At the side of Olivia stands the saturnine, self-worshipful Malvolio, nursing his conceit that the great lady may yet become his wife. And around those serious figures eddy the vinous revels of stout Sir Toby Belch, the puling capers of silly Sir Andrew. Aguecheek, the antics of mischievous Maria, and the romantic adventures of rescued and mystified Sebastian. It is a picture in little of the way of all things. Love is blind and will not see its own comfort, which is close at hand. Self-opinion makes itself a fool, and comes, amid inextinguishable laughter, to utter and irremediable disgrace. Frolic and revel sparkle, for their little moment, and turn to nothing.
Irrational fortune scatters her favors wholly without logic. Truth and devotion are rewarded by chance. And motley smiles over all.

A great while ago the world begun,
With hey, ho, the wind and the rain.

After the action of the piece has opened several comical situations are devised for Viola, together with several situations of serious perplexity, which mostly tend to create a comic effect for the auditor. In those situations Viola's gleeful spirit is liberated—her irrepressible hilarity, on being expected to play the part of a masculine lover, and her feminine consternation, when confronted with the necessity of combat, being artfully contrasted, for the sake of humorous results. The true note of the character, however, is serious. Viola is a woman of deep sensibility: and that way Miss Rehan has comprehended and reproduced her—permitting a certain wistful sadness to glimmer through the gauze of kindly vivacity with which, otherwise, her whole bright and gentle figure is artfully swathed. That was the pervading beauty of the impersonation. Those frolic scenes in which Viola participates are perfectly consonant with Miss Rehan's propensity for mirth and with her faculty for comic action. She rejoiced in them, and she made the listener rejoice in them. But the great underlying cause of her brilliant success in them was the profound sincerity of her feeling—over which her glee was seen to play, as moonlight plays upon the rippling surface of the ocean depth. In this embodiment, more than in any assumption of character previously presented by her she has relied upon a soft and gentle poetry of condition. She discarded all strong emphasis, whether of color, demeanor or speech. Her action was exceedingly delicate, and if at any moment she became conspicuous in a scene it was as the consequence of dramatic necessity, and not by reason of self-assertion. Lovely reserve and aristocratic distinction blended in the performance, and dignified and endeared it. The melody of Shakespeare's verse—especially in the passage of Viola's renunciation—fell from her lips in a strain of fluent sweetness that enhanced its beauty and deepened the pathos of its tender significance. In such tones the heart speaks, and not simply the warmth of an excited imagination, and so the incommunicable something that the soul knows of love and sorrow finds at least an utterance, if not an intelligible expression. Subtlety of perception naturally accompanies deep feeling.
Viola, when as Caesario she has captured the fancy of Olivia, although she may view that ludicrous dilemma archly, and even with a spice of innocent mischief, feels a woman's sympathy with the emotions of her sex; and all her conduct toward Olivia is refined and considerate. Miss Rehan was admirably true to the Shakespearean ideal in that particular, as also she was in expressing the large generosity of Viola toward Olivia's beauty. It is only a woman intrinsically noble who can be just toward her prosperous rival in matters of the heart. Miss Rehan, in her embodiment of Viols, has obeyed the finest of all artistic impulses—the impulse to make no effort. Her performance was as natural and as sweet as the opening of the rose. She allowed the pensive tenderness and the sweet gravity which are in her nature to drift into her portraiture of the character, and to express themselves honestly and simply. Her elocution was at its best—concealing all premeditation, and flowing, as the brook flows, with continuous music and spontaneous and accidental variety. She wore the boy-dress with all her usual grace. No woman plays the boy better. Few actresses have played it so well. The local public has seen other impersonations by Miss Rehan, more complex, more elaborate, more powerful; no other impersonation so alluring, so essentially poetical, so significant of artistic growth, and of the rich resources of spiritual nature. Her by-play alone, in the scene wherein Viola attends Orsino while he is listening to Feste's song, was a sufficient evidence of the true inspiration of genius. Her success with the house was very great, and she was re-called with enthusiasm many times. The dresses, three in number, are of exceptional beauty.

Persons who insist upon reading into the works of Shakespeare meanings that they do not contain often place many obstacles in the way of their enjoyment of a Shakespearean representation. Mr. Daly's revival of Twelfth Night—which was marked in every particular of it with simplicity, sense and taste—may not entirely satisfy judges of that exigent order. Nevertheless, it is a thoroughly well-appointed and most intellectual and scholar-like reproduction of that delicious comedy, and it was greatly enjoyed by one of the most numerous and most cultivated audiences that have been assembled this season. Remembrance of previous presentments of Twelfth Night, while it recalls much pleasure, recalls also some weariness—for the piece has usually been given with its explanatory narrative as well as its vitally dramatic passages. The performance on this occasion never once flagged. One reason is that the Malvolio episode has been condensed, and another reason is that the talk and action were skilfully diversified with delicious music. The scenes of Sir Toby's carnival and of Maria's plot were likewise carried with such an affluence of vivacity as could not fail to animate even the least festive of auditors. Mr. Lewis enacted Sir Toby. There is, in that character, underneath the sensuality and the humor, much shrewd knowledge of the world and a most capable, resolute and expeditious mind—albeit not devoted to a worthier end than that of appetite and personal comfort and advantage. The humor of Mr. Lewis is dry, quizzical, whimsically droll, waggishly sapient, and at times not without a sub-acid flavor of satirical pungency. He is not of the unctuous order, and he was not destined by nature for Falstaff or any of that kindred. Nevertheless, he suggested, most adroitly, Sir Toby's exultant animal delight in his own capacity of appetite, and in his bibulous diversions; while to the mental quality of the knight—the comic sagacity of a selfish good-natured worldling, the inveterate purpose of predominance and profit—he rendered the most ample justice. The relation of Sir Toby to Sir Andrew Aguecheek (a part that was intelligently and neatly acted by Mr. Herbert Gresham) is not unlike that of Falstaff to Justice Shallow—for in both cases the knight seeks, from the gudgeon, the replenishment of his purse. The preservation of that attitude by Mr. Lewis, and of the amatory attitude toward Maria, might be named as a sufficient denotement of his intellectual grasp of the character. He laid all possible emphasis, however, on the mirth, and in the scene of the midnight revel he was the incarnation of tipsy jocularity. The cooperation of Miss Catherine Lewis, as Maria, proved of great value to that scene, and indeed to the general effect of the humorous portion of the comedy. That actress has an abundant flow of animal spirits, a superlative talent for merry mischief, an inherent capacity of vivacious action, and a himble and crisp method of speech; and those attributes make her presence entirely adequate and delightful in characters—like Maria—of brittle sprightliness and roguish duplicity. She was cordially welcomed. Mr. George Clarke presented Malvolio, and therein he obtained professional honor such as an old actor may well cherish with pride. The ripe repose and adequacy of his art have not at any time been more explicitly manifested, or with more authority or more absolute power. Mr. Clarke embodied Malvolio as a very serious and even formidable person—as he is in Shakespeare—making the absurdity of the situation subordinate to the portentous gravity of the Don-like character, and thus largely augmenting the resultant merriment which accompanies his discomfiture and disgrace. That saturnine quality in Malvolio is of great value. He is not to be mistaken for a mere gull. "His own opinion was his god," as Queen Katherine said of Cardinal Wolsey. He came to grief through his colossal conceit, but he is not a booby. "He hath been most notoriously abused," says Olivia, at the last, and the command of Orsino is explicit and significant: "Pursue him, and entreat him to a peace." The scene of Malvolio's justification has been omitted in Mr. Daly's carefully condensed four-act copy of the comedy, but these who know the original will not forget its bearing on the story. Mr. Clarke's impersonation very clearly revealed a scholar-like grasp of the whole subject, and his execution was remarkable for symmetry and point. The other characters are in good hands, and they were adequately given. Olivia must be handsome, proud and stately—and that was not difficult for Miss Adelaide Prince. The requisite element of mirthful relish was readily supplied by Mr. William Gilbert, to the part of Fabian. Antonio was made picturesque and fervent by Mr. Charles Wheatleigh. The musical portion of the clown's part was admirably done by Mr. Lloyd Daubigny, who does not yet, however, claim attention as an actor—for there is more in that clown than melody. Sebastian—not a very grateful part but an important one—was most discreetly played by Mr. Sidney Herbert. Mr. Preston Clarke acted Orsino with princely dignity and refinement, and made every picture effective in which he appeared. The piece has been dressed in Greek and Italian garments of seventeenth century styles, and the pageantry of it was beautiful. No Shakespeare play has hitherto been produced with scenery at once so suitable and so magnificent. The colors and groupings made a feast to the eye, and the melodious accompaniments were a soothing comfort to the ear. Dramatic art receives a distinctly favorable impetus in this magnificent revival of a classic comedy, and the public gain in it is obvious and of much value.

E. A. Dithmar (review date 26 February 1893)

In the chronicle of the theatrical week the Viola of Ada Rehan holds the first place; in the record of her artistic career that lovely embodiment of one of Shakespeare's simplest but most beautiful creations will not be far from the first. Remembering Katharine, Julia, and Helena, it might be rash to say that her latest is her best work, but certainly she has done nothing better, for she realizes this heroine not only in her outward aspect, in form and bearing, and in melodious speech—she is surely the loveliest page that ever served an impossible Prince of Dalmatia, but that was to be expected—but in every shade of feeling, in every impulse, in every change of facial expression, she completely identifies herself with the role, and it with her own personality. She is so surely and entirely Viola as to make us forget all the other portrayals of this character in recent times, which was not the case with her Rosalind. Truth to tell, Miss Rehan's reading and conception of this part—using that tiresome word "conception" under protest to signify her comprehension of it as expressed in her performance—seem to us more lucid and convincing than her treatment of Rosalind.

One of the most charming of all the Essays of Elia, one of those that are best remembered by the readers of Lamb, is devoted to his memory of a performance of this very play he saw in his youth, and the description he there gives of the Viola of Dora Jordan now reads like a faithful account of the Viola of Ada Rehan. How closely this passage in it applies to the portrayal we saw first last Tuesday night!

There is no giving an account how she delivered the disguised story of her love for Orsino. It was no set speech that she had foreseen so as to weave it into a harmonious period, line necessarily following line, to make up the music—yet I have heard it so spoken, or, rather, read, not without its grace and beauty—but when she had declared her sister's history to be a 'blank' and that she 'never told her love,' there was a pause, as if the story had ended; and then the image of the 'worm in the bud' came up as a new suggestion and the heightened image of 'Patience' still followed after that as by some growing (and not mechanical) process, thought springing up after thought. I would almost say, as they were watered by her tears. She used no rhetoric in her passion or it was Nature's own rhetoric, most legitimate then when it seemed altogether without rule or law.

In the future there may be some critic of Lamb's worth and geniality and young heart and golden pen to thus record his memory of the performances of Shakespeare's heroines by the Dora Jordan of the English-speaking stage in these our little times.

Miss Rehan's elocution in this part seems to us absolutely beyond cavil. The cadences of her speech fall as gratefully upon the ear as sweetest music, yet she speaks, she does not read or recite. If speech upon the stage has ever sounded better or expressed a poet's meaning more clearly than her delivery of that fine passage of rhapsody Viola addresses to Olivia,

And make the babbling gossip of the air
Cry out 'Olivia'!
We have no knowledge of the time. The voice of Ada Rehan is the rarest and loveliest voice raised in public amid the ceaseless clamor of these times, and it is perfectly attuned to all the notes in this comedy of Shakespeare.

The tone of this impersonation is not continuously plaintive; she does not bear with her through all the mazes, in moods of frolic as well as those of sentiment, an air of melancholy; no Viola ever has. The girl is young, the spirits of wholesome, healthy youth are not always depressed even when youth is suffering from blighted affection. Presumably Viola would never die of love, even if Duke Orsino married his Countess; perhaps she would not even sit "like Patience on a monument" very long; but Miss Rehan's Viola, joyous when occasion demands it, sparkling with animation in the gayer scenes, with a delicate touch of irony in her vicarious lovemaking, is still dominated by pensiveness—the memory you bear away from it is a tender memory, the echo of her voice is gently sorrowful. She makes less of the comic scene with the roysterers than any other Viola we remember, even than Ellen Terry's or Modjeska's.

The charm of those two exquisite artists in everything they do is potent; but Miss Terry's Viola was what Miss Rehan's never is, monotonous, and its sweetness was rather cloying, while of Helena Modjeska's impersonations of Shakespeare's women we treasure in mind most strongly her Rosalind, Isabella, and Ophelia. Much is said in current talk about the Viola of Adelaide Neilson, and those who honestly and vividly remember the acting of that charming and ill-fated artist are to be congratulated, but some of us who remember all she did remember keenly, also, that, until almost the last year of her brilliant career, the glowing plumage of her genius was the constant mark of the small, ill-tempered birds who can always peck, even if they cannot sing.

But no memory of the past whatever can cast a shadow on the Viola of Ada Rehan. It is successful in the popular sense; it is a work of stage art of the finest quality.

Little more remains to be said about the revival of Twelfth Night. It is tiresome after all to be compelled so often to use the superlative; it is not in accord with the spirit of these times. The gibe and the jest and the sneer are much more popular, but in the old comedy revivals at Daly's Theatre the effect of beauty in color, form, and melody is cumulative. We thought only a few years ago that this high-minded, far-reaching manager could never do anything better than his production of The Taming of the Shrew; London expressed the same opinion a little later. It seems only a few days ago that we thought he had at last reached the limit with The Hunchback, but to describe Twelfth Night as it is given on his stage one needs a new vocabulary.

Much of the text is omitted; the Clown, for instance, is shorn of much of his antique wit, for which we have a fondness, and is principally of interest as a singer, and Malvolio, a part taken by Mr. George Clarke with the judgment and skill of an experienced and able actor, loses some of his scenes—if the Sir Topas episode is omitted after a while we shall not regret it, for though Shakespearean students esteem it highly, it has never seemed entertaining upon the stage, and was even duller in Mr. Irving's production of Twelfth Night than it is at present.

In much of the scenery and costuming of the new production an Oriental effect is secured. We doubt very much if Shakespeare knew where Illyria was or cared, but the coast of Dalmatia is close to the border land of the Orient. Greek forms and fashions have controlled former elaborate productions of this play, but the touch of Oriental warmth and languor now appropriately imparted to it adds greatly to its pleasing effect. The humor is well preserved by Mr. Lewis and his associates, and the music, which is all in keeping, is rendered with extraordinary ability for the singing forces of a theatre not devoted to music alone.

"Realism" has nothing to do with such a play as Twelfth Night. It all belongs to fancy. No one under its influence thinks of the horrors of shipwreck; the perfume of rare flowers, the echo of soft music pervades it. It is not needful, in presenting it on the stage, to befoul the atmosphere with the odor of bilge water or to give to any one of its characters the appearance of bodily suffering.

The production of a poetic drama is not an easy task. The manager who undertakes it should possess the highest and best qualities. No one in America in our time has equaled Augustin Daly in this kind of work. In London Mr. Irving, like Macready before him, has been obliged to submit throughout his brilliant career to the caviling and sneers of the gadflies of the press. In New-York, for nearly a quarter of a century now, Mr. Daly has had more than his share of that sort of abuse. The enormous pecuniary success of his present season, the most noteworthy, in some respects, of any in the history of his theatre, is therefore all the more gratifying to people who cherish a high ideal of the dramatic art.

Jeannette Gilder (review date 4 March 1893)

Although Mr. Daly has expended much labor and money upon his elaborate revival of Shakespeare's delightful comedy of Twelfth Night, and is entitled on that account to credit and gratitude, it must be confessed that the result is disappointing, inasmuch as the general richness of the setting excites expectations with regard to the acting which, unfortunately, are not always realized. The eye of the spectator is pleased continually by a series of glittering and attractive stage pictures, and by many evidences of artistic taste and profuse liberality in the matter of scenery, accessories and costume, but the intelligence is unsatisfied and the lover of the poet is forced to the conviction that more thought has been taken of the spectacle than of the play. If this representation had been offered at a minor theatre by a manager of smaller experience, capacity and accomplishment, it would have been worthy of hearty commendation as an effort in the right direction, but Mr. Daly has earned the right to be judged by the highest standards, and his best friends will scarcely be bold enough to assert that he has approached that of Mr. Henry Irving, not to speak of others that have been set in this city.

It may be admitted at once, and readily, that in mere sumptuousness of decoration he has done all that could be expected reasonably of any manager. There can be no question of the costliness of his preparation or of the skill with which he availed himself, as a rule, of modern theatrical resources. It is true that his system of lighting is deficient, that he has turned night into day and day into night, that the sky illumination in the opening set is an impossible phenomenon, that his costumes belong to no one place or period and that his architecture is curious in more respects than one; but it would be unfair to insist too strongly upon such lesser points of detail as these, considering the fanciful nature of the work—which affords plausible excuse for license—and the fact remains that such sets as the interior of Orsino's palace, with its array of courtiers and musicians, the hall of Olivia's house and the garden scene are beautiful and striking, while the costumes are extremely brilliant and picturesque—sometimes, indeed, a little too brilliant as in the case, for instance, of Viola just fresh from shipwreck. In all these spectacular features of the entertainment there is much to praise and little to complain of, while the incidental music, all of which by the way does not belong to Twelfth Night, is very sweetly and tastefully rendered, although occasionally in too slow time. But in the most vital part of the representation, the acting, this high level of excellence is not maintained. Correct as most of it is in form and detail it is sadly devoid of spirit or imagination. Miss Ada Rehan, when in her proper element, which is one of archness, or frolic or pretty petulance, is a most charming actress who need fear no rival; but in characters whose very essence is romantic, poetic and sentimental she is misplaced. Her defects are those of temperament, not of intelligence. Her delivery of verse is monotonous and unsympathetic, and her style of acting lacks the delicacy, refinement and grace necessarily associated with the heroines of poetry and imagination. In interpreting them she is compelled to restrain her own natural vivacity, which is her most potent weapon, and to substitute for it a colorless demeanor which is necessarily ineffective, and often dull. Her Viola, compared with the performances of such artists as Modjeska, Ellen Terry or Adelaide Neilson, was curiously insincere and unimaginative, except in those passages which gave something like free play to the merry mood in which she excels. She did not fall absolutely, of course—her experience as an actress and her natural charm as a woman prevented such a catastrophe as that—but most assuredly she fell very far short of success.

The most satisfactory performance was the Malvolio of Mr. George Clarke, which, although without the inspiration and distinction of Mr. Irving's masterful impersonation, was a humorous, consistent and exceedingly well-executed sketch. Mr. Lewis's Sir Toby was quaint and funny, but lacked breadth, vigor andunction, and the carousal scenes passed very tamely. The Olivia of Miss Prince was an uncommonly meritorious bit of work, admirable in dignity and grace, and especially notable for good elocution. Of Maria's spontaneous and infectious humor Miss Catharine Lewis suggested little. The only other part deserving a word of special mention was the Orsino of Creston Clarke. Doubtless the general representation will improve with rehearsal, but the future of it will depend chiefly upon the scenery and the music.

The Athenaeum (review date 13 January 1894)

The production of Twelfth Night is the most interesting feature in Mr. Daly's programme since his memorable revival of Taming of the Shrew. As in most recent Shakespearean representations, too much stress is laid upon the setting, and accessories are elevated into undeserved and, in a sense, inartistic prominence. Yet only when similar conditions prevail are we likely to see Shakespearean comedy at all, and to complain of means when the result is delightful would be churlish. For delightful the representation is. The perfume of the love scenes is preserved, and the whole is shown to be comedy, and not farce. To no character is allotted undue prominence; the whole is even, artistic, fragrant. In the scenes in Orsino's palace the grouping is, perhaps, a little too formal, and the sustained chorus to Feste's songs, though agreeable, is unimaginative. The result, however, as has been said, is pleasing, and lovers of Shakespeare should not fail to visit the performance. They must be prepared to see Shakespeare's disposition of the scenes "knocked about," and to find some occasional extravagances. Mirthful as it is, the laugh with which Maria more than once quits the stage is conventional and out of place. Still the right atmosphere is preserved, and the performances generally are excellent. Miss Ada Rehan's Viola is bewitching. Miss Renan looks surprisingly well in her page's costume, and delivers her lines with admirable music and with that sense of humour which is necessary to bring out their full significance. Nothing in which this actress has been seen conveys a higher estimate of her powers and endowments. Miss Violet Vanbrugh gives the right rendering of Olivia; and Miss Catherine Lewis, with the reservation before mentioned, leads off the revels with admirable spirit. Mr. James Lewis is the best Sir Toby Belch we can recall; Mr. Clarke's Malvolio is full of spirit; and Sir Andrew Aguecheek, Orsino, Feste, and the characters generally are modestly and well sustained. Mr. Daubigny's singing is excellent, and the general musical effects are delightful. Those who fail to see the representation will have cause for regret.

William Archer (review date 17 January 1894)

At last, at last! The long series of disappointments has ended at last, and we have to thank Mr Daly for an evening of rich and keen, if not absolutely unmixed, enjoyment. The performance of Twelfth Night has the one supreme merit which, in a Shakespearean revival, covers a multitude of sins—it really "revives" the play, makes it live again. There is nothing mechanical or academic about it. We feel we are in a live playhouse, not a historical museum. Not that I, personally, object to seeing the theatre turned now and again into a historical museum. When we have our Endowed Theatre, at which Mr Sydney Grundy scoffs (but "come it will, for a' that"), some twenty to fiveand-twenty nights in the year (not more, Mr Grundy!) will probably be devoted to the merely historical drama,—to plays which interest us, not for their living merits, but because, like those people with whom Mr Browning parleyed in one of his last books, they were of importance in their day. The Country Girl, despite the freshness and charm of Miss Rehan's Peggy, belongs on the whole to this class. It is pleasant enough to parley with Garrick for once in a way (since Wycherley is out of the question): but his work gives us pleasure, not because it is absolutely and perdurably beautiful or witty, but because the mediocrity of long ago acquires a certain charm in the very act of growing old. Here, I take it, lies the explanation of the difference between Mr W. S. Gilbert and Mr Clement Scott. Mr Scott, perhaps, does not quite thoroughly analyse the pleasure which he receives from The Country Girl, and mistakes for inherent superiority what is really an "un-earned increment" of quaintness due to mere lapse of time; while Mr Gilbert, not making sufficient allowance for this unearned increment—as inevitable, under certain conditions, in literature as in economics—is inclined to compare new plays and old on their absolute merits, weighing wit against wit, and invention against invention, as though the pleasure we received from wit and invention were, or ought to be, strictly commensurate with the sheer brain-power involved in it. Twelfth Night, on the other hand, is a work of inherent and permanent vitality. Poetry is the one thing imperishable, and Shakespeare has never written more tenderly and exquisitely than in the romantic scenes of this comedy. The fable has all the charm of a myth of the elder world, when instinct spoke to instinct unashamed, and when love found its sufficient sanction in beauty, with "no d—d nonsense about merit," about spiritual affinity, or harmony of souls, or friendship, or even mutual esteem. Someone in Paris has recently produced a pantomime-play in which Juliet awakens before Romeo has drunk the poison, and they set up house together, quarrel, and lead a cat-and-dog life. What wanton vulgarity of imagination! In Twelfth Night, only Malvolio, the would-be "bourgeois gentilhomme," associates love with domesticity. Malvolio, a born major-domo, dreams of ruling Olivia's house, bidding others know their place as he knows his, and, in short, fulfilling the social duties of marriage. To the noble and beautiful children of fantasy, marriage is only a spell or charm to be recited "for luck," as it were, as they cross the threshold of love. They are pagans in a pagan world, and we no more care to imagine them "married and settled," than we want to follow the figures on Keats's Grecian Urn into their workaday life in the Little town, by river or seashore,

Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel.

We leave the lovers in each other's arms, beyond the reach and time of destiny. It is in this etherealising of the material, this elimination of all after-thought from life, all doubt and fear and shame, that the perennial charm of the poem consists. These "high-fantastical" beings are so frankly absorbed in the passion of the moment that they make the moment an eternity. Since Shakespeare left the comedy without an epilogue, Keats might have supplied it, in the shape of a fantasia on the theme: 'For ever shalt thou love, and she be fair.'

Mr Daly and I will never quite agree, I fear, as to the proper way of treating Shakespeare's text. We differ in our fundamental principles. To me it seems that the aim of the artistic manager should be to present any given play with as little cutting and rearrangement as possible, having regard to the altered conditions of the theatre both before and behind the curtain. Mr Daly seems rather to cut and rearrange as much as he possibly can, without absolutely going the length of Dryden, Tate, and Cibber, and rewriting his author. My rule would be, "When in doubt, play Shakespeare;" to which Mr Daly would probably reply that he is never in the least doubt as to the superiority of his own ideas. For instance, nothing shall ever reconcile me to the barbarism (of which Mr Irving was also guilty) of opening the play with a seashore tableau, instead of with that bewitching speech of Orsino's, "If music be the food of love, play on," in which Shakespeare (who occasionally knew what he was about) strikes the keynote of the whole comedy. Mr Daly is not content with running Shakespeare's first and fourth scenes together as the second scene of his production: he actually cuts the six loveliest lines in the Duke's speech:

Give me excess of it: that, surfeiting,
The appetite may sicken, and so die,—
That strain again!—it had a dying fall:
O, it came o'er my ear like the sweet south;
That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing, and giving odour.

This is so incredible, that I almost hesitate to make the assertion; my wits may have been wool-gathering for the moment; but I certainly did not hear the lines. The running together of the two scenes, Mr Daly may say, was necessary because of the deep stage required for the Duke's court. Well, if the retention of Shakespeare's arrangement had involved the sacrifice of a few of the odalisques strewn about the floor of the ducal seraglio, we need not have been inconsolable. But I do not even see that any such sacrifice would have been necessary. If the re-sources of the modern theatre are unequal to the changes of scene required in following Shakespeare's arrangement, all I can say is, the more shame to it. There are many cases, of course, in which judicious rearrangement is quite permissible; but a rearrangement which displaces and mutilates what Shakespeare obviously intended for the opening chord of his romance is surely the reverse of judicious. The text throughout is treated very cavalierly, not only in the omission of important and characteristic speeches (such, for instance, as Viola's reply to Antonio, "I hate in-gratitude more in a man," &c), but in the curtailment and alteration of some even of the best-known phrases in the play. Why should the Clown's part be docked of the protestation that "Ginger shall be hot i' the mouth, too"? Why should Viola stop short at "By my troth, I'll tell thee, I am almost sick for one" (i.e., a beard), and omit "though I would not have it grow on my chin"? Is Mr Daly of opinion that Shakespeare "rubbed in" the jest inartistically? Perhaps; but what we want is Shakespeare's lack of art, not someone else's art. What possible authority is there for "And dallies with the innocence of love like ripe old age"? The emendation is as stupid as it is unnecessary. Finally, to pass over many more important matters, and descend to a very trifling, but not uncharacteristic, detail, why should the Clown modernise the line "Youth's a stuff will not endure," and sing "that won't endure" instead? This may seem the very pedantry of fault-finding, but the alteration serves no conceivable purpose, and to the ear which is familiar with the phrase in its quaintly archaic form (and what ear is not?), the modernisation is a quite sensible annoyance.

There now; I have had it out with Mr Daly, and can now return with an easy conscience to my original statement that, whatever his lapses of taste, he has truly revived the play, making it, as it ought to be, a thing beautiful, enjoyable, and lovable. I shall not even quarrel with the omission of "Come away, come away, Death," and the interpolation of one or two other more or less appropriate airs. In an ideal revival, the play would doubtless be less operatically treated; but the musical portion of the present performance is too beautiful to be otherwise than gratefully accepted. I don't know where Mr Windmer found the setting of "Oh, Mistress Mine!" which Mr Lloyd Daubigny sings so charmingly. It seems curiously unlike the words, converting the Clown's light-hearted ditty into a solemn and plaintive dirge: but it is beautiful, exquisitely beautiful and touching. "Who is Sylvia?" treated as a serenade at the end of the third act, is perhaps not strikingly appropriate, but it, too, is perfectly rendered, while the stage, by an original and ingenious arrangement of lights, presents one of the loveliest pictures imaginable. The performance, take it all round, is capital. In the very first scene, Mr Hobart Bosworth, as Viola's sea-captain, led off by speaking his lines not only with perfect verbal correctness (alas, that we should have to remark on so simple and mechanical a virtue!), but with excellent phrasing and accentuation. Similar praise must be accorded to Mr John Craig, who did full justice both to the metre and the meaning of Orsino's lines. Miss Violet Vanbrugh made a pleasant and intelligent Olivia; and the other blank-verse parts, if not excellently treated, were at least not notoriously maltreated. Mr George Clarke's Malvolio lacked fantasy, but was otherwise quite respectable; Mr James Lewis was an admirable Sir Toby, incomparably the best I have ever seen; Mr Herbert Gresham, as Sir Andrew, was quite worthy of his partner; and Miss Catherine Lewis, though she somewhat over-elongated the sprightliness of Maria, was not so very florid in her humour as she is sometimes apt to be. The comic scenes, on the whole, had the true "festivitas," without which they are a weariness of the flesh. By the way, why does Mr Daly take all the humour out of Viola's appeal for "Some mollification for your giant, sweet lady," by making it apply to Malvolio instead of Maria? The contrast between Miss Rehan's stature and Miss Lewis's is quite sufficient to give the thing point, though Shakespeare no doubt intended Maria to be played by a mere "wren" of a boy.
Lastly, of Miss Rehan's Viola. It is a beautiful, a fascinating, a truly poetic creation—on the whole more pleasing, to my own personal taste, than her Rosaline. Its one prevailing defect is slowness. Strange that one should have to say this of a performance of Miss Rehan's, but it gives all of Viola except her sparkle, her vivacity. A large exception, you may say; but until you have seen Miss Rehan you don't know what liberal compensations she presents in the shape of tenderness, delicacy, and quiet, subdued humour. At the same time, there is every reason why she should try to bring her achievement up to the point of perfection by hastening the movement of several passages. She has adopted a curious sort of psalmody in her treatment of verse. She exaggerates her pauses, and lengthens out her vowel sounds, caressingly, beautifully, but, as I cannot but think, immoderately. I first noticed this tendency to what I then called grandiloquence in her performance of Maid Marian in The Foresters. It is an error on the right side, and gives a peculiar, dreamy, languorous charm to many passages of her Viola; but an error it certainly is when carried to excess. Now and then, too, she misses what I may call syllabic perfection in the wording of her lines, baffling the ear, for example, by saying, "I'm the man, if it be so 'tis," instead of "I am the man." Her worst slip of this nature occurs in the very first lines of her part. Can anything be more beautiful than the echoing cadence of—

> And what should I do in Illyria?
> My brother, he is in Elysium, which Miss Rehan ruins by omitting the "he"? But, after all possible deductions, this Viola remains a creation of in-describable beauty and charm—a thing to be seen, and never to be forgotten.

Charles H. Shattuck (essay date 1987)

For 1893 Daly determined to surpass all his previous Shakespearean accomplishments: in Twelfth Night he found stuff that appealed with extraordinary intensity to his "creative" instincts. He disassembled the play and rebuilt it, cleansed it of every grossness, doubled the amount of music that Shakespeare called for (but canceled that too gloomy song "Come away death"), hired Graham Robertson to costume it in the high esthetic mode, and invented the most striking scenic effects, from violent storm to rose garden by moonlight. By cutting more than six hundred lines he got rid of everything that might endanger the "poetry" and "beauty." His efforts hit popular taste exactly as he intended. In New York Twelfth Night ran for six weeks (February 21 to April 8); it finished the season in Boston; a year later it enjoyed over 100 performances in London; it stayed in Daly's repertory to the end.

Most of the publishing critics echoed or even promoted the popular enthusiasm. Yet there were deep divisions. Consider only the responses to Miss Rehan's Viola. Out of William Winter's review [in The New York Tribune (22 February 1893)] (some two thousand words, all evidently composed in advance) we may cull such sentences as these:

> Viola is a woman of deep sensibility: and that way Miss Rehan has comprehended and reproduced her, permitting a certain wistful sadness to glimmer through the gauze of kindly vivacity with which, otherwise, her whole bright and gentle figure is artfully swathed.… The great underlying cause of her brilliant success was the profound sincerity of her feeling—over which her glee was seen to play, as moonlight plays upon the rippling surface of the ocean depth.… Lovely reserve and aristocratic distinction blended in the performance, and dignified and endeared it. The melody of Shakespeare's verse—especially in the passage of Viola's renunciation—fell from her lips in a strain of fluent sweetness that enhanced its beauty and deepended the pathos of its under significance. In such tones the heart speaks.… Her elocution was at its best—concealing all premeditation, and flowing, as the brook flows, with continuous music.… Her performance was as natural and as sweet as the opening of the rose.

Jeanette Gilder of The Critic [4 March, 1893] thought quite otherwise:

Miss Ada Rehan, when in her proper element, which is one of archness, or frolic or pretty petulance, is a most charming actress who need fear no rival; but in characters whose very essence is romantic, poetic and sentimental she is misplaced. Her defects are those of temperament, not of intelligence. Her delivery of verse is monotonous and unsympathetic, and her style of acting lacks the delicacy, refinement and grace necessarily associated with the heroines of poetry and imagination. In interpreting them she is compelled to restrain her own natural vivacity, and to substitute for it a colorless demeanor which is necessarily ineffective and often dull.

These opinions confronted each other everywhere in the press. Dithmar of the New York Times wrote two long reviews praising every aspect of the production, defending Daly from "the jibe and the jest and the sneer" so often directed against him, and declaring that "surely the actress never before seemed so lovely as she did in her page's garb, or spoke so well, or mingled in her acting archness and sentiment, the passion of womanhood, the unquenchable spirit of youth so deftly." Against this Towsie of the Evening Post declared that "in the more delicate, sentimental and purely poetic interludes her droning singsong robbed the familiar lines of almost all their familiar beauty." In Boston Arthur Warren of the Herald found nothing to blame; Clapp of the Advertiser and Mrs. Sutherland of the Transcript were reluctant to praise.

In The Critic Miss Gilder isolated one weakness of the production very clearly: "the general richness of the setting excites expectations with regard to the acting which, unfortunately, are not always realized." Daly's company, or what was left of it, was not right for the play. John Drew, who might have played Orsino, had defected. Otis Skinner was gone. Arthur Bourchier rehearsed Orsino but quarreled with Daly and resigned. The part was then taken on short notice and played without distinction by Creston Clarke (a nephew of Edwin Booth). Perky little James Lewis would be nobody's idea of a proper Toby Belch, but Daly padded his thighs and belly and instructed him to be jolly but not at all vulgar: the "carousal scenes" passed very tamely, said The Critic. Except for Winter, not even friends of the management were much amused by these scenes. George Clarke's Malvolio started off well enough, but his Yellow Stockings Scene lost its point because he was dressed in a dainty costume of pastel colors, pretty but not ridiculous: his cross-gartering consisted of bands of white ribbon on pale yellow hose. Feste, which Lewis might have made a good thing of, was relieved of most of his speeches and assigned to a sweet-voiced singer, Lloyd Daubigny, who was no comedian and was hardly called upon to "act" at all.

As for Miss Rehan's Viola, it appears that although she was adored for her personal beauty, she had great difficulty at first in finding what to make of the part. Her situation was much the same as that when Daly cast her as Helena in the Dream. There was no room in Viola for the explosiveness of her Katherine nor for the wit and merriment of her Rosalind. Viola, confined to a dramatic situation which she cannot dominate, has to be rescued from it; and Miss Rehan, thus prevented from lifting and carrying the play, was subdued by it. Happily, there are signs that in time her performance improved. When the production went to London, William Archer, A. B. Walkley, and [George Bernard] Shaw—though they could not abide Daly's arrangement of the text—were all delighted by her Viola. The Athenæum called it "bewitching." Archer took mild exception to the slowness of her speaking, her exaggerated pauses and excessively lengthened vowels, but both he and Walkley actually preferred her Viola to her Rosalind. For Shaw [in Our Theatres in the Nineties, 1932], "the moment she strikes up the true Shakespearian music, and feels her way to her part altogether by her sense of that music, the play returns to life and all the magic is there." When Clapp of Boston saw the play a second time in the autumn of 1894, he withdrew his initial objections and declared she had "accomplished a wonderful advance," was now "almost beyond praise." By 1898, Norman Hapgood, a hard man to please, sounded as deep in love with her Viola as everyone else: "As Viola her varied voice is kept at its sweeter, easier, more natural tones, her face is quiet with a sad love, an expression across which the lighter humor flits from moment to moment. It stands as one of the best Shakespearean interpretations of the time" [New York Commercial Advertiser (January 27, 1898)].

Daly was far more interested in creating spectacular stage effects than concerned for Shakespeare's play, and his tamperings were so outrageous as to deserve the compliments of a certain philistine critic named Vance Thompson, who declared that "he is doing what Colley Cibbâr did for his generation, and he is doing it quite as well." According to this Thompson, Daly's "method of ameliorating and remodeling the Shakespearean plays is the only feasible one." Every generation must take from the plays those qualities which are "in the line of its own fashionable modes of amusement," and what the modern amusement hunter wants is "pretty faces, pretty music, pretty pictures." Thompson is aware that the attitude he is expressing is not that of a superior person: "but you and I, it is to be hoped, are not superior persons and have learned that when we cannot get the moon it is well to put up with the substitute of wholesome green cheese" [New York Commercial Advertiser (December 2, 1893)].

Shakespeare's opening scene sets theme and tone for the play as Duke Orsino, accompanied by sweet music, broods over his unrequited love for the lady Olivia; next Shakespeare presents Viola at the sea shore, just rescued from shipwreck, hoping desperately that her beloved brother has not been drowned. Daly was not the first nor would he be the last to "improve" the play by reversing these two scenes, but his improvement is the most radical that anyone ever perpetrated. He had read The Tempest and discovered there how to get the evening going with a bang. With darkened stage and Storm Music he worked up his theatre's full potential of thunder, lightning, wind, and rain. Gradually the storm subsided, the music calmed, the rising dawn revealed through mists a boat lying alongside the rocky shore. The mists cleared. A Chorus was heard in the distance singing Ariel's song, "Come unto these yellow sands." When the lights were up to full, who should arrive but Viola's brother Sebastian and his rescuer Antonio, who were not supposed to be seen until Shakespeare's second act. When they explained themselves and went their ways, the Chorus, a band of happy Illyrian peasants, danced across the stage singing "Come unto these yellow sands" at top volume. Then at last came Viola with her Captain, sailors, and baggage, the Captain singing another snatch from The Tempest—Stephano's "I shall no more to sea, to sea. Here shall I die on shore." Viola's worry about her brother may have seemed a bit pointless, since the audience had just seen him in perfect health, but probably at that moment the audience was less concerned with plot than Viola's glorious costume. Though just arrived out of the stormy ocean, she appeared to be on her way to a fashionable soirée—a white gown embroidered with delicate gold patterns, the deep sleeves trimmed with wide gold fringe, a full-length rose-red cape draped from her shoulders.

When she heard about Orsino, and went off to "serve this duke," Daly then turned back to Shakespeare's opening scene. Probably he was uneasy about the boldness of his "improvement," for he consulted the leading American Shakespearean, H. H. Furness, about it. Furness's response [in a letter to Daly of January 27, 1893] must have gratified him hugely, and encouraged him to commit even further violations of the text:

In the name of sanctity why do you think I'll be shocked at any changes which a modern playwright thinks best to make in the omission or transposition of scenes in Shakespeare? His stage is not our stage, his audiences are not our audiences.' Tis only additions like Dryden's, Tate's or Garrick's that are lèse majesté. Your partial combination of the two seacoast scenes strikes me as excellent.

Furness urged him, too, to eliminate the final appearance of Malvolio, a suggestion which Daly would accept and improve upon.

When he finally got round to the Orsino Scene he had quite lost sight of its Shakespearean significance, and after the Storm Scene it must have seemed to him impossibly thin and feeble. He glamorized it. When the curtain rose on the love-lorn bachelor in his palatial quarters, he did not strike one as love-lorn at all: nine pretty girls—musicians, singers, and dancers—stood or knelt or lay about the stage. When he called for music they treated him not to a brief strain with a dying fall, but a full concert rendition of Sir Henry Bishop’s setting of the twenty-fifth stanza of Venus and Adonis, "Bid me discourse, I will enchant thine ear." After the song they performed an Oriental dance.

There was a technical reason for thus stretching out this first Orsino scene. At the end of it Orsino would cut ahead to scene four, calling for Cesario, and Miss Rehan had to be ready at the entrance in her green doublet and hose (identical with the costume in which we have already seen her brother). As Shakespeare arranged his narrative, she would have had the long Sir Toby scene (I. iii) in which to make the costume change, but in order to reduce the amount of scene-shifting Daly postponed the Sir Toby scene and tacked together two Orsino scenes (I. i and I. iv). Thus, in order to give Miss Rehan time enough in her dressing room he had to pad the first Orsino Scene with song and dance.

The "carousal" scenes (Shakespeare's I. iii and II. iii, also tacked together) were not played below stairs, as had long been the custom, but in Olivia's beautifully appointed drawing room—dainty furniture, a bronze chandelier, gilt statues on tall pedestals—and through a wide archway at the back a view of a pretty garden. It was hardly the ambience for Shakespeare's low comedy. But Daly did not want it to be very low. William Winter had urged from the beginning that "Sir Toby will not be made a foul & dirty Sir Toby—for that is not necessary." Business with tobacco pipes and flagons was kept to a minimum and nobody got very drunk or very amusing. In the second of these scenes, the late night one, there was a great deal of singing of "catches," all those named by Shakespeare—"Hold thy peace," "Three merry men be we," and "There dwelt a man in Babylon." Daly added two more that had crept into the play a century earlier:

> Christmas comes but once a year
> And therefore we'll be jolly and this one, probably sung as a round:

> Which is the properest day to drink,
> Saturday, Sunday, Monday?
> Each is the properest day I think.
> Why should I name but one day?
> Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday,
> Saturday, Sunday, Monday.

Feste did not sing "O mistress mine" in this scene but at Orsino's court in place of "Come away, death."

The gulling of Malvolio—the Letter Scene—took place in a spectacularly beautiful garden in front of Olivia's house. The house, a two-story structure, which one entered by mounting steps at either end of a high porch, stood at an angle at stage right. Downstage of the porch and near it was a garden chair, and across at stage left a stone bench. While Malvolio strolled about center stage, musing and preening himself, the pranksters hid behind a massive bank of very pink roses at upper left center. Across the back of the garden was a kind of picket fence with an arched opening at center, beyond which lay another flowered garden and beyond that the sea.

To mark the transition between the Letter Scene and Cesario's second visit to Olivia, which followed without intervening dialogue, Feste sang the first stanza of "It was a lording's daughter," the fifteenth item in Shakespeare's The Passionate Pilgrim.
The sentimental climax of the play was entirely a Daly intervention—a tableau sustained by a serenade. After the farcical violence of the Cesario-Sir Andrew duel, Viola heard words from Antonio that intimated that her brother was alive. Sinking into the garden chair near the porch she soliloquized, "O, if it prove, Tempests are kind, and salt waves fresh in love." Dusk was gathering, the new moon rose over the sea (in the west!), and music sounded. Through the archway up center came Orsino, followed by his band of girl-musicians, who half-hidden behind the bank of roses sang "Fair Olivia, what is she?" (Schubert's setting of the Sylvia song from The Two Gentlemen of Verona). Olivia appeared on her high porch, and looking down discovered Orsino gazing up at her. Turning away in annoyance, she discovered Cesario, and fixed her gaze lovingly on him—who was, of course, gazingly lovingly at Orsino. "The garden was all in moonlight," wrote William Winter [in his Shakespeare on the Stage, 1911] "The delicious music flowed on, and over that perfect pageant of romance the curtain fell." Even Bernard Shaw allowed that this Dalyism was both permissible and seductive, "thanks to Schubert and to the conductor, Mr. Henry Widmer, who has handled the music in such a fashion as to get the last drop of honey out of it."

All that remained of the play (Acts IV and V) after this feast of music and moonlight Daly packed into a single act. Not much remained that served Daly's purpose: a bit of sword play between Sir Toby and Sebastian, Olivia's drawing Sebastian offstage to marry him, the recognition between brother and sister, and Orsino's taking Viola for his "fancy's queen."

There was no room for Malvolio in this world of happy lovers. Everything after his Yellow Stockings Scene—the Prison Scene, his demand for retribution, his furious exit ("I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you")—was eventually canceled. Furness had urged Daly to omit Malvolio's very last appearance: "We really do not want to see Malvolio again—the laugh has died out & it can with difficulty be revived." Furness as much as Daly appears to have been oblivious to the ambivalence, the irony, the weight of the Malvolio story: Malvolio was a joke or he was nothing. And Daly objected to Malvolio even more strongly. As he told Winter, Malvolio's ordeal was painful and tiresome. He had got all the laughs that could be got out of the foolish gull, and these bitter passages only undercut and destroyed the "poetical" climax which he had so cunningly created. Though he printed the Prison Scene, he cut it from the performance. He sped the love affairs to their joyous conclusion, and while Feste and Maria sang the three most "innocent" stanzas of "Hey, ho, the wind and the rain," the company of lovers danced a galliard.

Of the many reviews of this Twelfth Night that I have seen, surprisingly few have been troubled that Daly smashed the play in order to turn it into a musical entertainment. Arthur Warren of the Boston Herald [April 18, 1893] offered an apologetic nod to those devoted Shakespeareans who might regard it as sacrilegious to cut lines, dispense with scenes, and subordinate characters in order to suit the tastes of modern audiences. "Malvolio has been somewhat slighted," Warren admitted, "and he is not as prominent a figure in the comedy as the author intended he should be, but, after all, there is much matter concerning this character which usually has the effect of wearying an audience." That idiot, before mentioned, who would give up the moon for wholesome green cheese, defended Daly with the argument that "it is no compliment to Shakespeare to make art dull." When the play got to England, William Archer reminded us that he disapproved of Daly's method, but as if weary of the struggle he only cited a few absurd misreadings and omissions (Feste was denied his "Ginger shall be hot i' the mouth too"), and borrowed a few neat whacks from Shaw, who, as Corno di Bassetto, was responsible only for covering the music.

Only Henry Clapp of Boston, after a second viewing, was sufficiently annoyed to enter sustained complaint. The best parts of the performance, he acknowledged, were "almost beyond praise," but there was "much which could scarcely be endured." The singing was abundant and excellent, and the choral rendition of "Bid me discourse" was pleasant to the ear—"even if the eye was a little amused by the resemblance of the court of Orsino, the 'bachelor' duke, to a Turkish seraglio." But in order to make room for so much music, and as a concession to scenic arrangements, "characters are made to march in and out with utter unreason," and Daly found it necessary to tear and pare and clip and snip Shakespeare's text… with a frankly insolent recklessness which would not have discredited Colley Cibber or Nahum Tate. Passages memorable in every line are presented in scarcely recognizable fragments; many of the most familiar are sacrificed altogether; and not seldom a cruel telephone abridgement is practised upon splendid pieces of wit, and the audience are treated to an exact half of some immortal world-famous joke. Turning Twelfth Night from a comedy into an operetta, even in a half dozen scenes, is certainly illegitimate. But the most extraordinary defeat of the spirit of comedy achieved by this version must not escape being noted. For the first time in who can say how many centuries, the entire revels of Sir Toby, Sir Andrew and the Clown are conducted without the assistance of apparent drinking and smoking,—perhaps for fear of spoiling the scenery.

The revelry concluded with a noisy dance and no words: it was useless for Sir Toby to shout "it's too late to go to bed now" when there was neither wine nor tobacco to stay up for.

But not even Clapp takes exception to the dismissal of Malvolio from the play after the Yellow Stockings Scene. All that seriously mattered, even to Clapp, was that "the evening was made beautiful and delightful by Miss Rehan's Viola."

And that, of course, was Daly's whole intention—to feed the public appetite for prettiness and sentiment. He gave them lovely scenery bathed in atmospheric sweetness, pretty costumes designed by the delicate artist Graham Robertson (and to Robertson's dismay, redesigned them to make them prettier), beautiful women, nothing to embarrass or worry anyone, and over all a wash of lovely music gathered ad libitum from anywhere. And Daly was rewarded. The historian and diplomat John Hay, for instance, thanked him [in a letter of March 29, 1893] for "this beautiful and masterly presentation of one of Shakespeare's most poetical works." Hay had come up to New York from Washington especially to take his children to it, and his own delight had been heightened by theirs. "It is hard to estimate the good you are doing in putting before the public such a magnificent result of combined industry, liberality, intelligence, and taste," he wrote. "Your Twelfth Night is saturated with beauty and poetry; the most enchanting dreams of fairyland are there, incarnate before our eyes. I hardly see how scenic art can go farther."

PRODUCTION:

Margaret Webster • Theatre Guild • 1940-41

BACKGROUND:

One of the most prominent American stagings of Twelfth Night in the first half of the twentieth century was the 1940-41 Theatre Guild production at the St. James Theatre, New York. Directed by Margaret Webster, the production starred Maurice Evans as Malvolio, a performance that departed from tradition in making use of a Cockney accent. Euphemia Van Rensselaer Wyatt commented that "Olivia's major-domo emerges as the correct British butler." Grenville Vernon enthused over this performance, maintaining that "Mr. Evans reaches the peak of his accomplishment in the most subtle, most beautifully articulated performance of the part I have ever seen." Joseph Wood Krutch, however, asserted that Evans's comic portrayal debased the role and was "false to Shakespeare's conception." Another portrayal that received mixed reviews was that of Helen Hayes in the part of Viola. Krutch argued that "so far as she herself is concerned there is in truth, very little left to be desired." Stark Young, by contrast, criticized her delivery of Shakespeare's blank verse, maintaining that she turned "most of all that poetic treasure into mere chirpy prose." Similarly, Rosamond Gilder commented that Hayes's performance lacked spontaneity and that only once or twice did she "release the full lyric loveliness of the part." Critics generally agreed that the production provided a splendid evening's entertainment, while nevertheless judging Webster's direction to have emphasized lively stage business at the expense of poetic interpretation. The cast included Mark Smith as Sir Andrew Aguecheek, Donald Burr as Feste, Sophie Stewart as Olivia, Wesley Addy as Orsino, and June Walker as Maria.

COMMENTARY:

Joseph Wood Krutch (review date 30 November 1940)

Presumably Shakespeare's contemporaries had no difficulty in knowing just how to take Twelfth Night and the other romantic comedies. But it has not always been so. In the next age that indefatigable playgoer Mr. Pepys witnessed a revival of the tale of Viola's misadventures, and he was probably speaking for most of his contemporaries when he called it "one of the weakest plays that ever I saw." Even today it would not be hard to find intelligent people ready to agree with Mr. Pepys, or with Bernard Shaw, who professed himself so unable to find in the whole group of comedies anything except brainless inanity that he was compelled to suppose titles like "As You Like It" and subtitles like "What You Will" were intended by Shakespeare as disavowals of responsibility. Neither can it be denied that the question of the ultimate artistic intention of these comedies presents a problem in a sense that the great tragedies do not. One may, to be sure, argue endlessly over the proper interpretation to be put upon Hamlet, but there is at least no doubt that it must be presented as tragedy in the grand style. There is, on the other hand, a real doubt as to what kind of comedy Twelfth Night is, a real doubt as to the seriousness of its artistic pretensions and the general nature of its comic intention. Is it, as apparently the Victorians presumed, romantically naive, sentimental, and whimsical to an extent which renders it almost literally brainless? Is it a merely random mixture of somewhat precious poetry and low comedy? Or do the two sets of characters bear some real relation to each other; so that the play as a whole means something more than the mere sum of its poetic and farcical elements?

For all these reasons the new and elaborate production of Twelfth Night (St. James Theater) with Helen Hayes and Maurice Evans is a bolder undertaking than any of the other recent revivals of Shakespeare. The play is not, as Hamlet is, fool-proof—at least to the extent that it cannot fail to be in some degree interesting. Audiences are probably less disposed to take naturally to it, and under the circumstances the first thing to be said is simply that it is, without question, the best production of this or any of the romantic comedies seen here in many a day and that it deserves the success which it is pretty certain to enjoy. Considered simply as an evening's entertainment, it is rich and unflagging; where it falls short of everything one could wish, it falls short because it manages almost too skilfully to avoid facing fundamental questions, because it never even tries to suggest what all the romantic posturing and all the simple fun add up to; because, indeed, it seems to assume that the whole means no more than the individual parts.

Of the performances the best is certainly that of Helen Hayes, and so far as she herself is concerned there is, in truth, very little left to be desired. Her Viola is not only charming and richly inventive; she is also mischievous, and she is dominated by a sense of fun which saves her from the mere cuteness which some performers have made cloying. Miss Hayes is superb in the scene of her first appearance before Olivia, and all through the play she delights one by striking just the right note—as she does, to cite a single example, in the soliloquy leading up to the conclusion that to her the proud Olivia has lost her heart. Here Miss Hayes, instead of being wistful or tender, exclaims, "She loves me!" with an accent of half-delighted and half-incredulous astonishment which makes completely evident the "Well, I'll be damned!" mentally accompanying it and thus keeps the mood of exuberant fun in which the whole part is played. Mr. Evans's Malvolio, considered simply as a comic characterization, is almost as good, even though his interpretation of the role debasea it almost to that of a mere comic butler and therefore seems to me to be not only false to Shakespeare's conception but incompatible with that interpretation of the play as a whole which I believe to be the best one. June Walker's Maria is delightfully comic, and Margaret Webster's direction, as it was in Henry IV, is highly competent in purely theatrical ways though almost too ready to put before everything else amusing business and mere liveliness on the stage. She manages to make every moment active and amusing enough so that an audience is never aware that anything more is possible or even desirable, but her solution of the problem of how to hold the play together is largely a theatrical rather than a poetic or imaginative one.

I can only wish that she had read—and pondered—Mark Van Doren's recent Shakespeare, in which he so illuminatingly and persuasively states the case for the assumption that the whole group of romantic comedies of which Twelfth Night is one are alike in that each is a poetic whole integrated by the same problem or at least the same contrast, that the central theme in each is the clash between an aristocracy which is cultivated, self-consciously exquisite, and fundamentally decadent and the representatives of some cruder but more full-blooded or more wilful group. In The Merchant of Venice Antonio's first speech announces luxuriously that he knows not why he is so sad; in Twelfth Night Orsino demands more of the musical food of love, only to announce a few seconds later that he has now achieved the surfeit he was seeking. But Antonio and Antonio's friends have to reckon with Shylock and something which threatens their world of finicky gentility just as Orsino and his friends have to reckon, not only with Sir Toby, but also—in the person of Malvolio—with a middle class just learning to be ambitious. Out of the balance of sympathies between these two groups the finest music of the plays arises, and yet the fact that in the present production the first scene ("If music be the food of love, play on") is the poorest in the whole play and quite pointless except in so far as it provides a factual exposition, shows how completely the deepest theme of the play has been missed. As here played, Twelfth Night is a delightful evening's entertainment. But it could conceivably be better, not merely quantitatively but qualitatively as well.

Stark Young (review date 2 December 1940)

It is only fair to say of the new production of Twelfth Night: or, What You Will that some of our best critics have found it an occasion of great merit. They have found in it a deal of sweet enchantment, fun, loveliness, and wit and merriment. If you can get that from the occasion, you are lucky; for that was Shakespeare's intention undoubtedly.

To my mind the event is very dull, not to say banal, unromantic and pedestrian. And in the familiar manner of the Theatre Guild is without joy. It does not seem to rise on pleasant exercise. Culture has the relation to pleasure or satisfaction that any other access of vitality has. We should not be led to wonder, as I was at the Guild production of Twelfth Night, why the producers took so much trouble or ever bothered with this play at all. Culture or no culture for the joy of it, the producers here have indeed taken a great deal of trouble, and labored to bring to their enterprise many a rich resource—for example, Mr. Paul Bowles's music, which underlies the play, delicate but firm, suggesting the antique but not going stale, and seeming at times more visible than heard note by note, Une by line.

The star of this Theatre-Guild-Gilbert-Miller-Helen-Hayes-Maurice-Evans production is Mr. Stewart Chaney. This youngest wren of nine carries off the majority of the honors; his décor has a beautiful richness that ought to be obvious and expected—the sources being what they are for theatre design within this period—but that is, among our designers, very rare and unfamiliar. One thing only I would suggest; it involves lighting. In the lines of the play three days are spoken of and also three months, so that we may assume some changing of the clock. More variations in the hour of day, the tone and assertion of the light, on Mr. Chaney's part would add to the scenes’ dramatic value. Otherwise his settings have a certain lightness for the play, and a Renaissance splendor and knowledge. The costumes provide an admirable reminder of Veronese, Tintoretto, Tiepolo—what you will—and are especially effective for the minor characters, who very likely do what they are told. Mr. Evans' costume for Malvolio has something too much of style and elegance for its right dramatic purposes; though this might be forgiven as court-masque if it were not that Shakespeare's motif of the yellow ing stockings and cross-gartering gets no chance. There is no costume whatsoever that is worth killing the dramatic point to such an extent. Maria's costumes, with their stripes and fine tones and surfaces, go wrong dramatically, unless, that is, this whole event be conceived as pure masque, free revel and artifice. That conception, however, the acting completely denies.

A point to keep in mind about Twelfth Night is that it is one of those theatre works that can do as it pleases, all glancing light, artificial device, lyric departure from cold fact. At the same time, however, we can suffer no harm in remembering that by way of Barnabe Riche (1581) and in turn from the thirty-sixth story in Part II of Bandello's Novelle, the play descends from those novels of later Greece that circulated endlessly in the classic groves but that are rarely mentioned in our schools. It happens to be the case just now, however, that history repeats itself and that we can comprehend more readily the way in which this Greek source was not so arbitrary and fanciful as might be supposed. Taking up the newspaper any day almost, we may read how people are ordered out of a country with half an hour's notice, bag and baggage, scattered over the earth, forwarded, gutted, misplaced or lost. Your sister, your twin, your traveling companion or adventurous helper is who knows where and may turn up when, by chance? The Greek novels, those romances and vagaries so different from the high-horse business of college Greek departments, rested partly on a foundation in fact, on the actual-incredible, something as the figures in Balinese sculpture come back finally to a certain anatomy in that race. We are not obliged, therefore, to be too wholly incredulous as to the fable in Twelfth Night, too scornful of the tale's improbability, any more than we need doubt, trim down and be afraid to risk its freedom, quirs and lyric romance.

So far as the verse goes, Twelfth Night has the elements of Shakespeare's middle period: boldness and freedom of the metrical scheme, keeping on the whole the older form. For the most part the reading of the company in this new production is inadequate, frightened of, or slurring, the metrical values, and without precision for the stresses that convey the sense. Few of the players are less successful in the reading of Shakespeare's lines, in their poetic and metrical values, than Miss Helen Hayes herself in that starry script Viola has to speak. Miss Hayes turns most of all that poetic treasure into mere chirpy prose. The poetic line, a living thing on the stage, can survive only a certain amount of so-called naturalness, conciliative, perhaps, but mistaken. In general Miss Hayes brought her usual, highly honorable professional application to her role, but Shakespeare's Viola is not for her.

Nothing is served by bringing up the matter of Duke Orsino, Sir Andrew Aguecheek and Sir Toby—all fine roles—and the performances given them (Orsino had a superb costume). How Miss Margaret Webster, who is one of our most literate directors, turned such matters over in a heavy heart, may be left to conjecture.

With his Malvolio, Mr. Maurice Evans, choosing to adopt a sort of Thackeray squire make-up and a cockney accent—brings to the whole occasion a touch of the professional that is to say the least refreshing. Malvolio is a part that has been done by a number of illustrious players—Irvin for example—and is easily within any actor's ambition. It is one of the darkest and most terrific things in Shakespeare and too strong, I have always thought, for our present-day stomachs. Granted the toning down of the bite, of the shadowed and the ominous, of the raw, distraught and eloquent, the Renaissance complexity, Mr. Evans' Malvolio is good and will be better. He is still searching for the plane he wants to have it on and the exact breadth and extravagance of the style he wants for it.

Grenville Vernon (review date 6 December 1940)

If Twelfth Night has ever received a New York production in which the acting level was higher or the staging more vital, it has not been in the memory of my generation. There are many to thank for this, the real opening of the season of 1940-41. There are the Theatre Guild and Gilbert Miller for sponsoring it, Theresa Helburn and Lawrence Langner for supervising it, Stewart Chaney for designing the settings and costumes, Margaret Webster for directing it, and the magnificent cast for playing it. Twelfth Night is a play that needs to be produced with vivacity, yet with poetry; with humor, yet with romance. This Miss Webster has accomplished, and in accomplishing it clinches her position as our most vital and original Shakespearean director. But Miss Webster had magnificent material to work with. Let me speak first of Maurice Evans.

In Malvolio Mr. Evans reaches the peak of his accomplishment in the most subtle, most beautifully articulated performance of the part I have ever seen. His Malvolio is a Cockney, a head butler raised to sublimation; not a figure of farce, but one of high comedy. E. H. Sothern made Malvolio an aristocrat in decadence, Evans makes him a butler in ascendent. In face, in walk, in gesture, in the gradations of his voice he is superb; to hear him utter the one word "Run?" in reply to Olivia's injunction is to hear him project his whole character in that single monosyllable. Mr. Evans's Malvolio is the Prince of Snobs, delightful, pathetic, unforgettable. Miss Helen Hayes's Viola is exquisitely human and humorous. In her scenes with Olivia and especially in her duelling with Sir Andrew, she is inimitable, and throughout is captivating and utterly sincere. What she lacks is in the poetic reading of her lines, and in romance. Hers is not an aristocratic Viola, but it is within its own conception an exquisitely thought out and executed figure. If she doesn't make one forget Jane Cowl or Julia Marlowe, she makes you remember Helen Hayes. The Olivia of Sophie Stewart is the best I have seen, a lady who combines charm and humor with the grand manner, and who knows how to speak her lines exquisitely. Wesley Addy fails to make Orsino effective because he tries to make him sensible. Orsino's lines are music, and nothing else, and they must be read as such. Mr. Addy attempts to make them express ideas, and succeeds only in making the character and the lines alike flat. Donald Burr is superb as Feste, both in his singing and his acting. His is the way a Shakespearean clown should be played and rarely is. June Walker is perfectly cast as Maria, acting with sprightliness and charm. It is a pity that Mark Smith's Sir Toby Belch shouldn't have been funnier, and the same applied to a lesser degree to Wallace Acton's Sir Andrew Aguecheek. A word of commendation too should be given to Ellis Irving for his Sebastian. In short with Twelfth Night the theatrical season at last bursts into life.

Rosamond Gilder (review date January 1941)

With a Presidential campaign behind us and preparedness ahead, with Europe's capitals in flames and war spreading like an insane octopus all over the habitable globe, Broadway takes time off for comedy, more comedy, nothing but comedy. As though fearful lest the dark thoughts that shadow us by day, that blacken newspaper headlines and blare at us through the air, should cross the threshold of the twenty-odd playhouses now open along Broadway, producers, authors, musicians and actors have united in a conspiracy of laughter. The latest recruit to the army of good cheer is no other than Shakespeare himself. Twelfth Night is true holiday fare, a light-hearted masque full of music, lovers, clowns, absurdities—What You Will—as its author cheerfully indicates. Written three hundred years ago as a divertissement for the January Sixth festival, the name of which it bears, it is perennially young. As Orsino says, it is, indeed,

Silly sooth,
And dallies with the innocence of love
Like the old age.

To do justice to this antique song, the Theatre Guild has assembled a formidable array of talents. The billing is as complex as a musical comedy. In this their first production of the season, the Guild joins hands with Gilbert Miller as producers; Margaret Webster, past-mistress in Shakespearean governance, directs; Stewart Chaney designs; there is music by Paul Bowles, supervision by Theresa Helburn and Lawrence Langner, an impressive array of stars of the second magnitude—June Walker, Mark Smith, Sophie Stuart, Wesley Addy—and, shining bright in the mid-firmament, the twin planets Helen Hayes and Maurice Evans. The result of all these combined excellences is indeed a feast for holiday makers, colorful, smoothly articulated, inventive, engaging. Miss Webster orchestrates her scenes ably, using all the resources of the theatre—settings, music, movement, grouping, costumes, properties—with her customary resourcefulness. She has been well served by her collaborators. Mr. Chaney's settings in the manner of the Stuart masques and of the early Restoration theatre are happily in the spirit of this playful fantasy. His false proscenium, decked with billowing painted curtains, frames an inner stage which, when its curtains are drawn, can be set in the twinkling of an eye. With backdrops painted in perspective a set piece or two, the scene changes from Orsino's palace to Olivia's garden, from the buttery to the street or to my lady's chamber. Miss Webster, abetted by Shakespeare, has devised innumerable ways of bridging the gap between scenes: sometimes Feste repeats a verse of his song, sometimes a lamp-lighter passes, sometimes Viola is seen marching Olivia-ward with Orsino's gentlemen in attendance. It all flows freely through a theatrical, never-never land where candelabra hang on curves of sky, where conspirators hide behind realistic bushes half their size, where all the make-believe of yesterday and today meets in a merry jumble.

Following the Stuart pattern, Mr. Chaney costumed his actors in knee breeches, his actresses in the tight-waisted free flowing dresses of the period. The play, incidentally, was very popular at the time of the reopening of the theatres under Charles II. Betterton gave it as his second production, Hamlet being his first. It provided one of the first 'breeches parts' for a woman and ran with 'mighty success' for many performances, though Pepys, never an enthusiastic Shakespearean, did not like it. He called it a 'silly play not related at all to the name or the day'. But he would have liked the current production. Its bright colors, its frills and furbelows, its little blackamoor carrying a pink parasol, its glitter and gaiety would have appealed to him. He would have enjoyed its pretty girls with their low-cut dresses without bothering to question why Olivia's household, steeped in mourning and ruled by a near-Puritan, should go thus accoutred. He would have enjoyed 'mightily' Paul Bowles' music though he might have been confused by our modern convention which accepts the fact that actors on the stage do not even twang their guitars while the music of the 'consort' floats up from a hidden orchestra pit. The music in this production is, indeed, all-important. It supplies the tender, lyric mood which is as much a part of the play as its more obvious fun. For Twelfth Night is not all foolery. Its theme is love frustrated, even its clown's songs are plaintive—they have a dying fall.

When Shakespeare wrote his play he posed a pretty problem to his boy-actors. He called upon them to be boys pretending to be girls pretending to be boys, undoubtedly the jest within the jest of Viola's impersonation added spice as well as some faint degree of verisimilitude to the original performances; the boy-actor could reasonably pass for a boy. But modern Violas are unfalteringly feminine even when they are as slim, youthful and bright-eyed as Miss Hayes. She makes a charming picture with her hair curled about her piquant face, her cocky hat on the back of her head, her striped knee breeches and rosette trimmed shoes. She wears her 'man's attire' without aggressive swagger and gives the kind of honest, direct performance that we have come to expect of an artist of her integrity. But she is not entirely at ease in the play itself. Many of her attitudes, positions, gestures, movements seem the result of direction, not the outgrowth of situation. Her performance lacks spontaneity, as it lacks real poetry; it is occasionally humorous and it is always gay and sweet and lovely as is everything Miss Hayes touches; there is about her an unaggressive, but an irresistible appeal; yet only once or twice throughout the evening does she release the full lyric loveliness of the part. One of the high points is the scene when Malvolio gives her Olivia's ring and the subsequent soliloquy with its direct, unaffected address to the audience.

As I am man,
My state is desperate for my master's love;
As I am woman,—now alas the day!—
What thriftless sighs shall poor Olivia breathe!
O time, thou must untangle this, not I:
It is too hard a knot for me to untie!
But her finest moment is at the end, when, her identity at last discovered, Orsino turns to her with

    Boy, thou hast said to me a thousand times
    Thou never shouldst love woman like to me.

and Viola answers:

    And all those sayings will I over-swear,
    And all those swearings keep as true in soul
    As doth that orbed continent the fire
    That severs day from night.

As Miss Hayes stands very quietly before the duke, looking up at him with a complete, absorbed concentration, tenderness is made manifest; her voice, her attitude, her expression glow with that inner fire, that lambency which is the essence of the actor's art.

If Miss Hayes' attack on Shakespeare is somewhat pedestrian and lacking in style, Mr. Evans as Malvolio has enough of it for a whole cry of players. His entrance in the pompous black of his steward's office, his gold chain about his neck, his high flared collar setting off a face unexpectedly adorned with goatee and sideburns, his high-soaring eyebrows expressing a noble self-complacency, an invincible hauteur, is an event in itself. He registers at once Malvolio's enormous conceit, his high seriousness, his disapproval of frivolity. In order to break away from the ordinary pattern of Shakespearean speech, and from the confines of his own successes in it, Mr. Evans has provided Malvolio with a genteel cockney accent. He scans his speech with care, avoiding h's where they do not belong, breathing upon them lovingly in their right places. This amusing trick keeps his voice well away from the music of the bard's blank verse with which his audiences have associated it so closely during these last years. The accent makes Malvolio's dream of Olivia's favor more ridiculous than ever and it adds yet another note to the chorus of colloquial speech with which American productions of Shakespeare are afflicted, but it is justified by Mr. Evans' use of it as a comic device. His performance is sprinkled with genuinely witty moments, as for instance, when Olivia bids him

    Run after that same peevish messenger,
    The county's man: he left this ring behind him…

Mr. Evans interjects a 'Run!!' which is as full of comment as a whole speech could be. In that one word he expresses his outraged dignity, his shock, his surprise and disapproval of the whole procedure. The subsequent scene with Viola is a delightful vignette of wit in performance. He is less successful in the latter part of the play and fails to rise to the final dignity of a man who has been 'notoriously wronged'. Malvolio becomes in the end, thanks to the all-embracing humanity of Shakespeare, a moving as well as a ridiculous figure. Though he is the grotesque pendant to this trilogy of misplaced loves, he is also a poignant example of the sin against the 'holy ghost' of human dignity. Mr. Evans does little with this aspect of the character, but the technical skill, the dash and accuracy of his acting, sets his performance high in his gallery of Shakespearean portraiture.

The play as a whole suffers from the usual problems that face any classic production which must be brought together in a short three weeks. Individual performances are un-even in themselves and often unconnected with their surroundings. Wesley Addy's Orsino is handsome and has a bold, Renaissance flourish, but it is dry, sharp. He hammers his lines in his effort not to sing them. June Walker suffers from the necessity of filling a big theatre with a voice that tends to become shrill when it is forced, but she has a natural sweetness and gaiety that help her interpretation of an unkind part. The chief comics, Sir Toby Belch and Sir Andrew Aguecheek, played by Mark Smith and Wallace Acton, labor not too successfully with the scenes of Elizabethan revelry, which require more gusto and comic relish.

Since this is so lyric a play—full of lovely sounds and songs—voice, speech, diction, delivery are all important and difficult to achieve in a theatre that provides its actors with no steady opportunity for development and experience. Miss Webster has cast the Feste from the ranks of musical comedy and has thereby obtained a fine voice for the songs with which it is studded. Donald Burr is husky and high-spirited. He sings easily and well and plays with vigor if without subtlety. The production as a whole shares this fault. It never coheres around a central mood; it lacks intention except the obvious one of achieving a smooth-running, vigorous performance. It has beauty, energy, competence, charm, but its lyric pulse beats low. This reservation accepted, the Twelfth Night at the St. James is a merry revel indeed, a feast for the eye and ear, a joy to the mind.

Euphemia Van Rensselaer Wyatt (review date March 1941)

"A Great while ago the world began" and ever since men and women have been making their own dream worlds while poets, who set boundaries to dreams, show what may happen on that far Illyrian shore where Shakespeare has set his comedy. Twelfth Night was the old English name for the Feast of the Epiphany and it marked the close of all the Christmas festivities; the minor note that is sounded in the title is the minor note of Elizabethan music and of all real comedy—the wishfulness of dreaming. Comedies of manner have their brief passing season but comedy written round the vagaries of human dreams is timeless. Have there not been young men since the world began who fancied that they were dying of love? Have there not been rich ladies who desired only the unobtainable? And when have girls ever ceased to want heroes, or conceited men to see themselves distorted? Because he, himself, was too much a part of the British scene to keep it out of Illyria, Shakespeare has interposed between his dream makers some hearty British clowning and blended them together with one of his favorite and mysterious types of philosopher, the Jester. Feste is the link between the palace and the kitchen; between the homely folk who laugh at their own foolishness and the clever people who sigh over it, and when Malvolio tries to rise from the lower to the higher level, they pull him back with a robust brutality that grates on modern squeamishness. Augustin Daly, by the way, fearlessly removed from his Twelfth Night the baiting of Malvolio in the madhouse. Unless Shakespeare meant it to give a touch of macabre pathos to the comedy, there seems small point in retaining it now as, to play it for humor, only makes for general discomfort.

William Winter points out that King Charles I. drew his pen through the title, Twelfth Night, on the Second Folio in the royal library and substituted Malvolio!

To hear Malvolio, that cross-garter'd Gull,
The Cockpit, Gallery, Boxes all are full —

In adding Malvolio to his repertory, Mr. Evans has followed the tradition of Macklin, Sir Henry Irving, Sir Beerbohm Tree and E. H. Sothern, but he has also brought to the part a new vision. For the first time, the solemn steward speaks in solemn Cockney as, disdaining all pretense of Dalmatian attributes, Olivia's major-domo emerges as the correct British buttler. Mr. Evans has also cornered a new laugh when, at Olivia's command,

Run after that same peevish messenger
The County's man —

he interrupts the pentameter and interpolates his now famous which integrates his whole character.

He and Miss Hayes also make the most out of the large stiff nosegay which Viola holds as she makes her first speech to Olivia and finally thrusts into Malvolio's hands. When he is sent "running" after her with the ring, which he presents with the usual business of the staff, he turns back and, dragging the nosegay out of the coattail's pocket, flings it at the feet of the boy for whom he has the full bureaucratic contempt of a minor official. After the garter scene, Mr. Evans removes the long black lacings which Maria surreptitiously ties to his belt and he stalks off with them trailing behind him. His costume, in accord with his characterization, has the stiff white shirt front, black tie and "tails" of butlerdom but his top hat carries cocksfeathers for the fantasy.

Viola, one of the gentlest and most unselfish of all Shakespeare's ladies, can cloy if played without humor. Mrs. Jordan was the first of the celebrated Violas, then came Mrs. Kean (Ellen Tree) and Adelaide Nielsen who was likened to "April sunshine." I never saw the Viola of Ellen Terry but she was always dissatisfied with herself in the part. Viola was born for me with Ada Rehan, glowing and romantic. Modjeska and Margaret Anglin were disappointments, so was Viola Allen but the poetry, of which Viola is the embodiment, was recreated by Julia Marlowe and Jane Cowl. Miss Hayes's Viola is not so much a lovelorn maid as a delightful urchin. So heartily and bravely does she assume the boy that the audience almost shares Olivia's mystification. As the boy has all of Miss Hayes's sensitive honesty, he is the nicest boy imaginable and, in her neat gray breeches, forsaking majesty, Miss Hayes affects the easy postures but never the swagger of young manhood. She is really funny in her first scene with Olivia and very, very funny in the duel but equally real is her solicitude for the Duke and Olivia. The strength of her passion for the Duke is less convincing. In Daly's production, "O mistress mine, where are you roaming?" was transposed to the scene between Orsino and Viola and at the line "Journeys end in lovers' meetings," Ada Rehan in her quick glance at the Duke, revealed her suffering. Miss Hayes, who kneels in a charming but complicated attitude by the Duke's couch, as the musicians sing "Come away death," lets her cheek touch his hand as it rests on her shoulder. The gesture would have been completely out of character for Ada Rehan.

Well known in London, Miss Sophie Stewart is an Olivia of incomparable grace and elegance, with a delicacy of movement and gesture that reveals her early training as a ballerina. Nearly a century ago, Feste was played here by a Mark Smith and now a descendant is the present Sir Toby Belch but he lacks the quizzical twinkle which made James Lewis so famous at Daly's nor does he carry off the part with quite the aristocratic bearing one expects from Olivia's kinsman. If Betterton was happy to turn from playing Hamlet and Othello to play Belch, there must be elements in the character that have been permitted to slip by. There is only one way to make comedy alive and that is to give it some contemporary connotation. Ferdinand Gottschalk once played Sir Andrew Aguecheek without overstraining the farce or the make-up but simply showing the pettiness of a very shallow mind. He had such distinguished predecessors as Lester Wallack and John Drew. One advantage of playing Shakespeare occasionally in modern dress is that it brushes off some of the accumulated cobwebs. Sir Toby as the decayed Union Club member and Sir Andrew as the cautious Yankee might re-acquire lost values. Feste takes the honors of the trio in Donald Burr who has stepped out of musical comedy for a part which demands a singer, a dancer and an actor of quick intelligence. Wesley Addy, who won his spurs as Hotspur, plays Orsino without enough imagination, but as Maria, June Walker is everything that she should be in overflowing measure. Her Maria is so full of contagious high spirits that she supplies the vitamins to every scene of the conspirators.

Stewart Chaney's designs are as elusive of place or period as Illyria. They verge toward the baroque, and the blacka-moor page is a happy touch for Olivia's household, as is the boudoir in which we first meet her. One of Chaney's most effective backdrops is a stylized perspective of angry cliffs for the seacoast. Paul Bowles has written an original score for six musicians—flute, oboe, percussion, muted trumpet, harp and an imitation harpsichord—and, opening with a serenade and closing with a round dance, the poetry of the whole comedy is woven on a musical background, unobtrusive but sustaining. As is distinctive with Miss Margaret Webster's productions, the whole is harmonious. But Miss Webster—to use an annoying modernism—is extravert in her outlook. Her Twelfth Night is forthright and the genuine entertainment it offers has made it the spectacular success of the season. As it should be.

PRODUCTION:

Hugh Hunt • Old Vic • 1950

BACKGROUND:

Hugh Hunt's revival at the Old Vic in 1950 avoided traditional approaches to the play's opening by employing mournful music in the first scene and by presenting an Illyria swathed in decayed grandeur. In commenting on the sets of Roger Furse, Richard David noted that "the Illyrian streets had the peeling and water-worn dignity of a side-canal in Venice." Hunt nevertheless infused his staging with a degree of liveliness, especially in the crowd scenes and musical interludes. The focal point of the production's comedy was Roger Livesey's portrayal of Sir Toby Belch, which T. C. Worsley praised as a "rich, bursting Sir Toby, who never misses an opportunity for a bit of business, but never gives us too much." Paul Rogers's Malvolio, which similarly contained an element of buffoonery, was less well received. J. C. Trewin found the performance "strangely out of the picture here." By contrast, Peggy Ashcroft's Viola was accorded general praise, with Trewin maintaining that "it is long since I have seen a Viola so fitted to the play." In judging the production as a whole, critics tended to deprecate Hunt's reliance upon low comedy. Other performances included Alec Clunes as Orsino, Ursula Jeans as Olivia, Robert Eddison as Sir Andrew Aguecheek, and Leo McKern as Feste.

COMMENTARY:

T. C. Worsley (review date 25 November 1950)

The best criticism I have heard of Mr. Hugh Hunt's production of Twelfth Night—with which the Old Vic make a welcome return to their old home in the Waterloo Road—was contained in a remark by a friend who listened to a description of it and then said: "I see, in other words, it managed to be both arty and hearty." It is just that. Its best bits are the hearty bits, centred round a fine scarlet-faced, broad-bottomed, big-bellied, rasping Roger Livesey as Sir Toby. Its worst bits are the arty framework which the producer has thought fit to provide. There are the simpering attendants on Olivia. There is a chorus of boys in beards and girls in urchin cuts, who round off each scene with a skip of dancing, lots of hurraying, clapping of hands, smashing of knees, and who are always there at the dramatic moments to "back up" the action with a concerted snarl or a burst of mocking laughter or a shaking of fists. Then there are the clowns who turn themselves over at the dropping of any one of the inaudible jokes; or keep striking attitudes taken from early theatrical engravings, or jumping over a bench before you know where you are.

Commedia dell'arte, we are doubtless meant to feel; and I am bound to admit that I start with an ineradicable prejudice against this kind of posturing and mumming, while those who enjoy it may not feel so strongly as I do. I think that all this belongs not merely to another age which cannot be revived, but also to a different zonal temperament, which we cannot ape. Twentieth-century English boys and girls, even when they are dressed up Guardi-Italianate, only make one sweat with embarrassment as they huzzah around, trying to be uninhibitedly Latin. Obviously none of this framework is necessary—Twelfth Night is not so bad a comedy as all that. On the other hand if it came off it might be a pleasing enough addition. But it is not in any case a substitute for getting a little nearer the heart of the play. Twelfth Night runs through a wide gradation of mood, from the lowest farce with Sir Toby Belch, to the highest comedy with Orsino and Olivia, and even touches a disturbing chord or two beyond that, with the humiliation of Malvolio, for instance. Mr. Hunt's production misses most of the shades except the lowest, and the arty intrusions, being strictly irrelevant, do not obscure the loss and cannot compensate for it.

Most of the low comedy is inventively and amusingly put over. Mr. Roger Livesey is a rich, bursting Sir Toby, who never misses an opportunity for a bit of business, but never gives us too much, never a belch or a stagger in excess, and he remains—that priceless attribute in an actor—always in perfect command. Then he and the producer have thought of some delightful new devices. The ladder balanced as a see-saw over the wine barrel in the first act is a splendid invention, and the fight between Aguecheek and Cesario-Viola in the second is another piece of perfect comic production. Mr. Eddison's Aguecheek has, by this time, settled into something faintly feasible; all the same I found the kind of death's head stuck on the end of a gangling broomstick which he made of himself a curiously pointless fantastic, which fitted in nowhere. We were surprised to find Malvolio played by Mr. Paul Capon as a comic, with a red nose and a touch of George Robey. And though he carried out the conception amusingly (at least up to his assault upon Olivia in the cross-gartered yellow stockings) the conception itself is so obviously wrong that one wonders why it was left in; it necessarily takes out of the ending that hint of the world of shadows which is an important ingredient of this romantic comedy. Not that anyone coming to the play for the first time through this production would think of classing it as a Romantic Comedy. The Romantic note is almost studiously avoided from the very first moment when Mr. Alec Clunes as Orsino delivers "If music be the food of love" with a jaunty smile as if he were handing us an arguable proposition. No, coming to it for the first time through this production, one would class it as a Fantasticated Farce, a very enjoyable, brisk and romping one. Even so one might think that there was altogether too much movement on the stage too often. Weren't, one might innocently object, some of the lines rather funny too in their own right—if only one could catch more of them?

And this is born out by the fact that apart from the broad comedy the best scene is the stillest: the scene in Orsino's palace where he talks of love with Viola while Feste sings "Come away, Death," and the page-Viola stands intensely watching him, referring his passion to herself. Miss Peggy Ashcroft was at her best here too, acting the scene with a charming unforced gentleness, and speaking the lovely language beautifully. Otherwise the Orsino-Olivia thread was sadly missing; and it was here that the producer might have concentrated his attempts to find a style. Herbert Farjeon called these two characters "Creations in the subtlest comic vein, the one in love with love, the other in love with death," and he added (his notices are full of such pregnant condensations):

> If this were realised by the actors the flexibility of their affection manifested in the final scenes would stay within the bounds of comedy, instead of edging over the borderline into something almost Sophoclean.

I should not like to end without re-emphasising that this production, for all its shortcomings and misplacements, comes over to the spectator with enormous vitality, verve and high spirits. In the battle between its predominant elements at least the hearty holds its own against the arty, and less sophisticated playgoers will enjoy themselves immensely. I have concentrated on the defects for this particular reason: it strikes me that if the commercial theatre is always liable to the infection of vulgarity, the besetting danger of our subsidised theatre at the moment may very well turn out to be artiness.

J. C. Trewin (review date 9 December 1950)

At any revival of Twelfth Night—frequent though they are, there are not enough of them for my liking—I bring with me a bristle of anxious question-marks. "Look here," says Dickens's character, "upon my soul you mustn't come into the place saying you want to know, you know." Maybe; but there is much to ask in Twelfth Night. I found the old questions circling round me in Lilian Baylis's famous and beautifully renovated theatre, the Waterloo Road Old Vic, now back to service at last.

Trivial things, no doubt. I would like to know how Viola, who, as a page, went in the same "fashion, colour, ornament" as her lost brother, managed to get herself so accurately fitted. I would be interested in the true age of Sir Andrew Aguecheek. I wonder why Olivia's jester happened to be "about the house" in the Duke's palace. I wonder who Fabian can be, the man Malvolio brought out of favour with Olivia "about a bear-baiting." I wonder at the odd Elizabethan sense of humour that could see nothing to jar in the scene of the imprisoned Malvolio. I would like to hear more of that sea-fight when the Duke's nephew Titus lost his leg. And I wonder always why Shakespeare should have imperilled the lovely recognition scene by the exchange: "My father had a mole upon his brow." … "And so had mine."

There are other questions, even less to the purpose. Some of these will never be answered. We shall hear nothing more about the Duke's nephew Titus: indeed, there is no reason why we should: he is one of the shadows fated, like Hisperia, Marcus Luccicos, and Valentinus, to stand only on the margin of Shakespearean drama. We shall never know more about Viola's disguise: this is Shakespeare in his what-you-will mood. The prison scene we have to endure, and it is run through as quickly as may be at the Vic.

To our surprise, Hugh Hunt, the inventive director, gives a new answer to the Fabian puzzle. He, too, must have bothered about this man: a fellow who turns up in the fifth scene of the second act, observing (with the baiting of Malvolio in mind): "If I lose a scruple of this sport, let me be boiled to death with melancholy." Mr. Hunt has now decided—and it speaks for his ingenuity—that Fabian is a potential rival to Feste, the jester. Feste is a "fool that the lady Olivia's father took much delight in." He is not always around when needed. ("My lady will hang thee for thy absence," says Maria.) We can assume that, being tired of his struggle to keep going in a dull household ("I marvel your ladyship takes delight in such a barren rascal"), he gets away when he can to more appreciative company, no doubt at the Palace. As presented at the Old Vic, where the actor is Leo McKern, Feste is in faded motley. The Fabian (Paul Hansard) is young, spry, forever on Feste's heels. We sense that the older man's fortunes are thinning, and that, in the final business with Malvolio's letter, Olivia's impatient "Read it you, sirrah" to Fabian shows the way things must go. Feste will strive to please us every day, but his day wanes.

It is an idea and it does explain Fabian, though I shall continue to believe obstinately that the fellow is a groom or an undergardener, and that Shakespeare wrote him into the piece in a hurry to make room for a neglected actor. The Vic reading takes something from Feste. The part can be done in innumerable ways. We have escaped, thank goodness, from the conventional cap-and-bells stencil, the clown likely to observe at any given moment (in the phrase of Gilbert's parody): "I would as lief be thrust through a quicket hedge as cry Pooh to a callow thrrostle." But for me a Feste should have the queer latent melancholy of a high summer afternoon: I miss this special feeling at the Vic.

Here we are; side-tracked as usual in any discussion of Illyria. Twelfth Night is not primarily about Feste. For that matter, it should not be primarily about Toby and Andrew, though the Illyrian knights are the richest company: they have seldom been funnier than in this revival, with Roger Livesey as a Toby cheerfully in the Upper Fourth and Robert Eddison as a lean and withered Andrew who finds his stay at Olivia's cumulatively embarrassing. Yet he has an abounding resilience. Mr. Eddison has his own views about the "dear manakin's" age: whatever we think of this—and I would put Andrew at, say, thirty-five to forty—we must agree at the Vic that the knight is in good fooling. And Andrew has a queer, twisted pathos when Olivia runs from him before his "No, faith, I'll not stay a jot longer."
This production has been called an Illyria of the drolls. Truly they have more than their share. But when I reproduce the revival in the mind, I shall call up first, not the roaring-boy Toby or the human-skeleton Andrew; not the ageing Feste, or the Malvolio who, though Paul Rogers plays him with competence, is strangely out of the picture here; not the Olivia or the Sebastian, who lack any special colour; not the adaptable quay-cum-garden set which wants a flood of sunlight to warm up its greyness: none of these things, but the wholly enchanting Viola of Peggy Ashcroft. That is right and proper. Illyria belongs to Viola: one day she will be its Duchess, and she will be fortunate in her Duke, the high-romantic Orsino of Alec Clunes.

It is long since I have seen a Viola so fitted to the play. Peggy Ashcroft is never brisk or pert, never self-consciously disguised, more of Boxing Night than Twelfth Night. She is very quiet, very loyal. She does not juggle with words. When she says:

If I did love you in my master's flame,
With such a suffering, such a deadly life,
In your denial I would find no sense;
I would not understand it.…

it is no more than truth. This Viola realises what love can be—she is not toying with it—and the "willow cabin" speech comes from her with an absolute sincerity, with no kind of elaborate preparation. (We know, that in her heart Viola is making the babbling gossip of the air cry out 'Orsino!') And this is not Peggy Ashcroft's finest moment: that comes at the very end, when Viola, her lost brother before her, answers his question, "What countryman? What name? What parentage?" with the barely-breathed "Of Messaline." Now the play is played. Viola has her reward at last in the strange bittersweet Illyrian world. The Old Vic can be happy indeed to have had such a performance as this at its opening.

Richard David (review date 1952)

For some years before the war there was one theatre in England, and perhaps only one, which could be confidently relied upon to produce Shakespeare for Shakespeare's sake—the Old Vic in the Waterloo Road. When in 1941 the building was damaged by bombs, the company moved to another theatre, in London's west end; but though there were still individual productions of distinction and star performances of particular roles, something of the special glory of the Old Vic seemed to evaporate with the change of quarters. The post-war reorganization of the Memorial Theatre at Stratford, of old the double shrine of Ham and Whimsy, and the startling emergence there of a true Shakespearian style have since provided another stage on which authentic productions of Shakespeare's plays may be expected. Yet even with this second stronghold in being, there are many who have waited anxiously for the reopening of the theatre in the Waterloo Road, in the hope that with it might reappear the old qualities, of faithfulness to the text and to the spirit of the plays, of star turns subordinated to team-work, and of stage-craft inventive but never fanciful or perverse.

No one who, little more than a year before, saw the still derelict building, with sagging galleries and the cleared pit vast and dreary in its dilapidation, would have guessed that the reconstruction could be so quickly carried through, or that the result could be so charming. By some feat of the original designer the theatre, which holds 500 people on the ground floor alone, gives an impression of great intimacy. It seems to assume good relations between stage and auditorium. The new décor, of crimson furnishings and patterned crimson panels contrasting with the French grey of walls and balustrades, is at once festive and cosy. The audience settles immediately into a mood of cheerful expectancy. Here once more is at least a perfect setting for Shakespeare.
The season opened gloomily with a production of Twelfth Night by Hugh Hunt. The gloom was in one sense actual. Roger Furse's costumes and settings for the play were on the grand scale, but it was a decayed grandeur. The Illyrian streets had the peeling and water-worn dignity of a side-canal in Venice, Olivia's garden the evergreen frowsiness of some great mansion where the family is seldom in residence. The dresses were of rich and weighty stuffs, but their colours were blacks and russets and sombre browns, the dash of scarlet in Antonio's cloak (and Malvolio's garters) positively swearing with the subfusc of the general effect. All this for the gentry; when the "members of the commonwealth" appeared on the stage (and, as will be seen, they did so only too often) it was in the garb of convicts. Seldom can the most high-spirited of Shakespeare's comedies have been presented against so glum and portentous a background.

What was the point of this drabness? If we are charitable we may take it as a reflexion of the producer's belief (more cynical by ten years than Lytton Strachey's) that Shakespeare was bored with comedy by the time he came to Twelfth Night, and in it exchanged his youthful delight in excess for disillusioned satire, his comic verve for perfunctory horse-play. This would explain the mechanical slickness with which the more farcical scenes were thrown off and thrown away, the absence of any pleasure (save malicious pleasure) in the raillery, and two staggering instances of miscasting. Ursula Jeans, for all the accomplishment of her acting, and the fluency and control of her speaking of verse, could not give Olivia precisely that un-worldliness without which she must appear (at least to a modern audience) a monstrous bundle of vanities and affectations; and Leo McKern delivered both the lines and the music of Feste in an offhand style that said plainly "there is nothing to be made of this stuff".

Now Twelfth Night is certainly a mature comedy by comparison with, say, The Merchant of Venice or A Midsummer Night's Dream, but it is a wry mind that finds in it either disillusion or distaste. The alternative title What You Will is surely a token rather of the author's benevolence than of his boredom. As for Feste, we happen to know precisely why his part is what it is. In 1599 William Kemp, who had created the more orthodox clown roles of Dog-berry and Touchstone, resigned his connexion with Shakespeare's company to become a free-lance entertainer, and his place as comic lead was taken by Robert Armin. By comparison with Kemp, Armin was a lightweight and an intellectual (he himself wrote comedies) whose strong points were his singing and his "slipper tongue". It was for this reason that Shakespeare wrote in for Feste not only the songs but the patter and word-play that depend for their effect on an unusually smooth and glib delivery. Such a gallimaufry of puns and nonsense might still be brought off by a virtuoso speaker with immense vitality and self-confidence.

But perhaps it was not so much Shakespeare that was bored with Twelfth Night as the producer himself; and indeed we have all seen and read the play so often that there is some excuse for feeling it to be hackneyed—why then present it at all?—or so easy and straightforward that little trouble need be given to its presentation. In fact, however, though familiarity may disguise it from us, Twelfth Night is (as far as language goes) an extremely difficult play, full of current slang and topical allusions beyond Shakespeare's other comedies. As the most mature of his essays in this genre it is also his nearest approach to the colloquial plays of London life and character for which Jonson at the turn of the century was beginning to set the fashion. Line after line of the dialogue makes a topical point that can be grasped today only with the aid of an erudite note. Yet the general drift is always clear, and the types portrayed so striking and universal that we tend to set up in our minds a precise picture of Malvolio, Sir Toby, or Sir Andrew, without any very exact remembrance or perhaps understanding of the words out of which they are formed. Hunt's production made the most of this tendency. The 'characters' were writ large in make-up and action, while the words, when not omitted, edited, or misapplied, were allowed, nay, assisted to go hang. Thus Paul Rogers's Malvolio, impressive at his first appearance, degenerated with the donning of his yellow stockings into pure butt and buffoon. Roger Livesey, made up as the pop-eyed military man on the cover of Lilliput, played Sir Toby with the good-humour and engaging reasonableness of Colonel Chinstrap, and might have carried it off; but the scene of his midnight carousal (to mention only one) was obliterated beneath the antics of the two knights with a ladder brought on, for no plausible reason, by Sir Andrew. They were certainly funny, but if we want such fun the place to go for it is the circus, where ladders are longer, the clowns are trained to the job, and buckets of whitewash are provided extra; where, too, we are spared the uneasy feeling that somewhere in the background a play is proceeding, which, could we but catch a word of it, might be worth the hearing.

This buffoonery overflowed every scene of the play and even the gaps between them. The sets had been admirably designed for rapid change without lowering the curtain, but their over-elaboration of detail made the operation, though speedy, a complicated one and quite an effort of adjustment to the new environment was required each time of the audience. To cover the physical and mental break the producer brought on a crowd of Illyrian peasants who capered and roared in chorus before the dissolving background. The same horror of gaps presumably inspired in him another piece of invention, though it was frequently employed even where no shift was to be made. This was the introduction in one scene of a character from the next who linked the two together like a held note in music. Unfortunately these 'suspensions by anticipation' often produced an unpleasant discord in the earlier scene. Thus when Maria arrived to congratulate the eavesdroppers she brought with her (all ready for the subsequent encounter with Viola) Feste. This called attention in the most blatant manner possible to the oddity of the substitution of Fabian for Feste in the box-tree (probably due to Armin's being, as we have seen, unsuited to knockabout), and to cover this a great deal of unnecessary and distracting byplay—surprise, resentment, malignant satisfaction—was required of the two. Similarly Aguecheek was present all through Olivia's declaration of love to Viola, and though this may be defended in the light of his subsequent assertion that he himself had witnessed Olivia's favours to the page, the actual sight of his face poking out of the box-tree is a discordant interruption in a scene of poetry. In planning such ingenuities, such irruptions of supers, such elaborations of 'business' a producer must ask himself three questions. Are they required by Shakespeare's text? No. Are they nevertheless a part of the necessary machinery of production on a modern stage? No—for where, after an indoor scene, the 'chorus' could not plausibly be introduced, the shift was made quite happily without it. Are they required for the translation of Shakespeare's intention into modern terms? No. Then away with them.

From a generally disastrous production it is all too easy to collect examples of how Shakespeare's comic points were missed, or masked, or bungled; but it is time to turn to the other, by many held the more important, the romantic half of the play. In this the producer seemed equally at sea. The miscasting of Olivia has already been noted, and Alec Clunes, playing Orsino with a fine blend of genuineness and affectation, had some ado to live down a series of misrepresentations and indignities. An opening scene in which the music was presented not as Orsino's self-indulgence but as a serenade to Olivia made an entirely false impression; and surely the Duke might have been allowed more than three attendants before he offered, as escort to Viola, "Some four or five … all, if you will." Hunt would have spared himself (and his Orsino) a titter if he had sent on a few of his redundant supers here instead of between the scenes. Yet all such faults were more than redeemed by the exquisitely moving performance of Peggy Ashcroft as Viola. How far she herself controlled her own part in the production cannot be guessed, but at least her presence on the stage seems to have influenced the producer and dissuaded him from the worst extravagances. Where some 'bright idea' for the reinterpretation of Viola was admitted, it was in keeping and effective. Such was the impulsive variety of her speech and movement in her first scene; or the taking of the cry "Olivia" (the climax of the "Make me a willow cabin" speech) as a hastily remembered substitution for the "Orsino" that possessed her own thoughts. This was a performance that brought out every subtlety of music as of meaning in the part, and but for this many more seats must have stood empty after the first interval.

Hugh Hunt (essay date 1954)

[In the following essay, Hunt explores the directorial issues that informed his production of Twelfth Night, focusing in particular on balancing the play's lyrical and comic elements, setting and costume, and the
This play is, in the grave parts, elegant and easy, and, in some of the lighter scenes, exquisitely humorous. Aguecheek is drawn with great propriety, but his character is, in great measure, that of natural fatuity, and is, therefore, not the proper prey of a satirist... The marriage of Olivia, and the succeeding perplexity, though well enough contrived to divert on the stage, wants credibility, and fails to produce the proper instruction required in the drama, as it exhibits no just picture of life.

Thus does Dr. Johnson criticize the play we are to perform. We recognize that this is purely literary criticism and has no bearing on the effect of the play upon an audience. Twelfth Night has always been one of the most popular comedies in the language. The frequency of its performance by girls' schools and women's clubs has tended to make it a little too familiar in the eyes of the audience—too familiar for its magic to work easily on them.

But Johnson's criticism is interesting to the producer, if only because it takes as its criterion of judgement an entirely irrelevant standpoint, and so teaches us what not to do with the play. Johnson was steeped in the neo-classical tradition and judged this play by the standards of eighteenth-century comedy. Such standards demanded that the duty of comedy is to portray the excesses of human behaviour and to cure those excesses by laughing at them. Such comedy must have a moral and, however salacious its subject matter, a didactic purpose. What the critic is complaining about in this play is that there is no obvious moral to be drawn from Twelfth Night, and it cannot be regarded as a true picture of the way people behave. But it is, in fact, not a comedy of manners; it is a poetic comedy. Our job is not to caricature reality, but to create a world of fantasy. It is the poetic and, indeed, the fantastic quality of Twelfth Night that I want to emphasize in this production, for how else, except in terms of fantasy, are we to explain the delightful improbabilities of this story of a girl disguised as a boy and the incredible love story which ensues?

To emphasize the poetical quality of this play does not mean that I want the lines to be intoned in the manner of romantic acting, but it does mean that the sound of the play must be given its value, and that poetry must not be treated as an unnecessary decoration which comes between the actor and the characterization of his part. The modern tendency in Shakespearian performance to submit the characters to overanalytical treatment can be as harmful to the flow of the play, as the nineteenth-century tendency to intone the poetry and tear a passion to tatters with a fine display of oratory. Poetry must be spoken with meaning, but also with feeling; gestures and movement in a poetical play must be eloquent, and characterization must be kept within the bounds of poetic creation and not stray into the realm of naturalistic imitation. This play is a fantasy, it must hang in the air somewhere midway between earth and heaven.

Not all of Twelfth Night is written in poetry, and there may appear to be a large gulf between the lyrical characters of Orsino, Viola, Sebastian and Olivia, and the comic, earthy characters of Toby, Andrew, Malvolio and Maria. Too often in productions of Twelfth Night we see the clowns walking away with the play; in consequence, the lyrical people appear pale and even a little dull beside their boisterous, prosaic companions.

THE BALANCE OF THE PLAY

Our main tasks must be: firstly, to balance the lyrical people with the comic people so that the latter do not out-weigh the former; secondly, to weld these two elements together by creating a poetic world in which both can exist side by side.

Let us start with the problem of balancing the lyrical and the comic. The important thing to realize about the lyrical side of Twelfth Night is that it is comedy and not sentimentality. So often we see the characters of Orsino and Olivia played as sentimental, or straight, parts; as such they will appear poor acting material, particularly Orsino, and be easily submerged by the strong characters of Toby, Andrew, Malvolio and Maria. If this is the case, the play will be thrown off balance, the love story of Viola will lose our sympathy, and as for Olivia, she will become frankly a bore. Now, Orsino and Olivia are intended as satirical parts. Their satire is not, I admit, the full blooded comedy of the clowns which caught the fancy of the groundlings, but a more delicate comedy which delighted the gallants and their ladies in the galleries.

In the characters of Orsino and Olivia, Shakespeare is satirizing two affectations of his time. Orsino is the Elizabethan gallant who is in love with love, spending his time lolling on sweet beds of flowers' and contemplating an ideal mistress of his fancy. (The same type of self-indulgence is satirized in the young Romeo.) Olivia is the chaste Elizabethan beauty who is in love with grief, vowing she will never enjoy the society of man. Both these are, in Shakespeare's philosophy, unnatural states of mind and as such are laughable, and both were common enough affectations of court life in Shakespeare's time, as we find it reflected in Elizabethan and Jacobean love poetry. Neither Orsino nor Olivia are, in fact, sincere in their dedication, though both think they are. In contrast to their insincerity, Viola represents sincere love; the true, unaffected, natural, human passion which comes like a fresh breeze to blow away their conceits.

Now, once we have accepted this satire, the problem is how to make it tell without exaggerating the characters in such a way as to destroy their charm, for neither Orsino nor Olivia can be treated in the caricature fashion of Restoration drama. Shakespeare's satire is gentle satire, unlike the strongly marked satire of Dr. Johnson's ideal of comedy. The wistful smile graces his lips, not the full-throated laugh which we direct at the extravagant creatures of the comedy of Johnson's day. This satirical comedy is essentially human, and sympathy is extended to the affected persons. This gentle satire must, however, be marked, and both Orsino and Olivia must be accepted as part of the play's comedy. We will find, once we accept and play this satire, that the gulf between the lyrical people and the broader comics is not nearly so wide as would otherwise appear. Moreover, in playing this satire of insincerity, the sincerity of Viola stands out in its proper place as the embodiment of Shakespeare's own philosophy. This is a big step forward in balancing the seemingly diverse elements of the comedy.

To complete the balance of the play, however, there remains the problem of welding the comic and lyrical elements together by creating a poetic world in which both can exist side by side. The provision of a harmonizing background, in which the lyrical character can exist beside the boisterous ones without hurt to either party, is of the utmost importance, otherwise we shall have two separate styles existing inside the comedy. If the two groups—the satirical and the broad comedy group—are not properly balanced, then, however much satire we infuse into the lyrical group we shall always find the comedy group pre-dominant. The wittiest comedy by Oscar Wilde will fail to get its legitimate laughs if one of the characters spends his time slipping up on a banana skin, and no matter how discreetly we play Sir Toby Belch, we cannot escape the fact that he is the sort of person who has a predilection for the type of humour which borders on farce. The background and atmosphere of the production must, therefore, provide the unifying factor and make it possible for broad comedy and satirical comedy to exist side by side. I will now turn to the way in which I intend, with the help of the designer, to treat the question of unification.

SETTING AND COSTUME

In Twelfth Night, as in all Shakespeare's fantastic comedies, there is no accepted, normal state of society—the 'just picture of life' required by Dr. Johnson. In nearly every English comedy from Congreve to Coward the scene is laid in a contemporary setting, but in Shakespeare's fantastic comedies the author creates his own society, his own country and his own conduct of life. In these comedies we enter the kingdom of the high fantastical where the rules of behaviours and reason, in the eighteenth century or neo-classic sense, are left behind. It is significant that in only one of his comedies, The Merry Wives of Windsor, does Shakespeare choose an English background. Everywhere else we enter a fantastic country which is either an invention of his own—such as the Forest of Arden, Illy ria, the Sea Coast of Bohemia—or a corner of the world sufficiently unknown to him and to his audience for a fantastic or unrealistic state of afiFairs to exist. In such a land of fantasy girls may be mistaken for boys, twins mixed up, lovers go to bed with each other without being aware of each other's identity, and many other incredible happenings take place. For such purposes his preference is for the old Italian romances which are laid in such places as Syracuse, Messina, Athens, and medieval France. He purposely avoids the contemporary society and the topical background, perhaps because it would have fettered his imagination and prescribed rules of behaviour too precise for his searching, poetic spirit. In this created world of fantastic comedy, anything can happen: Olivia can fall instantly in love with Viola and not be unduly perturbed when she finds that she has married Sebastian; Orsino can discover his love for Viola the moment he knows her to be a woman without any loss of the credibility so treasured by Dr. Johnson.

Twelfth Night is like nearly all Shakespeare's comedies, a comedy of love. But what distinguishes Illyria from the other fanciful countries of his comic genius is that it is a land of music. But Illyrian music is not only the food of love, it is also the food of every other kind of fancy; it sets free man's spirit to rove into the land of imagination, it opens the door of the kingdom of poetry, it induces melancholy and roisterous merriment and even tames the drunken clowns into a state of sentimentality. This land of Illyria, which is unfolded to us in Orsino's music with the dying fall and folded up again in Feste's song of the wind and the rain, rises like a magic island out of the sea, only to melt out of our grasp at the end like the land of fancy it is:

But that's all one,
Our play is done,
And we'll strive to please you every day.
[V.i.406-07]

To produce the true effect of this magic land of music on the stage we must free ourselves from the conventions which have stamped this play too strongly in the audiences' mind. We must try to find a new form in which to present the play. This form is all important, for to the modern playgoer it is not sufficient to return to the Elizabethan stage. We can no longer clothe the rush-strewn boards with our imagination, nor turn the Hall of the Middle Temple into the magic island of Illyria, as our Elizabethan ancestors were apparently able to do. Soaked as we are in the realism of the cinema and television, we require a greater impetus to set our imaginative faculties in motion and soar into Shakespeare's world of 'high fantastical', than did the playgoer of the Renaissance, to whom even such common objects as potatoes and pipes of tobacco were things of wonder, suggestive of incredible adventures. For us a spade is a spade, and the magic of Illyria can no longer exist in the Globe any more than it can exist in the box hedges of the overworked conventional setting of this play. The job of the modern designer of Twelfth Night is to find the right theatrical aids in order to allow his audience's imagination to reach across the centuries and find the magic world of Shakespeare's Illyria. The scenery of our production must be, therefore, neither conventional, nor realistic, nor purely Elizabethan, if it is to provide the right release for the imagination. It must be fresh, evocative and lyrical. This all important question is the designer's particular problem.

In searching for the form in which to present the play we have decided that certain principles must be born in mind: firstly, we must avoid unnecessary and cumbersome changes of scene; secondly, the poetic nature of the play can best be served by keeping as much of it in the open air as possible; thirdly, our scenery must be atmospheric without being realistic; lastly, we must give the play a sense both of intimacy and fantasy. This we have tried to do by placing Illyria on a small island off the Dalmatian coast. We realize it is an unconventional setting for the play, which is usually set among the trim box hedges of a typical Elizabethan garden—well enough, but no more than a recent theatrical convention when all is said. There are times when theatrical conventions should be broken; when the producer and designer should seek new visual aids for Shakespeare. Twelfth Night is, I believe, a case in point, for it is one of those plays which have become too familiar to the audience and it needs to be seen in a fresh light if its magic is to work again. But why choose the Dalmatian coast? First, because Dalmatia and the Aegean islands are probably Shakespeare's own geographical conception of where Illyria was, and, secondly, because when Viola and Sebastian are wrecked on a sea coast, we need some sort of fantasy island for them to arrive at. Moreover, though I place no great store by the source of the play, it is more than probable that it was derived from an old Italian play called Gl'Ingannati which stems from Venice and something of its Adriatic origin still lingers about it.

In pursuit of the principles outlined above we have arrived at the following three locations for the scenes:

1. Act I, Sc. 1-4; Act II, Sc. 1-3; Act III, Sc. 3, and Act IV to end

These scenes will be played in the piazza of a little seaport with streets leading to the sea, down which the shipwrecked travellers—Viola and Sebastian—will come. On either side of the piazza are the houses of Olivier and Orsino; neither of them very large or imposing, so as to maintain the feeling of a small, out of the way island, in which these two persons are the sole representatives of the aristocracy. In the middle of the piazza is a raised platform under which is the town prison.

2. Act, I, Sc. 5; Act II, Sc. 5; Act III, Sc. 2, and Act III, Sc. 4

These scenes will be played in the garden of Olivia, a secluded spot screened by cypress trees, where this affected and wealthy lady can escape from the unwanted attention of her suitors.

3. Act II, Sc.4

This most lovely of all the lyrical scenes will be played in the palace of Orsino, which we will treat in an airy Italianate fashion so as to preserve the open air character of the play.

We have given serious thought to the location of the drinking scene (Act II, Sc. 3). This is by tradition set in some kind of kitchen or cellar. Apart from our desire to avoid unnecessary scene changes, there is, as far as I can see, no indication in the text that this scene should take place in any definite locality. It can be played just as well immediately outside the door of Olivia's house, where the caterwauling of the knights would disturb the household no less than in the cellar. We have, therefore, decided to place this scene in the piazza at night, causing Toby and Andrew to enter as if returning from a carouse in the town, bearing a barrel of wine and a ladder with which Toby purposes to enter his niece's locked house through an upper window. Here they are joined by Feste, and the carouse becomes the merrier for a ladder and a barrel make an excellent see-saw. Maria and Malvolio issue from the house in a fruitless endeavour to prevent them from waking their mistress and causing Toby to be turned out for good.

Now the background we have described, revolving around the piazza of this small seaport, is reflected, though not in any pedantic sense, in the costumes. I would like you to imagine the inhabitants of Illyria as a gay, feckless, music-loving people, whose main occupation is the sea and all that pertains to it. If seafaring is the main occupation of the island, we can understand Orsino's anger with the pirate, Antonio. In such a community we will expect to find the common people dressed in simple, practical costumes, and the aristocrats in so small an island will be well-dressed but not over-ornate. Between the two households of Olivia and Orsino, there is not much to choose as far as wealth is concerned, and it is the natural expectation of the town that Olivia will in time ally herself with Orsino, there being no other suitable match for her on the island.

So much for what we might call the realism of our setting. I have, however, already indicated that the play cannot be treated realistically and must always move in the realms of the 'high fantastical'. The community we have outlined, therefore, only exists in the realms of the imagination. It is for this purpose that the designer has expressly avoided any definite period in the costume. It is for this purpose, too, that he has avoided any complete realism of setting, to which he has given an insubstantial quality in keeping with the fantasy of the story, for the play must remain timeless. To maintain this sense of timelessness and for the purpose of welding the lyrical and comic characters into a world where they can exist together, the designer has introduced into the costumes of Toby, Andrew, Feste, Malvolio and Fabian a marked note of the Commedia del Arte. In doing this we are not so wildly extravagant as it might seem, for the origins of this play were, as we have said, taken from an Italian source. This costume resemblance to the stock figures of Italian comedy is most predominant in the costumes of Feste and Fabian, about whom I shall have more to say later.

Having described the way in which we will try to give the play a unity and a fantastical atmosphere in keeping with its lyrical feeling, I will now pass to the question of characterization, which I will treat together with some indications of how I see the play appearing on the stage in this sort of setting.

ORSINO

It is early morning when the curtain rises on the piazza of Illyria; the houses that surround it are silhouetted against the light of the rising sun. On our left is Olivia's house, on our right Orsino's palace. Asleep by the fountain in the centre is Feste, who, of course, has been out on the loose and has found himself locked out.

Nay, either tell me where thou hast been, or I will not open my lips as wide as a bristle may enter, in way of thy excuse. My lady will hang thee for thy absence. [I. i. 1-4]

In the distance a clock chimes and Feste wakes up, looking apprehensively at Olivia's windows. He takes out his pipe and with a flourish summons the townspeople, who, as arranged, are to serenade Olivia on this fine summer's morning at the orders of Orsino; for Feste, as we find in Act II, Sc. 4, works for Orsino as well as Olivia. As the serenaders arrive and the music which is the 'food of love' is played beneath Olivia's windows, the door on the opposite side opens and Orsino, followed by his small retinue, enters.

The Duke of Illyria is the embodiment of the traditional lover with his sad, pale face, his Byronic collar, and his rich, flowing cloak. His eyes are fixed upon his mistress's closed shutters as he leans elegantly against the platform in the centre of the stage. He is the picture of an Elizabethan lover, but we must not imagine Orsino to be a spineless individual, nor purely a sentimental romantic. He is, in fact, a typical nobleman of Renaissance poetry and romance. He hunts, he likes music and poetry, he has a will of his own and a good deal of stubbornness. He is a man in search of the ideal. In his case this ideal takes the form of ideal love, and he has mistakenly embodied this ideal in the person of the dedicated virgin, Olivia. His love for her is as 'all embracing as the sea', and his passionate spirit is so absorbed with his imaginary ideal that he lives, acts and breathes love at every minute of the day. He requires only a good dose of liver salts, after which we shall find him a capital fellow and well worthy of Viola's love.

The music ended and the serenaders departed, he indulges in his favourite pastime of extolling his mistress:

O! when mine eyes did see Olivia first,
Methought she purg'd the air of pestilence;
That instant was I turned into a hart,
And my desires, like fell and cruel hounds,
E'er since pursue me …

[I. i. 18-22]

The typical opening for one of those allegorical love sonnets, which were such favoured pursuits of the Elizabethan gentry. But he is interrupted by Valentine who, issuing from Olivia's house, comes to tell him that the chastity of his mistress has once again prevailed. Having received the daily refusal to his protestations of love, there is nothing to do but to spend the morning reclining on a nice bed of flowers, where the lover in love with love can indulge himself by reflecting on the cruelty of his ideal, and wholly imaginary, mistress.

VIOLA

And now as he passes across the stage a very different procession enters at the back, toiling wearily up the narrow streets from the sea. This is Viola with the sailors and the Sea Captain. 'What country, friends, is this?' Viola asks, as she stands in amazement watching the departure of the handsome, love-sick Duke and his dejected followers. The little group which has entered present a strong contrast to the previous occupants of the piazza. Wet-through, tired and dispirited, having spent the night struggling with the elements after the loss of their ship and of their dear ones, we see in them, and in particular in Viola, a sincere grief nobly borne, as opposed to the affected grief of Orsino. We notice how Viola is so overcome at the loss of her brother that she has no further wish to live. But how gradually her own courageous nature, awakened by the cheerful practicality of the Sea Captain, gains the upper hand, and she bravely determines to face a new life. It is this contrast between sincerity and insincerity, between true grief and affected grief, between true love and self-indulgence, which is the main theme of the play. These first two scenes are delicately balanced to emphasize this contrast. If we reverse them—which is sometimes argued to be theatrically effective—we destroy the delicacy with which the author has balanced his opening situation.

Now, so far we have pointed at Viola as being the acme of perfection in matters relating to the emotions in contrast to Orsino and Olivia. It is important, however, that, as well as recognizing her emotional sincerity, we also realize that she is a human being with a natural desire to gain the love of her lord. Viola is already on the way to being in love with Orsino when the play begins; for she has heard her father talk of him and she has conjured up a vision of this handsome bachelor Duke to which her girl's heart has responded. She is not, therefore, completely without ulterior motive in her decision to offer herself to his service. Does she hope to supplant Olivia in his affections? That would hardly be true at first, for she deliberately disguises herself as a boy. But Viola undoubtedly hopes that something will come of it all, and that the adventure, which is certainly a very bold move on her part, may prove rewarding. I do not mean that, when entrusted with her various love embassies on behalf of her master, she will lack diligence or prove deceitful, but once she sees that Olivia is adamant in her determination to reject her suitor, Viola does not hesitate to counsel Orsino to give up his useless passion, and there is more than a hint that he might look elsewhere for an outlet for his love in the mysterious tale:

> My father had a daughter lov'd a man,
> As it might be, perhaps, were I a woman,
> I should your lordship.
> ![II. iv. 107-09]

Like the real woman she is, Viola likes to surround herself with a sense of mystery. Who is this strange youth who talks in riddles? She deliberately places a puzzle in Orsino's way for him to think out. It is the feminine side of Viola which makes us love her. She is not just an angel, incapable of the little decepts of human life. She is a woman in love. Her other human frailties only help to make her perfections more lovable. She is struck, for all her courage, with a very natural terror when asked to fight a duel. She has a delicious sense of irresponsibility which she assumes when things become too complicated and she finds that Olivia has fallen in love with her:

> O Time! thou must untangle this, not I;
> It is too hard a knot for me to untie!
> ![II. ii. 40-41]

Of all the characters that Shakespeare created, Viola is the most lovable, the most human.
SIR TOBY BELCH

And now that we have seen Viola off on her great adventure we can turn to the scene that follows. Sir Toby enters from Olivia's house, suffering from a bad hang-over, and thoroughly fed up with this endless state of mourning which pervades his niece's household. Seizing an opportunity to slip off unnoticed to the nearest hostelry, he is called back by Maria who has been watching him from Olivia's doorway. The two important points about Sir Toby Belch's character are: firstly, he is a gentleman who has run to seed; and secondly, he is quite determined he is going to enjoy life no matter what other people want to do. The idea that he should confine himself within the modest limits of order is abhorrent to him:

Confine? I'll confine myself no finer than I am: These clothes are good enough to drink in, and so be these boots too. [I. iii. 10-12]

Toby is completely selfish, and hopelessly unsubtle in his selfishness. He plans to marry off his niece to the unsuitable Sir Andrew so that he can borrow money from the latter. He persuades this ninny of a suitor to fight Cesario so as to provide himself with a good entertainment. Anything that comes between him and his pleasures must be swept out of the way and the principal obstacle to his enjoyment of life is the sour face of the puritanical Malvolio.

We might conclude from this that Toby is an unlikeable character, but in fact we like him because he is such a thorough rogue, and because he has such a constant, irrepressible sense of fun.

But with all his boisterousness, Toby must always remain a gentleman. In his most drunken moments we must see his ludicrous attempts to maintain his dignity. He is genuinely furious with the steward, Malvolio, for presuming to set himself up as a gentleman. The very fact that Toby was born a gentleman is his undoing. He has never had to work; he has been spoilt from his youth, and he has always managed to bluster his way through life. The new regime of cloistered virginity, which has been adopted by his niece since the death of her brother and the consequent dominance of Malvolio, has caused him to break out more wildly than ever as a protest against petticoat government in particular, and puritanism in general. For this we cannot wholly blame him; and for the understanding of Toby's behaviour we see one more reason why Olivia's character must be gently satirized. It is her affectations as much as Toby's own weakness which causes his excessive behaviour. You cannot confine Sir Toby Belch in a cloister of affected grief, where the vows and company of men have been abjured. He has learned to spend his money recklessly, to drink, to quarrel, and to dance. His trouble is that he is now penniless and dependent on his niece for his clothes and food. No wonder he cultivates Aguecheek for the sake of a little financial independence.

MARIA

For Maria, who tries to keep Toby on the rails, we may say that, apart from being Olivia's gentlewoman, she is the brains behind Toby. We imagine her as a high-spirited and neat person. She has come to be a little mother to Toby, trying to conceal his worst extravagances and save him from Olivia's tongue. But she is no doormat to be walked on by him, which would undoubtedly be her fate were she not possessed of a ready wit, a considerable courage, and a great sense of mischief. All these features make her into an indispensable prop for the rather helpless, old rascal for whom she cannot help but feel affection.

Although Maria has plenty of sound sense she is by no means beyond encouraging Toby to mischief, especially where Malvolio is concerned. We can easily imagine that the position of overbearing authority, which this intolerable steward has assumed in the household since the death of Olivia's brother, has not only made Toby far more truculent than usual, but has also made the servants, Maria, Feste and Fabian, ripe for revolt. They are all ready for mischief and Maria is determined to use it to bring about Malvolio's downfall. For this purpose she encourages Toby and supplies him with a device to overthrow this household tyrant. The fact that Toby marries her out of gratitude was probably a nice piece of calculation on Maria's part. But their marriage is as happy an augury for Toby's future as we can imagine, for it is highly unlikely that anyone else would have accepted the penniless, old reprobate, and, if anyone could keep Toby within the confines of some kind of order, Maria is the person to do it. Their marriage will undoubtedly be considered a misalliance in aristocratic circles. I hardly imagine Maria will be received at Orsino's court, but I feel quite sure that they never wanted for company round their hearth, nor did the company ever want for a 'stoup of wine', or a witty word from their hostess.

SIR ANDREW AGUECHEEK

And 'here comes Sir Andrew Aguecheek' on his way to pursue his preposterous courtship of Olivia. A more unlikely suitor for that temperamental Prima Donna's hand we cannot imagine. Perhaps Sir Andrew lives on the other side of the island of Illyria, but more likely he lives in the more cultured city of Venice, where he has learned to play the viol-de-gamboys and to speak 'three or four languages word for word without book'. At all events, he has plenty of money and is, as Maria says, 'a very fool and a prodigal'.

He has come to the little town of Illyria to woo the rich heiress, obviously at the instigation of Sir Toby, who hopes to reap a rich harvest from the match; for Sir Andrew is completely under the thumb of his boisterous companion. Toby is a fatal attraction to the timorous, weak-brained Andrew. In Toby's presence Sir Andrew feels himself a bit of a blood. Such is his need for an inflation of his ego that he will follow this bully-boy round like a spaniel, no matter how many kicks he receives; rejoicing in any little spark of encouragement that may fall from the old rogue's lips. He is one of those totally vacant-brained gentlemen who can be counted on to put his foot in it on every occasion; yet there is no malice in him, but rather a pathetic desire to please everyone and above all a wish to be thought well of, which invariably results in his making a fool of himself. He is aware that he is a bit of a failure, which occasionally makes him melancholy, and without the constant encouragement of Toby's companionship, he would give up at once.

This companionship between the old rogue and his fatuous hanger-on is not purely a matter of a desire for money on the one side and for inflation of ego on the other. Toby and Andrew have a strange affection for each other, and always back each other up when either is criticized. We should feel that, despite the difference of age and temperament, they are firm friends. But Andrew has just enough spark in him to revolt occasionally against Toby's dominance. Unfortunately it never comes to anything, for his courage is very slight, and a comforting word from his idol makes him a 'dear mannikin' once more. The quality which really endears Andrew to us is that he knows what a pitiful fellow he is. His desire to take part in everything, his valiant attempts to impress Toby with his courage, his happiness when Toby praises his prowess in dancing, his pathetic confession that he was 'loved once, too', all make of this poor num-skull a thoroughly lovable, if always ludicrous, creature.

So Toby and Andrew dance away from the piazza to set about some revels and for a few hours Andrew will bask in the sunshine of Toby's companionship. They are followed by Viola and Orsino's lords and there is more than a hint of jealousy in Valentine's lines to Viola:

If the Duke continue these favours towards you, Cesario, you are like to be much advanced.

[I. iv. 1-2]

For she has won Orsino's confidence, and now it is Viola and not Valentine who will be entrusted with the embassies of love. Viola goes off on her first embassy to Olivia accompanied by 'some four or five', and as they go the scene is changed from the piazza into Olivia's garden. When the music ends and the change is completed, we see Feste trying to elude Maria as she chases him in and out of the Illyrian boys and girls who have aided the change of scene. By the device of changing the scene in front of the audience, using the inhabitants of the island to move the pieces around, we will hope to maintain the flow of the play, and at the same time by the use of music maintain its fantastic character.

FESTE

I will begin by describing what is realistic about the character of Feste before I pass to what à might describe as the fantasy of his part. Feste is a sort of half-way person, belonging partly to the plot of the play, and partly to the strange musical atmosphere in which it is wrapped. The realistic Feste is the Feste of Olivia's household. He is a little, middle-aged creature who lives by his clowning, by his songs, by his ability to amuse his patroness. The existence of a licensed fool was probably a most precarious form of earning a living, for to be successful a fool has always to be able to produce the required distraction, no matter what his private feelings might be. Professional fooling required a daring and an impudence of approach which, if taken amiss by the uncertain temper of a patron, resulted in a beating at the best, or a hanging at the worst. More often failure to strike the right note entailed dismissal and we may be sure that a fool had little ability to earn his living at anything else.

Feste lives under this constant threat of dismissal; for Olivia with her affected grief is a very uncertain customer to serve. Moreover, it is clear that he is no longer quite equal to his job; perhaps he is growing old and a little stale.

Now you see, sir, how your fooling grows old, and people dislike it [I. v. 110-11] says Olivia to him, and Feste, unable to make any reply to this, quickly changes the subject. Now, if Feste is in danger of losing his job because his fooling is beginning to pall, he has two additional pitfalls to contend with: one is Malvolio, and the other his own irrepressible nature. Between him and Olivia's steward there is a constant feud; for not only is Malvolio bitterly jealous of any intimacy between his mistress and another servant, but as a Puritan and a man completely devoid of humour he has an inborn distaste for, as well as a strong distrust of, Feste's jests. Feste is quite aware of Malvolio's hostility and he knows, too, that the steward will do his utmost to get him thrown out of service. Feste's ultimate cruel mockery of the distracted Malvolio is only understood if we realize how serious a threat the steward is to Feste's livelihood. In the first scene when we see them together Malvolio administers a stinging insult to the ageing jester:

I saw him put down the other day with an ordinary fool, that has no more brain that a stone.
[I. v. 84-85]
Feste is at once touched to the quick; his professional pride has been badly wounded—put down by an ordinary fool! Is he losing his grip on his job? He is haunted by this cruel gibe and, when it is Malvolio's turn to lose favour, back comes these words out of Feste's mouth:

But do you remember? "Madam, why laugh you at such a barren rascal?" [V. i. 374-75] and so 'the whirligig of time brings in his revenges'.

The other pitfall that Feste has to contend against is his own irrepressible high spirits. Like Toby, Feste cannot confine himself within the modest limits of order. He is always out on the loose, not necessarily drinking, like Toby, but enjoying himself, flitting from place to place, sometimes at Orsino's house, sometimes in the company of Toby and Andrew. We shall see him in this production dancing with the music-loving crowd, mocking Orsino's sentimentality and getting into every sort of mischief, when he should be at home pandering to Olivia's whims. At the end he has gone too far—Olivia promises to right Malvolio's wrongs:
But when we know the grounds and authors of it, thou shalt be both the plaintiff and the judge of thine own cause. [V. i. 353-55]

This threat of an investigation into Malvolio's imprisonment cannot fail to produce fatal evidence against Feste, who is not only Malvolio's main enemy, but is also the most vulnerable of his mockers; for he cannot be allowed the liberty of Sir Toby and Sir Andrew, and Maria is safely married. Thus it is that when the happy couples go off to celebrate their 'solemn combination' Feste is left behind, and his last song has an ominous significance in its refrain of 'the wind and the rain'.

About the fantasy of Feste's part I shall have something to say later, but I will now turn to Olivia as she enters her garden accompanied by her dutifully sad ladies.

OLIVIA

I have already spoken of Olivia's insincerity, but I do not wish to give the impression that she is incapable of sincere love. We must imagine that this chaste lady is confronted with a considerable problem owing to Orsino's insistent wooing of her. She comes of a proud, rich family and we maintain that on this island there is no other suitable husband at hand, for she cannot take Sir Andrew's suit seriously. Unfortunately she does not love Orsino, and it is partly in self-defence that she affects a use of cloistered seclusion, hiding behind vows of everlasting mourning for her dead brother. She is, of course, quite aware that this form of prevarication makes her the more attractive to Orsino; aware, too, of her personal charms, as she clearly shows when she makes an inventory of her beauty to Viola:

Item, two lips indifferent red.
[I. v. 297]

Olivia has no intention of remaining a nun all her life, but it is a pleasant conceit for the moment, and, whilst holding Orsino at bay, she can, from behind her veil, be on the lookout for a nice personable young man. The joke of this situation is, of course, that she falls head over heels in love with Cesario, who is unable to respond. Thus she is placed in the most embarrassing position of having to endure the same scornful rejection of her own love as she has dealt out to Orsino.

This gentle comedy of the scornful beauty who rejects and is rejected will only become apparent if from the first the actress has struck the right note of affectation. If, on the contrary, the audience have been led to accept Olivia as a charming, straight juvenile, the comedy will be lost, the part appear insipid, and the pursuit of Viola-Cesario indecent and undecorous. Olivia is, of course, dressed in black and heavily veiled, her manner is one of assumed grief, which she manages to make very attractive. Behind the veil there is more than a hint of a self-willed, temperamental flirt and we should find no small degree of comedy in the haste with which she whips Sebastian off to church, before he has time to look round. The secret of the acting of Olivia is to balance affectation with attraction, and to underline the gentle, but unmistakable comedy of this capricious young woman, who woos so assiduously a girl under the impression that she has found a gallant, young gentleman.

MALVOLIO

In her steward, Malvolio, who accompanies her into the garden, we recognize the mixture of the Puritan and the proud servant who aspires to greatness. Since the death of Olivia's brother, Malvolio has clearly seen a golden opportunity for advancing both his authority and his social position. Olivia's affected grief has placed some good cards in his hands; for, as her principal male confidant, he is able to exert his authority over her household without interference, and who knows how far his advancement may carry him:
Malvolio is in love with his mistress, or at all events he has imagined himself to be so. He is a very ambitious person and, in his determination to keep Olivia to himself, he encourages her to reject all suitors with the utmost diligence. But although he concurs with Olivia's affectation of chaste seclusion, he does not entirely approve of his mistress's taste. He thoroughly disapproves of her championship of Feste, her tolerance of Toby and her dangerous interest in Cesario. We can well imagine his dislike at being asked to carry a ring from his mistress to this young stripling, Cesario, after his visit to Olivia. We can understand with what excitement he reads the letter that Maria drops in his path, and we can see how completely his ambition and pride are overthrown when he discovers the hoax that has been played on him.

Malvolio is, however, not a figure of tragedy, nor yet a fearsome villain. He is an intolerably pompous person, and as such he is exceedingly funny. He is puffed up with pride, credulous to a degree, full of affectations and fine airs and utterly lacking in any sense of humour, the absence of which makes him an easy butt for the 'lesser people'. He is, in fact, the sort of person who always gets his leg pulled, because he never seek a joke, and deserves to get his leg pulled, because he dislikes any form of fun in others. His gait, his dress, his speech, his pride, his 'austere regard' and his officiousness earn him the mockery that is meted out to him, and although his punishment is a little cruel by our standards, we must remember that these Elizabethan Illyrians were more full-blooded than we are.

We picture him as a middle-aged governess of a creature who folds his clothes meticulously when he goes to bed, and probably pins up his hair. No doubt he suffers severely from corns and objects very strongly to being told to hurry:

Run after that same peevish messenger. [I. v. 300]

We can imagine with what a look of surprised hauteur Malvolio receives this instruction from his mistress to un-bend his dignity and take to his heels! He passes from the play like an enraged hen with his feathers not a little ruffled, but with his self-conceit untouched.

SEBASTIAN AND ANTONIO

I will now turn from the group in the garden to two other figures who later enter the piazza: Sebastian and Antonio. About the former there is not a great deal to say, except that he is a thoroughly likeable young man who shares the same sort of directness that we find in his twin sister, Viola. Sebastian has an openness about him, an innate honesty, and a freshness which immediately endears him to his older companion. Like Viola he is deeply affected by the loss of his twin, but he has the same courageous determination to start life again and to seek his fortune cheerfully. He is the sort of person who responds very quickly to his emotions. He warms at once to Antonio's kindness; he falls head over heels in love with Olivia, and he does not hesitate to draw his sword on Andrew and Toby. The very quickness of his emotional response make him hot tempered as well as warm-hearted. Above all, the actor who plays Sebastian must approach the part lyrically. The joyous soliloquy 'This is the air, that is the glorious sun...' and the infinitely tender recognition of Viola demand a lyrical approach to the acting of this part which is of great importance to our acceptance of what might otherwise appear improbable.

There must be something about these twins that makes them specially attractive to the tougher type of male, for just as Viola wins the devotion of the Sea Captain, so Sebastian captures the affection of the pirate, Antonio. The secret of this attraction lies, I think, in the directness and warmth of their youthful affections. There is nothing complicated or affected in them to make the rough sea-dogs feel out of their depth. They bring out the fathering instinct, which is often a very endearing characteristic of the hardened seaman.
Antonio is a thorough seaman; honest and straightforward in his personal dealings, generous with his purse, despising meanness and ingratitude, brave in combat, incapable of cloaking his feelings when angered, and a devil when it comes to a scrap. He has, like Drake and Grenfell, been a notable pirate attacking with his 'bawbling vessel' the 'most noble bottom' of Orsino's fleet. Antonio denies this charge of piracy. To his way of thinking he won his prizes in fair combat with the odds against him, but he realizes that he may be justly regarded as Orsino's enemy, for, whereas his compatriots handed back their pirated gains in order to conclude an advantageous trade pact with the government of Illyria, Antonio refused to do so. He is, therefore, a marked man in Illyria; well knowing the danger he runs in accompanying Sebastian through the streets. It is clear that he must not walk, as Sebastian says, 'too open'; there must always be a cautiousness in his movements, as if he were constantly on the look-out for trouble. It is only when he sees what he thinks to be his young charge in bodily danger that he throws caution to the wind and rushes headlong into action and so into the arms of Orsino's officers. From then on he behaves as we would expect him to, in a fearless and courageous manner. We know he would walk with his head up to the gallows, were he not ultimately rescued by Sebastian.

FABIAN, THE CLOWN?

So far we have covered all the main characters of this play with the exception of Fabian. Here lies a problem. Who is this unexpected and unexplained character?

We had been led to believe from the plot concocted by Maria and Toby that the clown would make a third in the trapping of Malvolio. It is, therefore, not a little surprising that Shakespeare discards his clear intention that Feste should accompany Toby and Andrew in the letter scene, and deliberately replaces him with a character called Fabian, whose sole explanation of himself is that Malvolio 'brought him out of favour' with his mistress, Olivia, about a bear-baiting. Many explanations have been offered for the inclusion of this apparently unnecessary party, which seems to have been intended at one stage of the writing to be contained in the part of Feste, the clown. Perhaps the reason is that the actor who played Feste got a little beyond himself at rehearsals, and, as a result, the original Malvolio complained about the number of pranks that were being played behind his back whilst he was reading the letter, and insisted that Feste's part be given to another. Let the actor of Feste take note! Whatever the truth may be, we are now forced to accept the inclusion of Fabian, since from the letter scene onwards he takes an integral part in the action. It remains for us to find an explanation for him.

Licence, if it be in keeping with the spirit of the play, is perhaps allowed in the interpretation of Fabian. I propose to play him as a second clown—a rival to the ageing Feste. Like Feste he is a member of Olivia's household, but he is younger and less extravagant in his behaviour. If he be a clown, then with reasonable luck he may hope to succeed his rival, for his high spirits are more strictly under control. When Feste is asked to read Malvolio's letter to Olivia in the last scene of the play, he earns her rebuke for his ridiculous way of doing so, and she tells Fabian to read it instead. We can imagine how Feste's professional pride would bridle at this rebuke, which coupled with the facts that it is to another clown the letter is given and that this rival has already supplanted him in Toby's affection, will do much to emphasize Feste's final bitter clash with Malvolio, as being the only person on whom he can vent his hurt feelings.

This interpretation will help, too, in making Feste's last song of the wind and the rain more poignant, for not only has he lost his place, but his successor has probably already been found.

FESTE, THE PIVOT OF THE PLAY

I would like, at this point, to return to Feste as I said I would, and point out that although this song of the wind and the rain has a special poignancy when related to Feste's position, I do not want it sung sentimentally. Feste is not a sentimentalist. If fortune has dealt cruelly with him, he does not mope and die like Jack Point in *The Yeomen of the Guard. He should attack it with a pace and bravado which make it all the more poignant, for we know that his situation belies his words. We must know, too, that this song is half-way between the realistic Feste, the licensed fool of Olivia, and the fantastic Feste, the commentator upon the play.

Shakespeare wrote Twelfth Night with music sounding round him, and Feste with his songs is the author's principal instrument for introducing music into the play. To this extent, therefore, he has a role outside the normal characterization of his part. Moreover, the clown in the Elizabethan tradition was half-way between a straight actor and a licensed comedian, a relic of the devils of the mystery plays on the one hand and a borrowing from the Italian comedies on the other. I do not wish to pursue this theme beyond explaining why I intend to use Feste in his guise of Arlechino to punctuate the action. In this sort of dual role—realistic and fantastic—he is supported by the crowd of Illyria girls and boys who represent both the inhabitants of Illyria on the realistic side and convey, as creatures of fantasy, the atmosphere of music and dance which will characterize the treatment of this production.

To these people falls the task of conveying Viola on her journeys to and from Olivia's garden and at the same time changing the scenery as they pass along their route. At the same time, like Feste, they have a realistic role to play, and as Orsino's subjects they take part in the action, more especially in the latter part of the play, where the excitement of the final discoveries will be enhanced by their presence. Now the use of a crowd of this nature in Twelfth Night will need careful and tactful handling if it is not to degenerate into the chorus of a musical comedy. Our task will be to use the music and dances to enhance the fantasy without allowing them to become extraneous to the flow and action of the play. The success of their presence will depend on our ability to keep the whole play within the realms of the 'high fantastical' without losing touch with the true characterization of these delightful creatures.

This balance of fantasy and reality is important. I have already stressed that Twelfth Night is a lyrical comedy, not a comedy of manners. It Uves in the half-way house between reality and unreality, and although I have tried to describe the characters to you from the realistic point of view, I want you to play them with a lyrical approach so as to lift them off the ground and allow the whole play to move in the sphere of poetry.

For Twelfth Night is a magic play, written by the poet at the height of his powers before the intense bitterness of his great tragic period swept over him. It is withal a completely mature play. We do not have to contend with the obscure conceits and puns of Love's Labour's Lost, nor the paste-board characterization of The Shrew. The plot is carefully balanced, the characters warm and alive, the verse and prose have the rounded character of an author who is writing in full control of his pen. The playing of it is a challenge to our imagination and to our powers of delicate and subtle distinction of comedy. It demands the full intelligence and acting experience of a company—no more than that, of a team of first class players.

Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 26): Background:

BACKGROUND:

John Gielgud's 1955 production at the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre was received with muted praise, despite the central performances of Laurence Olivier as Malvolio and Vivien Leigh as Viola. This staging also featured a witty, gay Feste, played by Paul Daneman, and a sombre Sir Toby Belch, enacted by Richard Burton. Despite a strong cast, critics charged Gielgud with failing to unify the romantic comedy of the play within his production's espousal of realistic characterization. This was particularly apparent in Olivier's Malvolio, which presented the steward as a self-made man who had carefully studied aristocratic ways and speech. Olivier lent the character a degree of seriousness and dignity that critics found wholly original. The reviewer for The Times nevertheless noted that this interpretation resulted in the miscarriage of Malvolio's comic scenes. Although Leigh's Viola was complimented for her boyish charm, several critics faulted her handling of the verse. Other performances included Keith Micheli as Orsino, Alan Webb as Sir Toby, Michael Denison as Sir Andrew Aguecheek, and Maxine Audley as Olivia.

COMMENTARY:

Eric Keown (review date 20 April 1955)

It seemed fair to expect a great deal of a Twelfth Night produced by John Gielgud and containing a Malvolio by Laurence Olivier, a Viola by Vivien Leigh. This opening production at Stratford is, of course, an improvement on anything we saw there in last year's meagre season, but considering the talents now assembled it remains strangely disappointing. Sir Laurence has chosen to give Malvolio a rather tortured lisp, as of an aspiring barrow-boy earnestly improving his English at night-school; and though the trick of speech is mastered with the utmost skill, it is difficult to see how it helps. Again, his Malvolio is subdued in the early scenes to nothing more than a reasonable disciplinarian, and is therefore not a man whose pretensions in any way justify the hatred of his fellows. He is very funny in the letter scene, and in his final interview with Olivia pathetic with a most touching dignity; but it is only intermittently the full Malvolio.

As a boy Miss Leigh is charming, as Viola herself curiously unromantic. Her performance is as clear as crystal, and as cold; it conveys with precision everything except emotion. Alan Webb's Sir Toby goes only some of the way; raffish and lovable, certainly, but on a minor scale that stops short of robustness. Michael Denison's Aguecheek is more complete, an amusing study of a jittery ninny that would seem better in a production where the interior scenes were lit well enough to get the effect of the actors' faces, and not so darkly as they are here. Neither Angela Baddeley's Maria nor Keith Michell's Orsino have the force one would have anticipated, the latter losing in an unnecessarily affected manner.

On the other side, a really beautiful Olivia from Maxine Audley, full of grace and feeling, and an honest Feste from Edward Atienza, who sings the songs memorably. And visually there is much to delight in Malcolm Pride's dresses and in his delicately architectural sets, where all kinds of gentle felicities can be discovered, such as the glow of light on the slanting roofs of shadowed buildings. This is exceptional work, refreshingly unobtrusive, and marred only by the lowering of the shipwreck gauze in front of a lovely curtain of the Illyrian seaport—a perplexing montage presumably intended, since it happened twice. Leslie Bridgewater's music adds to the pleasures of an evening which, judged on the level of such a cast, also misses a sad list of opportunities.

Peter Fleming (review date 22 April 1955)

There is a certain lack of heart about this elegant and well-paced production. The play (as Johnson very mildly put it) 'exhibits no just picture of life,' and we cannot expect to have our withers wrung by the pangs of the lovers or the humiliations which Malvolio brings upon himself. Yet we ought, at times, to be touched by them, however lightly or quizzically; and here we are not.

Miss Vivien Leigh's Viola is trim, pretty, poised and resourceful; but to the qualities which distinguish an air-hostess something must be added—warmth, uncertainty, a capacity for being embarrassed—if she is to lead this improbable dance through Illyria in the way it should be led, and Miss Leigh's performance, though talented and charming, has too strong a bias towards what politicians call non-involvement. Miss Maxine Audley's unashamedly romantic Olivia and Mr. Keith Michell's handsome Orsino are more partisan and more satisfactory.

Sir Laurence Olivier presents a brilliant and deeply considered study of Malvolio; yet here again some inner quality of reserve or detachment intervenes, like Cellophane, between actor and audience, so that we do not quite relish to the full either the folly or the pathos of the steward. It is a performance of extraordinary virtuosity, yet it leaves us feeling vaguely unsatisfied. Of the trio who gull Malvolio, Mr. Michael Denison's Aguecheek is easily the funniest and the best. Sir John Gielgud's production hardly makes the most of the class-distinctions with which Olivia's household is riddled. Maria, in dress and speech, is almost as great a lady as her mistress, and Mr. Alan Webb is allowed to make Sir Toby Belch a sort of bedizened and befuddled tramp. This is often, and I always think wrongly, done. The point about Sir Toby is that his position is precarious; the discreet, the instantly regretted hiccup is better comedy than the thunderous and unregarded belch, and it is more interesting to see how long a tipsy man can stand up than how often he can fall down.

Mr. Edward Atienza's Feste (for the cut of whose motley some acknowledgement ought, I feel, to have been made to Dr. Leslie Hotson) is serviceable and pleasant, and Mr. William Devlin's impulsive sea-captain seems to belong to a warmer-blooded world than this Illyria. Mr. Malcolm Pride's scenery has very great beauty and distinction, and altogether the Stratford season can be said to have opened with considerable grace and lustre.

The Times (review date 22 April 1955)

Sir Laurence Olivier's interpretative resource is such that there was no guessing beforehand how he would choose to treat Malvolio; and the choice actually made—whether or not given theatrical validity—certainly took the Stratford first-night audience by surprise. It did not fall on the Puritan, whose portentous gravity is in itself a standing provocation to the fool-baiting Illyrians, a stiff spruce figure of preposterous pretensions. Nor on the insolent jackin-office, over-ambitious and overweening, properly put to his purgation. And not on the fantastic complex creature, twitching with distempered self-esteem and tortured by ambition, who gradually steals our sympathies from the over-zealous tricksters. The actor turned from these familiar personages to present a plain unlikeable man.

Sir Laurence's Malvolio is a shaven and cropped Round-head among laughing Cavaliers whose breeding he envies and whose frivolous manners he despises. He is an efficient steward who in the discharge of his duties may show ill-nature towards his fellow servants, but he is never preposterous. Those about him may dislike his starchiness; there is no particular reason why they (or we) should laugh at him. He hardly seems a natural butt. Even his manner of interrupting the midnight revels is more that of a man reasonably annoyed at being wakened from sleep than of an officers' steward. It requires the introduction of a red hot poker—manipulated with much realistic delicacy—to make the interrupter stir his comic stumps. While Malvolio's day-dreams swell towards realization the actor suggests the depths of social misgiving from which they rise at the artful Maria's enticement. He winds up the scene with an inimitable piece of by-play in which the grave steward after several wry attempts to smile into a mirror achieves a satisfied asinine grin. We have leave to laugh at him once more as "the yellow-legged stork," but it is not laughter but pathos that Sir Laurence is primarily concerned to produce—the pathos of a plain unlikeable man misplaced in a land of misrule and cruelly abused. Unfortunately the prison scene, with Malvolio lifting a stubbornly sensible head, crowned with a single straw, above floor level, miscarries. We have missed much of the laughter that springs from more conventional readings; we should miss the pathos also were Sir Laurence not able to cry "I'll be avenged on the whole pack of you" in a way that hushes the whole theatre. This cry, so exquisitely studied and so poignantly accusing, is one of the things—alas, not many—that we shall remember of a performance in which a well considered intention somehow fails of its full theatrical effect.

The scenery and the costumes of Mr. Malcolm Pride are always lovely to look at, and so is the Viola of Miss Vivien Leigh. She is like some happy hunting boy on her ways between Orsino and Olivia, but in speaking her contemptuous or tender rebukes of the lovers' poses she gets little variety into the verse. She is in her romantic way a little too "knowing" to convey the natural and transparent honesty which is designed for those who are the dupes of their own sentimentalism. Sir John Gielgud's production has to keep a difficult balance between his realistic Malvolio and the play's comic and romantic elements. He is inclined to hurry the roystering Illyrians. This is a pity since Mr. Alan Webb and Mr. Michael Denison are both wonderfully well suited as the two knights. Miss Angela Baddeley puts a somewhat shrewish edge on Maria's tongue. Delicate, imaginative grouping adds to the loveliness of the setting and costumes, and the romantics are well served by Miss Maxine Audley's gracious and elegant Olivia and by Mr. Keith Micheli as an Orsino who fairly revels in the pomp and circumstance of courtship. It must be said, however, that the loveliness of colour and the lightness of movement cannot altogether conceal the absence of feeling and humour that are of the essence of Twelfth Night.

J. C. Trewin (review date 23 April 1955)

Malvolio, Olivia's steward in that Illyrian world of May, has been many people on many stages: I have seen him as a sombre precisian, an icy Cardinal in reduced circumstances, a blend of bullfrog and fretful porpentine. None would have recognised any other. Indeed, we could have a whole cast of rival Malvolios; and fun it might be.

What, in a speech, is the true man? Maria has set him down for us:

The devil a Puritan that he is, or any thing constantly, but a time-pleaser, an affectioned ass that cons state without book, and utters it by great swarths; the best persuaded of himself, so cram'd, as he thinks, with excellencies, that it is his ground of faith that all that look on him love him [II. iii. 147-52].

And Olivia said of her steward: "O, you are sick of self-love, Malvolio, and taste with a distempered appetite."

I have been thinking of Malvolio in this early morning calm after the Twelfth Night that has opened the Festival season at Stratford-upon-Avon. With Sir John Gielgud to produce, and Sir Laurence and Lady Olivier (Vivien Leigh) as Malvolio and Viola, this has been the most eagerly-awaited première of the year. Now it is over I have been defending Sir Laurence's Malvolio—not that it needs any defence—against some of my colleagues, who have not found in him the Illyrian steward of their imaginations.

Let me say at once that it is a performance I shall remember for its fresh approach and its unselfishness. Malvolio, as Olivier acts him is not just a part for a comedian barnacled with antique "business." The man takes his proper place in the Illyrian household; he does not wantonly split the pattern of the play. Here, indeed, he is everything that Maria says he is: certainly an "affectioned ass" and a fellow that one (most properly) detests from his first appearance. He may be a competent steward, and no doubt anatomical dissection would show that his heart is in the right place. But, superficially, he is sour and thin-lipped; his eyes are contemptuous; he has a toxic glance for Feste, and he tastes with a distempered appetite. We realise at once why the household hates him; why Maria finds it easy to frame the plot. (If we consider it too deeply, the May-night plot for the May morning does lead to a scene, the imprisonment, that is as endearing as a bull-fight. Still, that was the Elizabethan sense of humour, and Twelfth Night has glory enough elsewhere for us to forget that sudden cruelty.)

The Stratford Malvolio has clearly worked his way up: an ambitious man whose ambitions still leap. Olivier suggests Malvolio's origin by his intonations, by the affected lisping veneer that flakes away suddenly to reveal the barrow-boy vowels. (I do not follow an argument that Sir Laurence should not have adopted this intricately-managed accent simply because it is intricate. Doubtless he would be criticised just as strongly if he did nothing. Do let us beware of fault-finding for its own sake.)

The supercilious fellow, day-dreaming about the respect to be shown by "my kinsmahn Tobay," turns naturally in the Letter scene to the turkey-cock blown by his imagination; the actor points subtly and richly the "affectioned ass" in his practice with the hand-mirror. From the first, Olivier has established the part firmly. He is theatrical without being blatantly so. Malvolio's character is as consistent as Shakespeare allows it to be: the vain, consequential prig, ashamed of his station, who can be transformed at a hint to the capering fool before the Countess ("Alas, poor fool! how have they baffled thee!"), and who moves to a figure oddly tragic when he is in the dark room and bound. Laurence Olivier has one great moment—and I observe the epithet—when, at the last, he comes from below in pitifully tattered dignity and blinking from the darkness. Cut to the heart, he asks for no more than revenge; it will be work indeed to entreat him to a peace.

I have seen Malvolios by the score. Some have been more immediately comic. None has been developed more logically and with less apparent effort. To those who say that Olivier toils for his humours, I can merely reply that there are as many variations in the "sense of humour" as there are in readings of Malvolio. Perversely, I refuse to believe that Olivier fails because he has not offered the part to us in poster-colours. He is, very simply, Malvolio: he takes us back to the man's past and makes us speculate about his future. (I have known younger images of Malvolio with the same contemptuous eyes, the same thin sneer, arrogant self-love.)

There is little more space. Sir John Gielgud, with settings by Malcolm Pride, has produced, lightly and elegantly, a romantic-wistful Illyria. The last moments, with the windows of the great house lit beneath the moon, are blessedly serene. Vivien Leigh's Viola has a still gravity; Maxine Audley hints at the shallowness of Olivia; Alan Webb—in a part that Sir Laurence once acted superbly—is an amiably ruffling Toby who never forgets that he is "consanguineous": he is also a good hand at mulling sack. The Andrew (Michael Denison) needs only a horse, a beehive and a useful little box to be another kind of knight. I did not much care for Keith Michell's Orsino, altogether too ardent a swooner even for the lovesick Duke, and the Feste (Edward Atienza) does not hold the mind. But I shall remember Malvolio and the May morning foolery; the "affectioned ass" wavering over the pronunciation of "slough"; Olivier's unfaltering technique, and the closing moment when I had the rare shiver one feels when a major personality is on the stage. It would be long before this Malvolio returned to his lady's house.

T. C. Worsley (review date 23 April 1955)

The new Stratford season which opened last week gives every promise of being extremely interesting. In contrast to last year the Directors have gathered a powerful cast to support the leading players, Sir Laurence Olivier and Miss Vivien Leigh: it is to include Angela Baddeley, Joyce Redman, Maxine Audley, Anthony Quayle, Alan Webb and Michael Denison. The two tragedies are to be the rarely staged Titus Andronicus as the last play and, as the third, Macbeth, in which there is good grounds for hoping that Sir Laurence will conquer a part which defeats so many good actors. The season has begun with a beautifully mounted Twelfth Night, elegantly and poetically produced by Sir John Gielgud. If, on the first night, there was some disappointment over this, the reason is to be found, I think, in expectations having been pitched a little out of key. Inevitably such a resounding first night creates a demand for the extra fizz of the great occasion. But Twelfth Night is not the right play to give that sort of satisfaction, and especially when, as here, the production is designed to stress and preserve a unified mood. In such a case there is no room for extravagances and fireworks, and individual performances must be toned down so that no excrescences are visible on the perfect polish of the surface.

I suppose the most obvious manifestation of this was in Mr. Alan Webb's Sir Toby Belch. Sir Toby, with a heavy actor playing the part, is often a dominating rollick, first cousin to Falstaff, and painted in the primary colours of knock-about. Mr. Alan Webb lost none of the points in scaling him down, and the play as a whole gained in cohesion. He and Miss Angela Baddeley and Mr. Michael Denison make a trio merry rather than noisy, credible servants of the grave Madonna in their off-hours. Perhaps in aiming at this they erred a little on the side of quietness; in the kitchen scene especially where they were placed very far back on the stage they lapsed into inaudibility—but they will soon get the feeling of the house and the expertness of all their timing and fooling will tell. The scaling down here meant a consequent muting of Malvolio, too. Sir Laurence Olivier is a superb comedian capable of those touches that take the breath away in admiration; and these touches were on show on all the edges of the part, lighting up some quite unemphatic phrase like "Madam, I will" with all the chiaroscuro of character—pomposity, self-importance, servility. We may have seen Malvolios who seem to make more of the part, but could anyone else make so much of it so unobtrusively, as loyalty to the general conception demanded?

For in this production the romantic element is to be kept dead centre, centre, and Mr. Malcolm Pride's decor, simple but sensuous, set the tone beautifully. (I personally rejoice to see Sir John breaking the fetish of the permanent set which has been responsible in its time for a full share of absurdities.) The rival houses are kept at just the right romantic pitch by Miss Maxine Audley's accomplished Olivia and Mr. Keith Michell's excellently spoken Orsino (though he alone in the cast was inclined, I though to "press" as they say of golfers). Miss Vivien Leigh achieved so exactly the stance and "set" of the page boy that she can afford to relax it a little as she plays herself in—an assured and valuable performance. Finally Mr. Edward Atienza, the excellent clown, pleasantly voiced, bridges the comedy and romance without any of the arty affectations which have lately overtaken our Festes. Altogether this was a most distinguished production with which to open.

Ronald Barker (review date June 1955)

Even Nature combined with the Memorial Theatre to make this production of Twelfth Night an auspicious occasion and held back her blossom and fragrance until it had settled down. I saw the play in the third week of the season and found it one of the most interesting productions of the play I have seen.

John Gielgud, the director, has seen the play not as an Elizabethan romp but as a quiet romantic piece. The tone is set by the exquisite opening lines of Orsino and held until Feste has let the last notes of his song die away.

There is a sad dying fall about the production, sustained on almost a single note, which makes it an almost touching experience because we believe in everything that happens. The fight for love is a life and death struggle, with the clowns remaining human beings and not set pawns of pernicious fun.
When most of us have been prepared to accept this play as a rather dull Renaissance oil painting done in glowing tones with broad strokes, it has been cleaned and all the old paint is peeled away, leaving a tender water colour with each line carefully moulded to sustain the atmosphere. But this painting would have been more welcome at the court of Victoria than that of the first Elizabeth.

Gielgud, for his inspiration, has gone to Granville-Barker's preface and the recent study of the play by Leslie Hotson, who has with infinite pains and scholarship given an indication of the type of person who inspired the parts.

The one which most differs from pre-conceived notions is that of Malvolio. He is not seen as a pompous bore but as a tight-lipped effeminate Shylock with an inferiority complex. The Merchant of Venice presented in this light would be a revaluation.

The clowns have the riotous merriment knocked out of them. They are all basically well-bred people and we chuckle with them, rather more than at them.

As to the poetry, Gielgud has managed to retain most of the lovely music and given his actors time to let the words have their full significance.

The director, then, having determined the style of production and interpretation must accept responsibility for his actors. They have responded superbly. This is the most interesting production of Twelfth Night to be seen since Michel Saint Denis did it at the Phoenix before the war.

Laurence Olivier as Malvolio may not be the general conception of the character, but the part is played with such panache and style that it is bound to influence all future interpretations of the part. His timing and technical control could not be equalled by any other actor in England.

Vivien Leigh gives a technically irreproachable performance. With her studied grace she looks incredibly beautiful, but is without heart or humour.

Michael Denison makes Sir Andrew into a queer delicate type. He has a lot of funny business which suits the interpretation perfectly. It is the best performance I have seen from this actor.

Angela Baddeley's Maria and Alan Webb's Sir Toby have lost all of their vulgarity and earthiness, but remain always in the picture. Orsino is beautifully played by Keith Micheli, and Maxine Audley's Olivia is warm, human and always feminine. Feste is played as a dull-witted clown.

But having accepted the romantic dominance, surely it was a mistake not to make more of the last song. Each verse should get slower and more profound until the sad end is reached.

This is a production that London should have the opportunity of seeing. It is a credit to our theatre.

Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 26): Background:

BACKGROUND:

Guthrie's 1957 production at the Stratford Festival, Ontario succeeded in integrating the romantic and comic plots of the drama. Critics such as Henry Hewes felt this had been achieved by a careful fleshing out of the comic roles. In praising Christopher Plummer's portrayal of Sir Andrew Aguecheek, for example, Hewes commented that "making Shakespeare's clowns into real people instead of mere affectations has the advantage of keeping the audience ready to laugh as they see each new situation approaching." Guthrie further innovated in his handling of Feste, played by Bruno Gerussi, who became, according to Arnold Edinborough, "a sad, ageing fool full of the pathos of his position where he is retained not for his wit but for his length of service." A similar sensitivity to the romantic roles characterized the production. Edinborough maintained that "as the bright-eyed and shrewdly naive Viola, Siobhan McKenna was entrancing and her swaggering self-importance was beautifully undermined by the sensitive playing of Frances Hyland as Olivia." Commentators further praised the performances of Lloyd Bochner as Orsino, Douglas Campbell as Sir Toby, and Douglas Rain as Malvolio.

COMMENTARY:

Brooks Atkinson (review date 4 July 1957)

Give Tyrone Guthrie a trap door and he is as happy as two larks. In Twelfth Night, which opened in the new Festival Theatre last evening, he has a heavy, thumping trap door in the center of the platform stage and four of his actors put on a harlequinade around, in and out of it—into it feet first at a headlong speed that is always good for a roar from the audience.

Don't expect much from the romantic scenes. Although they are affably played by Siobhan McKenna as Viola and Frances Hyland as Olivia, Mr. Guthrie is not much interested in them when he has a buffoon like Douglas Campbell on the staff. Inevitably, Mr. Campbell is Sir Toby Belch, top banana of the revels; and inevitably Mr. Campbell is very funny. No one can immerse himself more cheerfully in drunken festivity—a little weary from long dissipation and no sleep but always ready for one more tankard of ale and one more prank.

He is in good company. Christopher Plummer's gangling, chuckleheaded Sir Andrew Aguecheek, whose eyes are as befuddled as his brain; Amelia Hall's tiny, insinuating, mischief-making Maria; Bruno Gerussi's convivial Feste with good singing voice and more enterprise than is usual to the part—all these reel ing characters conspire with Sir Toby in keeping the humors low, slapdash and entertaining.

Mr. Guthrie does go on endlessly. This is a Twelfth Night that runs to three hours and a quarter, if the two intermissions are included. Having made his points two or three times, Mr. Guthrie makes them two or three times more with the same boyish enthusiasm. When the comic mood is on him, Mr. Guthrie can never bear to stop. This time he has conspired in long pantomime when Feste is taunting Malvolio in the dungeon. It is fairly unintelligible all the way through; it is also longer than Mr. Guthrie, who is the tallest stage director in the Western Hemisphere.

In the circumstances, the poetic interludes in Twelfth Night get short shrift. It is a pity. In the first place, they complete the symphonic or operatic design of this artificial comedy. In the second place, the actors are capable of making them charming. Miss McKenna is a pleasant Viola. There is something of the stolid St. Joan peasant in Miss McKenna's Illyrian maiden, which doubtless the author did not foresee, for he was a great toadier of ladies and gentlemen. But Miss McKenna's Viola has an expansive good humor that is good for the play. And Miss Hyland's Olivia—frail but willful, all grace and womanliness—gives the romantic scenes a core of meaning.

Douglas Rain's Malvolio is the finest piece of acting in the performance. The character is drawn at full length with admirable economy of means—rigid, neat, superior, lonely, this Malvolio, like Shylock, has a keen mind in a company of idlers and triflers. At a time when a theatregoer is just convincing himself that faulty theatre acoustics are responsible for the unintelligibility of parts of the performance, here comes Mr. Rain with perfect speaking. Every word is clear, precise, fully-formed and articulated.

Not being as heartless as the Elizabethans, Mr. Guthrie gives Malvolio a few moments of sobering dignity in the last scene. Both Malvolio and Mr. Rain deserve them. But Mr. Guthrie is chiefly interested in the comedy; he has lost his heart to the rolls and clowns, which results in a Twelfth Night that is funny but also formless, over-extended and tone-deaf.

Tanya Moiseiwitsch has designed costumes that seem to be in the Charles II period when men wore spiked beards and lace shoulder ruffs. It is an interesting period and Miss Moiseiwitsch's costumes are lively. An independent-minded director, Mr. Guthrie is a great hand for shifting centuries. If memory serves, he has only the eighteenth left.

Henry Hewes (review date 20 July 1957)

The fifth summer of the Shakespeare Festival Theatre of Canada is notable, not only because the most unique and exciting theatre in North America has moved from a temporary tent to a beautiful permanent building, but also because it presents two stars many consider the finest classic performers of the younger generation. One, twenty-eight-year-old Christopher Plummer, is instantly recognizable as a potential Sir Laurence Olivier. He is even recognizable as such in this, his first Hamlet, which, though deficient in some important respects, courageously explores the softer side of the role and its opportunities for humor.

The second star, whose Saint Joan has already earned her stage immortality, is Siobhan McKenna. As Viola in Tyrone Guthrie's production of Twelfth Night, Miss McKenna successfully applies some of the qualities that made her Joan so great. With economical grace and shining eye she creates Illyria out of bare boards as divinely as if she had had a vision of Heaven. When she disguises herself as a man or as half a man, there is the familiar boyish pleasure at being free of the necessity to act feminine. When she falls in love with Orsino it is as complete as a religious conversion, and when she prays that her brother may still be alive God would answer if Shakespeare didn't. Finally, when near the end of the play she volunteers to be tortured and killed by Orsino if it will bring him comfort she walks through him into the hearts of the audience.

Dr. Guthrie has astutely used the Irish actress's unrivaled capacity for sudden surges of spirit to transfuse high emotional voltage into a rather arbitrary love-masque. He has bid her use a higher than natural voice, which helps us to differentiate between this role and Joan. Vocally, Miss McKenna is at her best in the short speeches which she fills with intense emotion and sadness. Her "Was not this love indeed?" is unforgettably moving. Somewhat less effective is her delivery of the famous "willow-cabin speech, for by trying to fill each line with personal truth her own highly-individual rhythms and emphases sometimes clash with Shakespeare's measured lyrical flow.
With the security of Miss McKenna’s power, Dr. Guthrie feels free to play his clowns as less silly than is the lamentable tradition. Sir Toby, Maria, and Sir Andrew are well-defined characters. In the latter role Mr. Plummer is again reminiscent of Olivier, as he balances comic tricks with a characterization we can believe in. Really funny is the moment when Sir Andrew says of fooling "But I do it more natural," and involuntarily demonstrates by suddenly plummeting out of sight through an open trap-door. Making Shakespeare’s clowns into real people instead of mere affectations has the advantage of keeping the audience ready to laugh as they see each new situation approaching. However, Dr. Guthrie does not completely abandon his predilection for the superimposed piece of farcical business. In this Twelfth Night his niftiest invention is a double stairway one-and-a-half take. By having Viola coming down one side while her twin brother is whisking up the other, and allowing Malvolio to see both just a fraction of a second too far apart to realize that he has seen not one but two, he creates a quick stunning laugh and adds a feeling of speed to the proceedings.

Another fine innovation is Dr. Guthrie's decision not to play Feste as an effete, prancing jester. Bruno Gerussi's wise fool is earthy and never lets us forget that he has a daily problem of earning food and shelter in a world that can be very cruel. Since the puritanical Malvolio threatens his livelihood, Feste is partially justified in his cruelty to him, just as Shylock was in his hatred of Antonio. Douglas Rain plays the pompous steward very straight, which though it detracts somewhat from the hilarity improves the balance of the play. When at the evening's end the cast joins with Feste in the singing of "the rain it raineth every day" (with new music by John Cook that makes it resemble a rhythmic Yiddish lament) we feel we are experiencing life instead of the traditional cultural exercise that Shakespeare's plays so often become.

Arnold Edinborough (review date Autumn 1957)

After four very successful years in a tent, the Shakespeare Festival at Stratford, Ontario, is now housed in an exciting new theatre. From the outside, with its circular scalloped roof fluting into deep folds like some great nun's coif and topped by a jaunty coronet flying two flags, it still retains the carnival atmosphere which the tent had. Inside, the stage designed by Tanya Moiseiwitsch and Tyrone Guthrie remains relatively unchanged.

There is a large main stage jutting thirty-four feet into the audience and a triangular balcony at the back with steps leading up to it on each side. There are four large steps round the main stage and two platforms halfway up the stairs. There are thus seven levels of playing in the open and a large trapdoor which gives access to an invisible but very effective eighth.

The auditorium has been enlarged by the addition of an 858-seat balcony, but the arc of the pit has been slightly lessened so that no spectator has his sightline interrupted by the pillars of the balcony. Surprisingly enough, though the theatre now seats over two thousand people, no one in the audience is more than 70 feet from the stage.

The aisles through the audience are used for entrances and exits, three aisles running down to the stage and two running down from the stage under the audience. This makes a total of nine major entrances to playing areas on seven different levels.

In a word, then, this is an Elizabethan theatre. It does not slavishly follow Hodges or Cranford Adams or any other of the scholars who have taught us so much about the Globe and its fellows, but it does reconstruct a stage which has the essential facilities for the production, in its own idiom, of a drama which demands close identification of the actor with the audience, a variety of levels for the playing of eavesdropping and discovery scenes, ease of entrance from all sides to cope with the rapid swirl of battle or the more stately pomp of royalty in progress, and a sufficient cellarage for ghosts, prisoners, and other infernal beings.
Walter Kerr, summing up the theatre in his review in the New York Herald Tribune on July 7th, said: "The authorities responsible for the Canadian Festival have created something more than a dazzlingly handsome and superbly functional playhouse. They have given us the only really new stage and the only really new actor-audience experience of the last hundred years on this continent."

Those same authorities were aware that they must this season offer a program worthy of their new playhouse. So far, they had staged the less popular comedies, All's Well and Measure for Measure; they had given us a pantomime production of The Taming of the Shrew; there had been two histories, Richard III and Henry V. The nearest Stratford had been so far to a major play was a superb production of The Merchant of Venice in 1955 with the late Frederick Valk as Shylock.

The choice this year could not have been more "major". No Shakespearian theatre could aim higher than to baptise itself with Hamlet and bless its future with Twelfth Night. And both productions in their respective fashions were notable: the comedy for its overall direction by Tyrone Guthrie, the tragedy for its concentration on the story relieved by some sparkling individual performances.

... Twelfth Night is a blend of poetry and prose with the prosiest of all Shakespeare's fools linking the two groups of characters. More than in any other of the great comedies, it is possible to divorce the comic scenes from the romantic ones completely, making a self-sufficient sub-plot out of the gulling of Malvolio and the antics of the roisterers who arrange it. Such a director's trick, all too commonly done, forces Sir Toby and Sir Andrew to become lowlife clowns despite their titles, makes Maria's part cheap and Feste's unplayable. Another result is that the romantics are left to survive on the poetry alone—a diet on which the modern appetite can soon surfeit and its interest so die.

Tyrone Guthrie, who has done strange and wild violence to the text at Stratford on occasion, chose to integrate the play in a manner which is rare and delightful. Feste became a sad, ageing fool full of the pathos of his position where he is retained not for his wit but for his length of service. His melancholy, honestly come by, thus makes Malvolio's even more priggish, rendering his gulling and final turning-off not only poignant, which it always is, but even credible, which it seldom is.

On the opposite side of the court we have Viola retained with no recommendation other than her wit and youth, qualities which get her, without asking, the same licence as Feste has to plead for in the first scene with his mistress.

Thus Viola and Feste link together, and through that link the Duke and Olivia are seen to be alike in humanity if not in affection. This humanity goes on to embrace the comics who, though foolish, are yet nobly born. In their own way Sir Andrew and Sir Toby are no more nor less self-indulgent than Olivia in her rejection of love and the Duke in his advancing of it.

With this solid pattern behind the production, Twelfth Night was one of the best comic performances that many people will ever see. As the bright-eyed and shrewdly naive Viola, Siobhan McKenna was entrancing and her swaggering self-importance was beautifully undermined by the sensitive playing of Frances Hyland as Olivia. Lloyd Bochner made even the opening lines sound fresh and there was a clarity of diction and a poetic timbre in these three voices which was a joy to hear.

The sheer inventive fun of Douglas Campbell as Sir Toby and Christopher Plummer as Sir Andrew was inspired. Sir Toby was a rich portrait somewhat in the Rubens tradition with, from time to time, a Franz Hals fastidiousness which reminded us of his kinship with Olivia and of his knighthood. Sir Andrew was a ninny nonpareil. His falling into the trapdoor at the end of the cakes and ale scene and his massively ineffectual interruptions as Malvolio read the limed letter, on more than one occasion lifted the circular roof, even on the opening night when one assumes that dignity is more often indulged in than delight.
Bruno Gerussi, linking them all as Feste, was sad but industrious. True, his industry consisted mainly of tying invisible pieces of string from one stage pillar to the next, but this symbolic web was spun all round the play and the separate scenes glowed like dewdrops on it.

Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 26): Background:

BACKGROUND:

Hall's revival of Twelfth Night at the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre sought to give equal weight to the comic lightness and melancholic heaviness in the drama through a combination of visual effects and innovative characterization. Lila de Nobili's set designs were described by Robert Speaight as "a rich symphony in russet," and the court of Illyria was reminiscent of Charles IPs, with costumes patterned after the portraits of Van Dyck and Rubens. Most noteworthy among the principal roles was Geraldine McEwan's Olivia, which portrayed the Countess as a sharply satirical figure incapable of seriousness. Dorothy Tutin's Viola received unanimous approval; Peter Jackson commented that her portrayal was "wonderfully boyish, breathless, and bewildered and always completely audible." Other performances included Richard Johnson as Sir Andrew Aguecheek, Cyril Luckham as Feste, Michael Meacham as Orsino, Miranda Connell as Maria, and Douglas Rain as Malvolio. While this staging pleased audiences, critics such as Roy Walker voiced certain objections: "This was a Twelfth Night that did not altogether succeed, but a production that continually threw fresh light on a comedy about which most of us have long ceased to think freshly." The production was revived by the Royal Shakespeare Company in 1960 with several major cast changes.

COMMENTARY:

John Wain (review date 27 April 1958)

In the world of the cinema, the pundits are fond of telling us, a technical advance has usually been accompanied by a backslide in imagination and intelligence. I hope it won't turn out to be true of the theatre as well.

Last Tuesday's Twelfth Night (Stratford on Avon: director, Peter Hall) was a perfect example of how a Shakespeare play can be ripped apart by the twin steel claws of naturalism and gimmickry. The basic assumption of the modern Shakespearean theatre ("We've got to put on this dull stuff, which most people—ourselves included—find only half-intelligible; so let's see how we can import some fun into it") was evident from the first moment.

It isn't the actors' fault; that should be said at once. They all played quite brilliantly, and the packed audience seemed as delighted by their virtuosity as by the sumptuous staging and handsome scene-painting. Mr. Richard Johnson's Aguecheek was one of the cleverest studies I have ever seen; he turned the character into a paranoid manic-depressive, strongly reminiscent at times of Lucky in Waiting for Godot. His interpretation was a splendidly original play-within-the-play, besides making the perfect foil to Mr. Patrick Wymark's Sir Toby—a more robustly conventional interpretation, this, meaty and zestful.

Even those performances which most set one's teeth on edge were, as acting, very intelligent; in any other setting—as a series of revue turns, for instance—they would have been most enjoyable. Miss Geraldine McEwan's Olivia, played as a kittenish typist on holiday from a City office, was a charming study; it isn't her fault that Shakespeare made Olivia a countess, full of authority and aristocratic hauteur. Mr. Hall presumably told her to be coy and simpering, and coy and simpering she was. Just what his motives were in getting her to use her professional skill against the play, rather than for it, must remain his own secret; she did her job.

As for naturalism, it ran riot throughout. Even Miss Dorothy Tutin, whose instinctive grace and intelligence protected her, for the most part, against the over-literalness of the production, was side-tracked into playing the first of the scenes in which Viola acts as emissary to Olivia as if it had been written by Tennessee Williams. It was fascinating; but the scene would have made its own impact if it had been spoken quite simply—and that impact would have been Shakespeare's. And if the all-pervading naturalism handicapped even Miss Tutin, what it did to the scenes in which she did not take part is simply indescribable. Malvolio in his dungeon was allowed to give us ten minutes of pure tragedy, complete with hysterical laughter, anguished groaning and broken appeals for pity.

Feste, singing his final song, had to break down and sob in case anyone had missed the point that his character was meant to be rather sombre. When Sir Andrew offered to give Cesario his horse. I half expected to see a real one trot on to the stage.

It remains only to say that the audience showed every sign of being pleased; the applause was thunderous, the curtain-calls infinite; this production, clearly, will be a money-spinner. But does Stratford need to compete on this level? The next morning, the sky was pale blue, the sun warmed every stone, the town seemed one enchanting garden, the swans floated on the river, the beer flowed in the pubs—and it was Shakespeare's birthday. Wouldn't people (I mused) still come here even if they had to watch the plays put on quite straight?

Alan Brien (review date 2 May 1958)

I sometimes wonder what would happen if our bright young directors took the same impertinent liberties with the work of other dramatists which they now invariably take with Shakespeare. Early Noël Coward could be played as Restoration comedy. Ibsen could be played as Aldwych farce on a permanent set with nine doors. Accept the principle that the less the audience understand of the dialogue the more they will enjoy the horseplay, and any play can be treated as an abandoned old clothes shop only fit to be burgled by the next band of strolling players.

There is no doubt that much of our drama would be vastly improved by being set aside as a training area for the young commandos of the theatre. But what are they training for? To alter the period of the action, to rejig the entrances and exits of the characters, to distribute among the cast an ingenious assortment of grotesque mannerisms, is really a kind of forgery. If a producer is so confident in his ability as a renovator, he should have the courage to start with the text and rewrite the whole play as Dryden did with Antony and Cleopatra.

At Stratford, Mr. Peter Hall has set out to revarnish and retouch the surface of an old peeling canvas known as Twelfth Night. He has pushed it forward into the Caroline age—but it is the Caroline age seen through the eyes of a Victorian anecdotal painter so that among all the pageboy bobs, coaching-inn furniture and greetings-card flower gardens the unspoken question always seems to be 'When Did You Last See Your Father?' Olivia and Orsino should be a parody pair of aristocratic Arcadian lovers out of Sir Philip Sidney who drop their masks and fumble their lines when their conventional charade gets mixed up with real passion. Both their gentility and their genteelity are clearly signposted in the lines they are given. But under Mr. Hall's guidance Geraldine McEwan plays Olivia like some pert, perky middle-class flapper out of The Boy Friend. Michael Meachum's Orsino is nearer the target—but he is still a romantic Edwardian schoolboy Duke who has not yet quite made the transference from girlish boys to boyish girls.

The subplot of Malvolio, Aguecheek, Sir Toby and Maria was intended as a bass counterpoint theme to the tremulo treble passions of Orsino and Olivia. It is Shakespeare's method of giving depth of focus and an extra dimension to the nonrealistic, almost operatic, lay figures of a dramatic poem. Here again Mr. Hall has obtained brilliant performances from his cast and each individual character is theatrically a striking creation. Mark Dignam's vowel-gargling, proud-nosed Malvolio is a degraded pro-consul exiled among the white trash, Lord Curzon gullied by the beachcombers. Richard Johnson's stricken mental defective, with his heron legs akimbo and sheep face aghast, gives Aguecheek an insane pathos which the part can hardly bear. Such ingenious interpretations can hardly exist side by side. Once more Mr. Hall's determination to avoid dullness succeeds in atomising Shakespeare's play.

Mr. Hall is wrong and I am right. And yet how I enjoyed every moment of his wrongness. Scene after scene explodes like a Roman candle—the patterns are arbitrary, unconnected, perverse and dazzling. And throughout it all, defying Shakespeare with every gesture, struts the funny, touching, huggable, nervous Viola, triumphantly incarnated in Dorothy Tutin.

Peter Jackson (review date June 1958)

What a rib-tickling, refreshing Twelfth Night Peter Hall has conjured up for the second production of the Stratford season; a production that is smooth and gay and brimming with new ways to play old tricks.

Dorothy Tutin's golden Viola is wonderfully boyish, breathless and bewildered and always completely audible. She is alive, and to be alive in a cast like this means working double overtime.

To force Olivia to play for laughs while surrounded on all sides by comedians with far better lines does not give the actress a fighting chance, but Geraldine McEwan, with her piping voice and plaintive little gestures, draws such sympathy from the audience that the approach is almost justified.

Richard Johnson plunges from the high tragedy of Romeo to the foppish, foolish Andrew Aguecheek and scores brilliantly, creating—by movement and facial expression as much as by words—such a sad schoolboy of a knight that we have to weep with him.

Everyone in this cast is full of youth and vigour, even Patrick Wymark's Toby Belch; not a scruffy old dotard with one foot in the ale barrel but a pot-bellied musketeer with a clear mind and a good sword wrist. Miranda Connell's Maria is a delicious impression of fresh-faced laughter and sparkles at the expense of the stove-hatted, white-ruffled pompous prig of Mark Dignam's Malvolio.

The Feste of Cyril Luckham has grown old and grey in service and puts away ducats for his retirement but he is so deep in song and prose that I thought he must know every secret of life. As Orsino, Michael Meacham is suitably handsome, gallant and melancholy.

Lila de Nobili is an Italian and Italy is reflected in her mellow settings by rich blends of browns and golds, like old Renaissance tapestries.
On the first night of this revival the happy couples danced away into nothingness behind the gauze while Feste closed the chapter and then came such a well-won storm of applause that the illuminations by the river must have shaken in their sockets.

Roy Walker (review date 1959)

[Twelfth Night] has not a 'personal' title, and it hardly seems to have a central character, prominent or retired, unless we follow, as most star actors and modern productions do, the theatrical logic of opportunity that led to the comedy's being called, as early as 1623, 'Malvolio'. It has, of course, the two elements usual in a Shakespeare comedy, a romantic plot and a comic plot, usually played for contrast and counterpoint rather than brought to any final resolution and harmony. In the programme note to Peter Hall's production at Stratford in 1958, Ivor Brown speaks of the comic plot as 'secondary' but that hardly does justice to what may have been the producer's intention in keeping Malvolio in his place. Yet to select any one of the endearingly familiar characters as central and to balance the comic and romantic plots accordingly may seem, at best, an arbitrary attempt at novelty. Something of the sort, however, was what Hall seemed to be attempting. In making Feste the centre of the whirligig of time that brings in its revenges he had, at any rate, the authority of the New Cambridge edition. "We must hold," declared [New Cambridge editor A. Quiller-Couch], "and insist on holding Feste, Master of the Revels, to be the master-mind and controller of Twelfth Night, its comic spirit and president…." In the absence of a full supporting argument the assertion may seem arbitrary. A parallel to stimulate imagination in this direction might be found in the comparison of the bitter-sweet figure of Feste alone on the stage at the end, when the three couples go off, with that of the Merchant at the end of the earlier comedy when three other couples go off leaving alone the man to whom they owe, in some degree, their wedded happiness. There is also the fact that the title of Twelfth Night may be more indicative than it seems to us, who have lost any sense of twelfth night as a red-letter day in the calendar, the time of the Saturnalia which was also once the true date of Christmas. As John Stow tells us [in The Survey of London, 1912],

In the feast of Christmas, there was in the king's house, wheresoever he was lodged, a lord of misrule, or master of merry disports; and the like had ye in the house of every noble man of honour, or good worship, were he spiritual or temporal.

Is there more to that ubiquitous comic-sad spirit of Feste, a fool who lives by the church and masquerades as a veritable Abbot of Unreason, in this saturnal comic romance of the snobbish steward who aspires to be his mistress' master and the faithful servant who becomes her master's mistress, than was apparent to Pepys when he wrote it off as "not related at all to the name or day" (and as "a silly play") and to such moderns as J. Q. Adams when they agree with him, on the first point at any rate? The merit of Peter Hall's production, tentative rather than definitive, aspiring rather than assured, was that it gave new life to such a question. Perhaps Feste, whose song of the wind and the rain is heard next on the lips of Lear's Fool, has grown in the succession of Shakespeare's jesters, from the Touchstone who matches the motley of court and country to something more like the sadly wise Old Clown of such a modern Christian artist as Rouault?

Peter Hall's focus on Feste met the audience entering the theatre, on the drop-curtain painted by Lila de Nobili, who designed his 1957 Stratford production of Cymbeline. The central feature was a silvery aureoled figure in clown's costume descending into a dark world in which the faces of other characters seen in shadow were touched with the radiance. With his ass's ears he might well have been a disguised Mercury whose winged cap enabled him to go into whatever part of the universe he pleased with the greatest celerity. As music sounded a front spot focused on this coolly glowing figure, which dissolved as lights came up behind to make the curtain transparent. There a small group of musicians harmonized the music which is the food of love and, on the forestage, a group of gentlemen stood motionless in silhouette. The tableau of the drop had been transposed from the vertical to the horizontal, but nothing went well for love until Feste (Cyril Luckham) appeared. As soon as his quicksilver wit proved his young and feather-brained Olivia (Geraldine McEwan) a fool, this mature Feste gave us a shrewd hint that this was not altogether fool. "There is no slander in an allowed fool" [I. v. 94] and "Now Mercury endue thee with leasing, for thou speakest well of fools" [I. v. 97] responds the wise fool whom Mercury's winged cap fits.

From the romantic mistress to the comic kinsman; at the end of the first 'act' Feste found out the bully-boy Sir Toby (Patrick Wymark) and the fool absolute, Sir Andrew (Richard Johnson) for the drinking-scene, set not in a wine-cellar but in a glowing Warwickshire walled garden where these laughing cavaliers were rebuked by Malvolio (Mark Dignam)—"the devil a puritan that he is" [II. iii. 147]—kill-joy of comic and romantic plots. As has been observed [by New Cambridge editor J. Dover Wilson], Maria's plan to 'let the fool make a third' [II. iii. 174] in the gulling of this peacock is contradicted later, in the letter scene, when Fabian unaccountably deputizes for Feste. This production minimized the inconsistency by letting Feste feign sleep, head on arm, at a table. As the others went out he raised his head and stared thoughtfully after them. The stage darkened rapidly on this picture, wood-pigeons cooing amorously in the distance, for the 'act' interval. That at least left the emphasis on Feste, but what could he have been thinking so seriously about, unless it was why Fabian had been allowed to usurp his place later in the play? The present writer wonders if this was not the actors' doing at some time before 1623. Might not an actor of Malvolio object that besides having more than his share of the comedy, and songs besides, Feste was stealing his best scene by business behind the box-tree? All Fabian's lines and entrances are somewhat suspect, and the problem is not solved, as in this production, by introducing him with Olivia in I, v.

The second 'act' began with the Duke's "Give me some music …" acceptably echoing the opening of the first. Feste's sad song seemed to woo Orsino to accept the death of a hopeless love that new and true love might be born, he is lost unless the melancholy god make his doublet of changeable taffeta. After the letter scene, from which Feste was so unaccountably absent, Viola met the fellow "wise enough to play the fool" [III. i. 60] whose keen eyes seemed to penetrate her disguise. But then Feste was, as usual, missing from the mock duel. Surely he, and not Fabian, was to be Viola's second, well assured this cock would not fight? Was not that the point of Feste's shock when, taking Sebastian for his sister in the next scene, he finds the young man now has mettle enough? This scene, ending with Olivia suddenly smitten with Sebastian, closed the second 'act' and the brief final 'act' began with an abbreviated version of Feste's visitation of Malvolio, in rapid succession as Sir Topas and as himself, the dungeon being a cellar in the garden.

The play ended as it began, with music, all the romantic and comic characters, except Malvolio, dancing together in a golden distance behind a gauze curtain in love's now triumphant harmony, with Feste, the goer-between of the worlds of romance and comedy, and perhaps also of the gods and human kind, seated on the fore-stage in gathering dusk, sadly remembering how the world began. Now it was their light that just touched his figure, forlorn at the thought that there was no more for him to do in this world. Even a god who plays the wise fool may be left lonely at the dance of human love.

The producer had made the romantic plot more consistently light comedy by treating Olivia as a feather-brained little goose: he had kept the comics well on the subtle side of farce, and so made it possible for his Mercury to modulate between the two worlds of the play and make them one. His choice of Cavalier costume gave the maximum thematic contrast with Malvolio's Puritan habit, served the opposition of amours and austerity, and brought out what is most English in Shakespeare's Never-Never Land of Illyria. It also eased the problem of the identical twins with a hair-style equally suitable to boy and girl. He had, in Dorothy Tutin, a Viola of irresistible freshness and charm. The rest of a Stratford company for once not starstudded was of its own fairly high standard with none out-standing. This was a Twelfth Night that did not altogether succeed, but a production that continually threw fresh light on a comedy about which most of us have long ceased to think freshly, which we too easily accept as a cherished but somewhat shapeless romantic-comic routine.
Eric Keown (review date 25 May 1960)

It is always interesting to see a successful production revived with a different cast, and from Peter Hall's 1958 Stratford Twelfth Night only Dorothy Tutin, Patrick Wy-mark and Ian Holm remain. This makes the third in Mr. Hall's sequence of Shakespearian comedies. Its performance is considerably stronger than it was two years ago.

In particular Miss Tutin's Viola has grown up immeasurably. I admire very much the way she has overcome her inability to speak verse. To the most taking sincerity which is natural to her she now adds maturity and confidence; her Viola, fresh and spirited and full of humour, is altogether delightful. From Eric Porter Malvolio gets a new complexion. Instead of the fantastically butt who must always have been a poor steward, he plays him as a grave and responsible administrator with no shred of levity in his composition but with all the signs of ruthless efficiency; one can imagine him going through the housekeeper's accounts with a fine comb. Mr. Porter makes this reading very funny, and his threat of general revenge at the end has a chilling ring, for this Malvolio clearly means business.

Patrick Wymark's Sir Toby is younger than the average, and all the better for that; his enjoyment in baiting Malvolio is the more robust, and he carries off Maria with greater conviction. The Aguecheek is another triumph for Ian Richardson, a recruit to Stratford who is making his name rapidly. He avoids the extremes of eccentricity, and, not working too hard for laughs, gets them all the time. Derek Godfrey makes an admirably romantic figure of the lovesick Duke, and Max Adrian a haunting Feste who seems, in his engulfing sadness, beyond comfort. As Maria, Frances Cuka is improved.

The weakness of this production is the Olivia. In 1958 Mr. Hall, greatly daring, allowed Geraldine McEwan to chirp her way through the part, and being Miss McEwan, and an original, she brought something to it that had never been there before. Trying the same line again with Barbara Barnett, he fails. This Olivia is simply a minx without dignity, and not at all the sort of girl to command a household and engage in steadfast mourning.

For me a very minor weakness is the gauze hung about midstage for most of the scenes. This has a door cut in it, through which the actors stream on their way downstage, and the pattern of their movement through this bottleneck becomes monotonous. But on balance the production is another winner for Stratford, and Lila de Nobili's sets and seventeenth century dresses stand up well to a further inspection.

A. Alvarez (review date May 1960)

The revival of his 1958 production of Twelfth Night shows Peter Hall settling more comfortably than before on the throne of the Stratford Memorial Theatre. And it looks like being a good reign. When the season started, I suggested that his great virtue was his prime concern for Shakespeare's poetry. This means that the verse-speaking is neither hammered into rant and ripe elocutionism nor is it ironed out into prose; it is, instead, a medium for the feeling intelligence and demands nothing less from the actors. So the plays emerge less as galleries of types and characters than as creative statements, worlds of values. But at the same time, Hall is a great one for technical panache and high production: elaborate costumes and stage business, dim facades, period music—he proliferates the theatrical means into a kind of visual parallel of the play's complexities. The results are always striking but can easily slip into the fussy and merely ornamental.
Twelfth Night, however, is a good example of a production controlled by a critical reaction to the poetry. Like Lila de Nobili's Caroline costumes, it is geared to the play's faint air of over-lushness: speeches so cadenced and beautiful that the speakers sound as though they were not so much expressing what they felt as exploiting the moods they would like to feel, and jokes pushed so far that they slide close to brutality. Hall makes his cast keep tight control over the excesses. Derek Godfrey's Orsino is less romantic than romanticising, faintly comic under all his folds of dignity. Barbara Barnett tries to do the same for Olivia, but hasn't, for the time being, the acting resources; so she grimaces, twists her hands and bites her lip like some graceless Joyce Grenfell schoolgirl in fancy dress, more farce than fantasy and the only wrong note in the play. In contrast, Eric Porter as Malvolio resisted every easy temptation to parody the part: he was conceited, full of self-righteous Puritanism, insufferable in his way, but with an underrcurrent of seriousness that made him genuinely moving at the end. In the same way, Patrick Wymark's Sir Toby Belch was tougher, more drunken, less amiable than the usual thigh-slapping chunk of Merrie England, and Ian Richardson managed to slow down Aguecheek so that he could be comic without ever twittering.

The prizes, however, go to Dorothy Tutin and Max Adrian. Miss Tutin has exactly the odd combination of sensibility and immaturity that Viola needs. She is bright and cheeky, yet full of feeling and poetry. Where her Portia lacked weight and substance, her Viola is simply light in touch, all youthful fine feeling and delicacy. She is the nearest one will probably see to the original conception of a boy-actor playing a girl playing a boy. Max Adrian's Feste was the reverse of all this. No clown has ever been so melancholy. He hovered permanently on the edge of weeping, stricken, desolate, like King Lear after his madness. It seemed, heaven knows, disproportionate to the part, as though one had walked into the middle of things and missed a whole private tragedy. But granted Feste might conceivably be a man with a history—a neurotic case-history, in this instance—the rest came naturally and with extraordinary coherence of melancholy detail. And he certainly set the tone of the production: of comedy become wistful and enervated, of the lyric falling into the decadent, of jokes on the edge of turning sour. It was not for nothing that every scene was played through a filter of gauze drops; the play, too, came across darkened and unexpectedly serious. It was an impressive interpretation.

Caryl Brahms (review date July 1960)

I wish I could quote the whole of Hazlitt's analysis of the character of Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, the whole of Agate's Brief Chronicle of Miss Jean Forbes-Robertson's Viola (and of that I would sacrifice the rest, if need be, for the three words in which this great critic lights a candle to her quality for all time: "This grave baby"). I wish that I had read CE . Montague for your delight. And that good crusty (in the sense that he will surely have produced some judgements for us to chew on) critic, Alan Dent, must sometime, somewhere, have written passages that would be infinitely quotable. And then too, the illuminating first string of The Times—to read him is always to be dumb-founded by his quiet authority, perception and thoroughness. (No skipping the plot at Printing House Square where it will be recounted in such a manner as to form a comment.) And has not Kenneth Tynan anything of pith and vision to say of this zany piece? Well, then, I wish I could quote the lot of them, preferably in toto, and leave it at that for they would write like all the angels where I shall carp and complain and tear a strip off what was rarely less than enchantment.

GRAVE AND GAY

But perhaps more than any of these sensitive and accomplished quill-dippers I would like to quote one who was not professionally a critic in the Theatre at all; one who was torn between reading Twelfth Night in the garden "with no sound but the thud of an apple falling to the earth, or of the wind ruffling the branches of the tree..." and seeing it enacted at the Old Vic 1933—the year of Colonel de Basil's Baby Ballerinas; the year, recalled Old Vic-wise, of Leon Quartermain's Malvolio and Athene Seyler's Maria. The year I read about (but did not see, fool that I was) Madame Lopokova's Olivia. What a grave baby this great artist would have been had she played Viola—grave and gay by turns, like any baby pushed out in a pram, ignoring the world. "Many apples might fall without being heard in the Waterloo Road." mourns the writer, who is of course Virginia Woolf (that "of course" is just the Present Writer being maddeningly superior). Her essay is to be read in English Dramatic Criticism published by the University of Oxford Press in the quietly handsome, dark blue uniformity of the World's Classics, which I shall give to everyone I know this Christmas if it is still in print.

No one knew better than Shakespeare that every comedy is a day in May in England with overtones of April showers; that every silver lining has its cloud. No producer is more aware of this soft spring sunshine and the changing skies than Mr. Peter Hall. And if Twelfth Night were nothing but a poem how acceptable would we find this revival of the 1958 production at Stratford-upon-Avon. (Now that the Stratford-Atte-Bowe has its Theatre Workshop, and those at Toronto and Connecticut their festivals, we have to be a little pedantic about locations.)

The scenes which take us with them to a Warwickshire Illyria are seen in a smudge of trees as, lifted by the breeze, they shift and whisper and return to basking, each one a bronzed enchantment by Lila de Nobili, through which the burnished costumes gleam. These costumes may be something too lush, like a plum at the plop or a tea-rose with all its golden wealth extended and about to fall.

"Let there be light" was the order on a certain great occasion in the world outside the theatre. Inside the theatre. Mr. Peter Hall no doubt commanded "Let there be Mr. Michael Northen". And there he is, stopping time to catch a moment for us, making a minute memorable, gilding not the lily but the mood.

Add to this Mr. Eric Porter's Malvolio, the best that I have seen since Gielgud's puritanical steward; a very real and fiery Sebastian (Ian Holm), spoiling to be up and at 'em; and Mr. Dinsdale Landen's clearly-etched Fabian, The Threat to Feste. And what more do I want?

GINNED-UP DOVE

Well, first a Viola whose appearance does not remind me of the picture of the little boy standing before the Round-head at the table: "When did you last see your father?" Agate called Jean Forbes-Robertson's Viola "this grave baby", as we have seen: I would say of Miss Tutin's Viola that she is "this ginned-up dove". She is not my Viola—it is only fair to say she seemed to be everyone else's in the intervals—since to my mind quite the most perfect Viola I have ever seen was that of Miss Barbara Jefford at the Old Vic, being boyish and girlish, staunch and true and merry and grave and so very much in love and brimming over with the fun of it all. Miss Tutin was a huntress out for her man from the moment they carried her ashore and laid her safe on his soil. An only child, Miss Tutin, play-acting weddings up in the attic with all the confidence of one who is born to be and means to be and has no other aim than to be the bride. And the sooner the better. And yet, the memory of the poetry, the little show-off found in the part persists and is still with me. Ah well, let's dot her down as a bride who takes a book of poems on her honey-moon, having been with difficulty coaxed to leave her dog in the porch.

And the Olivia—what can I find to say that is not too discouraging to a young actress about this miscasting of Miss Barbara Barnett in the part? Well, I could begin by saying that Miss Barnett is not Virginia Woolf's Olivia:

SOMBRE COMPLEXION

"Our Olivia is a stately lady of sombre complexion, slow-moving and of few sympathies." (All, you will note, what Madame Lopokova, who prompted the analysis, is not likely to have been.) The Stratford-upon-Avon Olivia was a dizzy girl—and though this may have worked in the case of Miss Geraldine McEwan, the 1958
Olivia I did not see, it certainly did not work in the 1960 variorum, in less accomplished hands. And but for disheartening a pretty young player who was, I suspect, obeying her producer, I would leave the matter to Olivia there. Fortunately, there is a part of another kind to which Miss Barnett would be admirably suited and any management looking for a juvenile lead to enter the drawing-room with a tennis racket in Act I and leave it with a cocktail in Act III, need search no further.

The Orsino of Mr. Derek Godfrey found its true length at once. He made a fine striding figure of a lover who would certainly have had the guts to do his own wooing with that persuasive voice.

And now, we must come to Mr. Max Adrian, the most neurasthenic Feste since Mr. Robert Eddison was manicdepressive at the Old Vic.

OLD MAN FESTE

Mr. Adrian clearly subscribes to the school of thought that sees its Feste as an old man. He did his best to wring these iron withers with his old fool who is past playing the fool. And was it that he could not sing or that he did not wish to sing Feste's difficult songs but characterised and acted them instead? Be the reason what you will, on the first night Come Away Death was death.

But it is not Miss Barnett nor Mr. Adrian who are to blame for the off-key notes they pipe—it is the producer. Why did a director of Mr. Hall's distinction and gifts go in for 'amusing' casting? Did he remain amused, I wonder, when he took his place in the auditorium on the first night and saw what he had done? Mr. Adrian was born to play Aguecheek (Mr. Ian Richardson did more than well in the part and though it may seem to weaken my argument I must in fairness emphasise this) but he is cast in the one part that calls for an actor who can sing (as distinct from an actor who can "put over a number"). This wilful casting comes so often between the brilliant vision Mr. Hall has of his play and the effect he finally achieves in it. And yet so gifted a producer is he that he could make a bare stage sing and play a consort of viols in an ecstasy of harmony if he so minded. He is perhaps less able with a laugh—but this does not mean that he is a solemn producer—just, I suspect, blind and bone-headed when it comes to his cast-lists.

MOCKING MARIA

Still, he might take time off to chide Miss Frances Cuka gently away from the easy laugh she gets by sending up the accents of Maria's betters and all the artificial effects she cannot yet command and bid her content herself with honest, earthy fun. No young actress can be funnier than Miss Cuka in a natural way and that way is Maria's way and Shakespeare's way with Maria.

Have I left anyone out? The friendly, rather everyday Sir Toby of Mr. Patrick Wymark. But Sir Toby is Olivia's close kinsman and as such should have at least a silken lining to his nature, an inner aristocracy, even though it may be ivied-over with crummy cakes, and stale ale and the hiccoughs. Yet so friendly an understanding with his audience has Mr. Wymark that I was won over to him, seamy side and all.

Remains Mr. Raymond Leppard, Music Adviser to the Theatre, and composer of the incidental music. Hey there! You with the stars in your eyes and a cast of actors to write songs for—not singers who can act or even actors who can sing, as must be all too clear to you by now—won't you play a little safer until they can spare time for you to coach them?

And yet …

And yet I came away like a gourmet from a single perfect dish, knowing that this night I had feasted even though the feast was served al fresco in an autumnal garden something under the cloud.
"Viola, Malvolio, Olivia, the Duke—the mind," wrote Virginia Woolf, "so brims and spills over with all that we know and guess about them, as they move in and out among the shadows of the mind's stage" …

I do not doubt but that a large portion of Mr. Peter Hall's mind—and heart—is a stage, a shadowed stage; and that he dwells much thereon. And he has set his Illyria a lui, not in cloud cuckoo land, perhaps, but under a cloud; nor yet in Lopokova's land where everything suffers, not a sea-change, but "a change into light, into gaiety:" where "birds sing, the sheep are garlanded, the air rings with melody and human beings dance towards each other on the tips of their toes possessed of an exquisite friendliness, sympathy and delight". For though the garlands and the birds are there, we see them in the dim light that is shaded from the psychiatrist's couch. On it lies Feste. And what Mr. Hall has shown us may be the sweet and bitter memories of Feste's ailing world which once was young.

Robert Speaight (review date Autumn 1960)

Twelfth Night was the first of the productions that I saw this year, and on it I began to form the general impressions that I am recording here. I had seen the production two years ago, when it left me divided between delight and dissatisfaction. Mr. Hall, as it seemed to me, had started off with a good idea and had then gone some way to spoil it. All those cavaliers grouped around Orsino in a panelled hall straight out of Nash's English Mansions—this announced a Twelfth Night very much to my taste. And it is still a lovely thing to look upon, thanks in great part to Miss de Nobili's designs—a rich symphony in russet. But Mr. Hall, as usual, had plenty of surprises up his sleeve. The first was Miss Tutin. Not that one ever imagined she would be anything but an exquisite Viola, but the seasoned playgoer was hardly prepared for her entrance. Violas usually enter in a voluminous maternity gown from Dior, concealing the immaculate doublet and hose in which they will appear five minutes later, and a graceful hood protecting an unruffled wig. Miss Tutin went to the astonishing length of wearing two wigs, one of which showed distinct signs of having been touched by salt water. And instead of landing in Illyria like a leading lady, she actually clambered ashore as if she were in some doubt as to whether she would ever get there.

Just as Nash's panelling had easily given way to the cloud-capped towers of a transitory Adriatic, so these quickly dissolved into an English garden; and there was Mr. Wymark enjoying an obviously continental breakfast. The scene is always difficult to get under weigh, and Toby needs his cue. He gets it here from the chaplain to Olivia's household processing through the garden, followed by two dévoutes, and singing the "Gloria in excelsis". Now it is highly probable that Olivia had ordered a Mass for her brother's soul that morning; but if so, she would certainly have attended it herself. And it is inconceivable that the chaplain would have emerged from it singing the Gloria which is carefully excluded from the Liturgy for the Dead. If Mr. Hall had got hold of the right end of his bright idea, he would first of all have given Olivia her place in the procession, and then he would have set them all chanting the "De Profundis", antiphonally, as they walked back to the house and to a breakfast even more continental than Sir Toby's.

If Olivia had been to Mass that morning, Sir Toby would just as certainly have not, and Mr. Wymark got things moving briskly in the contrary direction, reminding us that however thickly the late September mists might be gathering, ginger would be hot i' the mouth before the night was over. And it was in the second garden scene that Mr. Hall sprang his next surprises. Mr. Adrian's Feste had drawn his pathos from a canvas by Georges Rouault. Here was the saddest but one of Shakespeare's clowns nursing the secret of an insoluble melancholy. I wondered if Mr. Adrian had found the clue to Feste where I have always found it—in his remark to Viola that he lives "by the church" [III. i. 3]. In other words, Feste is neither of Olivia's world, nor of Orsino's. He drifts from one to the other, inhabiting a world wholly of his own. In the end he is left to sing his melancholy envoi, casting a shadow behind him on to a distant and elegant pavane, and perhaps a slight doubt as to whether Miss Turin's Viola will ever settle down in Illyria. I thought Mr. Adrian might have made his point with a little more speed and a shade lighter emphasis, but his performance was one of exceptional originality and power.

The second surprise was Miss Bennett's Olivia. Here, once again, I felt that Mr. Hall was letting a good idea run away with him. I understood what he was aiming at—to inject melancholy into the comic scenes and comedy into the serious ones. I also realize what he was reacting against—the stately contraltos whom a sudden bereavement has distracted from the organization of the Hunt Ball. Miss Bennett would have been incapable of opening a Flower Show, and that, as they say, was the point of the operation. But Olivia should be the competent mistress of a great household; a serious young woman capable of great silliness—or, if you prefer, a silly young woman capable of sudden seriousness. What we were shown was a silly young woman incapable of any seriousness whatever. And this makes nonsense of Viola's impact on her fantasy. It is right that she should appear younger than Viola, but to play her persistently for comic effect is to rob the "roses of the spring" of all their perfume—and I cannot believe that this was Shakespeare's intention. In here casting passion with sentiment to the wings, Mr. Hall came near to cutting out the heart of his play.

That it still continued to beat was largely due to Miss Tutin. She steered her way to Orsino's bosom, a creature not altogether of his element even when her gaze was anchored on him. The recognition of Sebastian was beautifully managed—no stage can ever be wide enough for that miraculous coming together. And, for once, Mr. Ian Holm provided a plausible twin. Mr. Porter, playing a less stiff Malvolio than usual, gave us a genuinely human being; he won our sympathy by not asking for it. Mr. Allen was a splendid Antonio. Rarely can this short but significant part have been adorned with such an appropriate panache. And Mr. Godfrey's Orsino, as so often happens, came into its own in the last act.

The minor tactics of the production were full of good things; Sebastian and Viola nearly meeting in the street, and the chaplain's tactful and embarrassed aversion of the head while Sebastian and Olivia are exchanging their first kiss, and Malvolio's exit from the drinking scene. So, in the end, they all go their separate ways—Antonio to refit his galleys in Cork or Limerick, and Feste to vanish into an eccentric solitude. It is the measure of Shakespeare's genius that however neatly his plays are rounded off, his characters live on to perplex our questioning. This is increasingly true as he approaches the meridian of his achievement; and it was the merit of Mr. Hall's production that he allowed one or two of the shadows to gather here.…

T. C. Worsley (review date 20 December 1960)

For the Christmas season (up only until February 1) the Stratford Company bring into the Aldwych the Twelfth Night from the 1958 and 1960 seasons. The production is one of Mr. Peter Hall's, and, in my view, one of his best. But it flouts some of the traditions, and has to pay the penalty of being disliked by the Old Guard, not all of whom it may be found are very old.

It is a Caroline Twelfth Night, and this works very well for the "breeches parts." Miss Dorothy Tutin, who has now learned to speak beautifully, makes a thoroughly convincing Caroline page boy. Then, Miss Lila de Nobili had produced a lyrical décor, but it glows with autumnal browns and golds and greens, and the tradition stresses that this is a spring-like comedy.

These, however, are only minor counts against Mr. Hall. The major one is that he has allowed a spirit of gentle guying to pervade a comedy which is commonly taken very seriously indeed. Traditionally Twelfth Night is sharply divided into two moods. An intensely serious poetic mood in the love passages (The Orsino-Olivia sections) interposed with low comedy scenes from Sir Toby, Sir Andrew and the rest, with Malvolio left somewhere in the middle.
The disadvantage of this traditional handling is that the two parts never come together and that none of the disguise scenes ever quite makes convincing sense. Mr. Hall’s solution is not to take the lovers half so seriously at one end of the comedy fine and to cut down on the buffoonery at the other. And, for me, it works admirably. There is a cohesion in the performance now that is not often there.

INTERESTING CONCEPTION

The treatment is shown at either end of the extreme by the handling of Olivia and Sir Andrew Aguecheek respectively. Miss Geraldine McEwan's Olivia is pert, gay and sly. She is very far from the usual sloppy love-lorn drooper. She is agile-witted and alert for laughs. Unlike the traditional character she is in fact the kind of person whom we can readily believe would instantly swap a Sebastian for a Caesario. I might allow the criticism that Miss McEwan sometimes plays it a little too pert. But the conception seems to mean interesting solution of difficulties which the Old Guard often shut their eyes to.

At the other end of the scale, Mr. Richard Johnson, makes Sir Andrew Aguecheek a figure of pathos as well as a figure of fun. Every now and then there are flashes when this ridiculous poop suddenly realises what a ridiculous poop he is, and we get a laugh on the other side of our faces.

The pathos is to be found among the clowns (in Mr. Max Adrian's highly intelligent superbly articulated Feste, too): and comedy is discovered among the lovers: for Mr. Hall is surely right in reminding us that Orsino's form of hopeless love is not "serious" at all: it is the acting out of a period convention. He is right to mock it gently: and by doing so he produces in the whole play a tone into which the absurdities of the plot fit congruously, and he unifies the different elements.

 Needless to say these minutiae of criticism, important though they in fact are, will not affect an average audience. They, blissfully unaware of traditions broken and sacred principles violated, will enjoy this Twelfth Night immensely. It is beautiful to look at, it is gay, it is swift. Mr. Eric Porter repeats his excellent Malvolio and Mr. Patrick Wymark his excellent Sir Toby. Miss Patsy Byrne comes in to bring great high spirits to Maria.

Peter Hall (essay date 1966)

In the following essay, originally published in 1966, Hall describes his handling of Twelfth Night on the stage, commenting that it is "impossible to cut a word" of the play.

It is impossible to cut a word of Twelfth Night. Even its obscure jokes are brought alive by the exuberant rhythm of the scenes. It belongs to that small group of Shakespeare's plays (Macbeth and the Dream are others) that are sinewy and compact. They have no excess fat. Twelfth Night is complex, ambiguous, and heartbreakingly funny. It is the masterwork among the comedies.

It was written in 1600—or so we think—the date is only important in understanding its place in the canon. Its mood is ripe and rich. It springs from a heart now fully capable of compassion—an emotion which is rare in the earlier works. Twelfth Night has a view of men which is objective and realistic. But it can be terrible in its honesty because it is so understanding—just like Shakespeare's presentation of that uncontrollable Vice-figure, Falstaff.

A Midsummer Night's Dream, As You Like It, and the national epic of the histories are in the past. We are moving into maturity; the great tragedies, the romances, and those plays of such ambiguity (Measure for Measure, All's Well, and Troilus and Cressida) that scholars have always found them 'Problems'. A bitterness of spirit is about to inflame the rest of Shakespeare's work.

Twelfth Night is significant as a transitional play, and there is something of this bitterness in its comedy. But the comedy is rich, because there is darkness and disturbance. The comedy is defined by tragedy, the folly and the illusions by sincerity, the joy by anguish.

The play deals with the theme common to all Shakespeare's comedies: the journey by means of experience to maturity—a maturity which it is necessary to crown by a marriage. Twelfth Night is a critique of illusions. A very young countess (Olivia), who is more in love with grief than with the true memory of her dead brother, is courted by a duke (Orsino) who is more in love with the idea of love than with the countess. Both of them have emotions which are modish and self-regarding. Their lives are invaded by a young girl (Viola), a realist who is in love with life, and has been freshly rescued from the sea and from the true anguish which she feels for the loss of her brother. Her presence when she becomes an illusion herself, a girl disguised as a boy, forces Olivia and Orsino, and all the self-deceivers who surround them into an understanding of reality. By the end of the play the deceivers have all suffered retribution for their faults. They are then capable of maturity.

This is the main and comic action of the play. It is set in a never-never land suited to such heady illusions, Illyria; a place, whatever its actual geography, that is a complete country of Shakespeare's imagination. It has music and flowers, buttery-bars, ancient monuments, box-trees, a very London puritan, Elizabethan court-jokes, and an abundance of cakes and ale. It has a relaxed climate in which sharp practice can easily disguise itself as friendship, and hypocrisy can masquerade as idealism. And it is all lapped by the sea, that image of opposites that haunted Shakespeare throughout his life. Tempest and sudden death are countered by calm seas, miraculous salvation and regeneration.

All Shakespeare's thinking, whether religious, political or moral, is based on his concept of Order. There is a just proportion, a necessary balance, in all things; Man above Beast, King above Man, God above King. It is the job of existence to seek out this order and abide by it. Revolution, whether in the family, the State or the heavens, breathes disorder and ultimate anarchy. Sometimes this chaos may be necessary, as the fever of rebellion is the way to health for the sick state, or as the young must repudiate their parents to reach maturity. But the action is still wrong, and some retribution will follow any act of disorder. Bolingbroke has to depose Richard II to weed the garden of England, but he and his family will suffer for the action.

For it is wrong to depose a king; just as it is wrong for the heart to rule the head, or for extremes in anything to be victorious. Balance is the only sure basis of life. Cakes and ale are just as dangerous in excess as the intolerant zeal of a high puritan.

It follows, then, that Man must govern himself as precisely as an army or a state, and strive for the just balance of opposites, the mean:

Take but degree away, untune that string,
And hark what discord follows.
[Troilus and Cressida, I.iii. 109-10]

All the characters of Twelfth Night save Viola are creatures of excess, agents of disorder. Orsino is in love with love, Olivia is in love with grief, and Sir Toby is overdrinking, behaving merrily below-stairs, and gulling a fool of his money. Sir Andrew is blinded by pretension, and Malvolio by egotism and hypocrisy. Even the cryptic Feste is self-indulgent in his bitterness and his melancholy. Sebastian is unwittingly churlish to the man who loves him and does not know how to express it. And we feel some criticism of Antonio because of the secrecy of his private and public life. Fabian and Maria lack tact; they behave out of their station and are thus disorderly.
All the main characters are treated critically, even Viola herself, overzealous to disguise herself as a man, suffers from the reality. But none of the critical spirit kills the joy of the comedy. It is for the audience to enjoy and then judge. For these characters are rich and complex. They are not simple Jonsonian humours.

I have space only to talk of one character in depth. I pick what is to me the most important character in the play—Feste. He is a deliberate enigma, poised uneasily between the two worlds of the court and the great house:

![Image](II. iv. 12)

He is bitter, insecure, singing the old half-forgotten songs to the Duke (for nostalgia is predictably the Duke's favourite musical companion), his jokes now tarnished and not very successful. He is the creation of a professional entertainer, and we may perhaps remotely relate him to John Osborne's Archie Rice, or to that fearful misanthropy which overtakes most comics when they begin to despise their audience. He is suffered by all, and liked by few. He is the most perceptive and formidable character in the play. Viola brings reality to the play by her instinct, but Feste could often do it if he wished by his shrewdness. I believe he penetrates Viola's disguise:

![Image](III. i. 49)

He is left alone at the end of the play singing bitterly, and more obscenely than most people realize, about the transient nature of life.

And he is the main character of the play's most extraordinary scene. He is a strange kind of fool, when disguised as Sir Topas he cruelly tortures the imprisoned Malvolio. He is very perceptive about Orsino, and offers a penetrating judgement:

![Image](II. iv. 74-5)

Feste is the critical centre of the play, the Thersites, the Jacques without eloquence, the malcontent, the man who sees all and says little, the cynic. It takes an idealist to be such a cynic.

I would like now to speculate. It is known that many of the professional fools were, in fact, defrocked priests. If the poor boy who was educated up to be a cleric failed to get a benefice, or if his reason or his morals dragged him away from the true faith, there was not much open to this medieval outsider except professional foolery. The education, the mental agility, and the Latin tags could all find a professional use. The destructive resentment of the failure could help his professional personality. Such a hypothesis is impossible to prove, but it is certainly a useful background to the actor playing Feste. It leads him without difficulty to the malice of Sir Topas's scene. Men are very bitter about the professions that fail them.

Only one of the other characters of the play, in my opinion, lacks three dimensions, and the life-enhancing inconsistency with which Shakespeare regularly surprises us. This is Malvolio—after Viola, the most famous character in the play. I find the character drawn from the outside and slightly caricatured. The plot makes it appear a great part—or at least offers an actor of genius the opportunity of making it flesh. But it is two-dimensional. Shakespeare's professional enemies were plagues and puritans. Perhaps he could not be objective; perhaps his hatred was too intense.

The structure of Twelfth Night repays careful study. There is no play with a surer exposition. In forty lines we meet the Duke, learn of his frustrated love for Olivia, and savour his court of music and flowers. His opening speech is justly one of the famous lyrics of our language. But when it is spoken by Orsino, the love-sick character in action, it is ironic because it is so beautiful. This capricious man ('Enough. No more! Tis not so sweet now as it was before'), with his indulgent love of fancy, is hardly fit to rule a state when he cannot rule himself. The excessive beauty of this first scene reveals all.

There is, in fact, very little that is purely lyrical in dramatic Shakespeare. Henry VI's pathetic yearnings to be a shepherd on the battlefield, or Oberon's lustful and malicious 'I know a bank', are critical of the characters who utter them.

In the second scene of Twelfth Night, the storm delivers a grieving and sincere Viola to this country of false love. But she has courage, and springs quickly to new life. She resolves on disguise—as a man. Then, with the tempo of the play still racing, we meet the sunshine comedy of Sir Toby and the foolish Sir Andrew (a contrast to the stormy sea coast). The tone is reckless, dangerously irresponsible.

One scene with Viola in the court hoist with her own disguise—

> Yet a barful strife!
> Who e'er I woo, myself would be his wife, and we are back in Olivia's house meeting the strange clown, Feste, the superior Malvolio with his promise of a comic fall to come and Olivia herself.
> [I. iv. 41-2]

The comic exposition is now complete. Shakespeare has dealt himself a perfect hand for misunderstanding and complication. We expect the arrival of Viola's twin brother, and a pattern of misunderstanding, just as we expect the pretensions of these comic characters to be exposed.

Let us also look at the last scene, where predictably all the follies come home to roost, and all the misunderstandings are cleared up. Everything can then end in the fullness of marriage, and only Feste is left outside with his bitter song.

Shakespeare relishes denouements. His last scenes in which order is restored have the counterpoint and balance of music. In Cymbeline, indeed, he permits himself the delights of some two score discoveries. This is no incompetence. Information is withheld and arranged so that the dance can go on as long as possible.

The most beautiful thing in the last scene of Twelfth Night is the twin recognition of Viola and Sebastian.
Each knows that the other is truly their nearest and dearest, yet their joy is deliberately prolonged while they confirm to each other what each already knows.

This is the lyrical heart of the scene, and around it is woven a comic pattern of discovery and retribution until all is known:

> and golden time convents,
> A solemn combination shall be made
> Of our dear souls …
> [V. i. 382-84]
The imagery of Twelfth Night is as rich as its humanity. It is drawn from music, from the appetites (their yearnings and their uneasy surfeits), and, of course, from the inevitable image of human love, 'the worm i' the bud'. The imagery is sensual but transitory. The predominant image is that of the sea. It is an image of life and love, ranging from 'capacity receiveth as the sea' through the colloquialisms of 'board her', 'hoist sail', the prose precision of 'determinate voyage is mere extravagancy' and finally to the joy of 'share in this most happy wreck'.

The play is deliberately and delightfully erotic. We must remind ourselves that the original Viola and Olivia were boys, and that Shakespeare conceived his play in these terms. The pattern is then as follows: a boy playing a girl disguised as a boy is sent on a mission of love to a boy playing a girl, when his real emotions must be centred on playing a girl who is in love with Orsino. The second boy-girl then falls in love with the boy-girl-boy. Aphrodite can ask for no richer situation. Shakespeare had explored the possibilities of such a situation in The Two Gentlemen of Verona, but here he uses it to the full. It is hard on a modern actress to find this deliberate ambivalence.

The play bored Samuel Pepys, but in spite of this has held the stage successfully ever since. There are three dangerous traditions of the stage. Malvolio is by custom played by the leading actor. But the star in this role cannot help playing for sympathy, and even if he wishes to avoid it his public will insist upon giving it. A sympathetic Malvolio raises questions which should never be asked. We must still laugh at his final exit. The play only works if a brilliant actor can play the part in order to be completely detested, laughed at, and finally understood.

Olivia is generally played too old: doubtless a tradition which comes from the stock companies where the part belonged by right to the character lady who also played Gertrude. Twelfth Night is a play of youth and Olivia must be much younger in wisdom and experience than Viola.

The other dangerous stage tradition prevents us from clearly seeing Sir Andrew Aguecheek. He is always played as an effeminate. The text would rather indicate the opposite. He is a man with manure on his boots rather than ribbons in his hair. He is an unattractive, pretentious knight from the country—a man of money who loves dogs and hunting and who yearns to make a good match, though he is too much of a coward to try. Elizabethan literature is full of such empty roaring boys, such gentlemen bumpkins.

But the stage has not dealt badly with the play, and assuredly the play has always brought joy to the theatres. If the comedy is kept true to character and the lyrical emotions are expressed clearly and musically, but with no false resonance or oversentiment (unless the character positively demands it), then the miracle will always work. The period of the play should not be specific. But in Shakespeare's Illyria you must not think it strange to meet Sea Captains and Puritans, Counts, Priests, Fools, Country Parsons and English aristocrats.

These ideas of mine cannot pretend to be original, I write this short essay from a study of the play over more than twenty years, and the happy experience of three stage productions. I cannot honestly remember whether the ideas I have expressed are my own or somebody else's. But I do know they have stood the test of experience. To those that I have pillaged, I therefore offer my apologies and thanks.

Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 26): Production:

PRODUCTION:

Clifford Williams • RSC • 1966
BACKGROUND:

Williams's 1966 revival dispensed with a serious approach to Twelfth Night, "presenting it," wrote the critic for The Times, "as a hard-edged almost Italianate comedy firmly steeled against pathos and poetry." For this very reason, most critics responded without enthusiasm to the production. Hilary Spurling maintained that the set design, which evoked the Italian High Renaissance, lacked the fanciful quality typically associated with Shakespeare's Illyria. Additionally, most critics felt the performances to have been unmemorable. J. C. Trewin asserted that "Mr. Williams has been at pains … to mock the affectation of Orsino (Alan Howard) and of Olivia (Estelle Kohler), the first a near-burlesque of romantic passion, the second a mere kitten." Jeremy Kingston, however, praised the strong performances of Diana Rigg as Viola and Ian Holm as Malvolio, hailing them as the "chief pleasures of the evening." For the critic of The Times, Rigg's Viola was a "delicious" fusion of "comic embarrassment and vulnerable feminity." Holm played Malvolio as a petty and irascible bureaucrat "swelling," in the words of J. C. Trewin, "with bullfrog fury, obsequious to his betters, a bully to his inferiors, and drilling the language until it must shriek for mercy." Despite wishing for a tenderer Twelfth Night, Robert Speaight concluded that "it would be priggish not to admit that this production was enormously diverting, even if now and then it won its laughs at rather too high a price."

COMMENTARY:

The Times (review date 17 June 1966)

Clifford Williams, who directed the Royal Shakespeare's vastly successful Comedy of Errors has now tackled Twelfth Night on similar lines, presenting it as a hard-edged almost Italianate comedy firmly steeled against pathos and poetry.

This may seem a perverse style to adopt for one of the most musical of the comedies, but at least it is carried through consistently. Sally Jacobs's set establishes the tone exactly: a simple facade of four up-stage arches, and, above them, a musicians' gallery whose occupants behave more like a town band than a courtly ensemble. This is no atmosphere for voluptuous fancy; and, sure enough, Orsino (Alan Howard) enters the first scene at a run and conducts his campaign against Olivia's affections more in a military than romantic spirit.

As a whole, the production is distinguished by its cleanness of line. For major changes in situation, such as Olivia's declaration to Cesario and the final reunion, the stage is cleared to allow maximum freedom of movement and concentration on the essentials. There is no superfluous business (the drinking scene, for instance, is hardly given a chance to get under way): but what there is has strong dramatic point. Viola's duel is an excellently elaborated set piece (with Aguecheek going down, convinced he has been killed), and another well imagined stroke comes in the dungeon scene when Feste addresses his lines to a puppet fitted over Malvolio's hand through the bars.

There are no outstanding performances, though Diana Rigg, returning to base after her television spree is a delicious Viola; she alone brings some music into the production, and sheds the armour of Emma Peel to display her old gifts of comic embarrassment and vulnerable femininity.
Ian Holm's Malvolio, made up to resemble the Droeshout Shakespeare, cultivates a complex mongrel accent—with a top-dressing of eccentric gentility and a basis of raw bullying cockney—that also has unmistakable echoes of Olivier. His, nevertheless, is the strongest male performance.

Brewster Mason's Sir Toby and David Warner's Ague-cheek do little more than go through the accepted motions of the parts; and Norman Rodway's Feste, in the anti-poetic context, is out in the cold. There is an unusual and persuasive Olivia by Estelle Kohler; not, this time; a gracious lady, but a vain and conquestgirl recently released from male protection and briefly favouring the novelty of power before submitting once again to male authority.

Hilary Spurling (review date 24 June 1966)

Columns are to architecture what melody is to music,' says Stendhal somewhere on his travels through Italy, and would have been pleased with both in the first minutes of Twelfth Night at Stratford: Orsino stands before a row of slender columns, listening in an attitude of conscious ecstasy—a rose in one outstretched hand, one foot poised on a stool in the centre of an empty, polished marble floor—to 'That strain again; it had a dying fall.' Orsino is a prince of the Renaissance; and Clifford Williams's production is built round that assumption, which is perhaps why it has been received with such a notable lack of enthusiasm. The chief complaint seems to be that it lacks 'poetry and pathos'; the answer is that this is not our kind of poetry, nor our kind of pathos.

Part of the trouble is no doubt a sentimental disappointment. There is nothing fanciful about this particular Illyria: that severe colonnade, that gleaming floor, the tall, slim, sallow-featured gentlemen of Orsino's court, all belong specifically to the Italian High Renaissance. Even the lighting, by John Bradley, recalls the soft, powdery light of quattrocento Tuscan painters, and Sally Jacobs has used their warm reds and browns, with an odd splash of peacock blue or a painted orange tree, for her sets and costumes. And Alan Howard's delivery of the famous first speech—dealing out the syllables as Beerbohm would have said—shows a Renaissance delight in luxury and artifice. Also more than a hint, in his glistening eyes and sensuous lips, of Renaissance barbarity—my desires, like fell and cruel hounds, E'er since pursue me.'

Twelfth Night down the ages has acquired a misleading reputation as an elegant and amiable piece of nonsense, 'never straying into lewdness, as Quiller-Couch has it, a romp in short and wishy-washy to boot. It is an impression this production should go far to counteract. The play was, after all, as Dr Hotson argues, very likely first performed on January 6, 1601, before Queen Elizabeth and in honour of the real Duke Orsino—who, as a child of four, had watched Webster's hideous tragedy of The White Devil acted out in real life; who was son to Brachiano and his murdered duchess, stepson of the White Devil herself; and who was passing through London on his way home to the Pitti Palace in Florence after accompanying Maria de'Medici on her bridal journey into France. At all events, Twelfth Night was written for a magnificent and a savage age. One is apt to forget that it ends with bloody coxcombs and broken heads and a surgeon blind drunk at eight in the morning; that of the two sea-captains who happen to land in Illyria, one is swiftly imprisoned and the other goes in well-justified fear of his life; also that strange, prophetic passage near the end of the play, when Orsino's 'thoughts are ripe in mischief and, like Othello and in much the same words, he threatens to kill the thing he loves. Viola's reply is not Desdemona's but it is given in the same spirit: 'most jocund, apt and willingly's she accepts death at her lover's hands.

The difference is, of course, that Orsino is only playing at jealousy, as he has played all along at love. It is not even clear whether it is Olivia or Viola he means to kill. But, throughout, their triangular relationship—delicately brought out, on two sides at least, in this production—is the central ambiguity of this strangely ambiguous play. An aura of desire, narrowly and deliciously averted, hangs over all the scenes.
between Orsino and his 'dear lad,' Viola/Cesario. At one point, as his page, she undresses him, draws off his gloves, takes his hat and cloak, half-caressing, half-shrinking from the touch. For both, pleasure and pain are intensified by the rôle she plays as go-between in his formal courtship of Olivia.

The cruelty latent in Orsino is blatant in Brewster Mason's Toby—none of your tedious, potbellied knights, this Sir Toby is a dangerous smooth man, much given to cocking one booted thigh across the other as he lounges in his large armchair. Jolly he may be, but there is nothing innocent in his jollity. If Sir Toby says it is the moneybags he wants from Aguecheek, Mr Mason makes it plain it is, in fact, the exercise of power. Drink with him is a prelude to a peculiarly subtle form of baiting, in which Sir Andrew is his victim and Feste both audience and partner.

Norman Rodway is a white-haired Fool, still agile but with a suspicion of stiffness in the joints; he gives the impression that the wind and the rain can't hold off for long. The favourite device, in their mutual pastime of twitting Sir Andrew, is, of course, the innuendo. It is perfectly possible to miss much in this play, but, faced with this Feste, even the most gullible would be hard put to it to share 'Q's' faith that he is 'the cleanest-mouthed' of Shakespeare's fools. In what strikes me as a distinctly Hotsonian production, Mr Rodway and his bauble have found double meanings where even Dr Hotson saw none. They fly to and fro above the head of David Warner's Sir Andrew—an anxious beanpole, following with dog-like eyes the shafts he can't follow with his mind. It is not for nothing that Sir Toby chooses to go through life under the sign 'legs and thighs.'

Not that this production is either goatish or brutal. But precisely because these two elements are present—and the three performances, Orsino, Toby, Feste, do more than anything else to set the tone—other, simpler charms come up brighter, like colours in a newly-restored picture. Chief of these is Diana Rigg's Viola, an exquisite performance which justifies all the compliments paid her within the play. 'Dian's lip is not more smooth and rubious' indeed. Shakespeare was, so far as can be guessed, thirty-seven when he wrote Twelfth Night, last of his comedies before the great tragedies. Mr Williams's production—and here the comparison which has been so freely bandied about, with the same director's Comedy of Errors, is meaningless; an obvious parallel is Peter Wood's sour and sweet Love for Love at the National Theatre—gives above all the Proustian impression, of looking back across time at the sweetness and self-deceptions of youth, equivocal, evanescent and all the more piercing for being beyond recall.

'I am not what I am,' says Viola. But nothing that is, is (to reverse what the old hermit of Prague so Wittily said to a niece of King Gorboduc), and they are none of them what they think they are—save only Sir Andrew who promptly and proudly recognises himself in Malvolio's description: 'I knew 'twas I, for many do call me fool.' Anyone who, seeing this production, can still think Twelfth Night a simple play might do worse than try Sir Andrew's cap to see if it fits.

I have no room for the remaining trio—Olivia, Maria, Malvolio. Ian Holm's Malvolio, an amazing performance, has been done justice elsewhere; Patsy Byrne is more of a Mopsa or a Dorcas than a Maria, but she has a pleasant line in hearty laughter; Estelle Kohler's Olivia is unfortunate, a boisterous, pushing schoolgirl—a born games captain in fact—disastrously out of her depths among this collection of wry sophisticates.

J. C. Trewin (review date 25 June 1966)

I used, in the primeval years, to attend a parish council meeting with a member who was so like Ian Holm's Malvolio that when this actor appeared in the Royal Shakespeare Company's Twelfth Night at Stratford-upon-Avon, I expected him to make an impassioned speech about footpaths. The aspect was similar:
the same baldness with the straggling lock, the same smudge of moustache, the odd comic resemblance—as of a very distant cousin—to the Shakespeare portrait.

Most of all, the likeness to my lost parish councillor was vocal. When Malvolio ballooned the ends of his sentences, pinched his vowels, barked suddenly like a choleric sergeant-major, or pressed the Letter speech through the mangle of his idiosyncratic pronunciation, I suddenly heard again those forgotten debates in which a village senate would send defiant resolutions to the Rural District Council. The resolutions never did any good, but at least they let off a good deal of steam.…

Malvolio, in this production by Clifford Williams, blows off steam furiously. He is a small man who, like some other small men, is resolved to be seen and heard: he goes through life, as it were, on tiptoe, snarling officiously when anyone larger impedes him. How he has trampled a path towards his current post, as Olivia's steward, nobody can really suggest. But there he is, always present, swelling with bullfrog fury, obsequious to his betters, a bully to his inferiors, and drilling the language until it must shriek for mercy. We do not sympathise with him, as we have to with some Malvolios: there is no room for regret even when, constricted by his cross-gartering, he moves before Olivia like a goose-stepping robot. And I cannot say that I felt strongly for him at the première when, having cried "I'll be revenged upon the whole pack of you," he plunged away in the Illyrian sunlight, one shoe on the other off, in a kind of urgent shamble. What the man's revenge will be, I have no idea. Possibly, red with rage, he will propose a devastating motion in some dim conclave or other, strutting stiffly to the front of the platform, every vowel and consonant jangling.

It is a comfort to think of this dire fellow because he is among the pleasures in a Twelfth Night that never gets very far. Visually, it has a certain elegance. The stage looks well, an uncluttered acting space with its musicians' gallery and its imaginative lighting. Besides Malvolio, the revival has Diana Rigg (back from television) as Viola, an actress who is loving, spirited, and true, even if she lacks the wistfulness of Jean Forbes-Robertson that must stay forever in the mind.

This said, little of the other acting will remain permanently burnished. Mr Williams has been at pains, I think, to mock the affectation of Orsino (Alan Howard) and of Olivia (Estelle Kohler), the first a near-burlesque of romantic passion, the second a mere kitten. Neither performance really works for me; and I cannot report that the Illyrian humorists are overwhelming in their sport royal. Sir Toby (Brewster Mason) and Maria (Patsy Byrne) are, for once, of the right Shakespearan rank—it is a relief to get away from the housemaid-Marias—but they are not particularly funny, in spite of Mr Mason's bright eye and Miss Byrne's contagiously shrilling laugh. David Warner's Sir Andrew is meagrely commonplace, except in the duel, when he and Miss Rigg seem to do everything but swallow their swords, and the musicians above look on with enthusiasm.

Though any collector of Twelfth Nights must cheer a new revival, I do wish that this one had more for the record book. It is not enough just to see Toby scribbling in haste a postscript to the letter from the Fortunate-Unhappy, or Andrew growling his way out to write the challenge to Viola. The speaking, generally, is mediocre. Possibly the night's most fruitful notion is the use of the musicians who are always there to observe the play and to aid its progress when needed.

Jeremy Kingston (review date 29 June 1966)

Clifford Williams directed a joyous Comedy of Errors a few years back and more recently extracted much hilarity from Marlowe's Jew of Malta. His Twelfth Night (Stratford-upon-Avon), altogether a trickier play, comes across as an uneven, rather lollipping affair. Excellently inventive at times—even making fresh sense of some obscure Shakespeare allusions—too many scenes give an impression of under-rehearsal. It was as if we were watching a run-through a week before opening night at the end of which the director would hop on to the stage with a file of notes and advise the cast where to give what bits the extra fillip. Perhaps in a week or two the fillips and the finish will be there.

Sally Jacobs' setting is a courtyard bounded by a line of high arches with a minstrels' gallery above. This leaves a large, generally bare acting area which the drawing of tapestries or the introduction of bushes or statues transforms into an inner room, garden or public square. So far, so sensible. Oddities of the production are an excessively languid Orsino and a far from proud Olivia (Estelle Kohler), coy, actively coquettish from the start, who literally flings herself at Viola/Cesario. I didn't care for the intention behind either of these interpretations. Brewster Mason's Sir Toby is a rounded performance but in a more restrained and thoughtful, more courtly vein than is customary. (Since he is Olivia's uncle, incidentally, there must be a fifty-fifty chance that her surname is Belch too, I suppose.)

The chief pleasures of the evening are provided by Diana Rigg's Viola and Ian Holm's Malvolio. Returning to the stage after her Emma Peel activities, Miss Rigg is persuasively shy and sweet and touchingly disarming in her direct addresses to the audience. Ian Holm is made up with bald dome and wispy whiskers to look like the Shakespeare head in the current "Heads of Fame" series on a well-known breakfast cereal packet. His strangled vowels and sharp barks of command are those of a diminutive sergeant-major who will always be passed over for RSM. I can't remember a Malvolio so short in stature—there is some comic byplay between him and David Warner's lofty Sir Andrew—and Mr. Holm's interpretation of the part as a man embittered by his lack of inches as much as by his lack of breeding is convincing as well as new. His resentment of festivity and heartiness is the envy of a wouldbe athlete too puny to jump over the horse, too unsure of his calf muscles to turn a cartwheel.

\textbf{Hugh Leonard (review date August 1966)}

An heroic Sir Toby, a grimly disenchanted Feste, a Snudge-like Malvolio, and a Viola who strides boyfully around Illyria with the bemusement of a twentieth-century Alice in a medieval rabbit warren: these are the ingredients of Clifford Williams' new production of \textit{Twelfth Night} at Stratford-upon-Avon. Shakespeare's alternative title for \textit{Twelfth Night} was \textit{What You Will}: which Mr Williams has evidently taken as a message personally intended for himself. It is not that he mixes his styles—at least not any more than Shakespeare did in inventing a fairyland with back-streets: what he has done is not to elect for any style in particular … certainly insofar as ensemble acting is concerned. An ill-assorted bunch of fools, decadents, swingers, melancholies, time-servers and transvestites is dropped into the deep end to sink or swim in defiance not only of dramatic unity but of the guiding principles of the Royal Shakespeare Company. The immorality of it all is that the mixture succeeds. Apart from the very occasional dull patch, the evening is an enchantment.

Illyria is England as seen through the eyes of a happy drunkard: or, rather, two drunkards—one above stairs, the other in the kitchen. (Despite the stage instruction which reads 'A room in Olivia's house', I have always imagined the Belch-Aguecheek-Maria scenes as happening deep in the sunless bowels of the house, under beamed ceilings and with the firelight glinting on pewter; everything here should be as darkly brown as ale.) Sally Jacobs' setting was most unEnglish: a coolly austere row of Roman arches which combined the merits of elegance and utility, and—more important—acted as a drawstring, so that the wildly incompatible elements of the play were united in a kind of shotgun marriage. The only real incongruity was that the musicians, although delightfully placed on what looked like the upper level of the aqueduct at Tarragona, found themselves pressed into service as the town band, given to playing in all the local stately homes in their spare time. No ale-brown corners here; but the set, if not atmospheric, was one of the things that saved Mr Williams' Bacon.
There were some magnificent touches: Sir Andrew's ecstatic dance, for example, which ended when he discovered that he was somehow partnering the enraged Malvolio. And when Maria says of Malvolio: '... he will come to her in yellow stockings, and 'tis a colour she abhors', everyone looked sorrowfully at Aguecheek, who at that moment realised that he had been fruitlessly wooing Olivia while dressed from head to foot in vilest yellow. Somehow, most of the innovations seemed to concern Sir Andrew, who was beautifully played by David Warner as a sheep that had been overlooked at slaughter-time. It is impossible to assess Mr Warner's performance without considering Brewster Mason's Sir Toby and Patsy Byrne's Maria. Mr Mason unaccountably chose to play Sir Toby as a nobleman first and a drunkard second. The fact is that, as suggested by his name, Belch is a malicious old swine, as illiterate as most of the nobility were in Shakespeare's day and for long afterwards. Mr Mason plays him like Sir Francis Drake between voyages … far too knightly and too British to provide any sort of comic contrast with Mr Warner's visiting Englishman. And Miss Byrne's Maria was over-familiar: we seem to have seen this performance from Miss Byrne before: and perhaps it is time for the RSC to start casting her against type. In the low-comedy scenes it was left to Mr Williams' inventiveness, to Mr Warner and to Ian Holm's Malvolio to get the laughs.

Mr Holm—whether revealed mercilessly in hair-curlers, paralysed by vicious cross-gartering or convulsing us with a phoney-genteel accent which Paul Scofield's government inspector would have envied—was magnificent. This Malvolio was not so far removed from the joyless little time-server who yelps for silence in a public house and is savagely beaten up, simply because his tone of voice begged for it. Mr Holm managed to be hateful, comic and tragic all at once, which is quite a feat. Norman Rodway as Feste gave us a man halfway out of a job. In his battle between expediency and principle, he almost taunts Olivia into dismissing him. His jokes are double-edged; he is saying to the observers: 'See how uncaring I am,' and, to Olivia: 'See how my humour suits your sadness'. Mr Rodway's performance is geared towards his dungeon scene with Malvolio: an acrid sequence which strikes a proper balance for the whole production. It is a nastily excellent piece of work, which began shakily as if Mr Rodway had temporarily forgotten just how fine an actor he is.

Then there was Diana Rigg as Viola. Nearly all of the critics have taken pleasure in reminding us that since Miss Rigg has played in a more ephemeral entertainment than Twelfth Night her performance here must be accorded the same indulgence as that shown to Samuel Johnson's walking dog. It is true that she is a modern Viola, just as Ian Holm has given us a modern Henry V. And so what? If her tightly-tailored behind is not that of a pageboy, Miss Rigg is all too comically aware of the fact. She speaks verse beautifully, precisely and with intelligence, and was far too good for the gloomy Orsino: she should have gone off with Malvolio and taught him a few songs and how to drink ale. Alan Howard's Orsino was fine, considering how dull the part is; as Olivia, Estelle Kohler showed plenty of life, but lacked polish; while there was a nicely dumbfounded Antonio from Godfrey Quigley. Guy Woolfenden's musical settings were splendid, as always.

The critics have complained that this production is variously too languorous, too harsh, too downbeat, too leisurely and too knockabout (one who apparently can't count described the setting as consisting of four arches). The play does, in fact, contain all these alleged shortcomings: they were in it when Shakespeare wrote it. If Mr Williams deserves criticism it is not for mixing his styles, but for failing to make palatable the mixture that was there to begin with. In the last analysis, what Shakespeare wrote was a superb piece of entertainment; and this, or very nearly, is what Mr Williams, his cast, musicians and designer have given us.

Robert Speaight (review date Autumn 1966)

Nothing that I had heard or read suggested that Mr. Clifford Williams' production of Twelfth Night was a good one. It seemed that he was trying to repeat his success with The Comedy of Errors by applying the same method to very different material. If you are out to debunk romanticism—a fashionable pastime in the contemporary theater—you will find that Shakespeare has already gone a good way in this direction, and that it is dangerous to out-pace him. As always, Shakespeare holds the balance, and the first business of the director—before he gives rein to his invention, and Mr. Williams' invention is exceedingly fertile—must be to hold the scales even. In this production they were not held quite evenly. There was no doubt of Viola's love for Orsino or of his for her—though he doesn't know it; no doubt, either, of Antonio's love for Sebastian' or of Viola's and Sebastian's for each other. Viola was quite right to play the "ring" soliloquy for high comedy; but Olivia's infatuation should be seen in three slightly different perspectives; as it appears to Viola, as it appears to the audience, and as it appears to herself. She must not be so absurd that we resist the notion of Sebastian succumbing to her charms, because Sebastian is an entirely serious person. The truth is that Olivia is a very solemn and very charming young woman with little sense of humor and rather more money than is good for her. Like many such people, she is something of a fool. Miss Kohler was less ostentatiously foolish than Miss Geraldine McEwan in the last Stratford production, but I still thought she could have done with an inch or two more of dignity and a more imperative hint of the châtelaine.

In the first part of the play the comedy was happily unforced, but there were moments, later, when it was either misplaced or toppled over into farce. Sebastian's bewilderment must be transformed into pure rapture by the time Olivia is leading him to that clandestine marriage. The duel can arguably be treated as slapstick, but not to the extent of turning these very real people into marionettes. Similarly, in the letter scene there must be some lingering pretence that the conspirators are neither seen nor over-heard. So the bias of Mr. Williams' production was certainly towards comedy, broader than the purist would approve of. That the balance was not altogether upset was mainly due to Miss Diana Rigg's gallant and resourceful Viola. At once vulnerable and adventurous, humorous and high-spirited, she had a kind of helpless humility which I found extremely moving. Only a tendency to start a sentence at the top of her voice and end it inaudibly marred the perfect execution of what had been perfectly imagined.

The best Viola is always worth more than the best Orsino, but here Mr. Alan Howard was a shade "o'erparted". Orsino is a difficult and not altogether rewarding role, and it demands a certain maturity of personality and technique, a certain elegance of address, a certain effortless authority. Mr. Rodway's Feste very wisely did not ask us to think that he was funny, for the whole point of Feste is that he exhausted his jokes years ago and has been sensibly pensioned off in a cottage for retired clowns. Having played the part myself, I sympathize with anyone attacking it who is not a singer. Mr. Rodway's discreet recitative was at least in tune, which mine was not. Mr. Mason's Toby was genially well-bred, and even when it was light in the head was never too heavy in the hand. In fact it could have done with rather more weight; one never quite felt that Toby was in charge. Mr. Warner's Aguecheek would have been better for "straighter" playing—this was casting such as a director dreams of, and it needed little or no embellishment. Miss Patsy Byrne was a splendid Maria, and there was a quite remarkable Fabian from Mr. Wylton. Fabian is as dull a part as Shakespeare wrote; yet here was Mr. Wylton lighting up not only his own corner of the stage, but several square yards around him. And what an example he set of rich, racy, rightly characterized, flexible, and easily audible speech!

Mr. Quigley's Antonio had a fine resonant romanticism, and for once the idea occurred to someone that if you are a pirate hoping to escape arrest the last thing you do is to look piratical. So instead of Long John Silver with both his legs on, we had a nondescript appearance and an anything but nondescript performance. But the masterpiece, and also in a sense the key, to this production was Mr. Holm's Malvolio. An old theatrical convention used to insist that Malvolio must be tall. This was knocked on the head some years ago at the Old Vic by Mr. Alec McOwen. His Malvolio was a fussy little wasp of a man; but where he suggested the sudden sting of a wasp, Mr. Holm, with even fewer inches, suggested the murmur of innumerable bees. He had his sting, of course, but it was anything but sudden. It emerged from a mysterious vocal gestation, of which Mr.
Holm's larynx alone has the prescription. The new convention insists that Malvolio comes from the "suburbs by the Elephant". This was conceived by Maurice Evans in 1939: carried on at Stratford by Sir Laurence Olivier; and has now been consummated, with sublime comic effect, by Mr. Holm. The result is that the play oscillates between an exchange of vows and an exchange of vowels.
We were promised, in one of the theater publications, "a deeper look" into Twelfth Night. Mr. Williams had not looked as deeply or as subtly as Mr. Hall in 1961, and my own taste is for a tenderer Twelfth Night. Where Mr. Hall was prepared to be as romantic as Shakespeare would let him, Mr. Williams did not avail himself of all the necessary permissions. But it would be priggish not to admit that this production was enormously diverting, even if now and then it won its laughs at rather too high a price. Miss Sally Jacobs' décor and costumes were rightly and handsomely Elizabethan, although they lacked Miss Lila de Nobili's russet autumnal glow; and it was a pleasure both to see and hear the musicians. I have never seen the conventions of the Elizabethan stage more dexterously adapted to modern usage.

BACKGROUND:

Barton's 1969-70 production took the course of providing what Gareth Lloyd Evans termed a "gravely lyrical interpretation of Shakespeare's work that derived from the text itself." Irving Wardle qualified his praise by stating "this is not the funniest or most inventive Twelfth Night I have seen; but I can remember no production that held all the comedy's elements in such harmony."

For many critics, the focal point of the production was Emrys James's Feste, which Simon Gray declared "a theatrical triumph." Donald Sinden's Malvolio was similarly praised by the majority of commentators. Speaight noted that Sinden's handling of the role in the vein of high comedy left "the right bitterness in the mouth when the play's flight from realism might have seemed too precipitate." Critics further praised Judi Dench's Viola and the Scottish eccentricity of Barry Jackson's Sir Andrew Aguecheek. Most reviewers, however, faulted Lisa Harrow's Olivia as a depressing portrayal that jarred with Illyria's reputation as a "sunny place." In judging the production as a whole, Benedict Nightingale concluded that it was "Barton's peculiar and perverse achievement to send us out of Shakespeare's 'happiest comedy' feeling that neither [Olivia and Orsino] nor anyone else will live happily ever after." In 1970 the production was transferred to the Aldwych Theatre in London with several cast changes, including Richard Pasco as Orsino, and Tony Church as Sir Toby Belch.

COMMENTARY:

Irving Wardle (review date 22 August 1969)

Having shown Troilus and Cressida through the eyes of Thersites, John Barton now gives us Feste's version of Twelfth Night: and again the fool proves himself the best guide to the play.

This is not the funniest or most inventive Twelfth Night I have seen; but I can remember no production that held all the comedy's elements in such harmony. Played amid fragile white properties, against a sombre background, it is in key with Feste's last song: its humour and melancholy both springing from a sense of transience underscored with music and the sound of the waves that lodged the two castaways on Illyria.
At present some parts of the production are not fully assimilated in the general pattern. Muted though the atmosphere may be, it could stand a less subdued Sir Toby than Bill Fraser's whose big moment comes only with the wintry dismissal of Aguecheek (which almost suggests Falstaff rejecting Hal). Conversely Donald Sinden's Malvolio seems to have wandered in from another production. It is an extremely knowing performance, avoiding the old tricks and finding new ways of getting laughs (struggling to get Olivia's ring off his finger): but anything as actorish as this jars against the prevailing mood.

A Scottish Aguecheek also stirred initial doubts. Why turn a prodigal into a bagpipe-toting tightwad grudgingly rummaging in his sporran for tips? However, Barrie Ingham amply justifies this reading by turning the Knight into a fully fledged clown capable of gymnastic feats (including a sensational back-fall) and for ever trudging after Olivia (Lisa Harrow) with pathetic little bunches of flowers. The presence of Feste is felt even in his absence. When he does appear he polarizes the action, creating those moments at which Shakespeare touches hands with Chekhov as in the "Catch" scene, which reduces Sir Andrew to tears and brings back Brenda Bruce's aging Maria after a false goodnight in the hope of luring Sir Toby to bed; or in the Tabour scene with Viola, where cross-talk gives way to music and unspoken communion, as the two characters sprawl out together ruefully surveying the human scene from some other plane.

Emrys James's grizzled Feste would hardly have commanded such effects, if the rest of the show had not been working for him: but he gives a most musical performance that blends the senses of long-term melancholy, and present pleasure. Judi Dench's Viola, suited seductively in olive green, is attuned to the same broken harmony and matches it with her characteristic inflections, that combine a chuckle with a catch in the throat.

Simon Gray (review date 29 August 1969)

Sir Toby Belch and Sir Andrew Aguecheek sit collapsed, their eyes rheumy with retrospection, while Feste, as he sings 'What is love?' Tis not hereafter', watches them with tender irony. Later the three of them, spurred on by a Maria of real feeling, are baiting Malvolio when suddenly, as if overcome by shame, they pause to stare at each other aghast. Finally, at the end of his performance as Sir Topas, Feste takes off his beard with a weary disgust, and so permits the audience to be completely charmed by him once more. In other words John Barton, who has achieved at Stratford an intelligent and sensitive account of this notoriously difficult play, has done so by filtering into its darkest corners some of the spirit that moves his fool, a fool so touching in his lapses that we easily forgive him his complicity in the Malvolio plot, and so enchanting in his tone that we forgive him even his appalling jokes. But Mr Barton's production is more than morally good and unusually coherent. It is also robust, funny and warm, full of shrewd observations and genuinely poignant moments. His conception of Feste has led him to a theatrical triumph.

Nevertheless his Feste is not Shakespeare's. The fool of the text is in places wryly wise and always consciously a dependent, a hack with a spiritual life; and his songs, of course, are beautiful. He is also malicious, with the malice of a man who cannot tolerate others knowing what he knows about himself. This Feste enjoys tormenting Malvolio, whose cold insights ('I marvel your ladyship takes delight in such a tavern rascal … unless you laugh and minister to him, he's gagged') constitute a real threat to his powers of enchantment, and thus to his vanity. Mr Barton's Feste agrees in a tone of self-redeeming compassion to bring 'the light and paper, and ink' for Malvolio's letter, and so helps us to forget that Shakespeare's fool subsequently and callously fails to deliver the letter itself. Mr Barton's Feste touches us into more than tolerance with his gesture of shame, and so helps us to forget that Shakespeare's Feste crows triumphantly over the released and now publicly humiliated Malvolio. It is not that in these places Mr Barton has molested the text—rather that by placing the stress elsewhere, by humanely filling in Shakespeare's brutal blanks, he has created a fool who is incapable of doing and saying what he actually says and does; and the audience, like the production, can then pretend he hasn't.
As it is with Feste, so it is with every character in the production. Judi Dench's Viola, for instance, is far too delightful to take advantage of Olivia or in any other way embarrass the audience. When she comes to woo for Orsino's sake, she chortles out the great love passage in a spirit of exuberant parody; and when Malvolio brings her the ring, she receives it with an innocent astonishment that deftly prepares the way for her tremulous 'Disguise, I see thou art a wickedness'. From then on, and perfectly consistently, she reacts to Olivia's overtures with a cleansingly comic gaucheness. But that initial speech—'Make me a willow cabin'—is not a classic of romantic persuasiveness for nothing. If it is ironic in its exaggerations, it is also insidiously enticing in its rhythms—rhythms that Miss Dench's rendering inevitably coarsens. And though Shakespeare's Viola may act out a sly astonishment when she is left alone to contemplate Olivia's confusion, she has already been too revealingly quick-witted with Malvolio—'She took the ring of me, I'll none of it'—and given something about herself away. Shakespeare's Viola, in fact, is a much more knowing girl than Mr Barton's, much more complex, and consequently the comedy in her relationship with Olivia is both more intensely erotic and altogether more dangerous—it's a comedy that cuts cynically through all our illusions about the nature of romantic love to the amoral and chaotic emotions that merely adopt romantic postures as a disguise and for self-disguise. Only Shakespeare's nerve, the elegant confidence with which he defines the limits of his Illyria and the aplomb with which he converts his analysis into seeming playfulness, prevents us from finding the comedy as a whole repellent. We are, in other words, seduced into believing that the instinct for order in comic art will always prevail over the anarchy of our inner lives. But still he lingers in the memory to remind us that Illyria is after all an illusion that has been fashioned out of much potential, and some actual, pain.

Well, it probably seems perverse to blame Mr Barton for not going far enough into the dark when almost every other review has only qualified its praise in wondering whether he hasn't gone too far. And above all it would be ungracious to end without again saluting a production that is informed in its every moment, and by every member of its cast, with intelligence and humanity. If we haven't got a Twelfth Night that has met the play's most disturbing challenges head on, then we can at least be grateful that we have been given one that has profited richly from the way in which it has avoided them.

Hilary Spurting (review date 30 August 1969)

Devotees of the spectacular, or for that matter of pantomime and magic spangles, must have been especially pleased by the light, fantastic style devised this year at Stratford for Pericles and The Winter's Tale. Clearly a scheme based on these two plays, with Henry VIII to come, should ideally have included Cymbeline or, failing that, The Tempest and preferably both. Clearly, on the other hand, the kind of audiences who flock enthusiastically to Stratford might reasonably be expected to stand for only so much of Shakespeare's unfamiliar, and comparatively abstruse, last things. However entrancing they may be in practice, in theory the late romances are not what one might call box office gold. And so we have Twelfth Night which, one can't help feeling, must have been envisaged as something of a spanner in this season's works.

Whatever the reason, John Barton's production shows sinister signs of compromise. 'This comedy prefigures the final romances', explains a programme note; and, in the sense that the plot turns on freaks of time, on storm and shipwreck, supposed death and a family reunion at the end, it well may do. But the play's gaiety is not much enhanced by Mr Barton's jettisoning all the simpler jokes in favour of a kind of wintry melancholy. The gravity which, against the opulent stagings of the earlier productions, seemed delicately austere, here seems merely drab, not to say pedantic. And I cannot see that, just because the sea pervades Pericles and figures largely in The Winter's Tale, that is any reason why waves should pound and gurgle in the wings throughout Twelfth Night.
Admittedly, this device works handsomely the first time: when, after the music of the opening scene, Orsino vanishes, the court is whisked away and doors fly open at the back on Viola, appearing in a puff of smoke—which, on second thoughts, turns out to be a wisp of sea spray curling round her ankles. Christopher Morley's set is a magnificent great hall, receding according to the symmetrical perspective of which the Renaissance was so fond, dwindling to a point and built of wooden slats. Barred sunlight, trellised walks and neat silvery trees in tubs suggest the costly artificiality of Illyrian manners, in sharp contrast to Viola coming ashore in rags, attended by a captain and two seamen, all piratically louche. This moment, like the plot itself, has an unreality at once theatrical, mysterious and fetchingly bizarre. One has glimmerings of what might have been—indeed, considering this company's flair for reshaping its productions in performance, what still may be—a remarkable conception.

Certainly Charles Thomas, as Orsino, has the right combination of sensual grace and elaborate fatigue, of youth and spirits hopefully concealed beneath a studiously frowzy front. And Judi Dench's Viola, so humorous and dapper, so attentive to her master and so composedly distressed, is a charming creature. As for Donald Sinden's Malvolio—a portly soul struggling to get out of an absurdly spindly body—it is the masterpiece of this production. To switch, as Mr Sinden has done in the past three years, from Lord Foppington to Not Now Darling—in which he was an incomparably smooth and bland farceur—and now Malvolio argues him, in every sense, a man of truly formidable parts.

But even Mr Sinden's road winds uphill much of the way in Olivia's unaccountably depressed, and often positively morbid, household. Brenda Bruce's Maria—a leathery lady with scraggy bun and snappish voice—shows small sign of the pert flirt; her advances to Sir Toby suggest rather the despondency of one sinking fast into a lonely and embittered spinsterhood. Bill Fraser as a despised, unwanted and dependant elderly relative is both accurate and sad but not, I think, Sir Toby Belch. Emrys James's Feste is picturesque and wistful, as well he might be on this job, and Lisa Harrow makes a shrill and unimpressive Olivia. The best of this glum bunch is Barrie Ingham's Andrew Aguecheek, a lank Scotsman nourishing the huge, secret and surprising vanity which sometimes breeds in northern parts.

Nothing, in short, becomes this production—unless perhaps its magical opening sequence—like the leaving of it: a splendid formal confrontation in which, when Viola finds Sebastian, she also finds, in this gay and dashing brother (Gordon Reid), for once her mirror image.

Jeremy Kingston (review date 3 September 1969)

For the young lovers in Twelfth Night the last scene brings them all their hearts desire. Twins are reunited, boys turn out to be girls, a double marriage is arranged. Then the mood is interrupted—though not so much interrupted as permanently modulated into something profounder than the conventional happy end of romance. With one terse, tremendous line—"I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you!"—Malvolio flings himself out of the play. And lest we think this scene merely is an interruption in the happy story the clown Feste stays on the otherwise emptied stage to give us his ambiguous song about the wind and the rain, man's estate and the sadness of life.

Because Twelfth Night, a play full of mirth, is shot through with sadness. John Barton's superb production at Stratford-upon-Avon realises this melancholy chiefly through the person of Feste, the white-faced clown wandering between Orsino's court and Olivia's household, commenting upon their follies in banter and song. The other characters are all familiar with his songs; they hum the tunes quietly to themselves when alone. Emrys James's "Come, mistress mine," brings tears to the eyes of the knights. His "Come away, death," does the same to Orsino. During the second verse of this song Mr. James circles Charles Thomas (Orsino) with a curious dragging walk, pressing his hand to his brow, excessively underlining the melancholy until one realises that the grief expressed is excessive. He is using the song as a reproof. Orsino, of course, is too wrapped up in self-pity to notice but Judi Dench's Viola is sharp enough to see what he's on about.

Miss Dench's Viola is a beautifully imagined performance. Brave and firm from her first appearance on the Illyrian shore she shows touchingly her understanding of love's sorrows, whirling the poignancy away by following a catch in her throat with a light laugh—smiling at grief, something this actress has always been able to do perfectly. Tender comedy sparkles between her and Lisa Harrow's gravely charming Olivia.

The knightly revels are sad too. Barrie Ingham's Sir Andrew is a knight of a woeful countenance. Bill Fraser's Toby is more often gloomy than not. Even Maria (Brenda Bruce) trails pensively after him, always hoping he will raise her from mistress to wife.

The comedy chiefly accompanies Donald Sinden's Malvolio. Absurdly humorous in his demand for formality his characterisation can be guessed from his reaction to Olivia's, "Run after that same peevish messenger." "Run?" he echoes (a director's addition) in accents of appalled amazement. Then slowly, high-stepping, he runs. Mr. Sinden is so powerful a comic actor he must adorn and decorate any part he plays. The result is very funny indeed but by making us enjoy his company so much he goes dangerously near tearing the play open.

The sourest joke in Shakespeare is the locking of Malvolio in the dark cellar but it indicates (as does the title) that Shakespeare's golden view of the world has come to an end. Twelfth Night is the last in a string of comedies and histories: after it comes Hamlet. At the end of this production Mr. Barton shows the four lovers stepping back along the airy tunnel of wicker lattices to their own happy wonderland. Malvolio, Antonio, Feste veer sideways into the wings.

Robert Cushman (review date October 1969)

But tell me true' asks Feste of Malvolio 'are you not mad indeed or do you but counterfeit? A strange emphasis, and not, I think, one which many actors would employ of their own accord. It jerked me out of the stupor into which I had been cast by the slackest Sir Topas scene in my recollection, and set me wondering what Feste could possibly mean by it. A reference to bis own masquerade as Master Parson perhaps, but Malvolio is hardly in a position to see the joke. Anyway that seemed much too simple, too specific. There was about the delivery the weighty self-consciousness which Royal Shakespeare actors are apt to signal that though they cannot quite fit this reading into their characterisation they will do it this way to oblige the director who thinks that it has great thematic significance.

What in fact was happening, I decided, was that John Barton was digging me in the ribs and remarking that this was a play in which everyone was a madman or a pretender or both, and in which sanity and frenzy, reality and illusion, were so intermixed that only a jester could hope to distinguish them. All of which is true but out, surely, of Feste's ken (I would say consciousness but the word is overworn) as a participant in the action, which is how, when engaged in discourse with another character, he must be regarded. For moments like these the actors should perhaps be equipped with portable 'thinks' bubbles.

The madness theme is assiduously pursued. When Sebastian enters and canvasses (weakly) the possibility of his own or Olivia's insanity his meditations are counterpointed by the offstage howling of the madly-used Malvolio. When Olivia appears to waft him to the altar she brings with her, as the priest demanded by the text, the very Sir Topas Feste has just impersonated. I would rather it had been the old hermit of Prague that never saw pen and ink, but Sir Topas will do. During the final scene all references to madness or to being and seeming are approached with wary reverence while any mention of the sea (and, give them their due, I had never realised before just how many there are in Twelfth Night) is enough to bring the proceedings to a dead
In turning on the sound-effects even for such fleeting references as Orsino's description of his love ('as hungry as the sea, And can digest as much') Barton is taking Shakespeare's Imagery and What It Tells Us altogether too solemnly. Such punctilious underlining can only render the words ridiculous. (And if that is the idea it is hardly necessary in a production which already has Charles Thomas as Orsino writhing on the ground in an ecstasy of love-sick self-indulgence so heavily accentuated as to outpace the text.) But even those who find the device acceptable must grant that it bulks larger than it should, not so much through its own forcefulness as through lack of challenging interest elsewhere.

For if you take Twelfth Night to be a dramatised Feast of Misrule, if you carefully emphasise all the relevant lines, and if your learned lady-wife backs you up in a closely-argued programme note, the one quality your production cannot afford is tameness. But here inertia, so to speak, runs riot. Sir Toby (Bill Fraser) enters, turns downstage, and informs the world in general that he is sure care's an enemy to life. That's him taped, but at no point thereafter does he behave as though he believed in his admirable axiom. His best moment is his very last, his scornful rejection of Sir Andrew. In accordance with current Stratford practice this is played to the hilt; but how much crueller it could have seemed, with half the effort, had there been any contrasting warmth in their earlier scenes. Barrie Ingham's Andrew, a scion of the clan MacAguecheek, is at first blush an admirable conception; he is clearly marked out as a stranger in town (London must have been full of him as the Tudors gave place to the Stuarts) and he does some funny things with bagpipes. But where Shakespeare intended dialect comedy he invariably made ample phonetic provision in the lines.

Brenda Bruce is a tart, efficient Maria. Incidentally, how does Mrs Barton work out that her marriage to Toby is 'the coldest of off-stage bargains'? Since it does take place off-stage, we are hardly in a position to judge of its warmth anyway, but Toby makes enough admiring not to say possessive remarks about the future Lady Belch for us to assume some willingness on his part. The match is announced in a speech whose general tone is festive and conciliatory. The Barton view gives Miss Bruce a whole new man-trapping subtext to play out; she is plainly out to provide for her old age, only too well aware that youth's a stuff will not endure. Feste's warning is hardly needed; indeed, finely though Emrys James speaks and sings the part, he is doomed in this company to seem a tireless stater of the obvious.

But Feste's fate is nothing compared to what has befallen Malvolio. Pity the killjoy without a sport to spoil. The whole comic balance of the play has been tilted for there is more joyousness in Donald Sinden's pride of office than in any of those who oppose him. His first word—a massive, sneering 'Yes'—rocked the theatre; not only was it magnificently funny, it was the first laugh of the evening, a cathartic release for the entire audience. The Puritan, it was evident, was our true Lord of Misrule and to him alone could we look for cakes and ale. Here, if only by default, was a reading of staggering subtlety. There were more jewels to come but they were strung increasingly thin; lacking adequate support (the box-tree conspiracy can never have gone for less) the performance foundered. It serves though as an interesting reminder of the extent to which this company depends on virtuoso performances (by Sinden or Ian Richardson or David Waller) for success in broad comedy. As a group they're no fun at all.

In the comedy of sentiment they are generally much more adroit, and doubtless when Orsino has picked himself up and Olivia has developed a firmer line and Sebastian has been replaced, these scenes will come into their own.

Judi Dench is ahead already; her untarnished freshness has never been more welcome. She alone is fully mistress of those strange RSC inflections: 'Who'er I woo myself would be his … WIFE' she exclaims and for once we are listening not to an academic demonstration of the paradox of Viola's situation but to the girl herself. The rest of the production owes it to her to improve.
Robert W. Speaight (review date Winter 1969)

When after 50 years of playgoing you cast your eye down a program of Twelfth Night, pick out the characters of Orsino, Feste, Maria, Aguecheek, Malvolio, Viola, and Olivia, and conclude that you have never seen these parts better played, and rarely played as well—when you leave the theater with tears in your eyes and laughter on your lips—then the performance you have seen bids fair to be definitive. Of course the bid fails because there are always other things to say, and another generation of actors and directors knocking on the door to say them. But John Barton's Twelfth Night of 1969 was the best, absolutely, that I remember. Peter Hall, in the first year of his directorate, was aiming at very much the same effect, but in the case of Olivia and Feste pushed his theory too far. Olivia was silly, but she was not as silly as all that. Feste was passé, but he was still a professional clown—knowing his business well enough to amuse Olivia, enrage Malvolio, and earn a testril from Aguecheek. If you push Olivia too far in the direction of silliness, and Feste too far in the direction of melancholy, you distort the balance of the play.

Mr. Barton's production has been described as Twelfth Night seen through the eyes of Feste. It is the right perspective. The mood was autumnal, the costumes Elizabethan, and the place a purely fanciful Illyria with white trees and perfectly contemporary garden chairs in a gold setting—as timeless as the play itself. Here Emrys James's Feste was quietly in command—seeing everything and through everything, and singing with delicate accomplishment about many of the things that he saw. Lisa Harrow's Olivia was a spoilt innocent, whom Viola and Sebastian between them matriculated into life. Judi Dench's Viola, vulnerable, resourceful, gallant and gay, brought the realities of emotional as well as physical shipwreck into a world where Orsino was reading too much Spenser and Sidney for the good of his soul, and where Olivia had too much money. Charles Thomas brought out better than I have ever seen it brought out before the therapeutic effect of Viola's arrival at his court; and Judi Dench—who is one of the half dozen best actresses on the English stage—stabbed his heart, and ours, with a matador's certainty of aim. One is always waiting, in any production of Twelfth Night, for the great moments—Aguecheek's "I was adored once too" [II. iii. 181] Viola's "Willow cabin" and "It gives a very echo to the seat where love is throned" [II. iv. 22] the recognition of Sebastian—and each time the blade struck home.

If the mood of this production was autumnal, and therefore attuned both to poetry and emotion, the humours were given hilarious rein. Feste earned his laughs as well as his testrils, and a Scots Aguecheek trailing his bagpipes was a brilliant invention, and brilliantly executed by Barrie Ingham. Brenda Bruce was a sparkling, and properly mature, Maria—accepting Sir Toby with certain legitimate misgivings. In a sense more than physical, Donald Sinden's Malvolio towered above his persecutors—a bigger man than they, for all his grotesque infatuation. This was a superb performance in the vein of high comedy, leaving the right bitterness in the mouth when the play's flight from realism might have seemed too precipitate. Toby's repudiation of Aguecheek had the same salutary sting. It was one of many original touches which brought the play to us as if we were seeing it for the first time—like the howling of the gale outside the gilded cage of Orsino's palace; reality at odds with romanticism—each claiming its rights. They were distributed here with a quite exquisite impartiality, meaning distilled and melody carefully conveying it. All comedies are comedies of errors, and in Twelfth Night the mistaken identities are only the least of them. Mr. Barton and the Royal Shakespeare Company left us thinking very hard about the others.

Irving Wardle (review date 7 August 1970)

Substantially recast since its first appearance a year ago, John Barton's Twelfth Night arrives at the Aldwych having undergone one of those transformations that often overtake productions on the road from Stratford to London.

Originally this seemed to be Feste's Twelfth Night: a shifting perspective of romantic ardour and romantic folly seen through the eyes of the Fool against an everpresent sense of the effects of time.

The main emphasis has been displaced to a contrast between the play's lyricism and broad comedy: and with much of the fun knocked out of the comedy. You might almost describe the result as an economic interpretation: on one side Orsino and Viola with money enough to surrender to delicate emotion; and on the other, the creatures of Olivia's household, all (including Barrie Ingham's Scottish skinflint Aguecheek) materially enslaved to the queen bee.

If anyone earns the central place it is Donald Sinden's Malvolio: the agent of so much fear in the household, and finally the most wounded member of all—broken double under the weight of his humiliation, and stumbling off stage after handing Olivia his chain of office. It is not a happy household.

Aguecheek trudging hopelessly after Olivia with a withered bunch of flowers is a dilapidated, balding wreck, at least as pathetic as comic. While Leslie Sands's Sir Toby (replacing Bill Fraser) is a joker as much obsessed with profit as Feste: a broken-winded old pug who exerts himself as little as possible (he is continually reaching out a great paw to grab passing victims without himself moving an inch) and drops all pretense of fun as soon as there is no more to be gained from it: as in his collapse into fearful apprehension in the Sir Topas scene, and in his final vindictive casting-off of his wretched companion.

Most startling and persuasive of the group is Elizabeth Spriggs's Maria: no longer the usual bundle of fun, but a prim Edinburgh housekeeper in gold rimmed spectacles, besotted with Sir Toby and only mounting the Malvolio intrigue with the purpose of luring him into marriage. She has sudden, instantly suppressed, burst of indecorous humour.

But the essence of the reading appears after the carousel scene where she steals back hoping to catch Sir Toby alone, only to be packed off blubbering by the selfish old brute ("It is too late to go to bed"); or, right at the end, in the glare of possessive indignation she throws at Sebastian for having clobbered her hero.

Blindly supervising this fearful, mean-spirited household is Lisa Harrow's Olivia: a Shakespearian Marie Antoinette, quite oblivious of everything taking place outside the range of her amorous obsession, and caressing her people like stray dogs.

This is the most austere Twelfth Night I have seen. It does permit an all-out comic treatment of some passages: notably Malvolio's letter scene, which Mr. Sinden has worked out in beautiful fresh detail, picking out the commas for clues in M.O.A.I., and automatically correcting the sun-dial in the midst of his fantasies of greatness. It does not fare too well with the romance.

Richard Pascos Orsino gives that awkward part a welcome male vigour. But Judi Dench's Viola, although backed up with a murmuring ocean and seductively set off in olive velvet, works too hard to extract new harmonics from the familiar lines. She responds with great sensitivity to the continual changes of mood and colour: but it is all done in slow motion, and for much of the time one just longs for her to get on with it. In the surrounding context, though, she has to put up a solo fight against the dominant anti-romantic bias.

Christopher Morley's set, a latticed cell illuminates from outside, undergoes beautiful transformations from pannelled interior to pastoral sunshine. It is one of the RSC's happiest variations on its current visual model.

Benedict Nightingale (review date 21 August 1970)
If we're to believe Simon Gray, who reviewed it for the NS from Stratford last year, John Barton's Twelfth Night was a notably gloomy business, dominated by a Feste so black and brooding he'd make Lear's Fool look like a maypole. The production has now moved south, to the Aldwych, and thawed; though not quite enough, perhaps, or not in the right places. Illyria is not yet the cosy, irresponsible place Shakespeare is generally agreed to have postulated. Indeed, there's no difference in kind between the visiting twins and the natives of the place. Those who would take them to stand for realism and romanticism respectively will not receive much comfort from Barton's production. Everyone exists on or near some middle level of feeling: there are no extremes of gaiety or torment, no highs or horrible lows. The atmosphere is that of a party after the most amusing guests have left, and the survivors are beginning to sober up—edgy, querulous, still slightly sottish, but no longer sottishly happy.

It is Olivia's household that seizes the attention and sets the tone. Leslie Sands's lumbering Belch has a half-drowned look, and carouses more from habit than enthusiasm. He feels his age, and so do Barrie Ingham's Ague-cheek, a scrawny, loveless highlander, dandling bagpipes, and Elizabeth Spriggs's Maria, a governness from the genteel lowlands. All this Scotmanship is no more than a lazy way of tickling gratuitous laughter out of a situation that ought to be funny enough already; nevertheless, Miss Spriggs's performance does have distinct merits of its own.

The 'beagle, true-bred' is usually played as a game young bitch whose affection for Toby is entirely inexplicable: why burden herself with a lopsided old soak, even if he has a title of sorts? But Miss Spriggs's beagle is older, plainer and visibly hunting for a man, any man. Sands's Toby knows this, and bullies her meanly; she tricks Malvolio into his yellow stockings, less for revenge than to ingratiate herself with this insensitive lover. Miss Spriggs's achievement is to reconcile all this with a ladylike, indeed prim exterior. She is the kind of embryo old maid who wears a hip-flask under her garter and daydreams of bawling 'bloody' at her employer; if her spectacles glint, so do the eyes underneath them. One senses depths of vulgarity in her, long repressed, determined to find expression.

It is somewhat the same with Emrys James's malicious, gleeful Feste and Donald Sinden's Malvolio, who looks and sounds like some archetypally Eminent Victorian, heavy, stern and physically unable to smile. Both are well individualised performances, but neither they nor the others generate much fun. Barton seems not nearly so interested in mounting entertaining practical jokes as in exploring the character of their inventors and emphasising the cruelty of their effects. He makes far less of Sinden's amorous posturing before Olivia than of Sinden imprisoned: a great black bull, tethered and roaring from his pen; and then half-emerging, white-faced and disconcertingly human, to rail, like Dr Arnold, at those who ought to be his prefects' fags. But then Barton is an unusually serious-minded director, even by the solemn standards of today, and we should not be surprised by this—or, for that matter, by his handling of Orsino's court.

This is even more depressing than Olivia's household fundamentally is. She, Olivia, is played by Lisa Harrow as a skittish, smug girl who would scarcely command the respect she's inexplicably accorded by her brawling retinue; he, Orsino, played by Richard Pasco, sits hunched among candles, scowling unhappily at the darkness beyond him and thoroughly bewildering such as Judi Dench's Viola. Is this really the pleasant country her father told her of? The love-sickness of this Orsino, if less than suicidal, certainly seems greater and madder than that of the conventional swain Shakespeare actually created. His threat at the end to 'kill what I love' isn't just another romantic excrescence: it looks genuinely murderous for a moment. Well may Miss Dench, a vivid, sweet, pained, misused girl, steel herself for the slaughter. It doesn't happen, of course: they get married instead—but for what? It is Barton's peculiar and perverse achievement to send us out of Shakespeare's 'happiest comedy' feeling that neither they nor anyone else will live happily ever after.

Peter Roberts (review date October 1970)
A Freak Thunderstorm on the second night of the London showing of John Barton's revival of Twelfth Night at least ensured one experienced the production in a way denied the many enthusiasts who had queued to see it at last year's Stratford-on-Avon season. And if they think they were fortunate not to have to sit in the Aldwych with empty ice cream cartons bobbing like miniature gondolas around their damp feet, as Malvolio (Donald Sinden) stood, fearful of being electrocuted, waist deep in the water engulfing his pit, then all I can say is they never had it so good.

At least, I doubt very much whether any of them found themselves being applauded at the end of the performance by the cast. I doubt, too, whether their appreciation of the revival's use of seacoast sound effects could have been quite as extraordinary as ours when it was realised that nature had taken over from art: that the thunderclaps out-side the theatre had replaced the taped sound of an Illyrian sea coast inside. In the circumstances a unique audience/actor contact was understandably set up as the play closed to the familiar words:

> When that I was and a little tiny boy,
> With hey, ho, the wind and the rain,
> A foolish thing was but a toy,
> For the rain it raineth every day.

Well, they don't make such perfectly timed rain like that every day in London just as revivals such as this Twelfth Night are a once-in-a-lifetime occurrence.

Its subtlety is what I am going to have to settle reluctantly for as the overall quality that makes this revival so satisfying. I say 'reluctantly', because subtlety is a hard quality to convey in a few hundred words as well as sounding awfully like an OK word for implying you enjoyed something in a complex way without being bright enough to explain the hows and whys.

Anyway here goes. Christopher Morley's slatted set is subtle because it seems to be merely an enclosed empty space of the sort approved by Peter Brook. In fact, it serves many purposes. At times exterior lighting transforms it from a solid Tudor Chamber into a frail fairytale structure that looks as though it might float away on the next whiff of poetry. Stephanie Howard's Tudor costumes, Michael Tubbs' music arranged from traditional sources and Brian Harris' impression of candle-lit presentation all help to reinforce the suggestion of an Elizabethan production in one of the capital's Great Halls, whilst at the same time avoiding a cumbersome reproduction of some imaginary revival of Twelfth Night that might have been watched by the Virgin Queen herself or perhaps her successor who, of course, was no virgin.

John Barton's direction is subtle, because he has thrown no one blanket interpretation over the play and forced the words and the cast to conform to that single viewpoint. Rather he and his cast keep a tight rein on the more familiarly beautiful passages so that the production's highlights are not confined to sections that find their way into Golden Treasuries or Anthologies of The Best of Shakespeare. Sometimes the lines are emphasised to underscore points that tend to get lost in productions more bent on bringing out the mellow beauty of the verse. For example the parallel of Olivia's lamenting the death of a brother and Viola's trying not to grieve the loss of hers is pointedly made. Elsewhere the lines are stretched to accommodate meanings they do not obviously hold. The example here is that Sir Toby and Maria (a vulnerable middle-aged country housekeeper in Elizabeth Spriggs' performance) have slept together for years and their plot-tying marriage in the play is thus the making official of something that's long been looked at with a blind eye.
The play's manic-depressives go to Lisa Harrow and Richard Pasco. The torment Olivia has already begun to experience a sharp swing of the pendulum when Judi Dench's sunny Viola comes to perk her out of her gloom, whilst Richard Pasco's Orsino remains in heavy-lidded and long-coated abstraction until the flurry of weddings at the play's close. The sane man, taken for mad, Malvolio, is given interesting treatment by Donald Sinden who makes the fellow look like Michael Hordern, though the audience, which is taken into the character's confidence in an uncamp Frankie Howerd style, gets the treatment in Sinden's best basso register.

There are no weak links in the cast, though one has to say that Emrys James, who made so notable an impression as the Boss in The Plebeians Rehearse the Uprising, now shows that he has the versatility to make an impressively gentle Feste. And Barrie Ingham, currently this season's Leontes in The Winter's Tale, switches effortlessly to Sir Andrew Aguecheek who is given bagpipes and a Scottish accent, and works wonders with them without resort to scene-stealing eccentricities.

Go and see this production, then, for though I cannot promise you rain other than that mentioned in the text, I think you will be struck by Barton's subtle treatment of the androgynous paths here depicted for love's fulfilment, which I have not even mentioned crudely here. …

Gareth Lloyd Evans (review date 1970)

The penultimate production of the season—Twelfth Night—was awaited with interest and perhaps some trepidation, in view of the published announcements that it was to be linked with the last plays. Expectation was utterly confounded. John Barton has created the most visually graceful, most intelligently ordered production of this season. The vast stage area is gone, replaced by an elegant set, resembling an angular tunnel in perspective, but, with its candelabra and suggestion of wattle, redolent of an Elizabethan Hall. Illyria, unlike Bohemia, is somewhere. No musique concrète or 'pop' astound the air; the aural background to Orsino's part of Illyria is the dim sound of the sea and curlews crying.

Mr Barton has taken his interpretation from the text and not dressed it in contemporary reach-me-up-or-downs. It seems a simple thing to declare that when Shakespeare is allowed to speak to the director, the actors themselves seem to find it easier to 'give' without worrying about how much of Shakespeare they are expected to withhold; yet, on the evidence of Twelfth Night this would seem to be almost a law of nature. There is indeed a distinct contrast between the general acting standard of this production and the others of the season—much to the detriment of the latter.

The tone of the interpretation is gravely lyrical. The comedy is an obbligato and not a raison d'être. Andrew Aguecheek's zanniness is here encased in a Scots accent—a procedure which itself gives a quality of lurking melancholy to the character. His by-play with the bagpipes is stridently funny, but always controlled. This Aguecheek (Barrie Ingham's finest performance at this theatre) is no mere daft gull. His hopeless affection for Olivia is emphasized by pathetic gifts of flowers; his need for friendship, devoid of Toby's commodity, is suggested by his pathetic but curiously dignified appeals in the eyes and his occasional snatchng up of the nearest female hand to kiss. Toby Belch is very much the black sheep of a noble family, aware of his precarious station and, indeed, of his alcoholic fecklessness. He spends his time in Illyria on a slippery slope and has much of self-reproach in him. Maria stands, either actually or in spirit, at his side, throughout. She herself, is ageing, left on the shelf; she waits desperately for the word from him, and what she often gets is a dusty answer. The words 'Tis too late to go to bed, now' are spoken to her. Olivia is bewildered and very young, giving the sense that unexpected family responsibility has sapped her youth of the opportunity to learn judgement and, indeed, real love. Orsino broods upon his love with dark melancholic brows. In the end he seizes his chance, not like a covetous and peremptory prince, but like a youngster (a Romeo) who has mewled…
about ideal love and compromises with a sweet actuality which, unknown to him, is as near to the ideal as he will ever achieve.

Love, of all kinds, gravely finds its own places in Barton's Illyria. Even Viola seems to be part of an inevitability rather than, as is customary, a prime agent in the ordering of Illyria's heart.

Time and time again the production illuminates the text, not only by the intelligent and lyrical speaking and the sharpness with which the wit is observed, but in by-play and the intelligent placing of lines. Malvolio (who, alone, is unsought by the spirit of love and therefore Illyria can have none of him) cannot remove the ring from his finger to give to Viola; 'We three' are hear, speak and see no evil; Viola's hand intermittently pulls her doublet down over her pubic areas with shy fright.

This production is a superb demonstration of the difference between imposed and acquired interpretation. The truth is that, in this case, because the director himself has 'experienced' the text rather than forced it to experience him, we in the audience 'share' the production. This 'sharing' is an important matter. One of the weaknesses of the kind of directorial interpretation which is more imposed upon, than acquired from, the text, is that it often places a gap between audience and realized performance. On a simple level this can be described as a process in which the audience is forced to come to conclusions on matters which do not grow from the text—hence they are sometimes left darkling. On another level, an audience sometimes feels that, after leaving the theatre, something has been 'taken away' rather than 'added to' them. Imposed interpretation almost always diminishes not only the quality of audience experience but also the potency of the play.

Twelfth Night is not the sort of play which induces actors to make the fire bells ring and the horses run. Yet, in Barton's production, because the play is respected, the actors find faith in themselves, and we hear, from them, the sounds of lutes and viols—this is as it should be.

Donald Sinden (essay date 1985)

[In the following essay, Sinden analyzes his performance as Malvolio for Barton's 1969-70 production of Twelfth Night.]

Why is it so difficult to record in words a theatrical performance? Critics such as Hazlitt, Coleridge, Agate and Tynan have given us their own responses to certain performances; and we have some heavily annotated scripts of actors and actresses such as Sarah Siddons and Ellen Terry. But I cannot recall an attempt by an actor to analyse his own performance, to set down what he thought and did, what he tried to achieve, where and how he succeeded, move by move. That is what I am attempting here. Not that I think my interpretation of Malvolio in 1970 was definitive—no Shakespearean performance ever is. I do think it fitted John Barton's conception of Twelfth Night, however, and it was well received by the public.

I first saw Twelfth Night at Stratford-upon-Avon in 1947, and in the following year appeared as Sebastian in the Old Vic production directed by Sir Alec Guinness. I fully appreciated the charm of this delightful play, so much so that when early in 1969 John Barton telephoned to ask me to play Malvolio I unhesitatingly said 'yes'. It was to be the penultimate production of the season, to be followed by Henry VIII in which I was to play the King. Rehearsals were begun two days after I left my current play Not Now Darling. When I reread Twelfth Night, however, I soon realized that this was not the play I thought I knew. Troubled, I telephoned John Barton: 'I am afraid you may have to recast Malvolio—I find him tragic.' Thank God for that', he replied, T thought I would have to talk you round to it.' I was committed. Before rehearsals started I read the play some ten times. Slowly, oh so slowly I hammer myself into the character until by the time of the first performance I can step in and out of his shoes. I look for any character-building phrase in the script, and try to analyse his attitudes to circumstances both in the play and out of it. Though I have read most books on the theory of acting, I subscribe to no one method but try to judge performances by a tenet of Ellen Terry's: 'To act you must make the thing written your own; you must steal the words, steal the thoughts, and convey the stolen treasure to others with great art.'

What kind of man is Malvolio? What is his background? I see him as a military man; unpopular at school, he joins the army and, while he displays no quality of leadership, he is so damned efficient that he now finds himself, at forty-five, a Colonel in the Pay Corps, embittered, with no prospect of further promotion. He has bored every woman he has met and he stays unmarried. A certain widowed Count I suppose needed a major-domo to manage his Mediterranean estate, and who better than this totally efficient and honest teetotaller? When Malvolio arrives in Illyria he is shocked by its asolare mood and its sponging layabouts. There is Sir Toby (perhaps the English brother of the dead Countess), but there is nothing easier to manage than a drunk; then the Fool, whose tasteless jokes fail to amuse Malvolio, who goes Absent Without Leave, and must be disciplined; and Maria (aged fifty in Barton's production and sometime governess to the Count's daughter) could be brought to heel if only she wouldn't consort with people above her station. As for the suitors, Aguecheek, that eccentric fifty-year-old Scot (Barton's version), and the arty Count Orsino—but I am already thinking as Malvolio!

As I rehearse, the muscles of my face and my whole body begin to react to the tensions within Malvolio. The military years have left their mark: an erect stance, nearly always at 'Attention', and when 'At Ease' never fully relaxed. Originally I had wanted to carry a short cane, but being persuaded that it would evoke quite the wrong period I settled for the long staff of office, but always felt that to Malvolio it was an encumbrance. He has a small, tight, mean mouth, the corners of which turn down. The inner ends of his eyebrows are elevated and the outer pulled down in an expression of permanent supercilious scorn for his minions. He is thin—too thin—from his years of austerity. Now, I as an actor am not thin enough! Yet the actor in the comedy must tell the audience as much as he can at his first entrance. What can make-up and costume do for me? I spend a great deal of time observing my fellow creatures, trying to find 'copy' for the character I play, and frequently I find my 'face' in an art gallery. On this occasion I visited the Tate and found my Malvolio in Graham Sutherland's splendid elongated portrait of Somerset Maugham. The eyebrows, the mouth, the wrinkles—every one of them vertical, and that is what I must be: vertical—the knees close together, the hair very thin on top but grown long in an attempt to cover the balding pate, above all the colour—yellow, jaundiced. I take a postcard; I have my make-up.

Now for the costume. The designer has placed the setting for this production at about the year 1603, Late Elizabe-than, early Jacobean. The costume designer and I agree that Malvolio should be dressed in black: high-heeled shoes (adding height), black stockings (shming), breeches, doublet (very tight), and the black only relieved by very narrow, plain, white collar and cuffs. I choose a period hat like a black flower pot (height again and vertical line), and an overcoat with a large raised collar which in silhouette continues the line from hat-to-shoulders-to-hip. Malvolio must have a chain of office (a thin one with a large circular disc). This could run across the chest, but no—better run it round the neck and down as near vertical as possible. Somerset Maugham's hair would be quite out of period so we make a wig with long straight hair faintly curled at the bottom all round the head, with a few strands to cover the dome, now padded to give an egg-like look. All this was not thought up in advance, of course, but day by day as rehearsals were under way.

In performance the character must move in specific stage conditions, in this instance on a permanent set designed by Christopher Morley. It represented a long room or gallery running away from the audience in deep perspective, with double doors at the far end and entrance Downstage Left and Right. I have always thought that a stage should be mapped out on graph paper so that a prompt-script could denote somewhat more precise positions. As it is we merely write, for example, 'X D R' which assumes the knowledge (previously recorded) that we were formerly 'U C. Quite often one will shift weight from one foot to the other; while this can change emphasis it is very rarely recorded. In the account that follows I have used this simplified convention but have added one of my own. Laughs are not normally recorded, but the comic actor is always striving for them, and I would like to be able to rate their size from 1-9, between the largest that can be expected (9) and the smallest (1) still worth trying for.

'If music be the food of love'—the play has started, and I shall try to give you my thoughts and Malvolio's, objective and subjective, at key points of its performance.

Before the start of Act 1, Scene 3 the Olivia household is returning from church; entering Left and straight to the centre of the stage, a sharp Right turn, Up and out of the door U C leaving Toby behind with his first line. As I move toward the centre carrying my staff I look to my left—people! What are they doing there? (Laugh 3.) Again leading a procession in Scene 5, but no coat and hat, I enter this time R. I glower at Feste, for I have persuaded Olivia that he must go and she has promised to dismiss him; I assist Olivia to her chair D R. None of this is exaggerated and only a tiny fraction of the audience notices it. Fabian and another servant are in attendance slightly Up-stage C. Fabian has a drink on a tray which he hands me and which I proffer to Olivia; she doesn't want it so I return it to Fabian, take a book from him and give it to Olivia, glance at its cover and see it is not at all suitable. 'Take the Fool away', says Olivia. If only she wouldn't personally give orders to the servants. She ought to do it through me. But with a quick jerk of my staff to them I think I can make it appear that that was the original intention. But what is the Fool saying? 'Take away the Lady.' Good God, he should be shot. What a bore he is, but she gives in to him and I walk L and turn my back to the populace, who again seem to have gathered. 'What think you of this Fool, Malvolio? doth he not mend?' Wham! Right into my court and in front of all these people. What can I say? The most grudging, sour, nasal 'Nyeas' (laugh 4). The actor needs a laugh there, as his next line is vicious, 'and shall do till the pangs of death shake him'. Feste answers with a feeble joke at which Maria dares to laugh—a glower, a rap on the floor and a jerk of my staff and she is sent scurrying. 'How say you to that, Malvolio?' From a great height and with positive delight I can reply 'he is out of his guard already, unless you laugh' (pronounced as one might say 'vomit'). Then, with a look across the theatre circle, 'I take these wise men that crow so … no better than the fool's zanies.' Did I see a smile on Fabian's face? 'I'll have his guts for garters.' I am now one-hundred-percent Malvolio, but in a comedy I, the actor, must remain one-hundred-percent myself, standing out-side my character, my ears out on stalks listening for the very slightest sound from the audience, controlling them, so that I am able to steer a 'cue', 'punch' or 'tag' line clear of any interruption. If on any night Malvolio takes over, the precision, the immaculate timing, the control suffer. If the actor takes over, the performance becomes 'technical' and the audience is always aware of it. (This last is often a fault of mine and my wife lets me know it.)

Malvolio's next entrance shows him at a loss, foot faulted, off-guard, vulnerable, outfaced by a mere chit of a boy. Ostensibly to ask for further instructions I enter from L rapidly, the staff now out of control, and on arriving C my mouth opens—but to say what? My finger tips to my lips (does he bite his nails?) and Olivia is looking at me waiting. I must try to say something, pull myself together: 'Madam' (pronounced Mairdom; laugh 3), producing it from a stutter of B's D's T's and P's to make the word much more incongruous. I finish in desperation, 'What is to be said to him, Lady?—he's fortified against any denial.' She answers, 'Tell him he shall not speak with me.' This solution seems never to have occurred to me. With a civil inclination I start off quickly L but after four steps I am caught in mid-air and turn towards Olivia, for I had quite forgotten. 'Has been told so' (laugh 3). 'What kind of man is he?' What an extraordinary question! 'Why, of mankind' (laugh 1). 'What manner of man', 'Of very ill manner' (laugh 2). I look off L. Then Olivia, as to a child, 'Of what personage and years is he?' A great light dawns—at last I see what she is getting at. Here I interpose 'Ahhh!' (laugh 2), and speak grudgingly on. But Olivia answers, 'Let him approach.' I must obey; I turn and begin to exit quickly L but I am again caught in mid-air by 'Call in my gentlewoman!' Oh dear! One thing at a time, please. A sharp about turn and my staff is Jove-like banged on the floor and the voice that roars 'Gentlewoman' is of the parade-ground (laugh 4). Maria comes scuttling on from R. 'May Lady calls', I explain, with the implication that the voice that thundered 'Gentlewoman' was Olivia's (laugh 4). With scornful dignity and elegant use of my staff, I exit L. No sooner out of 'the presence' I am faced with that.
maddening Cesario again. As I return to announce 'him', before I can utter a word, I am shaken to discover that Olivia and Maria have both lowered their veils.

As Cesario is shortly to play upon this point, I must not as an actor forestall it; however, as Malvolio, I cannot allow it to go unnoticed; my reaction is therefore infinitesimal.

While I am still undetermined about whom I should speak to, Cesario enters and says to Olivia: 'The honourable lady of the house, which is she?' Can I believe what I hear? This chit of a boy takes incredible liberties, and suddenly Olivia says: 'Give us the place alone.' Leave a young man and young girl alone! But that is an order, so a rap with my staff and pointing it R, I indicate that Maria must leave—and before me. She does so and I look Cesario over from head to foot and slowly, very slowly; with efficient use of my staff exit R.

Every night at this point I would wait in the wings for my next entrance—partly because I personally enjoyed listening to the enchanting scene between Cesario and Olivia and partly because I felt that Malvolio would do precisely the same—his ear glued to the keyhole. 'What ho, Malvolio!' His military reflex action is to reply: 'Here, Madam', patently betraying the fact that he is, to say the least, lurking (laugh 2). I came into view from the R entrance and under cover of a laugh from the audience I made my way to C. Malvolio recovers dignity en route—his attention riveted on the 'door' L through which Cesario has just left. He is hardly aware that he then adds: 'At your service.' Olivia begins: 'Run after that same …' This is too much! Never in my life—at least not for many years have I been ordered to do anything so indecorous; shocked, shattered, I echo: 'Run!?' (laugh 8). John Barton always disapproved of this. He did not mind my reaction or that I should mouth 'Run', but I was not to vocalize it. The difference for me was between a titter and a theatre-shaking belly laugh. We finally agreed, 'Matinées only'. Subsequently in Australia Trevor Nunn found himself having to rehearse some replacements to the cast—John Barton being detained in Stratford-upon-Avon. When we came to this scene he asked me why I no longer got a laugh at this point of the play. I explained that John Barton had said that my 'run' was not in the text. 'Ah; but', said Nunn equivocally, 'it is in the subtext.' So back it went for the rest of the tour! Malvolio only half hears the rest of her instructions and is not quite sure when she has finished. She gives him the ring which he has to almost force on to his much larger finger while couching the staff in the crook of his elbow. A pause, then she adds: 'Hie thee, Malvolio.' I am deeply hurt that she should speak thus to me—but what am I to do? Pained and distressed I reply: 'Madam' (I'm sorry you should behave like this) 'I will.' I turn L, the staff is held by its centre, horizontally, in the right hand and I execute what must be the slowest run ever (one critic called it 'a Zulu lope'), as if crossing a series of puddles just wider than an extended pace. I exit L (laugh 8, and round of applause).

John Barton here transposed Act 2, Scenes 1 and 2. The chair and sunshade were replaced by a long bench, the door U C opened and we are in a street. Cesario enters Up-stage having come straight from the house and seats herself, perplexed by her own encounter with Olivia. Immediately Malvolio appears from the same U entrance; still 'running', he is tiring visibly (laugh 2); he 'runs' down to the R corner of the stage and stops; he looks out towards the audience 'Where can be?—not there.' He 'runs' across below Cesario to the L (laugh 2), and is about to exit when he becomes aware that Cesario has risen and is now standing. It looks like him, but is it? I point the top end of my staff: 'Were not you e'en now with the Countess Olivia?' 'On a moderate pace I have since arrived but hither.' (Is that a veiled criticism that he walks faster than I run?) However, 'She returns this ring to you, sir.' The staff regains its normal vertical position but upside down—damned thing! Reverse it, embarrassing (laugh 1), and again couched at the left elbow to facilitate the removal of the ring while saying, 'You might have saved me my pains to have taken it away yourself.' But the ring has stuck (laugh 3). A heave. No good. A quick look to Cesario, don't let him think I am embarrassed; 'She adds moreover that you should put your Lord into a desperate' (that word is coloured by his own desperation) 'assurance she will none of him.' Another tug and an attempt to un-screw the ring—but it is still stuck. What a terrible thing to happen! (Laugh 5.) But play for time: 'And one thing more …' The mind has raced: he remembers his mother removing a ring by sucking it and the surrounding finger and so lubricating it; he does so. He succeeds, and by the end of 'unless it be to report your Lord's taking of this' it is off!—'Receive it so.' I hold it out at arm's length with R hand finger tips, but Cesario says, 'She took the ring of me, I'll none of it' and he crosses D R. Out of all patience I shout, 'Come, sir!' He turns back. 'You peevishly threw it to her and her will is it should be so' (i.e. 'peevishly') 'returned' (laugh 4). Affecting a 'peevish' stance, L foot raised and L arm half-raised for a rather feminine throw he inadvertently appears effeminate as he throws the ring at Cesario's feet. Cesario makes no move. 'If it be worth the stooping for, there it lies [lays] in your eye [aye]; if not, be it his' (and I know very well that you will pick it up the moment I am out of sight) 'that "finds" it.' Staff to the horizontal position and I eject myself into the air to continue 'running'—Upstage. It takes three or four steps to realize that I no longer have to run; put on the brakes! A quick look back to glare at Cesario for a moment of embarrassment (laugh 4) which of course I won't admit and with more dignity than at any other time in the play I stride, like a galleon in full sail, straight U and off centre.

Lying in bed that night, having read a few pages of St Thomas Aquinas and wondering what attitude to take to the proposed new Prayer Book, at around midnight I hear sounds coming from the garden; they increase in volume: what is it—a riot? I leap out of bed wearing my new night-gown. It reaches just to my knees. Slippers on, putting my chain of office around my neck, symbol of authority, what would I be without it? my fur-collared coat over the top and my hat on my head—it's a cold night and I am bald—I race off down the stairs and out to the garden. I can now see Sir Toby and Maria dancing and singing while Feste plays his wretched guitar and Sir Andrew his bagpipes!! At my very fastest walk I eject myself from the R (in fact I always stood several paces offstage at the 'start' position in order to achieve maximum propulsion at the moment of entry onstage). Arriving in the centre of the group, Feste on my left, Aguecheek D C, Sir Toby U C and Maria standing on the chair R, the 'music' continues until one by one they become aware of my presence (laugh 8); first Feste, then Maria who signals to Toby who sits C, then Aguecheek who subsides on to the floor. Again, John Barton disapproved of the hat in this scene, but I felt it quite legitimate to wear it. Malvolio would have felt un-dressed without hat and coat. I am furious! Passing my glower from Aguecheek back to Feste I suddenly become aware that my coat has flown open exposing my 'shorty' nightgown and my bare legs beneath it! With a lightning movement I cross the coat over my shame (at the same moment one knee slightly crosses the other resulting in an 'unintentional' attitude of effeminacy (laugh 6)—a middle-aged Susannah surprised at her bath). A snatched look at them all—did they see my nightgown? I cannot openly attack Sir Toby or Sir Andrew, but I can attack Feste and Maria, my minions, and through them the other two, so I address Feste. He has gone too far. Far too far. I walk above him to C and strike an attitude, left hand on the back of the deck-chair and right hand pulls back my coat and rests on my right hip (laugh 6). Quite forgetting that I now expose nightgown and legs and look totally absurd while telling Sir Toby I must be round with him. Sir Toby and Feste are untamed. Right, then—I will break it up by removing their supplies. Andrew has placed his drinking vessel on the floor as he subsided, so on my way to collect it, moving round L and D C, I pass Feste and say, 'Is it even so?' (if it is, that is your lot). I pick it up—Good God! it is one of my Lady's best glass goblets. I say to Sir Andrew, 'This is much credit to you:' I take the glass U and behind the table where I find that they have all been using glass goblets—not only that, but also one of my Lady's best decanters and a silver tray and a silver candelabra on which are burning three candles. They cost a great deal of money and I am responsible for the household accounts! This will never happen again! I pick up the tray and all its contents. Suddenly I hear Sir Toby at my L saying, 'Art any more than a steward?' My lips tighten, my eyes narrow (stop before you go too far). 'Rub your chain with crumbs', he says, and 'A stoop of wine, Maria.' My chance. He cannot, he shall not, involve my servants. My head lashes round to Maria who is about to follow Sir Toby's request. 'Mistress Mary' is spoken quietly but menacingly; there is no doubt about it meaning 'stand still'. 'She shall know of it' (tell-tale) 'by this hand.' A final sneer at them all—particularly Sir Toby, for my last remarks were as much for his benefit as Maria's; my head erect, tray held carefully, sharp R turn I march off R (an imperceptible half step backwards before L, R, L, R) (laugh 5).

I like to think that the letter scene (2.5) was originally played with Toby, Andrew and Fabian (where does he spring from?) hidden in the upper balcony over an inner stage. Maria could then get a laugh with, 'Get you all three into the box—tree.' The box tree has been treated in different ways; sometimes three individual trees can be carried round the stage, and sometimes there is a series of trees with the three moving from one to another. In this production Maria placed the letter on a deck-chair and the spectators hid behind a hedge (breaking the convention which normally does not allow soliloquy to be overheard by other characters). Barton thought of it as Malvolio's scene and left him the rest of the stage unencumbered. When we began work on the scene we found we had to give some thought to the letter. What type of letter? A scroll? A single sheet? Folded?—once, twice? All we knew is that it is 'sealed'—or has upon it a seal.…

Malvolio has been strolling in the garden and even loosened the neck of his tunic! ('Practising behaviour to his own shadow' I took to mean 'As his only audience' rather than 'Making shadow-shapes'.) His arms behind his back at waist level he appears U C but looking off L as Maria says 'for here comes the trout that must be caught with tickling', before leaving. He walks very slowly straight D C imperiously surveying his domain. Half-way down he involuntarily breaks into a little dance step (feet only) (laugh 3). I had in fact learnt the step for Henry VIII from which it had eventually been cut and I thought it a pity to waste it! Suddenly the thought that he may be seen stops him and almost in panic looks, quickly, first L, and then R, into the exits. No, all is well; so proceed D C. Arriving below the hedge his attention is caught by something L; it is 'my Lady' in imagination. He affects a most elaborate bow and extends his L hand on which to place 'hers', gives 'her' a sickly, ingratiating smile and 'they' turn to move R but—who is that skulking in the shadows D R? (One of the common people.) He glowers, his R hand shoots out and an imperious finger beckons the varlet—'he' approaches—the finger gestures 'him' to kneel—'he' doesn't—the glower deepens—again 'Down' says the finger. 'He' kneels. Malvolio draws an imaginary sword and violently decapitates him, replaces sword and smiles benignly on his 'consort' (laugh 3). Such is power! This has evoked a laugh and to his great consternation he is aware that he is overlooked by the theatre audience. Horror; his left arm is still holding 'my Lady's' imaginary hand! Consternation: this requires an explanation. 'Tis but fortune—all is fortune.' (The following part of the Une I found terribly ambiguous; 'Maria once told me she did affect me and I have heard herself' etc. sounds as if 'she' and 'herself' applied to Maria rather than to Olivia. John Barton suggested I should say, 'Maria once told me my Lady did affect me', which certainly clarifies it though the purists will object.) 'It should be one of my complexion' (of which he is very proud!), and on that happy note he can amble R above the chair on which he places his L hand. 'What should I think on't?' causes him to move slightly D R. A smile breaks; his eyes narrow and glisten, 'To be Count Malvolio'. The audience have laughed at Andrew and Toby's following lines as he is about to sit on the chair on which the letter has been placed. Malvolio thinks the audience must be laughing at him; he is arrested in a halfsit—"There is example for't. The Lady of the Strachy married the Yeoman of the Wardrobe'—so there. He completes the action of sitting and becomes involved in his reverie—'Having been three months married to her, sitting', as thus, 'in my state'—while Toby speaks, Malvolio notices his 'officers' off R and gestures them forward, 'calling my officers about me, in my branched velvet gown', described with a gesture 'having come from a day bed where I have left Olivia', and such is my prowess—he looks at a knowing colleague in the circle—'sleeping', his eyebrows flicker to underline his point (laugh 4). 'And then' with Olivia safely tucked up, 'to have the humour of state; and after a demure travel of regard', he looks along the circle from L to R and selects one person to whom to address with an accusatory finger, 'telling them I know my place as I would they should do theirs, to ask for my kinsman' (as he is now!) 'Toby' (that pig). A slight pause and he rolls the letter into a 'tube'; 'I frown the while and perchance … wind up my watch … or play with my …' The letter is now held upright on his lap somewhat suggestively; the audience is about to giggle (laugh 3)—(filthy minds these people have)—an explanation is necessary, 'some rich jewel' (laugh 2). 'Toby approaches' from L, 'curtsies there to me…I extend my hand to him thus', an imperious L hand is extended palm down and as an afterthought he adds, 'quenching my familiar smile with an austere regard of control' (laugh 2) (why should they think that funny?). 'You MUST amend your drunkenness', the head relaxes slightly R but cracks back with, 'Besides; you waste the treasure of your time with a foolish knight … one Sir Andrew' (a second-class Christian name). The daydream is over; his attention wanders; what is this in his hand? A piece of paper; put it where? Down beside the chair—someone else will clear it up. But—it has writing upon it—'What employment have we here?' The writing is upside down, he turns it round.
"BY MY LIFE": he leaps from the chair and speaks directly to the audience 'this is may Lady's hand!' He studies the writing and finds confirmation. He shows the writing to the audience and illustrates with his L hand 'These be her very c's, her u's 'n her t's' (Naughtily I abbreviated the original text of 'and her t's'), 'and thus makes she her great P's' (laugh 3). I must forestall the audience's reaction. Malvolio doesn't intend the bawdry, but Shakespeare does (there is no 'c' or 'P' in the superscription). He throws the letter aside and starts to move U. His eyes roam the audience (I would not dream of reading someone else's letter). His fingers run along the back of the chair R to L. As it reaches the end … did his foot slip? or how is it that he has now lost 18 inches in height and has the back of the chair under his R armpit? (laugh 4). He can now read the superscription, 'To the unknown beloved, this, and my good wishes'. As he picks it up and moves D C he tells the onlookers, 'Her very phrases … By your leave'. (Excuse me for a moment while I open this.) But there is a great seal. Foiled! Showing it to the audience who will now understand the reason for this stoppage he says, 'Wax' (laugh 2) and illustrates with a finger. 'Soft' (therefore only recently sealed!), 'and the impressure her Lucrece.' As he squeezes the sides of the letter so that it resembles a tele-scope, he says, 'With which she uses to seal.' Tis may Lady.' After asking, 'To whom should this be?' with one eye closed he peers through it as if it were the most natural way of reading a letter (laugh 1); again he fails to discover the contents. The letter is now flat again. He tries to raise one corner of the flap, now the other corner, and the wax gives way! He emits a high-pitched, almost effeminate 'Oh' (laugh 4) (or what is shorter than 'Oh'? 'O'?). As he looks at the audience (what an awful thing to happen) the look develops into a 'You will probably think that I did that on purpose.' A third of the letter is snatched open …

The postscript is upside down so is impossible to read. What meets his eye is 'Jove knows I love, but who? Lips, do not move. No man must knoo' (laugh 2). Incredulous he repeats, 'No man must knoo?'; to the audience (silly me)'No man must know!' Ah. 'If this should be thee … Malvolio'. You will notice that I cut 'What follows? The numbers altered.' Arrogantly I thought this gives away the MOAI point too soon, and I inserted 'What follows?' before reciting in a tee-tum, tee-tum fashion:

I may command where I adore
But silence like a Lucrece knife
With bloodless stroke my heart doth gore
Moai doth sway my life.

[II.v. 107-07]

And puzzled, I ask if the audience know the word—'MO AH-EE?' (laugh 2). While Fabian and Sir Toby speak I try to work it out; ""MO-AH-EE doth sway my life." Nay, but first let me see, let me see'; the next two lines being cut he continues, ""I may command where I adore." Nay, but first let me see, let me see'; the next two lines being cut he continues, ""I may command where I adore." Why, she may command me', he tells the audience, 'I serve her; she is may Lady. Why this is evident to any formal capacity, there is no obstruction in this—spoken so quickly it elicits a laugh. 'What should that alphabetical position portend? If I could make that resemble something in me... "M" comma "o" comma "A" comma', and he shows the commas to the audience the while; what a fool he has been not to notice before! So what does it all mean? 'M', he queries. A great light dawns. The eyes pop. The "M" dissolves into 'M' m MALVOLIO', he ventures in a whisper. Don't they understand? ' "M" … why, that begins MY NAME!' SO that is clear for the 'M', 'but then there is no consonancy' (no consonants) 'in the sequel. That suffers under probation ... "A" should follow but "o" does! The "I" comes behind.' More thought: '"M.O.A.I." etc.

After picking out the word 'crush', the other third of the letter falls open. 'Soft!' A silencing finger is raised while his R hand holds the letter, 'here follows prose'. (Thank God, after all that poesy.) 'If this fall into thy hand, revolve'; a look at the audience, 'it can't mean that! If it does, I won't. 'But as he continues he involuntarily walks in a tight circle, making sure that the resulting laugh (3) does not obscure the lines. 'In my stars I am above thee, but be not afraid of greatness; some are born great' (not me) 'some achieve greatness' (not me) 'and some' (wait for it) 'have greatness thrust upon 'em. 'He flashes a plea to the audience. Do they understand the importance of that? His speech now becomes faster and faster, growing in excitement as the truths reveal themselves. 'Remember who commended thy yellow stockings' (yellow stockings, to the audience) 'and wished to see thee ever cross-gartered' (cross-gartered?). 'I say remember. Go to, thou art made if thou desir'st to be so. If not, let me see thee a...' (does it? Yes it does! Joy can know no bounds!)—to the gallery, 'STEWARD still.' They obviously don't believe him, so he shows them the very word and mouths it a second time (laugh 3). Fools! He is patently wasting his time on them—they only laugh. The fellow of servants and not worthy to touch fortune's finger farewell she that would alter services with thee the fortunate unhappy.' He is breathless (so am I), but up, up, exultant, 'Daylight and champagne discover not more. This is open.' He strikes the letter on 'this' and on 'open'. Right, then! 'I will be proud. I will read politic authors. I will baffle Sir Toby. I will wash off gross acquaintance. I will be point devise the very man!' The voice drops in pitch and intensity and slowly begins to rise again, 'I do not now fool myself to let imagination jade me; for every reason excites to this... that may Lady, loves, ME!' The voice drops again, only to rise again, 'I thank my stars' (and there they are somewhere above the gallery); 'I ... am ... Happy' (laugh 3) and never has a face looked more gloomy although ecstatic. So, resolved and fast, 'I will be strange, stout, in yellow stockings and cross-gartered' (if that is the way She wants it) 'even with the swiftness of putting on.' He turns to run upstage but before taking a step he turns back and down on one knee, 'Jove and my stars be praised', he crosses himself (laugh 2). Oh! A quick look at the populace, 'don't think that I just crossed myself', and he is off upstage looking down at the letter. A scream! 'Ahyyyyyyyy', he turns and beckons to the audience: 'Here', and by way of explanation he races back to a 'friend' who happens to be sitting in the front row of the stalls and shows him, 'is yet a postscript!' (laugh 2). (All right. I'll read it to you.) 'Thou can'st not choose but know who I am! If thou entertainst my love, let it appear in thy smiling...' a squeal of brakes—poleaxed! (laugh 2). Look for a friend—None? (Gloomily.) 'Thy smiles become thee well, therefore in my presence still smile.' The word becomes 'manure', the mouth a gash; 'dear, O my sweet, I prithee'. Total dejection!—but mounting larks should sing. There is iron resolution in this man, so in the voice of Job he calls upon his God, 'Jove! I thank thee! I will "smile"' (and what is more I'll try it now)—the corners of the mouth extend some two inches towards his ears, but that is all (laugh 3). He can do it. Given time. 'I will do everything that Thou'—and his extended arm nearly touches Jove himself—'wilt have me!' Malvolio floats swiftly upstage and off (laugh 9 and round of applause).

I don't mind admitting that I used to collapse sweating in my dressing-room. The necessary ebullience was the most ecstatic I have yet been able to produce as an actor. In my Malvolio wardrobe I find a pair of black and yellow slashed breeches; they are Elizabethan rather than Jacobean, however. And here is a large yellow ruff, and a hat—very similar to my other but with a wide brim. With today's top-lighting in the theatre this would shadow the face, so the designer agreed that the front of the brim should be flattened and attached to the crown. This is topped by a large yellow feather. Our designer pointed out that cross-gartering merely implied that the normal garter, from below the knee, was crossed at the back of the leg and continued up and round again above the knee before being tied in a bow. Never having attempted this before, Malvolio has tied them far too tight and they are serving as a tourniquet, a fact that is to colour the whole scene. He has spent some hours creeping around the house and garden in an endeavour to find Olivia. Is she evading him? And he must try not to be seen by the servants. The gaiety with which he donned the garments is now wearing rather thin—was it, will it be, worth this masquerade? Where can she be? My legs are killing me. Legs which were so straight, almost knock-kneed, are now bowed with the agony. I have literally to hold on to the gatepost UC as I am about to come down into the garden (laugh 6).

Shakespeare very cleverly allowed his Malvolio to be totally outrageous in this scene, excusing all by making Fabian say 'If this were played upon a stage now, I could condemn it for an improbable fiction.'

My face is grimacing with the pain. I hobble forward and half-way down (laugh 4) and there she is!—standing D R with her back to me. Pull myself together, the pain has gone! or has it? Twinges every now and again, I make my way to the L of the sundial—I can lean on it if necessary. I 'prepare' myself for the total effect. I have her letter in my L hand—both arms are lifted effectively above my head; I succeed in looking rather like the famous Faun of Pompeii and filled with the same euphoria. But she doesn't turn! (Maria is there L but I don't see her.) A discreet cough. She turns! 'How now, Malvolio?'; not quite the reaction I expected; but of course! I have forgotten the smile! Here goes (laugh 4). Very musically, almost sung, 'Sweet Lady', and then—as written—flatly, with no humour at all, 'Ho. Ho' (laugh 4). The parallel fingers of my R hand punctuate both 'Ho's' like castanets; Burbage never produced such an effect! 'I sent for thee upon a sad occasion', she will have her little jokes; 'Sad, Lady? I could be sad … This', I lift my L leg and point to it, 'does make some obstruction in the blood' (the increased pressure on the R leg causes me to clutch, and lean on the sundial) (laugh 5), 'but what of that?—If it please the eye of one, it is with me as the very true sonnet is, "Please one and please all".' (John Barton discovered that this was a lyric of a popular song of the time so I attempted to sing it, un-musically, while illustrating that 'one' applied to Olivia and 'all' to the audience.) 'Not black in my mind though yellow in my legs' (laugh 2); my best joke for years! I fail to notice that no one laughs at it. I hold the letter aloft; 'It did come to his hands and commands shall be executed! I think we do know the sweet Roman hand'; and I speak as one who can recognize a Gill Sans Serif at ten paces as I face away to peruse the contents of the letter. (In reality, to allow myself the required reaction on the next line.) WHAT has she said?? My reaction is shock. Horror. Panic (laugh 7). The audience see him in full face. 'To bed?' Good God! So soon? But what must be must be: 'AY!' (laugh 4) is a battle cry: the challenge is accepted, 'Sweet heart and I come to thee.' Valentino was never in better form: endless kisses are exploded and my finger tips flick them in her direction. Suddenly from my left, the voice of Maria. How dare she! I am committed. I must play this through. 'Be surly with servants'—'At your request?! Yessss', what do I mean by that?—I don't know, but it gives me time to think my next quip: 'Nightingales answer daws', and a glance at Olivia for approbation. But Maria goes on. She must be quelled. I will quote to her a line which should be to her totally incomprehensible while at the same time impressing 'may Lady', so, in portentous tones (Abandon Hope All Ye, etc.), 'Be not afraid of greatness', and a quick aside to Olivia, 'twas well writ' (laugh 1). Oh goody. Olivia is joining in the game, pretending she doesn't understand, so with rising tones 'some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them' (laugh 2). I don't hear her intervening lines; I now take her by the arm and cross L. I will show her that I have memorized every word of her letter and at the same time sweep her off her feet to a climactic 'If not, let me see thee a servant still!' (laugh 3). Unbeknown, a servant has entered behind me L and as I open my mouth to say—perhaps—'Madam this is it', he says 'Madam, the young gentleman of the Count Orsino's is returned.' I register him but I am now sitting on a cloud—nothing can deflate me. They all exit.

'Oh ho' is triumphant and straight at the audience, 'do you come near me now!' 'Cast thy humble slough' is from memory, but while I speak I open the letter and read—for proof positive—the rest of the quotation. I cut the next twenty-eight words because in the letter as we have it 'sad face', 'slow tongue', 'reverend carriage' are not mentioned at all. Also, theatrically I was able to leapfrog to 'I have limed her!' (of course I must not forget) 'it is Jove's doing and, Jove!' (a call to attract His attention just above the back row of the gallery) 'make me thankful.' I address the audience again—orchestra stalls now, 'and when she went away now, "Let this fellow be looked to"'(you realize the importance of that?). I look around—surely someone out there does! Idiots! "Fellow" '(laugh 2); they still don't get it, 'not Malvolio, nor after my degree, but FELLOW' (laugh 3).

I am saddened to record that it took me nearly a hundred performances to evolve the next piece of 'business'. The turning-point was a matinée in Adelaide while we were on a tour of Australia. The local company, whose performance of The Seagull we had seen the week before, came to the Twelfth Night matinée. I tried to think of something that, while not in any way disturbing the rest of the audience, might please a very charming group of fellow Thespians. I was quite unprepared for the result—one of the best laughs in the play. As I have stated, bang in the centre of the stage was a designer's gimmick: a sundial—all very charming but of no use at all; all movements were restricted to circling round it. I had already discovered some use for it in the succeeding part of the scene, of which more anon, but I now thought that if the disc at the end of my chain were a watch and if at this moment I were to look at the time indicated on the sundial and if on checking my watch against it I should find a variance, Malvolio's meticulous mind would automatically assume that his watch would be correct and that it was the sundial that showed the incorrect time. It should be therefore put to rights. The sundial, being made of stone, would be heavy but under pressure could be twisted (I tried it on a real one and unless cemented to the ground it can be done). So, I assume the sun to be shining from the R corner at the back of the gallery. 'Why everything adheres together' (glance at sundial) 'that no dram of a scruple' (look at watch) 'no scruple of a scruple' (back to sundial) 'no obstacle' (look at watch). Check 'sunbeam' to sundial and adjust it until correct time is shown during—'no incredulous or unsafe circumstance' (laugh 9).

But who comes here? Toby. Begin as I mean to go on: complete hauteur. I hear him but am heedless of his words. As Toby says 'How is't with you?' he attempts to lay a soothing hand on my right forearm—how dare he! I knock it away as one would a mosquito one hears approaching the face and bring my hand sharply back to nearly where it was, but impale it upon the finger of the sundial!—'Ah!' (laugh 5). It is pure trickery: the flat of the hand merely strikes the angle of the 'finger'. In considerable pain Malvolio shakes his hand, looks at the wound and determines to brave it out, but Sir Toby, startled, produces a crude crucifix and advises Malvolio to 'defy the devil'. In his confused, euphoric state Malvolio believes this drunkard to be embarking on a theological dissertation—'Do you know what you say?' is a rhetorical reprimand. It is all too much: the euphoria, the agony of the cross-gartering, the pain of the impaled hand, the insults; one must make a good exit, hence 'Geow. Hang yourselves all! You are idle shallow things. I am not of your element. You shall know more hereafter' is split between my adversaries (laugh 3). Malvolio turns, but the tourniquet has done its work, his R leg has quite gone to sleep, he nearly falls, staggers and hobbles in great pain U C and off.

I will admit to a dissatisfaction on this exit—I never really succeeded in bringing it off theatrically, even if I did truthfully.

Apart from the almost incidental 'We'll have him in a dark room and bound' Shakespeare in no way prepares his audience for the shock of Malvolio's next appearance. The play was written when bull- and bear-baiting were common sports, the pillory entertained jeering crowds, idiots were part of 'the public stock of harmless pleasure' and the populace thronged to public executions. In John Barton's production, the so-called prison scene took place some-where at the end of the garden where there could have been some type of primitive septic tank covered firstly by an iron grille and over that a trap door to keep out some of the disgusting smell.
In this Malvolio has been placed. We are to imagine that the floor of this sewer is some eight feet below ground level, so only by gripping the bars and pulling himself up will Malvolio be able to just get his head through the bars. His hands and head will be the only parts visible.

Feste stamps on the trap. Who, what is it? 'Oh!' Feste opens the trap as he says "What ho I say, peace in this prison.' Are 'they' about to taunt him again? Defensively, 'Who calls there?' It is practically dark outside but the faintest glimmer of moonlight attracts Malvolio as he grips the bar and pulls his head through (laugh 4); his eyes are starting from his head, he is hysterical. 'Good Sir Topas. Do not think I am mad' (but I think I am)—'they have laid me here in hideous darkness', and Malvolio is weeping. 'Say'st thou that house is dark?'
'As Hell, Sir Topas.' Hell to Malvolio is a very real place, but Sir Topas then tells Malvolio that the clerestories are 'lustrous as ebony'. Malvolio looks from R slowly to L, trying to fathom what to a sane man is nonsense but to him is surely proof of his own madness. Like King Lear's 'Let me not be mad!' Malvolio then slowly and tearfully tells himself, 'I … am … not … mad … Sir … Topas', and clinging to reason, 'I say to you this house is dark!' In reply to Sir Topas, Malvolio then explodes, 'I say this house is as dark as ignorance though ignorance were as dark as hell and I say there was never man thus abused.' That spurt has exhausted Malvolio who realizes that he is merely antagonizing Sir Topas; the tears are held back, 'I am no more mad than you are—make the trial of it in any constant question.' (I am not mad. I am not mad. I am not mad.)
'What is the opinion of Pythagoras concerning wildfowl?' Ah, I know, I know the answer! 'That the soul of our grandam might haply inhabit a bird.' 'What thinkest thou of his opinion?' As a true Catholic, 'I think nobly of the soul and no way approve his opinion.' During his next line Feste makes to lower the trap door; Malvolio is aware of this manoeuvre; he is to be left to the rats and spiders. Sheer panic sets in. His last chance is going.
While crying 'No. No. No', Malvolio tries to ward off the closing trap. 'Sir Topas, Sir Topas', are hardly 'words', but pleas running into sobs.
For what must seem hours Malvolio is left until a voice is heard—is that Feste? 'Fool?' It is! 'Fool!' He hasn't heard me! 'Fool!! I say!!' Feste lifts the trap and at the same instant Malvolio hauls himself up like a drowning man clutching the bars, causing Feste to back hastily R and fall to his knees; 'Who calls, ha?' As if there had never been any misunderstanding between them, Malvolio continues, 'Good Fool, as ever thou wilt deserve well at my hand, help me to a candle!' Malvolio's voice breaks—this is the nearest he comes to admitting his terror of the dark, 'and pen, ink and paper'; no answer. 'As I am a gentleman' (and as soon as I get out of here) 'I will live to be thankful to thee for't.' Feste advances on his knees cautiously. 'Master Malvolio?' I can quite understand that he would never recognize me in this condition, but, believe it or not, it is me: 'Aye, good Fool.' Thank God, he seems to understand. 'Fool, there was never man so notoriously abused'; and as one sane man to another, 'I am as well in my wits, Fool, as thou art.' I am unable to take in his reply. My predicament dominates all. 'They have here propertied me. Keep me in darkness.' (Each time on that word the voice breaks and the body shudders.) 'Send ministers to me!' 'Asses!' is screamed off to the L. The exertion is again too much. 'And do all they can to face me out of my wits', is deflated.

Feste has apparently seen someone and with 'Advise you what you say' he seems to indicate that I should hide. I drop to the bottom of the pit out of sight. It sounds like the priest! 'Sir Topas'—my words are cautious yet accusatory; apparent silence; the priest has gone, I can now come up; but has Feste gone? Please God no. 'Fool! ... Fool!!!... Fool, I say!!!', panic again. But he is still there. 'Good fool; help me to some light!'; Malvolio is weak and near to collapse, 'and some paper.' 'I tell thee' (and myself) 'I am as well in my wits as any man in Illyria', but he doesn't believe me. As a lion's paw that would drag a victim through the bars of its cage a hand whips out and grabs Feste, all of whose strength is needed to prevent his being pulled through the grille. 'By this hand I am!' Where did that vicious strength come from? Feste whimpers. But again the exertion is too much and the relapse greater. Now I have alienated him, too—he never liked me in the first place—he is sure to take revenge. 'Good Fool' is now a begging for forgiveness, 'some ink, paper and (please) light; and convey what I will set down to may Lady.' I don't think I have succeeded in winning him over—perhaps bribery? 'It shall advantage thee more than ever the bearing of letter did.' He is abject. Feste agrees but asks two questions which are answered consecutively, 'Believe me', with the voice breaking, it is almost the prayer of a sinner, 'I am not'; their heads move from side to side to underline the statement. 'I tell thee true', my grip is relaxed; Feste makes one more taunt but extricates himself at the same time and eludes the claws which futilely try to catch him again. How I dislike that man. Hypocritically I call after him 'Fool, I'll requite it in the highest degree.' A nod of dismissal—for God's sake, go!—but I mustn't upset him—'I prithee, be gone.' Feste picks up his guitar and begins inexplicably to sing! What is he saying? He has tricked me! As the song gets faster and faster he begins to run round and round the trap, back and forth, across the grille, over my head; I try to follow the direction of his antics; the world swims; I am mad; faster and faster; round and round; a mumbled series of cries which could be defined as 'No. No. No ...No ...No ...No ...No ...'; I am still holding myself up by the bars; Feste stamps on my hands; I hold on; he slams the trap closed while my head is apparently still in view above the grille; with a scream I fall to the bottom of the pit. Silence; daylight comes; Sebastian enters, 'Yet 'tis not madness.' A very weak cry of 'Help' comes from below ground, unheard by Sebastian, 'That this may be some error but no madness'. An almost incoherent sentence containing the word 'help' is heard. Sebastian talks on, 'To any other trust but that I am mad'. A faint sound of nonsensical gibberish can be heard trailing off into sobs.

I will admit that I would not have liked this interpolation had I been playing Sebastian, but John Barton allowed me to produce this most terrifying effect.

In the next scene Malvolio speaks verse, and continues to do so through the rest of the play. Why? Is it that in this most poetic of plays he is a very prosaic character? Certainly the use of verse in this last scene is extremely valuable to the actor because it is easier to 'take off'.

Malvolio is as mad as it is possible for a sane man to be. Hours later Fabian and another have been sent to release Malvolio and escort him to the presence of Olivia. They try to control him—how dare they touch me!
With a bellow like a wounded bull Malvolio erupts through the centre entrance (laugh 5). A large number of people are gathered. Oblivious, Malvolio has eyes only to seek out Olivia. There she is D R. He staggers forward and there is no one else present for him, as he explodes (from C) 'Madam, you have done me wrong./'Notorious wrong!' She contradicts: I have now nothing to lose, so can answer back 'Lady, you have. Pray you peruse that letter'; she takes it, 'You must not now deny it is your hand' (look at it!), 'Or say 'tis not your seal' (look at it!), 'not your invention./You can say none of this. Well' (have the grace to) 'grant it then./And tell me—in the modesty of honour,/Why you have given me such clear lights of favour...’But soon he falters and begins to break down, 'Why have you suffered me to be imprisoned, /Kept in a dark house'—this line he tells to the others who are standing L (she did that to me); 'visited by the priest', a maniacal look around—(where is he!), 'And made the most notorious geck and gull/ That e'er invention played on.’ He can hardly get the words out through the sobs—'Tell me—why?'

'This is not my writing', she says. Malvolio snatches the letter and looks at it—of course it's her writing; 'But out of question 'tis Maria's hand.' Malvolio's jaw drops, the eyes start; an 'Ugh!' (meaning What!) and he checks every word of the letter. Can this be so? It is so—Fabian confirms it is. As he unravels the story Malvolio sinks to his knees and sobs. As Fabian finishes, an attempt at a plea of justification breaks out as, 'I—I—I', which Olivia assuages with, 'Alas, poor fool'. And now Feste rams the knife home, he kneels R beside the kneeling Malvolio and sadistically twists the knife. He was in the plot. He was Sir Topas. My own words are thrown in my face, but there is no fight left in Malvolio, he can only await the coup de grâce: 'And thus the whirligig of time brings in his revenges.' Malvolio staggers to his feet and the wounded bull looks about him. They are smiling at him, a kindly smile. But the degradation is too great; so, pathetically like a small boy who knows he has lost but cannot leave without an exit line, says to them all 'I'll be revenged', he pauses and pouts, 'on the whole pack of you.' It is a totally empty threat. The House, Illyria, the World, will shortly be laughing at his predicament. I believe there is but one thing for Malvolio—suicide.

Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 26): Background:

BACKGROUND:

Peter Gill's directorial debut with the RSC presented a sexually charged revival of the play that was dominated by the image of Narcissus. A portrait of the self-absorbed youth, gazing at his reflection in pool of water, was the focus of designer William Dudley's otherwise spare set, and served as a continuous reminder to the audience of the themes of ambiguous sexuality and erotic self-deception. For Michael Billington, this resulted in a production that was "curiously short on social and human detail." This was further accentuated by what critics generally felt were the uncomic performances of Patricia Hayes as Maria, Frank Thornton as Sir Andrew Aguecheek and Ron Pember as Feste. Additionally, Jane Lapotaire's androgynous rendering of Viola was faulted by Irving Wardle for serving solely as "a blank screen on to which others project their fantasies." Two dissenting opinions came from Bernard Crick and Michael Coveney, both of whom witnessed Gill's staging after it moved to the Aldwych Theatre in London in 1975. The former lauded Gill's "confidence in the comedy of Viola, Olivia, and Orsino;" and the latter praised John Price's "versatile and powerful" rendering of Orsino.
Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 26): Commentary:

COMMENTARY:

B. A. Young (review date 23 August 1974)

SOURCE: a review of Twelfth Night in Financial Times, August 23, 1974, p. 3.

The programme quotes R. D. Laing on Jill, a distorting mirror to herself, who has to distort herself to appear undistorted to herself. You can make any number of such games from Twelfth Night "You do think you know not what you are," says Viola to Olivia. "If I think so," says Olivia, "I think the same of you." "Then think you right, I am not what I am," Viola confesses. But it's no more than a game; as an identical twin, I've experienced enough mistaken-identity complexes to recognise the results in others, real or fictional.

If Peter Gill in his production for the RSC has worried too much about such things, at least it doesn't show in the play, which emerges as no more than the familiar black-edged comedy, in which the mistaken identities are exaggerated by Shakespeare's use of boy actors as girls and of girls posing as boys. Short of deliberate eccentricity, in fact, nothing need be added to the instant mix but talent, and that is amply available here.

Jane Lapotaire makes a very boyish boy, though I have to say that at her first entrance, when she was still a girl, she drove me mad by her continual breathless trotting round the stage when she was supposed to have just come ashore from a shipwreck; nor do I think she should be quite so ready with her fists. Robert Lloyd as Sebastian duplicates her prettily.

The weight, as usual, swings in the direction of Malvolio, to which Nicol Williamson brings all his individual talents. This is a tall, crane-like steward, moving with the stiff efficiency of a well-programmed robot and speaking in haughty tones from which the native Welsh is being carefully squeezed. (It returns in full flood when the unhappy man is tied up in the cellar and all his dignity is gone.) Perhaps Mr. Williamson having had such a success with it in Coriolanus, is over-generous with his long Pinteresque pauses, but he can move a house to heartbreak at a stroke, and duly does so by his delivery of his final un-forgiving words through the hands with which he is covering his face in name.

David Waller is a tough old Toby, perhaps a retired colonel in the Illyrian cavalry, and Frank Thornton, an Ague-cheek rather more unambitious than we have grown used to. Neither John Price's Orsino nor Mary Rutherford's Olivia is much more than handsome; the director seems purposely to have kept them in low profile, as the politicians say, to retain the more important characters in the limelight.

William Dudley's set is little more than a square box with a mural of Narcissus on the back wall and graffiti framing the front arch. (They read: "O learn to read what silent love hath writ" and "O know sweet love, I always write of you.") Orsino's court spends much time lying on cushions on the floor caressing one another, but if Orsino is meant to be gay, as the text may be taken to suggest if necessary, how is it that he spends so much time and passion courting Olivia?

The music that feeds his love is a Bohemian-sounding romance played on the violin. Surely it should have been a viola?

Michael Billington (review date 23 August 1974)

Peter Gill made his name as a director with his meticulously realistic productions of D. H. Lawrence; yet paradoxically his Stratford production of Twelfth Night (his first for the RSC) seems curiously short on social and human detail. It is intelligent, well spoken and boasts a superlative Malvolio in Nicol Williamson; but at the moment it looks more like an X-ray plate of the play than the living article itself.

The dominant image is of a nonethereal bisexuality. William Dudley's plain box set confronts us throughout with a sketch of an ambisextrous Narcissus figure gazing into a pool; and there is nothing at all equivocal about the physical relationships. Orsino hugs Cesario to his breast with rapturous abandon: Antonio is plainly Sebastian's longtime boy friend: and Viola all but tears her hair in anguish at Olivia's unfulfilled passion for her. All this is fully in keeping with the play's serpentine sexual complexity; but in stressing this one theme, Mr Gill neglects the characters' social function. It is hard to imagine Mary Rutherford's lightweight Olivia as the head of a hierarchical household or to see how Patricia Hayes's scuttling, funny, busybee Maria could be anyone's gentlewoman, let alone Sir Toby's putative bride. In short, the almost novelistic detail that characterised Barton's magnificent 1969 production is here totally lacking.

In compensation, however, there is an unforgettable Malvolio from Williamson. His snarling, peremptory dismissal of Feste at the outset for once completely justifies the plot against him: and his lovesick, lopsided looks at Olivia suggest it stems from cruel observation of the truth. But what Williamson does so brilliantly is blend high comedy and deep emotional pain: he distends his mouth into the most unearthly, agonising shapes in the garden trying to make the cryptic letters form a meaningful word and in the last scene he tears Maria's epistle into miniscule fragments before departing in his own permanent, private hell, all dignity destroyed. This is superb acting.

None of the other performances match this but Ron Pember's savage, sardonic teeth-baring Feste rasping out his songs as if it were The Threepenny Opera is startlingly effective and Frank Thornton's balding, knock-kneed Ague-cheek is a neat study of a superannuated manic depressive. Jane Lapotaire's Viola, however, lacks lyricism and Tutinesque wit and the romantics as a whole come shakily off.

Irving Wardle (review date 23 August 1974)

The main intention of Peter Gill's production is inscribed on the back wall of William Dudley's bare set: the figure of Narcissus gazing down into his pool.

Never has Illyria been more remote from the outside world. John Price's Orsino lounges on cushions to languorous violin music fondling whichever favourite happens to be lying closest. Mary Rutherford's Olivia is with-drawn into complacent self-regard as an ice-princess. Malvolio, in his own way, is the greatest narcissist of the lot (and the only one who finally resists cure). All are intoxicated with their own reflections, and the function of Viola and Sebastian is to put them through an Ovidian obstacle course from which they learn to turn away from the mirror and form real attachments.

The emphasis is on the play's erotic metamorphoses, and this means underplaying the comedy. Even visually, the show regularly contracts for the funniest scenes. The drinking party takes place in a cramped little room with Toby putting his feet up on a chest marked "Sir T. Belch"; solid box hedges are trundled into the dreamlike environment for the gulling of Malvolio.

Given the production's aims, I suppose these proportions are right. But it means losing a lot of fun and leaving some areas unexplored. For instance, Patricia Hayes plays Maria as an elderly nurse-like figure with no evident attachment to David Waller's lazily free-loading Sir Toby. Nor does Sir Andrew show much interest.
in Olivia: Frank Thornton plays him as a dejected White Knight with no will of his own, who scores downbeat laughs on lines like "Shall we set about some revels?" while looking down at his inturned toes.

Unfunniest of all is Ron Pember's Cockney Feste, a most unmusical Fool who rasps the songs out in defiance of voluptuous accompaniment, and plays more as an unshaven malcontent than as a paid entertainer who has to watch the moods of his audience. This Feste would not have waited for the whirligig of time to bring in its revenge.

Stranded between the two worlds, Nicol Williamson's Malvolio towers over the production as its main comedian and main erotic victim. He is an eternal outsider wearing the uniform of someone who belongs. In his black steward's suit and chain he looks like some heavy piece of antique furniture, and you can almost hear him creaking when he moves.

He prefixes his early lines with sagacious pauses, and then the voice comes out—reedy, Welsh, and ridiculous. The garden scene, where he tortures the MOAI conundrum into experimental Welsh words, has an almost unbearable privacy. And his cross-gartering fits poignantly into the production's scheme as a planned metamorphosis that fails to work out.

Physically Jane Lapotaire and Robert Lloyd supply a close piece of doubling as Viola and Sebastian: with the oddity that the usual sexual balance is reversed. Both are much fondled: Viola by Orsino, Sebastian by Antonio. But where Miss Lapotaire comes on as a neutral androgynous presence, a blank screen on to which others project their fantasies; Mr Lloyd radiates his often dull part with erotic vitality. His verse speaking is also among the best in a not noticeably eloquent production.

J. W. Lambert (review date 25 August 1974)

Best To make clear at once that the Royal Shakespeare Company's new production of Twelfth Night at Stratford is entirely enjoyable, even to one who found their last version, especially in its second year, the most alertly beautiful of the last thirty years or so. That one, directed by John Barton, was glowingly elegiac—as, by and large, was Toby Robertson's recent re-creation for the Prospect Theatre Company.

I hear murmurs of discontent as I talk of these performances in terms of their directors. Well, we all gird at perverse notions imposed upon a play; "director's theatre" is a well-worn term of abuse. But the theatre in general, and Shakespeare in particular, has gained far more than it has lost from the emergence of overall guiding minds to meld individual actors with the play, so that alert audiences can absorb the work's underlying themes.

Interesting, therefore, at the least, to see what Peter Gill—best known so far for his bringing to life of D. H. Lawrence's miners' plays at the Royal Court—and a company new to Stratford and its ambience would find for themselves and us in this much-loved comedy.

The stage, in William Dudley's setting, is a great golden-tawny box; the Illyrians, in Deirdre Clancy's costumes, play out their dreams and follies in a graceful Hilliard world dominated by the image of Narcissus gazing into the pool. It is not only Malvolio who is sick of self-love, though it is only Malvolio (and perhaps in this production Feste) who cannot smash the mirror and at last look outward lovingly to other people.

The romantic quartet are Youth incarnate, even Orsino and Olivia. Physical energy keeps bursting through sentimental withdrawal—suddenly they dash off in pursuit of this or that like puppies on a sunlit lawn. Freely and generously handled, too, is that element of comradeship or soul friendship, going in no terror of physical contact, which is merely demeaned by bleakly oversimplifying words like bisexuality. We make very heavy weather of these enriching bonds today; Mr Gill and his players embody them with a welcome ease.

It is a rare Twelfth Night which calls for particular praise of Orsino and Sebastian; but John Price (despite an addiction to bent knees) and Robert Lloyd, young actors to watch, make them startlingly three-dimensional. Mary Rutherford's Olivia (despite a predilection for beating time on tiptoe) gives the mourning girl more than a touch of her delicious Hermia in (that strain again) the Brook Midsummer Night's Dream, and clutching hold as the shipwrecked Sebastian clutched his mast, lets us feel how she has to turn to Malvolio in place of her lost father and brother. Fine-boned, wide-eyed, a slim gazelle of a girl, Jane Lapotaire's Viola balances her romantic longings with a delectable common sense.

At Orsino's court the lord may be bewitched but the rest are merry enough; as we return from the interval his people are having a delightful party in the garden, trying out a song, launching into a dance, laughing and happy. At Olivia's house, of course, the case is otherwise. Age, failure and fear throw their shadows. I wish I could say that David Waller's Sir Toby, Frank Thornton's Sir Andrew and Patricia Hayes's Maria had found more to offer than competent stereotyped performances. But this trio, even though they pull off their shabby trick, are no match for the puritans whose shadow darkens this potential earthly paradise.

Puritans—yes, for there are two. Nicol Williamson's splendid Welsh (what's he got against Wales?) Malvolio, with pinched dough face and currant eyes, his matchstick legs liquefied by cross-gartering, marvelously mouths the MOAI of the letter scene, and constructs a smile as a child builds a house of cards. His bewildered "Tell me why" to Olivia exactly catches that familiar yelp of pain from the heart of the egotist; and his parting cry of revenge, snarled through hands clasped to his face, echoes the piercing epitome of all self-lovers and life-haters.

The other puritan? Feste, no less. Not here the sad, lovingly sharp, wittily defeated figures drawn by, say, Emrys James or Ronnie Stevens; Ron Pember gives us a clown (and a successfully funny one) much closer to Thersites and Apemantus than to Touchstone or Jack Point, an embittered cockney idealist, angrily banging his drum and baring his teeth in "Come away, death"; another life-hater, infiltrating the hedonists like a member of the Angry Brigade at a coming-out ball; never letting up, even in the last reconciling verse of "The Wind and the Rain"; but never tearing the texture of the play apart either, I should add. This is the Twelfth Night that Shakespeare wrote, freshly illuminated.

Peter Ransley (review date 29 August 1974)

Peter Gill's beautifully clear production of Twelfth Night for the RSC at Stratford is played against a sketch of Narcissus gazing at himself in a pool. And throughout the play, the precision of the direction keeps the pool clear, so that we can see not only the characters, but their endless reflections in one another.

Viola disguised as a man conveying Orsino's love to Olivia who falls in love with what she imagines Viola to be, ad infinitum, can get pretty tedious stuff unless it is as controlled and accurate as a Magritte painting. This control has to be at the expense of some life and virility, and the production's main source of energy is a tremendous Malvolio from Nicol Williamson. Its other, quieter source of life is a touching and moving Viola from Jane Lapotaire….

From the moment Nicol Williamson enters, soberly black, self-satisfied, stiff-legged as if he walks on virtue, we anticipate a spectacular performance. The way in which the walk alone changes from exit to exit—from the stiff-legged, to the strutting coxcomb, to the humiliated suitor—is worth going to Stratford to see. And in the letter scene, where he is tricked into believing that Olivia is in love with him, he is superb as he ponders, sweats and puzzles, until he finally sees himself reflected in the letter and assumes the greatness thrust upon him, swelling up into a triumph, which he momentarily drops as he thanks Jove with a suddenly-remembered humility: 'Jove, I will smile, I will do everything that thou wilt have me'.

Much less spectacular, but equally vital to this production, is Jane Lapotaire's Viola. Keeping off the higher slopes of lyricism (thank Jove), she makes the words sound as if they were written last week. It must be a maddeningly complex part for any actor to have to begin to think about: what's my outside doing when my inside's feeling this (oh, and, of course, it's not my own outside anyway); I must be true to my lover in conveying his love to her; thank God she rejects it … how dare she reject it! It's a tribute to Jane Lapotaire that she makes Viola sound so simple and so fresh.

If what is lost in this approach is some of the comedy, then that does not particularly distress me. In fact, the comic setpieces of Toby Belch (David Waller) and Aguecheek (Frank Thornton) never really take off, although Pat Hayes as Maria flutters about energetically. Ron Pember's Feste works in this production, precisely because it is more sardonic than comic.

Robert Speaight (essay date Autumn 1974)

For the seasoned playgoer any production of Twelfth Night has to compete with invincible memories, and it will be a long time before John Barton's treatment of the play a few years ago finds an effective challenger. Peter Gill is a newcomer to the Royal Shakespeare Theatre. His vision is honest, if uninspired; and he took his cue from Narcissus—alias Orsino, Olivia, and Malvolio—gazing at his own image. Indeed the figure of Narcissus in the background was the only pictorial element in the bleakest decor that can ever have been devised for this highly decorative play. The same square box that served for King John, Cymbeline, and Richard II served again, with the difference that the roof had disappeared and the black walls had turned to russet. Cushions for Orsino, a seat for Olivia, a box hedge for the practical jokers, and a hut for the drinking scene, were whisked on and off with desperate rapidity. Otherwise the actors were stranded on a stage several sizes too big for them and seemed unable to speak three lines without starting out for a long walk. The scenes between Viola and Olivia suffered a good deal from this dispersion. The Stratford stage can do anything one asks it to, and I cannot understand why so little is done with it. The memory of Lila de Nobili's autumnal setting for Peter Hall's production returns to haunt one with the scenic possibilities on which Stratford seems resolutely to have turned its back.

Nevertheless the 1974 Twelfth Night was full of good things. Nicol Williamson's Malvolio—immensely tall, tight-lipped, softly and hesitantly spoken—was a creative performance of the first order. Indeed a classic of its kind. His vanity was as ridiculous as his discomfiture was painful; and his authority, theatrically speaking, was unquestionable from first to last. The performance had moments that one will not forget; his smile in the letter scene came like a winter sun breaking through the clouds, and his ultimate agony was such that there was no need for the four-fold repetition of "I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you." David Waller's Sir Toby was also the best that I have seen for a very long time. The breeding was preserved with the belching, and the comedy was all the surer for being unforced. Frank Thornton's Aguecheek was exquisitely vapid, and Brian Hall's Fabian made a great deal out of what is wrongly regarded as a dull part. Ron Pember's Feste, on the other hand, was mistakenly costumed and much too coarsely conceived. Feste is the linchpin that holds the play together, for he has the entry both to Orsino's gilded cage and to Olivia's cloistered garden. He is in touch with everyone; and his last song conveys the dramatist's warning that, shine the sun never so brightly, the rain will fall. This was cleverly reinforced in the Stratford production by the exclusion of Antonio from the pré-nuptial party.
Jane Lapotaire and Robert Lloyd were as convincing a pair of twins as I remember. Unfortunately, neither Miss Lapotaire nor the production's Olivia, Mary Rutherford, had quite the experience or the style to project performances from a stage which was threatening to swallow them up into an auditorium which demands that acting, however subtle, shall be a fraction or two larger than life. In a theater half as big their performances would have been twice as effective; but both these young players have personality and address, and in each case youth was an asset. Patricia Hayes is a highly accomplished comedienne, but she proved too mature for Maria, who is Olivia's lady-in-waiting, not her nurse. John Price was a passionate rather than a languorous Orsino. One would have liked a stronger hint of the man who was reading too much Spenser and Sidney for the good of his soul and the health of his affections; and the dressing-gown in which he chose to spend his days suggested anything but a ducal ward-robe. All in all, though, the right balance was struck between fun and fantasy, poetry and prose, sentiment and satire; and the music helped discreetly to keep the production in tune. The erotic undertones of the play would have been audible from the opposite bank of the Avon.

Michael Coveney (review date 6 February 1975)

Even though it had little serious competition, this production by Peter Gill struck me as far and away the RSC's best offering at Stratford last year. And, re-staged for London by Colin Cook, the play still comes across with its original vigour and vitality. Quite simply, Mr. Gill has gone straight to the heart of a magical and mysterious Illyria, revealing the lovers to be a responsive and complex quartet, continually fascinated and drawn on by the miracle of identity. No romantic twaddle, no coy aside here; when Cesario tumbles to the possibility of her white, androgynous exterior having charmed the Countess, the implications are both humorous and disturbing. Words do indeed prove rascals, but outward appearances are doubly dangerous—and, therefore, doubly exciting.

Similarly, I have never before experienced the Olivia/Cesario and the Orsino/Cesario scenes so sharply. They positively crackle. The cue is taken from the dominating painted Narcissus on the upstage wall; Orsino not only concentrates passionately on the reflectively "male" apparition that is the disguised Viola, he all but disappears under her skin. John Price as the Duke, volatile and powerful, is unstintingly sworn to his latest passion. His other languid courtiers are ignored and finally dismissed as he breaks down at Cesario's tale of distanced grief. Melancholy is usually the province of Feste. But there is no more crucially poignant moment in this production than when Jane Lapotaire, knocked sideways by Orsino's energetic surrender to her, moves away and chokingly admits that she is "all the daughters of her father's house; and all the brothers too."

The passions and outbursts are deeply felt in the speaking of the lines. I cannot remember a production of a Shakespearean comedy where so much actual sense was made of the verse. On another level. Paul Moriarty makes an impressive Antonio, devotedly trailing an ebullient Sebastian (Robert Lloyd) with offers of servitude and expressions of loyalty that are oddly out of tune with the harmonies of the air. Antonio sees things as they are, deals in the everyday realities of a relationship, while the lovers discover perhaps more heady and ambiguous truths by dalliance and impulse. Antonio is as much an outsider in his way as Feste and Malvolio are in theirs (a point brilliantly elaborated by Leslie Fiedler in The Stranger in Shakespeare), and this is here stunningly, emphasised at the play's conclusion. The lovers swirl and exit, perhaps still wrongly paired, it matters not; but they leave Antonio stranded in front of the painted Narcissus, a baffled figure, while Feste spits out his final song.

The casting of Ron Pember as Feste is inspired. He goes through the motions reluctantly not only when pressed into Orsino's service; but whenever called upon. "Youth's a stuff will not endure" is sung, at first for Belch and Age-cheek but, eventually, as an expression of disgust, a hopeless, shrugged epitaph for his own pointless function. He is a Cockney sloucher, hating his repertoire as much as others seem to like it, openly scavenging for coppers with a routine flippancy that barely veils a total contempt. Mr. Pember sings wonderfully, and he even manages to explain why he does not join in the gulling of Malvolio—he has fallen sound asleep on the floor as Maria (Patricia Hayes, neat and bouncy) unleashes her plan on the befuddled aristocrats.

Nicol Williamson's Malvolio remains a superbly rounded piece of acting. Squeezing his Welsh puritanical whine through thin, bloodless lips, he walks painfully on lifted shoes even before the cross-gartering. Still yellow-stockinged, he emerges from dungeon to sunlight with hair standing on end, eyes shielded from the general gaze. It is a grand and intelligent performance that restates the play's general themes of vanity and over-reaching desire in vivid style. The resolution is marvellously handled, a comic climax magnificently achieved as Mary Rutherford's Olivia confronts, with indecorous hunger, the brief prospect of a married life with two beautiful men. The design by William Dudley and the costumes by Deirdre Clancy are coloured in ravishing gradation of yellows, browns and oranges. The music by George Fenton is, appropriately, exquisite.

_Benedict Nightingale (review date 14 February 1975)_

One only has to look at the set to know what Peter Gill thinks of most of the characters in the _Twelfth Night_ he's directed for the RSC. There, on a rust-coloured wall, is a sketch of Narcissus, gloating over his reflection; and there he remains, while John Price's Orsino palpitates, Mary Rutherford's Olivia postures behind her veil, and Nicol Williamson's Malvolio falls so massively sick of self-love that 'distempered appetite' seems as inadequate a diagnosis of his symptoms as telling a leper he has dermatitis.

Even those who affect to care for other people are curiously unconvincing, as if they were more interested in their own emotion than in its supposed objects—or, indeed, than in the precise gender of those objects. Orsino vaguely fondles the boy Cesario, and Olivia, at the end, eyes Viola and Sebastian as if they were already two-thirds of a swinging threesome.

But Peter Gill comes from the Royal Court, not a theatre where narcissists are allowed to sport with moral impunity. Disapproval must be registered—but how? Why, through Feste, who is played by Ron Pember as something much harsher and more severe than the usual 'melancholy clown'. He mutters at Olivia, growls at Viola, rages at Orsino, sneers at Malvolio, and then turns on the audience with such savagery that the closing line, 'we strive to please you every day', comes across as a promise to flay us en masse in the foyer.

Mr Gill's hints of bisexuality are, of course, a way of making a merit of the stage convention that says girls may become boys at the twist of a slip. It is not his interpretation which is objectionable, but the editorialising emphasis he gives it. Everything suffers from overkill, not least his Malvolio. Let me say at once that in many ways Williamson is magnificent—feverish and hilarious in the letter-reading scene, and so carried away by the subsequent encounter with Olivia that he's constantly having to leap up and apologise to 'Jehove' (as he pronounces it) for his maniac glee. He is, in fact, the worst sort of Jehove's Witness, sour, self-satisfied, supercilious, and capable of stunning pettiness: notice the little, righteous nods, as if to say 'so there!', with which he dismisses the 'lighter people'. But Williamson never does anything by halves that can be done by doubles. He dominates the action, partly because he's six or seven feet taller than anyone else and, with his padded, stately haunches, looks more like an upended sofa than a mortal man—and partly because his contempt is even more virulent than Mr Pember's. That 'distempered appetite' becomes terrible indigestion: he hawks up words from an acid maw, and spits them out as if their fumes were burning his nose. It's the sort of performance that really should be fenced off, like anything else that seems to be leaking dangerous chemicals on a large scale.

The acting is uneven. There are some surprisingly feeble performances to balance this colossus and, somewhere in between, a sweet, downright Viola from Jane Lapotaire and a sly, predatory Belch from David Waller. Mr Waller, though soberer than most of his predecessors in the part, also manages a memorable drunk-scene, a floundering muddle of mumbles, silence, sudden shouts, idiot laughter and painfully enunciated syllables. There remains just one objection, and a rather serious one. What possessed Mr Gill to allow his social comedy to lurch into farce, with knockabout officers arresting Antonio, Feydeauesque leaps and gasps from Miss Rutherford, and the cast openly mugging at the awkwardly shifting scenery? I can precisely date the beginning of the decline. It occurs when Williamson, apparently tiring of lumbering about like a removal man with a three-piece suite on his back, sprints gaily around the stage in pursuit of Miss Rutherford. How odd that, confronted with this blatant absurdity, Mr Gill didn't come to his senses and remember that, with Shakespeare, effective comedy always emerges from carefully observed character and can never be gratuitously imposed upon it.

Bernard Crick (review date 14 March 1975)

[The] Twelfth Night that has come from Stratford to London is the test of my claim that this is a great era of theatre. Here is the greatest and yet, in some ways, the most difficult of English comedies. And here is a superlative production of it, yet without a name, either of producer or actor, that would pull the public in, yet full of universal, simple joyful competence.

Well, Nicol Williamson is perhaps of star quality, although more like an actor to actors, not ever likely to stop the play with applause on his entry—as audiences used to greet great Larry even in Strindberg: Williamson's knobbly knees, croaking voice, craggy head and sharp theatrical intelligence will not draw fans from afar. For a moment his Malvolio wobbled on the brink of hog-it-over-acting, but only for a moment, and after all it is a solo, certainly a lonely part: the censorious Puritan is a lonely and persecuted outcast in the rational utopia of permissive happiness that is Illyria. The world is upside down. The twelfth night is a night of misrule, and he is the only—well almost the only—outsider.

And it is a straightforward production, no great tricks or reinterpretations, no signs that the producer is obsessive in any way, only many marks of thought about every line, of bringing out things not often noticed, of playing down some things too often over-noticed.

I have seen swings, saws, custard pies, coloured bladders, weak bladders, pails of water and God knows what beside swing into action as heavy comics and producers show their lack of trust in the Bard as a script writer. Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, Feste and Maria have often emulated Fred Karno's army in defeat. But Peter Gill, the director, is quite clear that the comedy of the play is one of playful pursuit amid sexual ambiguity and ambivalence, it is between Viola and Olivia, and the household drunks are very much the sub-plot. This Sir Toby, played by David Waller with ever-commendable restraint, is not Falstaff to up-stage the king. He is an ex-army cadger, a crooked gentleman, certainly, like Falstaff, but not a very nice one, quite unloveable except as an ageing Maria's last chance.

He preys upon a simple-minded Scot, not the quick-witted son of a king, not fair game. Sir Andrew indeed, does not overdo it. He relies solely on the simple incongruity of an inhibited, melancholy and provincial man trying to play the role of a cosmopolitan courtier. Frank Thornton injects a quite shattering melancholy into: "Shall we set about some revels?" Sir Toby blenches and heavily complies. Feste wishes he had another job, but he soldiers on being funny—if he didn't, he'd be whipped and workless. Sir Andrew's joylessness in revelry reminds us of what Malvolio might have been like had the letter been genuine, had they really been her "Cs, her Us and her Ts".

The simple strength of this production is that it has confidence in the comedy of Viola, Olivia and Orsino. Is this a banality? But I've seen so many productions in which Sir Toby and crew are the comedy and Viola and Olivia are romantic, even if light romantic, for a few quips are allowed, a certain humour is to be got out of the girl in boy's clothing ("Get tickets for the theatre, Miss Beal, Twelfth Night is playing again").

Here from the start it is clear that Orsino is fooling himself, is too madly extravagant to be taken seriously in his passion for Olivia. He is not guyed as a person, on the contrary: the cult of hopeless love is guyed. And Olivia, here a read and important new reading, is no longer the stately, majestic beautiful Portia type; Mary Rutherford is very much like the merry tom-boy Hermia she played in the great Dream, and also fooling herself, like the Duke, by plunging into the game of an equally fashionable cult—that of extravagant mourning.

She is a much more plausible foil for Viola than the grand dame reading. Jane Lapotaire, looking for all the world like Jean Louis Barrault or Marcel Marceau in the sharp profile and white make-up of mime, plays Viola as radiating up to the hilt (if that be the word) bisexuality. She does fall in love with the Duke. She is appalled at Olivia falling in love with her, but she knows what's going on and is no prude. When Feste asks that God "in his next commodity of hair, send thee a beard", she says, "I am almost sick for one—though I would not have it grow on my chin", but the stress falls not on "my" but on "chin". ("I think we'll have to return the tickets, Miss Buss.")

The Duke is young and lolls about panting and sighing, half-dressed, a sexy man, all male comradely affection with his courtiers, arms around them, head on shoulders in the huge Habitat cushions. And among them, Viola, small, white and utterly frozen as he fondles her/him while he talks about his other love—frozen not just with horror but with tense, deliberate, fraught repression. This is a marvellously funny scene, both ribald and pathetic. There looks down on them all the time from the otherwise simple back-cloth, a painting of Narcissus gazing down at his reflection.

Illyria is the kingdom of self-love. In Illyria, there is nothing else to do but to amuse oneself. Illyria is more removed from the real world than even The Importance of Being Earnest, which is certainly a tract against being earnest. But amusing others, that is a harder graft.

Feste is the one, at first discordant, surprise. He is not the "sweet fool" we have come to expect; the gentle, witty zany, someone to fit easily in a great lady's entourage, more like a naughty domestic animal, a Christopher Smart's cat or John Skelton's parrot, than a wilful human servant. No, Ron Pember is a hardbitten, professional comic, working at it all the time, watching the audience's reaction, fearing that the fashion for him will pass and that he will prove boring, but equally fearing that he will one day go too far.

He speaks with the accent of a Petticoat Lane salesman, or the last stand of the dregs of the music hall. Far from powdered and pretty, he is perpetually half-shaved. His voice has a rough, sardonic, cutting edge. He is most unIllyrian, a reminder of the outside world—of employment, servitude and even death. He sings: "Then come kiss me, sweet and twenty, Youth's a stuff will not endure" harshly, almost mockingly, a profane version of the Duke's idyll of true love thwarted; more than an erotic encouragement, a reminder of old mortality. He is closer to Rahare than to Touch-stone.

At first this reading grated, but then it grew on me. In Illyria the pursuit of love must lead to comedy: there is always a closeness between the comic and the erotic.

But the pursuit of comedy for its own sake, as in the cruelty to Malvolio—justly reproved, but the joke goes too far—or as in Feste's having to stake all on making Olivia laugh herself out of what looks like deepest mourning, is a dangerous matter. One mistake, one gag mistimed, one insolence too close to the bone, and his next job may have to be as porter with the Macbeths in Scotland.
Viola's lines become, in this reading, not just a compliment but a profound analysis:

This fellow is wise enough to play the fool;
And to do that well craves a kind of wit.
He must observe their mood on whom he jests,
The quality of persons and the time,
And, like the haggard, check at every feather
That comes before his eye. This is a practice
As full of labour as a wise man's art.
For folly that he wisely shows is fit;
But wise men, folly-fallen, quite taint their wit.

This one blast of cold, outside air apart, Illyria is self-contained and the production needs no great tricks or surprises. Only a multitude of little pleasant inventions. Cesario/Viola skips boy-like about the stage, punches playfully Curio or another gentleman in attendance; but when she tries to do the same, in male camaraderies, to the Duke, to divert his full-steam of misdirected love, the punch falters, the deception becomes almost too hard—it is almost a love-pat, not a playful punch, or what's the difference anyway?

Even at the end, the marvellous ending, Olivia's cry, "Oh marvellous", at seeing the twins revealed to themselves and all, is no banality but an explosive gurgle of sexual pleasure—as if "Oh, two for the price of one, both boy and girl". Orsino's remark to Sebastian: "Be not amazed", then gets guyed as sententious understatement. But not her: "Oh marvellous". And he at first tries to lead out Sebastian instead of Viola—purely a mistake, of course, "Oh marvellous!"

Marvellous indeed, that the situation we know so well, the inherent improbability and silliness of it, the two twins mistaken for each other and now recognizing each other, yet still plucks at the heart strings, seems like real surprise and tension: the Platonic halves are rejoined.

But surprise and tension about what? Some things may be said in comedy that are still hard to say in life. "I am not what I seem indeed." Orsino does, after all, have it both ways. Then comedy is not unreality. Nor is it happy endings. "Exeunt all but Feste." Here the producer takes a liberty. As the cast of great ones swirl off-stage to begin to prepare for the double wedding, Antonio, who plainly loved Sebastian, is left standing alone outside with his back to the audience, while Feste sings his merry song with the sad refrain: "For the rain it raineth every day." But yet this is not overdone. It is just there, the dying fall amid the perpetual merriment. I cannot imagine a better presentation of Illyria, but there are always new things to be found in it. Indeed, I felt just that the last time I saw this greatest English company play the greatest English comedy.

Peter Thomson (essay date 1975)

Twelfth Night was Peter Gill's first directing assignment for the Royal Shakespeare Company, and is unlikely to be his last. Stratford needs this kind of work, easy of access to a theatrically uninquisitive audience, and eager to display the talents of its leading actors. The Company had changed completely now that the first three plays had moved to London. That fine Stratford stalwart David Waller was Sir Toby Belch, but Jane Lapotaire (Viola), Frank Thornton (Sir Andrew Aguecheek), Patricia Hayes (Maria), and Ron Pember (Feste) were as new to the Company as their director. Where is the proud 'sixties talk of a company style? There is none. Each play must establish its particular style during the rehearsal period. Outside that and the players' prior skills, there is no resource. When the work of a single playwright is so persistently performed, this 'one-off' quality is regrettable. There is an undeniable sense that some possibility is being missed, a sense that is deepened by the nagging presence of Peter Brook's name among the Directors of the Company.

The designer, William Dudley, had surrounded the Twelfth Night stage with slatted, wood-textured walls, constructed in isolable blocks. A pale portrait of Narcissus decorated the central block of the back wall, which slid forward to create two upstage entrances very much in the position of the Elizabethan stage doors. The long entrances and exits, especially of Nicol Williamson's Malvolio, were made a feature of the production, whose physical norm was choreographed movement on a bare stage. As a variant on this, there were the pretty setpieces—two box-hedges, three potted trees, a quaintly small wall as background for the drinking scene (II, iii), benches—and the cushions on which Orsino and his favourites dallied and fondled. Orsino's bisexuality and the unexplained involvement of Antonio in the dénouement were the production's most dangerous statements. Given his fondness for petting, it seemed unlikely that Orsino would not have felt through Viola's disguise, but Jane Lapotaire's nicely mixed response in I, iv and II, iv made the point worthwhile. The director's concern to emphasize the play's sexual confusion was exemplified in the timing of Viola's soliloquy after Malvolio has brought her Olivia's ring:

She loves me sure; the cunning of her passion
Invites me in this churlish messenger.
None of my lord's ring! why, he sent her none.
I am the man.

(II, ii, 22-25)

She paused there in obvious confusion, then recovered with a smiling shrug, and the audience laughed delightedly. She was such a lively, boyish boy—the kind of fourth-former the heterosexual prefect has a crush on (I was adored once too!). Jane Lapotaire is, indeed, a Shakespearian actress of the highest quality. Her vocal range and her sensitivity to mid-speech shifts of emphasis reminded me of the young Dorothy Turin in the part; and she backed up her director's concept by reaching the audience's bisexuality. Mary Rutherford's Olivia, busy and thoroughly middle-class, with an almost northern bluntness and a cuddly body, was an adequate foil, but neither Orsino nor Sebastian could sustain the idea at this Viola's high level. 'O thou dissembling cub' ought more strongly to have embodied Orsino's fury, not only that Cesario should marry his Olivia, but also that his Cesario should marry at all.

It was largely through individual performances that this production recommended itself. Nicol Williamson's Malvolio was a studied grotesque—a pinched, Scottish elder of the kirk with the distorted sexual aspirations of the 'unco' guid'. He held his voice in the back of his throat, and only his bottom lip was mobile. The walk was a heron's prance, and, at times of supreme self-satisfaction, his head leant towards his shoulder and his eyes glinted like an alert bird's. The run was an absurd lope, which carried his legs as far sideways as forwards and left the top half of his body almost static. His black costume was striped with white lines of various thickness and density and topped with a ruff. It had a trompe-l'oeil effect, seeming to hold a tiny head an impossible distance from the bottom of the long, mean legs. He was happiest in this costume. Comically night-shirted in II, iii, and villainously cross-gartered in III, iv, he was willing to let the absurdity of the dress usurp his comic force. But in the gulling scene he was brilliant. He explained 'play with my—some rich jewel' [II. v. 60] by a gesture sharper than a footnote, lifting his chain of office then slapping it down with self-annoyance. His attempts to twist his mouth into a meaningful pronunciation of M, O, A, I, were as hilarious as his sudden, irrational conclusion that they said 'Malvolio'. Remembering his dignity, he just resisted the invitation to 'revolve' contained in the letter, but 'smile' he would, and did. First he had to remember how to do it, and then, almost imperceptibly, force his lips wider and slowly wider into a look of such joyless jollity as might have been worn by Miss Hotchkiss at the ITMA office party. His subsequent entrance to Olivia, pushing Maria aside and 'smiling' as he smeared his body along a property tree, was perfect, but the scene declined into ungainly knockabout and was only saved by the soliloquy. Twice, then, he stood to acknowledge with reverent hypocrisy Jove's hand in his well-merited glory, but for the rest of the time he sprawled beside a table in gangling self-love.
The tone of Frank Thornton's Aguecheek was set by the long face and longer silence that preceded his lifeless question, 'Shall we set about some revels?' (I, iii, 135-36). He was thin and melancholy, devoid of energy, dyspeptic and consumptive. There was a consciousness of real loneliness beneath the surface of the comic scenes, that affected not only Aguecheek but also Feste and Sir Toby. David Waller was, on his first entrance with Maria, dignified and relaxed, but drink depressed and depraved him. He made his reading of the character clear to his [Guardian [18 September 1974] interviewer:

Toby's first line is: 'What a plague means my niece to take the death of her brother thus? I am sure care's an enemy to life.' That suggests to me a man who is, as it were, protesting too much. He is protecting himself, a wounded man—hence the drinking … Nearly his last words are 'I hate a drunken rogue'. And it seems quite clear to me that he's referring quite consciously to himself.

That, expressed with admirable clarity, was the key to Waller's playing of Sir Toby. Patricia Hayes's perky Maria was a decade older and too happy below stairs to give credibility to her standing in Olivia's household. And Feste? How fascinating that it can be played so variously. Ron Pember spoke like a Londoner, dressed like a faded Harlequin now reduced to busking, and hinted always at a radical's social distaste for the antics of privilege. He despised the effete of Orsino's court, and his angry assumption that Viola considered him a beggar (III, i, 9) had all the spikiness of class-pride. But there was more than this. One member of the audience interestingly compared him with Bosola, another joker who declines to laugh at his own jokes. He was discomforting, an outsider, almost malevolently saturnine, defying the sentimental response to Malvolio's plight by pressing home his final accusations with heartless accuracy in Act V. (Yet he, with Fabian, guided Sir Andrew off the stage after Sir Toby's cruel last rebuff.) The majority of George Fenton's music for the production had a 'Victorian Elizabethan' tone. Against that, Pember sang his songs with the gritty voice of the modern, unaccompanied folk-singer. He was a working man among the leisured classes, deeply critical of their behaviour and bitterly dissatisfied with his own. The rough-and-ready air of the curtain-call was, perhaps, his triumph over the formality of Illyria. The four lovers had whirled and weaved their way around, involving Antonio in their dance, but leaving him bemused and lonely when they went out and the stage wall slid shut behind them. And there Antonio stood, upstage alone, while Ron Pember sang his song of mutability to us. I shall never forget this Feste.

PRODUCTION:

David Jones Stratford Festival, Ontario 1975

BACKGROUND:

Jones's production was deemed by critics to have steered a moderate course between the excessively romantic stagings of the nineteenth century and the more cynical interpretations of such twentieth-century directors as Tyrone Guthrie. Clive Barnes characterized Jones as "one of the new-style British classics directors who are original without being outlandish and place the simple, yet imaginative interpretation of the playwright's concept as absolutely paramount." This exceptionally successful production of Twelfth Night highlighted the play's themes of love and identity, particularly as expressed through the characters of Malvolio, played by Brian Bedford, and Viola, played by Kathleen Widdoes. Bedford presented Malvolio as a prim, self-righteous puritan, and played directly to the audience. Berners W. Jackson likened the actor to a virtuoso musician playing "upon a cacophonous instrument, directly manipulating the responses, not only of the whole group, but also of individuals." By contrast, Stephen Macht's Orsino was censured for his strident tones. Jackson complained that "during his opening speech he banged a book shut, stomped around, and growled or shouted out the lines in a way that made it evident Shakespeare hadn't written the part as he wanted to play it."

COMMENTARY:
Clive Barnes (review date 12 June 1975)

[David Jones's staging of] Twelfth Night proved to be a beauty—one of the lightest, most luminous and elegant things to be seen in Stratford for some years.

David Jones is one of the two directors of the Royal Shakespeare Company in Britain—he triumphantly staged Gorky's Summer Folk and Love's Labour's Lost for the company at the Brooklyn Academy of Music this season—and in this Twelfth Night he escapes from the Canadian tradition of Guthrie into something far more substantial and poetic.

Mr. Jones is like Mr. Phillips, one of the newstyle British classics directors who are original without being outlandish and place the simple, yet imaginative interpretation of the playwright's concept as absolutely paramount.

It is a far more pragmatic method and not nearly so stylized as the old Guthrie approach, which was aimed at pleasing an audience rather than presenting a play. Mind you, if the new way is successful, the audience will be pleased, as it was abundantly with this Twelfth Night.

The zest of Mr. Jones's interpretation of these crisscrossing patterns of love and identity, shone out from the first. He takes Orsino's opening speech, "If music be the food of love," as if it had just been written by the playwright, and throughout he is devilishly imaginative in his readings of the text, for this is a subtle, supple view of the vagaries of love.

It is exquisitely acted—you could hardly have told that this was largely the same company that had marched, with leaden-footed competence, through Shaw's Saint Joan the night before.

The two principals, indeed, were new, and they were iridescent. Brian Bedford as Malvolio and Kathleen Widdoes as Viola had just that definition of Shakespearean style that has been lacking at Stratford these last few seasons.

Mr. Bedford's dignified beetle of a Malvolio, talking like a genteel minor civil servant, grinning inordinately at his own feeble jokes, and looking like a plump, self-satisfied Richelieu, makes a formidable character.

Mr. Bedford—and Mr. Jones—take a considerable risk in frequently addressing the audience directly. Style wards off the threat inherent here of vulgarity, but at the end perhaps Mr. Bedford, who has been the consummate comedian throughout, does at present miss the full morose possibility of Malvolio's final malediction.

But this is a rich Malvolio, and Miss Widdoes with her tempestuously passionate Viola is its equal. Saucer-eyed and trigger-spirited, Miss Widdoes is absolutely credible. The other performances were all in their own way admirable—Marti Maraden made a pretty and unusually vivacious Olivia; Leslie Yeo a belchingly amusing Sir Toby, obviously more concerned with ale than cakes; Tom Kneebone, the histrionically ineffectual Dauphin of Saint Joan was wryly and bitterly effective as Feste, and Frank Maraden had a nicely lank despondency as Aguecheek. It shows what direction can do—and I also like the Caroline period design of Susan Benson.

John Pettigrew (review date February 1976)
Over at the Festival Theatre, David Jones of the Royal Shakespeare Company directed an enjoyable Twelfth Night, straightforward and sunny, a production that left the more sombre areas unexplored—only once, I think, in Sir Andrew's response to Sir Toby's contemptuous rebuke, did one of the flat characters for a fleeting moment become round. Much better than Stratford's first Twelfth Night (one twisted out of shape by Tyrone Guthrie's obsession with the play's darker side), it was less generally satisfactory than David William's jewel of a production in 1966. But if in some respects it was very remarkable indeed, and attained levels that Stratford had probably not reached before, it was made extremely uneven by extraordinary variation in the quality of individual performances. Tom Kneebone's Feste seemed to me to lack the kind of imagination that went into his Dauphin in Saint Joan, and to be no more than adequate, though it is only fair to add that I don't pretend to understand Feste, that I find him less interesting than most critics do, and that what I think I found missing was the kind of bitterness that would have been discordant in the generally harmonious world of this production. A good deal less than adequate was Denise Fergusson's Maria. I find it difficult to be fair to Miss Fergusson because I admired her Jenny in The Threepenny Opera of 1972 so very much that I keep expecting her to rise to that level again and keep getting disappointed. As I have pointed out before, I regard myself as an authority on Marias, having once given the worst performance ever given anywhere in that role (or in any other role for that matter). What the part needs is the kind of pert and joyful zip that Molière's soubrettes have (Miss Galloway would be a definitive Maria), but Miss Fergusson was flat rather than bubbly, and seemed bewildered. The major disaster, however, was the Orsino, Stephen Macht's abysmal failure in the role, posing problems for other actors and especially Viola, on whose taste in men Mr. Macht's casting cast the most serious doubts. Mr. Macht's Proctor showed that he's a good actor, but he should avoid Shakespearean roles except those requiring Brooklyn Jews or oriental thugs of an acrobatic bent. Never again, I trust, will I hear the play's first word ("If") so underlined as if there is philosophically every reason to doubt that music be the food of love, and never again, I trust, will I be led to find myself thinking in the first scene of Orsino as an understudy rehearsing King Lear in his opening scene, or as a Tigger in an absolute frenzy to be even more bouncy than usual. Mr. Macht leaped about the stage, slammed books shut for no apparent reason, held fielding practice, went through a complete repertoire of damnable faces before beginning, threatened to transfix a horrified messenger with a crossbow, and generally seemed determined to o'erdo Termagant and to out-herod Herod, and to need a strait-jacket. I did not enjoy Mr. Macht's performance, and that the production survived it is a tribute to most of the others involved.

There were some nice bits of business, some of them none the worse for not being original. Sir Andrew's yellow costume gave special point to Maria's remark that yellow is a colour Olivia abhors. Sir Toby Belch, anxious to prove his sobriety, tried to walk a straight line but became naturally bewildered since the line he chose to tread was that marking a difference in stage levels. Feste remarked, "Did you never see the picture of We Three," to Toby, Andrew and himself, who, for reasons that escape me now, but which seemed convincing at the time, had somehow become "See-no-evil," "Hear-no-evil," and "Speak-no-evil."

There were also excellent performances. Leslie Yeo had and gave a good time as Toby, and Lewis Gordon was an admirable Fabian. Last year I insisted in these pages on the evidence of Marti Maraden's Katharine in Love's Labour's Lost that she was a young actress of enormous promise whom the Festival must grapple to itself with hoops of steel; this year her Olivia was one of her several fine performances, and Frank Maraden's Sir Andrew was also as good as any I've seen. Violas I am quite incapable of judging since I always fall in love with them within about two minutes of their arrivals in Illyria, and I tend to think that Siobhan McKenna or Joan Darling or Martha Henry or Judi Dench is the finest I've seen until I see the next one. This year I fell for Kathleen Widdoes who did everything superbly and who, I think, better at communicating the sheer joy of being vital and in love than anyone else I've seen. And her girlish squeal of delight as she finally flung herself upon Orsino was a supremely lovely moment.
But this was Malvolio's Twelfth Night It is true that Brian Bedford overacted disgracefully, and that economy was not a word that he appeared to have heard of, true that the performance may have thinned the role since it was quite impossible ever to sympathize with this Malvolio, true that he kept inventing new gags which not only broke audiences up but kept his fellow actors on their toes since they were never sure what he would come up with next (Sir Andrew's completely unsuccessful efforts to restrain his hysterics at one new bit of business one night were alone worth the price of admission). But if Mr. Bedford's performance was naughty indeed and very far from being definitive, it was also memorable and marvellous, the kind of thing that only the finest actor can get away with.

At the centre of Mr. Bedford's Malvolio were supreme self-satisfaction, snobbishness, and smugness incarnate. All that is conventional enough, though I don't think I've ever seen a Malvolio who disliked others' jokes so much, or who derived such terrific enjoyment from his own even when they weren't funny ("By your leave, wax" reduced him to tears of laughter). What was certainly fresh was this Malvolio's revelation that his Puritanism is only skin-deep, or rather, perhaps, that he thinks Puritanism good for others, but not for himself. He moved with a kind of built-in snigger, possessed of a dirty little mind beside which a London sewer would be crystallinity personified. The thought of the daybed where he had left Olivia sleeping filled him with pornographic delight, the thought of her making "her great P's" was exquisitely geared to tickle his smutty little mind. Lost in daydream, he remarked to in imaginary Sir Toby, "My fortunes having cast me on your niece," and then became wildly gleeful at the thought of being literally cast there. Olivia's "Wilt thou go to bed, Malvolio" practically precipitated an orgasm. His unlimited capacity for self-approval went along with an equal capacity for disapproving of others: "as a squash is before 'tis a peascod" would have withered Viola had she heard it. Again Jove's name was certainly to be invoked, but only, where Malvolio himself was concerned, as that of a social inferior to whom some curious social ritual suggested the desirability of paying homage if only because the best people do so and because to defer to him is to show oneself as truly humble.

There was some lovely business: an interior struggle as to whether or not to revolve on reading Maria's instruction to do so; a grotesque slow bend to pick up Maria's letter; an entrance with Malvolio playing "She loves me, she loves me not" with a flower, then suddenly realizing that the number might not work out, cheating by counting ahead, and then pettishly discarding the flower. And while I suppose he ought not to have done it, I could not help dissolving as Mr. Bedford played to particular members of the audience, sharing his jokes with them, and even on one occasion pausing until some kindly gentleman in the audience prompted him with "have greatness thrust upon them," whereupon Mr. Bedford nodded his gratitude and chalked up the debt for the help.

Berners W. Jackson (review date Winter 1976)

The Twelfth Night directed by David Jones at the Festival Theatre was thoroughly agreeable Shakespeare, lively, full-bodied, and a pleasure to look at. Dressed by Susan Benson in costumes that were near-Renaissance, neither aggressively nor archly period, the production struck a subtle and convincing medium between the sunshine piece that we are told our forefathers relished and the acidulous attempt at black comedy that some modern directors have pursued in producing this play. Leslie Yeo's Sir Toby Belch was jovial enough for a workaday Lord of Misrule. His bluster, his belches, his pranks, and his slap-and-tickle with Maria were his continuing lifestyle, but the strength of his animosity toward Malvolio betrayed a sourness of spirit, a sense of self-waste. A sort of pinched, incomplete Falstaff, he was a forgivable man, more easily liked by others than by himself. Denise Fergusson gave Maria considerable bright-eyed malice. A strong-bodied lass excited by her ability to be one of the boys without losing sexual identity, she disarmed the audience by the gusto with which she relished her own cleverness. Frank Maraden was an attenuated, ungainly, dim-witted Aguecheek of watery affability. Prompted to action he became a dancer of excruciating absurdity, designed to trip over feet, his own if no others were available. In a suit of lemon yellow as remarkable as the fact that he existed, he claimed the kind of unguarded affection that one must feel for the last specimen of a species otherwise extinct. The remote singularity of Feste was emphasized by a costume of pale, uncertain gold, the dress for Tom Kneebone's harsh and metallic clown, burnished by wit, but unhappy.
This was a tough, professional Feste, his eyes quizzical and disenchanted, his distaste for his fellow men beginning with himself.

For those who have sometimes wondered, as I have, why Shakespeare wrote in the part of Fabian, Lewis Gordon's performance in this production may offer a suggestion. Nearly every Fabian I have seen has appeared to believe that, as a late-comer to the comic company, he must exhibit some striking eccentricity in order to hold his own with Sir Toby and the gang. Since the part doesn't give an actor with that particular ambition much to work with, the result has invariably been more puzzling than effective. Mr. Gordon played the role as an ordinary fellow who rather enjoyed his odd companions but would not have wanted to be thought like them. In so doing he provided them with a foil of normalcy that Shakespeare may have intended, and at the same time demonstrated why Feste could not have effectively performed Fabian's function and remained Feste.

Kathleen Widdoes was a sweet-faced, candid Viola, who did the Cesario part with a nicely judged unmasculine attempt at masculinity. One admired, for instance, the hearty way she got her right shoulder into a thrusting handshake, because the result obviously caused her physical pain. The subtle variety in her gait and stance suggested that she was having continually to remind herself of what she was supposed to be. This was a winning performance because Miss Widdoes was able to make the audience feel, to the point of sharing in it, Viola's pleasure at being alive and in love. Since she is also an actress capable of expressing great joy what appears to be a process of inner radiation, Miss Widdoes made the recognition scene totally memorable.

Olivia, so often played as a rather dreary lady who seems to suffer from a permanent asthma of the spirit, was given character and wit by Marti Maraden. Her vow of long mourning for her brother did not prevent her handling her household competently, and all evidence of overindulged sentiment evaporated when Viola appeared. Love, however ironically mistaken, came as a challenge to this Olivia, and brought out the best in her, making her a force to be reckoned with. However, Stephen Macht's Orsino struck me as irritatingly perverse. Mr. Macht seemed to have conceived Orsino as a tigerish spirit caged in boredom and maddened by unrequited love. During his opening speech he banged a book shut, stamped around, and growled or shouted out the lines in a way that made it evident Shakespeare hadn't written the part as he wanted to play it. Thus he failed to conjure up what I take to be the atmosphere of Illyria, and though he did make some amends later on by his glad acceptance of Viola, it was not until after he had grabbed Olivia by the throat and given other evidence of serious instability.

Brian Bedford's Malvolio was an unlovely and unlovable prig of a man with a monumental capacity for self-approval, who nevertheless managed to make himself totally agreeable to the audience. Dignity had starched his face into a mask of disapproval, but it could crack into a mirthless smile for public consumption, or rumple into a private snigger of delight when he was soliloquizing upon his own character, fortunes, or undertakings. In these moments Mr. Bedford encouraged the participation of the audience; he affected to be puzzled by their reactions, he asked for their approval, he took them into his confidence. This was an astonishing virtuoso performance with the actor playing upon the audience like a musician upon a cacophonous instrument, directly manipulating the responses, not only of the whole group, but also of individuals. It was all so skillful and so hilarious that an adverse criticism seems merely grumpy, and yet, although this Malvolio remained in character throughout, Mr. Bedford's familiarities with the audience did, I think, make it impossible for him to achieve fully the effects that ought to attach later in the play to Malvolio's bewilderment, anger, and pathetically outraged dignity.

PRODUCTION:
BACKGROUND:

Employing the seasonal associations of Twelfth Night as metaphors for the play's action, Hands's RSC production opened with an Illyria shrouded in winter and closed with the arrival of spring. This threw into relief the centrality of the play's romantic relationships, which critics agreed were rendered with energy. Benedict Nightingale commented, "in Illyria love is a sudden and alarming affliction, a variety of glandular fever virulent enough to send the mercury racing up and over the humiliation threshold." In particular, Gareth Thomas's Orsino and Kate Nicholls's Olivia were faulted for indulging in hyperbolic emotion. J. C. Trewin asserted that "we know that Orsino and Olivia are given to excess, but it was long since they had been acted with more resolute and superfluous vigour." John Wood-vine's Malvolio received more favorable reviews; Sally Aire commented that "his use of the physical constraints of his preposterous cross-gartering [gave] opportunity for some unexpectedly enjoyable clowning." Similarly, Geoffrey Hutchings's Feste received critical acclaim for his handling of the role's melancholy and music. Aire wrote that Hutchings played Feste "with a privateness, the whimsy is there to hide a sadness which is revealed only in his music-making, a dimension of the performance which is as skilfully accomplished as the rest of it."

COMMENTARY:

Sheridan Morley (review date 20 June 1979)

Short of making it into a musical, which amazingly seems never to have been tried, there's not a lot that even the most wilful or determined of directors can do with Twelfth Night. Unusually, almost alone among the later comedies, it defies any kind of social or political or historical comment and therefore is inclined to become an actors' rather than a producer's play.

Having already staged it to considerable acclaim at the Comedie Francaise, with his wife as Viola, Terry Hands now brings to a new RSC production at Stratford the same designer (John Napier) but a homegrown cast and, from all Parisian accounts, a somewhat broader interpretation. We start off in a wild and wintry wood, as though the play were actually set on Twelfth Night rather than merely written for it; enter thereto a curiously irate Orsino (Gareth Thomas) bellowing instructions about more music to a semirecalcitrant court, and from here on it is clearly going to be every actor for himself and devil take the hind-most.

Thus we have a jolly-hockey schoolgirl Olivia (Kate Nicholls), an unusually seductive Maria (Jane Downs), a gargantuan Toby Belch (Willoughby Goddard) and John McEnery as Aguecheek camping around like Moley in a woolly balaclava. None of them seem to have a lot to do with each other, but all are maniacally intent on making the most of their several moments—not least John Wood-vine whose Malvolio is unusually desperate to get all the established laughs and then some.

By the end of the first half we seem to have moved from The Wind in the Willows through Mary Rose to Rookery Nook, no mean achievement in an hour and a half; by the beginning of the second half we've also acquired a Fabian (Norman Tyrrell) out of some mediaeval episode of The Archers and increasingly Cherie Lunghi's Viola is getting to look like the principal boy out of some especially eccentric pantomime.

But Twelfth Night is reasonably indestructible, its twinning plot being both simpler and infinitely more touching than that of Comedy Of Errors; thus it doesn't much matter that what we appear to have here is fifteen actors racing round each other in search of a common style. They never actually find one, but they have a lot of fun along the way and so on the first night did an audibly delighted audience. By the end of the second half Spring has been sprung, as has Malvolio, and Feste (Geoffrey Hutchings in the performance of the evening, unless you count an interesting stage debut from Stephen Rashbrook as Sebastian) is as usual allowed to walk away with the end of the play on a stage he has never for an instant left. He alone has realised that Twelfth Night should have been a musical all along.

Benedict Nightingale (review date 22 June 1979)

For some time now our directors have been conscientiously darkening what used to be regarded as Shakespeare's happiest comedy. We have had glum and scabrous Festes, and we have had Malvolios so cruelly teased that even the Belches—mean drunks and unprincipled predators to a man—have proved mildly shocked by their maltreatment. But these prison-house productions have obviously missed much, not least the interestingly erratic and even violent behaviour of some of the more romantic characters. In Illyria love is a sudden and alarming affliction, a variety of glandular fever virulent enough to send the mercury racing up and over the humiliation threshold:

Cesario, by the roses of the spring,
By maidhood, honour, truth and everything,
I love thee so that, maugre all thy pride,
Nor wit nor reason can my passion hide.

It is, however, precisely such sentiments that give Terry Hand's revival of the play its tone, style and extravagant originality.

Roger Bisley's Antonio seems much more than ordinarily besotted with Sebastian, and Gareth Thomas's Orsino is not the usual droopy musicophaghe but a grizzled gentleman-pirate dangerously likely to succumb to his unpredictable impulses and cut a throat or two. As for Kate Nicholls's Olivia, she has no sooner swept on stage than she has thrown aside her mourning veil to reveal a lavish auburn mane that at once justifies her overwhelming vanity and gives due warning of her torrid temperament. Before long this pre-Raphaelite beauty is proclaiming her loves and hates with a flamboyance that must be audible halfway across Illyria, and enthusiastically matching voice with movement and gesture. She flirtatiously rubs up against Malvolio, flings aside the wretched Aguecheek, and proceeds to astonish Cesario-Viola with the physical frankness of her unruly emotions. 'To one of your receiving enough is shown', she cries, and promptly disproves her own words by leaping at her, cuddling her, and pursuing her pelimeli through the garden. At one moment of high excitement she seems actually to be trying to rape her, and at another she blunders into and very nearly knocks flat one of the spindly, woebegone trees that cower onstage, like crones in a gymnasium. It is as if defloration were not enough: this rampaging lady will be satisfied with nothing short of deforestation. This is more than a little absurd, and certainly very hard to reconcile with the staid melancholic who threatens the carousing Toby with banishment; but it is also an overdue corrective to theatrical tradition, since Olivias have long tended to be wet and anonymous, uniformly incapable of feeling the flames to whose heat their words attest. It unbalances, but does not up-end, a production that seems sensible enough elsewhere and can claim several 'better-than-average performances: Willoughby Goddard's Belch, physically piggy and morally swinish; Cheril Lunghi's sweet and affectionate Viola; and, especially, John Woodvine's Malvolio, whose private hobby is practising the vindictive kicks-upthe-bum he will one day give the undeserving Goddard. Watch this baleful puritan, who may well never have smiled in his life before, grimacing wolfishly into his hand-mirror as he prepares to charm Olivia, or doing battle with yellow stockings whose cross-garters don't so much impede the circulation as mummify the legs. Only rarely, I have found, is Twelfth Night even remotely as funny on the stage as in the study. That this time performance comes close to matching bookish imagination is substantially due to Mr Woodvine's wickedly silly solemnities.
Sally Aire (review date July 1979)

In this new production Terry Hands seems to be seeking to direct us to a reappraisal of the traditional view of this piece as a simple Christmas divertissement, and in so doing gives us a production which in places seems perverse in its interpretation of characters and their narrative functions. Yet one of the happiest consequences of this rather wilful treatment is a re-think on Orsino and Olivia, neither of whom, traditionally played, is the most enlivening of Shakespeare's creations: Orsino, who usually droops about the stage like a withering love-lies-bleeding, is here driven by his lovesickness into a bitter aggression, and rants (and raves) like the proverbial bear with a sore head which his name suggests. The opening scene of the play, therefore, came as something of a shock to the audience, amongst whom I thought I detected a rather uncomfortable reaction at this point, as well as a feeling of discomfort from the stage. But Orsino's ego-trip had made itself clear from the start, and we were all aware of the firm directorial hand. The object of Orsino's passion, Olivia, soon revealed herself as a barely feasible mixture of flowing pre-Raphaelite beauty and rather pukka lacrosse captain. She projects such qualities of heartiness, hautiness and downright lust as would scare the pants firmly onto any man less macho than Orsino or more awake than the bemused Sebastian. Both these interpretations bring into focus one feature common to both characters—emotional, psychic immaturity, and in doing this cast what, for me at least, was new light on the play.

Viola, too, is in search of an emotional wholeness, grieving for her drowned brother. (Olivia, too, we remember at the beginning of the play is supposed to be in mourning for her brother.) Malvolio, who seems flattered rather than fulfilled by what he believes to be Olivia's admiration, is 'sick of self-love', and, unable to achieve his emotional wholeness, he slides out of the play and into the next dramatic generation—'I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you', to evolve into the corrupt villain of Jacobean drama. The other characters are resolved and so, in terms of dramatic history, die a quiet, happy 'mythic death'. Whilst the various lovers in the play are all falling in love with appearances, all in their own particular stages of transition between the mature and the infantile state, with all its attendant regression and narcissism, there does appear to be one character who has achieved his own psychic wholeness before the play has even started.

Feste is no longer a young man, he is a wise Fool—beginning to approach the Fool of Lear—who has learned his craft through some sort of suffering; a private man, sufficient unto himself and, incidentally, in this production looking disturbingly ill. This apartness from the other characters is emphasised in this production in that from the opening Feste never leaves the stage (except at the very end, to hasten Sebastian's arrival); and he remains often in the shadows, motionless by one of the trees which constitute the set. But although always present, listening, and so in full knowledge of all the misunderstandings the plot gives rise to, the text never makes it possible for him to try to sort them out. This does make a very real narrative problem for the audience, if not for the actor. Geoffrey Hutchings plays Feste with a privateness, the whimsey is there to hide a sadness which is revealed only in his music-making, a dimension of the performance which is as skilfully accomplished as the rest of it.

If Feste is less overtly comic an interpretation than we are used to, Malvolio is more so. He is ludicrous rather than repugnant, and John Woodvine's use of the physical constraints of his preposterous cross-gartering gives opportunity for some unexpectedly enjoyable clowning. Cherie Lunghi's Viola exudes an air of guileless innocence. She plays the role with a straight directness and childlike charm, but I missed the toughness Jane Lapotaire brought to the role five years ago.

The production sets Part One of the play in winter. John Napier's trees are bare of leaves, everyone is shivering (Orsino seems to hold court permanently out of doors) and everyone is wrapped in furs and leather (again!). The Spring of Part Two is a little more convincing. The trees have sprouted a few leaves and cold yellow primroses and daffodils have appeared. It gives us something different to look at, but does seem really rather predictably schematic. The costume design is one of light shades—pale grey, white, black dominate, with browns and yellows supplied by the early autumnal Belch, Aguecheek and Maria. The music is for once a happy fusion of early Tudor filtered through a modern ear. The catch 'Hold thy peace' and Feste's 'Come away Death' work particularly well, whilst the tune for Little Tiny Boy is very close to the traditional one. There is an all too rare sense here of the actors being at ease with the music and enjoying it.

A last, small, practical point: there is some difficulty with sightlines, and I noticed a couple of annoying maskings in some of the scenes involving Sir Toby Belch. I imagine these have been sorted out by now.

J. C. Trewin (review date Summer 1980)

Illyria has often been a strange place; yet though it is a world just over the horizon, it must not be fantasticated beyond belief. Terry Hands joined the various directors who have used the secondary title, What You Will, as an invitation to adventure. At Stratford he also accepted a hint from the calendar. At first it was obviously a hard Illyrian winter, snow powdered beneath the leafless trees, everyone muffled up but (for all the low temperature) staying perpetually and unpersuasively out of doors. Until Malvolio's letter-speech the play was unwarmed, though Orsino did his best by carrying infatuation into near-frenzy. So intelligent an actress as Kate Nicholls was obliged to present Olivia as a coquette with a wild comingon disposition, a director's tiresome caprice. We know that Orsino and Olivia are given to excess, but it was long since they had been acted with more resolute and superfluous vigor. Anything that distracts us from the language in Twelfth Night must be false. When spring at length appeared, for some of us that early shiver stayed.

John Woodvine's Malvolio was plausible, a domestic regimental sergeant-major in trouble with his vowels; Cherie Lunghi's Viola had a forth-right charm that suited Cesario. I was unhappy with a Toby like a bullying Friar Tuck, and a Feste (there could be a book of Festes) like an intermittently electrified dormouse.

Roger Warren (review date 1980)

John Napier's set was … the most striking feature of the new Twelfth Night, … [it consisted of] a sloping platform with bare trees in large square tubs and snow on the ground; the sun came out in time for Malvolio to practise behaviour in it, and Maria's grey winter shawl was decked out with green leaves and suspended from one of the trees to provide extra 'cover' for the eavesdroppers in the letter scene; from III, i daffodils blossomed in the tubs, and green leaves had sprouted on some (but by no means all) of the bare trees, so that the stage picture for the second half was a mixture of winter and spring: but if this matched the mixture of harshness and happiness in the play, it also, less happily, reflected a certain confusion in Terry Hands's production.

Through the trees, characters were often seen upstage, preparing for the next episode: Sir Toby meeting Cesario at the gate; Viola and Olivia in conversation before coming downstage centre for their exchange in III, iv as Sir Toby moved upstage to meditate upon some horrid message for a challenge; Viola even loosening her hair upstage and draping a shawl around her male breeches to give some semblance of being Orsino's mistress while the others listened to Malvolio's letter downstage. During Feste's final song, the lovers in a happy group centre were isolated from those who felt the imminence of the wind and the rain, sitting underneath the trees at the shadowed edges of the platform: the wounded Aguecheek, head in hands, the isolated Antonio, and the sobered Maria and Toby, separated and facing away from each other.
If Mr Hands gave us contrast here, he gave us contradiction elsewhere, especially in his presentation of Feste and Malvolio. Feste was on stage virtually throughout, an ill-licensed Twelfth Night Lord of Misrule, even cueing character's entries in the finale; but since he had seen both Cesario and Sebastian, 'your name is not Master Cesario; nor this is not my nose neither' had to be made to mean the reverse of what it in fact does mean, to the extent of Feste actually removing a false nose to emphasise knowingly that 'nothing that is so is so'. This was the most blatant example of Mr Hands's typical habit of sacrificing the plain meaning of the text to the interests of some imposed 'concept'; but text and performance tend to resist such concepts, and Geoffrey Hutchings's quietly rustic Feste was among the least dominating I have seen.

John Woodvine (Malvolio) seemed at first to be carefully building a consistent characterisation of a humourless puritanical steward, self-conscious about social gaffes, having immense difficulty with the pronunciation of 'slough', speaking with a nasal twang specifically mocked in Feste's line 'Malvolio's nose is no whipstock', and grimly resolving 'I—will—smile' as if his life depended upon it. The resulting physical contortion was legitimately very funny, but the antics with the cross-garters seemed to come from a more farcical character, equipped with a huge yellow codpiece for gross phallic humour at 'greatness thrust upon them'. 'I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you' was charged with deadly menace; but as he turned away upstage, the long cord which had tied his feet snaked along the floor after him out of the trapdoor from which he had emerged. What we were finally to think about Malvolio was not clear.

The most original interpretation was of the lovers, who expressed what they were feeling with unusual direct emphasis, without either lyricism or affectation. Gareth Thomas tore into Orsino's lines rapidly, roughly, even aggressively, as if he was basically a man of action who felt obliged to use conventional wooing styles and disliked them; at the end he wore a flowing white Saracen-style robe with a scimitar at his belt (looking rather like Byron in oriental costume), turning the knife violently on both Olivia and Viola, thus wringing from Viola the passionately emphatic declaration 'after him I LOVE'. This interpretation had the merit of bringing real weight to his imaging of his fierce desires as 'fell and cruel hounds' at the cost of gabbling more reflective passages ('longing, wavering, sooner lost and worn'), but its vigour was refreshing.

So, too, was that of Olivia. Interpreting a figure of speech as a statement of fact, Mr Hands did not merely 'veil' her 'like a cloistress', but dressed her in flowing black and white nun's robes; when Viola asked to see her face, Olivia removed not just the nun's veil but her entire head-dress, revealing long red tresses which made her look an odd mixture of Mary Magdalen and Salome; but at least it emphasised Olivia's vigorous coming alive, as did the force with which she virtually assaulted fate on the line 'Fate, show thy force'. But the actress lacked the experience to vary her subsequent delivery, and her very emphatic style ultimately became tiring.

It was Cherie Lunghi's Viola that really gained from this approach. At the start a scared waif, she gradually worked out her disguise ('an eunuch!' was a sudden inspiration), and also thought her way through the 'willow cabin' speech, which began as a genuine, thoughtful attempt to answer Olivia's question, and gradually acquired great power as she built up the plan bit by bit. In the central scene [II. iv. 88-110] with Orsino, their passionate, almost violent exchanges ('Sooth, but you must!', 'Ay, but I know—' 'What dost thou know?'), flung backwards and forwards, built up to a tingling 'She never told her love', which was charged with real emotional frustration. During 'Come away death', she draped her cloak caringly around Orsino's shoulders, and their mutual absorption was so great that they virtually forgot about Feste; Orsino broke the spell with the next instruction about Olivia, thus increasing her frustration, but at the end of the scene he returned to her to give back her cloak, and this held moment between them underlined their development during the scene and prepared for their final union. Miss Lunghi also played the humour with impish lightness, and she alone brought distinction of style and personality to a production generally lacking in the subtle undertones and detailed humanity achieved in previous Stratford productions of this play.

PRODUCTION:
David Mamet Circle Repertory Theatre, New York 1980

BACKGROUND:

Mamet’s 1980 production of Twelfth Night at the Circle Repertory Theatre, New York engendered heated critical comment for its bold use of costuming. Adopting an anachronistic approach that clothed characters in garb from a variety of centuries, Mamet explained that he allowed the actors themselves to choose the costumes that they felt were appropriate for their characters. Many critics asserted that this directorial choice was nothing more than an irresponsible gimmick. Michael Bertin, however, argued that it was "a fine intuition into the play's heart," explaining that "uniformity in costuming is ... a relatively modern innovation." This production further elicited contrary responses regarding Marshall W. Mason's performance as Malvolio. John Simon described Mason's Malvolio as "a prissy antiques salesman trying to screw up his courage to turn a trick on Central Park West," while Bertin characterized the performance as "elegant and reserved." Lindsay Crouse, by contrast, won unanimous approval for her rendering of Viola, which Edith Oliver hailed as "the best I've ever seen," noting that the actress spoke "her poetry ... as easily as breathing, never slighting its music or emotion or force." Colin Stinton's Feste was also praised by the majority of critics. Oliver in particular singled out his deft handling of Shakespeare's language: "struck with much of that tormenting dialogue, he somehow makes it sound witty, and his voice and speech are worthy of the haunting songs he sings." The cast additionally included Jay O. Saunders as Orsino, Michael Lerner as Sir Toby Belch, Trish Hawkins as Olivia, and Marceli Rosenblatt as Maria.

COMMENTARY:

Mel Gussow (review date 17 December 1980)

David Mamet's lighthearted production of Twelfth Night at the Circle Repertory Company features two outstanding Shakespearean performances—by Lindsay Crouse in the pivotal role of Viola and by Colin Stinton in the usually subordinate role of Feste the clown.

As played by Mr. Stinton, the clown is a deadpan wit who nimbly takes the measure of everyone else on stage. He orchestrates their cheerful deceptions and always has a palm extended to solicit a donation. He is such an articulate and engaging performer, acting and singing ("O Mistress Mine") that one wishes his character could have had an even fairer share of Shakespeare's choicest speeches, beginning with Orsino's opening entreaty, "If music be the food of love, play on."

In this production, the first of the Circle's seasonal two-part repertory (Gerhart Hauptmann's The Beaver Coat is staged in tandem), Mr. Stinton shares the evening's honors with Miss Crouse. She is a beacon of loveliness as the willful Viola. While pretending to be boyish, she magically retains a feminine radiance. She would be perfectly suited to play all of Shakespeare's girl-boy roles, and womanly characters as well.

Exuding charm along with intelligence, she convincingly becomes the object of all affection. When she looks up in unabashed admiration at Orsino, she makes us believe that the man is worthy of her, although Jay O. Sanders, who is playing the role, lacks that customary regal air of command. Mr. Sanders is one of several actors who fall somewhat short of the full fathom of fun in Twelfth Night. Michael Lerner and Jack Dengel offer rather rudimentary approximations of those two domestic buffoons, Sir Toby and Sir Andrew, although they and others improve in the course of the evening.

The primary debits of an otherwise enjoyable show are Clifford Capone's costumes, which are, to say the least, capricious. They seem to have been thrown together from different productions and different periods.
Mr. Stinton, for example, wears chinos and a reindeer ski sweater and looks as if he had just wandered in from watching a football game in Good News. At one point he lights up a Kool. Miss Crouse and the Duke's other minions are dressed like military-school plebes. Robert Lupone wears a pirate's bandanna as large as a turban. Marshall W. Mason, the Circle's artistic director, playing Malvolio in tails and top hat, needs only a pince nez to make the picture complete as a portrait of The New Yorker's Eustace Tilley.

Fred Kolouch's drab setting has a vaguely Mediterranean aspect and a short staircase that leads up only so that it can immediately lead down. The director has also unwisely used blackouts after short scenes, which slows down the play and emphasizes the episodic nature of the evening.

However, once the devious subplots fall in place, Miss Crouse takes charge of the romance and Mr. Stinton takes charge of the comedy, and this Twelfth Night begins to sprint. Trish Hawkins is a vivacious Olivia and W.H. Macy is bedazzled but eager as Miss Crouse's look-alike brother. The scenes among the three of them, with a tumult of mistaken identities and sudden infatuations, are both antic and romantic.

According to the program, Mr. Mason first attempted the role of Malvolio 20 years ago, and it remains his favorite acting experience. He has remembered the character well. He is funny and properly fussy, although he lacks the pyrotechnic comic dexterity that Brian Bedford brought to the role at the Stratford Festival, Canada. Mr. Mason's Malvolio is a man of high standards, sincere intentions and pinched emotions, easily badgered into making a foil of himself.

As this Malvolio picks up the planted letter containing a bogus confession of love to him from his lady Olivia, the dastardly plotters peer down from atop a wall. With only their faces visible, Sir Toby, Sir Andrew and Fabian (Charles T. Harper) are a trio of laughable, head-bobbing Toby jugs. Later, when Mr. Mason returns, riotously cross-gartered, with his yellow stockings glaring like sun-spots, this austere puritan amusingly abandons his inhibitions and unleashes a grin.

Mr. Mamet's frothy version of Twelfth Night proves three things: some artistic directors can easily double as character actors; contemporary playwrights can be at home directing in Illyria, and Miss Crouse and Mr. Stinton are actors to be applauded.

John Simon (review date 29 December 1980)

Nowhere in the western world, I daresay, do the classics fare as badly as in our theater. I don't know whether it is the teaching or the learning—more properly the lack of teaching and the unwillingness to learn—that is to blame. In any case, American theater seems to be equipped only for the latest American plays; there is no sense of other times and other places—as what follows shockingly demonstrates.

The Circle Repertory is about as good an institutional theater as we have, possibly the best; but only for contemporary Americana. Now, alas, we are getting Twelfth Night, staged by the playwright David Mamet as Friday the thirteenth. Start, if you will, with the costumes of Clifford Capone: unlovely, uninventive, and, on top of that, inconsistent. While most characters wear dull modern clothes—Orsino's men in West Point uniforms, Sir Toby in a corduroy sport jacket, Feste in a reindeer sweater—Aguecheek is out of Restoration comedy and Antonio out of The Pirates of Penzance. These costumes are cheap in both senses of the word, and show it, again in both. The Circle Rep's small stage is inhospitable to Shakespeare, but Fred Kolouch's set neither makes full use of the available space nor conjures up a poetic vision of Illyria. It does, however, conjure up a vision of a highschool production of Twelfth Night.
Now, take the staging. For no good reason, Mamet will have Feste doing a crossword puzzle or lighting up a cigarette. If there were consistent modernization throughout, or if that cigarette would shed light on a character or situation, very well; but these gimmicks are desultory, arbitrary, and sophomoric. When three plotters are spying on Malvolio and he looks up at them atop a wall, two sink out of sight and one impersonates a statue—meaning that he can see them. When Malvolio next looks up at them, they blithely stay put—meaning he cannot see them. The staging abounds in this sort of inconsistency. When Sebastian finally comes on at the same time as Viola, Mamet has her gazing at him expressionlessly for a long time. Clearly, the director must find a way to justify the delayed recognition; but this, like much else that is not mere surface stuff, Mamet fails to provide.

Seven performances are heartbreaking if they are meant to be funny, riotous if they are meant in earnest. Jay O. Sanders, as Orsino, declaims Shakespeare's poetry as if it were "The Shooting of Dan McGrew," and moves like a trolley conductor. Trish Hawkins, as Olivia, flutters like a dinner-theater Blanche DuBois and delivers blank verse as if it were a tremulous, flower-child dither. As Sebastian, W. H. Macy is an aging Dead End Kid trying to make like Andy Hardy. Marshall W. Mason's Malvolio is a prissy antiques salesman trying to screw his courage to turn a trick on Central Park West; Charles T. Harper's Fabian, far from being his adversary, is his fruitier younger brother. The Antonio of Robert Lupone has a delivery as rich in variety as the knock-knock of a woodpecker. Most offensive of all is Colin Stinton as Feste. Looking like a baby Charles Durning, he rattles off his lines with smart-ass condescension and displays what the French so admirably characterize as a tâte à gifler. As for his songs, they come out as tuneless improvisations by a laughing hyena.

Jake Dengel at least looks right as Aguecheek; Marceli Rosenblatt (Maria) and Michael Lerner (Sir Toby) at least try to act, but turn Illyria into the Bronx. As Viola, Lindsay Crouse is superb. She is both womanly and boyish, separately and together; she is both ingenuous innocent and, when called for, precocious judge of character; she can, even at the breakneck speed at which she is directed to speak, make her verse signify and sing. In any production of Twelfth Night, even the best, she could easily hold her own. If Sara Sugihara, listed as musical director, actually composed what passes for music here, let her music be the food of fish.

Edith Oliver (review date 29 December 1980)

Twelfth Night, which opened last week at the Circle Repertory, under the direction of the dramatist David Mamet, is deliberately informal and moves briskly from beginning to end. Every moment is clear—which takes some doing—and the preposterous story, called by Wolcott Gibbs "as irritating as a raspberry seed in a back tooth," becomes acceptable (or is easily ignored), in spite of the pun-cluttered dialogue, which impressed Mr. G. as "a torment to all but the exceptionally devout." Devout or not, I've always found the play a moonstruck and enchanting blend of friskiness and beauty, with credibility the last thing on its mind. There is no skimping (God knows) on the friskiness in this production, but what remains in the memory is the beauty and gravity and humor and mischief of Lindsay Crouse's Viola, who sets the tone of the best of the evening; without ever declaiming, Miss Crouse speaks her poetry—some of the loveliest of Shakespeare's poetry—as easily as breathing, never slighting its music or emotion or force. Even the most familiar of the set pieces—"Make me a willow cabin at your gate" and "My father had a daughter lov'd a man"—sound freshly minted. Her young, ardent Viola is the best I've ever seen (and I start with Jane Cowl), and so is the funny, lyric Feste of Colin Stinton. Stuck with much of that tormenting dialogue, he somehow makes it sound witty, and his voice and speech are worthy of the haunting songs he sings. His "Hey, ho, the wind and the rain," at the end, after all the shenanigans, with the entire cast behind him, is surprisingly moving.

Miss Crouse and Mr. Stinton are totally at home in Shakespeare. The same cannot be said for that entire cast. Although Marceli Rosenblatt's slyboots Maria is funny and in keeping, the other performances vary from the barely acceptable to the terrible. The Malvolio of Marshall W. Mason, the artistic director of the Circle Rep, is so limp and unsure (or was on the evening I was there) that it is impossible to summon up any pity for the character as the victim of a cruel practical joke—much less any laughter. The shenanigans get damned trying.

The scenery, by Fred Kolouch, is spare and unobtrusive. The costumes, by Clifford Capone, while becoming enough, look like a kind of come-as-you-are masquerade. Miss Crouse, disguised as a boy, wears the customary Shakespearean, doublet and hose (I guess); Mr. Stinton wears slacks and a sweater. The other women are in what is usually called "period" dress, but of what period I cannot tell you; as for the other men, there's a hunting cap here, a riding habit there—that sort of thing. Yet even the clothes are appropriate, in their way, to Mr. Mamet's un-conventional yet never slapdash production, which makes not the slightest attempt to be British.

Michael Bertin (review date Summer 1981)

David Mamet's production of Twelfth Night opened with the sound of a distant flute. Orsino and Curio were leaning against a wall, and were lost in thought. The flute stopped and all was still as we experienced the vacancy of Orsino's expression and the stasis that engulfed him. Life without love, it seemed, was more than sad; it was plainly dull. The mood was right for the opening; both serious and laughable, it pulled us in as it offered a perspective. Mamet was careful not to rush or force his effects. He allowed each scene to search its form. Seeing, for example, that there is much talk in the opening acts, he enabled this talk to occur with an unhurried confidence, establishing character, nuance, and theme as he proceeded. New colors were added to what fast became a crisp, textured, and cumulative stage experience. In the end, Mamet's production offered a fleeting glimpse of the play's metaphysical bounty.

… [The Mamet-Circle Repertory Company staging of Twelfth Night took place in] a theatre that seats 160. The trestle stage cannot measure more than six by twelve yards. Mamet, however, mastered the limitations of his stage, and extended the space through a vision of the play that related festivity to life. Furthermore, he grounded that vision in a close reading of the text.

Fred Kolouch's deceptively simple setting was outlined by a high and decaying stone wall that broke off to blend with distant cuffs. The time seemed Mediterranean winter, and we were either in Olivia's garden or just beyond the garden gate. The gate itself was arched, fixing the scene with the prospect of a far and swelling sea. The green-blue sky and sea made the gray-brown rocks colder still. Though a potentially tragic land, however, the place held fast to hope and life, as did the lone and undulating rose vine that worked along the mountain path straining for the sun. The wall contained a mysterious empty statuary niche which was perhaps a muted echo of the unfulfilled life Viola—as "patience on a monument"—would miraculously evade. This was Illyria: antique yet modern in its ambiguity, beautiful yet potentially harsh, illusory yet real, informed by seriousness but happy in an unblinking way.

Mamet made one choice that could be labeled as gimmickry. But I thought that his adoption of a manifold costume metaphor was a fine intuition into the play's heart. Quite simply, the clothing spanned the range of modern history. There were among others, an Edwardian Malvolio, an eighteenth-century Sir Andrew in three-cornered hat, a buccaneer Antonio in bandanna with sword, a Napoleonic Officer with fixed bayonet, a military-cadet Cesario, and a modern Feste sporting Hush Puppies, chinos, and a blue ski sweater adorned with prancing deer. Some in the New York press attacked the approach as irresponsible eclecticism. But uniformity in costuming is, as we know, a relatively modern innovation, and the thought of consciously returning to the older convention for Twelfth Night was intriguing. Why then did Mamet want his costumes "visible" in so unexpected a way? He answered that since he had no idea how people dressed in Illyria, he had allowed the actors to determine their costuming on the basis of their character's needs. (The play is located sympathetically in Shakespeare's England, of course, but Elizabethan garb is not really the issue here.) Mamet's answer seemed evasive, or at best partial. This may have been the idea but, in Eric Bentley's phrase, what was the idea behind the idea?

I think there were two: the costumes functioned as emblems of consciousness and as masks. As emblems they revealed how different characters saw themselves. Some, like Feste, were free and wore whatever suited them; others, like Sir Andrew, were imprisoned in outdated modes. Malvolio wore his aspirations; Viola/Cesario wore her/his division. Fascinating perspectives in consciousness evolved when, for example, a "modern" character would address one historically older. But what exactly was modern here? What was old? In a play concerned with illusion and reality, the costumes united with the setting to create an aura of controlled ambiguity.

But as the performance progressed and its poetry took hold, the costumes began to function as masks. The differences in styles of dress dissolved in a deepening coherence of mood, implying that sexual differences were dissolving in the fundamental unity of human passions. The interpretation was not oppressively stated; rather, it seemed to breathe with the play. Mamet was not implying that men and women were the same; he was rendering the nature of their differences problematical in order to relate the mask-before-the-face to the denouement's face-before-the-mask. And when, at the end of the performance, the unity of the denouement evolved into the unity of actors donning street clothes, the happy implication of the play's ending spilled into New York's Sheridan Square, with the ultimate irony being the nature of the world they fell into. The production's philosophy could be stated in the phrase: an image of happiness and love created and questioned.

The unforced thoughtfulness of the interpretation was joyously experienced in the immediacy of performance. If Sir Toby and Olivia lacked some definition, and if Orsino had trouble with some of his verse, the other principals were excellent. But of them all, a beautifully balanced quartet stands out: Malvolio, Maria, Feste, and Viola…. Malvolio (played by the company's artistic director, Marshall Mason) was elegantly and reserved. He walked on the balls of his feet as if fearing contact with the common clay. Fastidiously attired in Edwardian style, sporting top hat, tails, and white gloves, he allowed himself the small sartorial excesses of the would-be dandy. He was given to modest coughs, and had a smile that broke just beyond nature into insincerity. There was a serious point to his elegance; he wore his ambitions on a brocaded vest. Here was a steward: efficient, respected, trusted, and true…. reading of the letter was restrained, leisured, and logical. He was a calm man reasoning his way to ridicule, and he held onto dignity a little while longer, which made his eventual fall a little more painful. Our laughter was insured, however, by his insufferable conceit. When he spoke the line "Jove, I thank thee," he thought of himself as addressing an equal.

Marceli Rosenblatt's Maria was more Olivia's gentlewoman than her chambermaid. Diminutive and fiercely loyal, she would interpose herself between her lady and dangers like Malvolio. Gracious, sane, and substantial, with a touch of effervescence, she was the sparkling club soda, if you will, to her lady's darker wine. She was a friend and future wife to Sir Toby and not … his mere brawling mate. Her comic timing was first-rate, heightened by understatement. Instead of yelling in an obvious and guttural way, "He's in yellow stockings," she allowed herself a degree of seriousness that recoiled into extended laughter as she broke into a grin….

On a very different level was Colin Stinton's Feste. He can be best described in a bit of staging. After Malvolio has insulted the revelers in the "kitchen" scene, Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, and Maria plot their revenge. Feste has no lines at this point, for Shakespeare seems to have overlooked the exit. Feste's duration in the scene is thus open to interpretation, and some directors have kept him on the stage asleep. Mamet keeps him there awake with telling results. Feste sits apart listening to the plot, and does not approach the rest until Maria's "and let the fool make a third." His silent presence offers an unobtrusive witness to the festivity, and simultaneously makes a fine character point. Feste can be played as the secret keeper of hard truths, and his silence here contributed to that aura of private knowledge and existence. Since his singing could hold the stage unaccompanied, and his speech had the precision and command of wit, Stinton was also funny and touching. When Sir Toby and Sir Andrew departed to continue their carousing, they left this modern Feste alone working a crossword puzzle.

Finally, Lindsay Crouse. Her Viola was, I think, the spirit of the Circle Repertory's Twelfth Night. When playing Cesario, she did not insist on reminding us that she was a woman, or try to play at being a man before Olivia. She played the passion of the verse instead, and stressed the truth of feeling within the sexual role. Her playing was reinforced by some shrewd staging. For example, as Viola, she responded to the Sea Captain's kindness by placing her hand on his knee in a gesture of reciprocal warmth (I. ii); as Cesario, she echoed the gesture by placing her hand on Orsino's knee (II. iv). In this way the human being shone through the particular instance of disguise, a disguise which, in any event, was rendered less restricting when viewed against the multitude of "disguises" on stage. The approach made Olivia's response to Cesario credible. Olivia was not falling in love with a woman dressed as a man; she was falling in love with another passionate human being. During the "willow cabin" speech, for instance, Olivia approached tears and paused before saying in a hushed whisper, "you might do much." With Orsino, Crouse simply expressed a restrained love which he could take as friendship and which we could see as more. The ease of the performance was a pleasure, and it was sane for today.

The image of Lindsay Crouse that remains is of her gaze. It was unsentimental, clear-eyed, and brave. It was searching…. Mamet and company took us to a new realm of experience: Shakespeare's land of Illyria.

Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 26): Production:

PRODUCTION:

John Caird • RSC • 1983-84

BACKGROUND:

Caird's 1983-84 production with the RSC was viewed by the majority of critics as the summation of the twentieth-century preoccupation with the play's melancholy. As Irving Wardle stated, "quite a deal of poison has been seeping into this play … but John Caird's production is the first I have seen that projects Twelfth Night as an all-out dark comedy." Set in the Jacobean period, the production accentuated a sense of decay and confinement by employing a ruined garden, rusting gates, and a mortuary chapel as components of the set designs. For many commentators, the strengths of this revival were the musical score of liona Sekacz and the performances of the principal actors. Nicholas Shrimpton hailed Gemma Jones's Maria as "the most original piece of characterization in the production … this was a high-spirited, horsey girl from a country background, now living in reduced circumstances as a paid companion." Additionally, Emrys James's Malvolio was praised for its fresh power by several critics. Richard Findlater asserted "this Malvolio is odious, even dangerous, in his moment of naked triumph, taken with splendid comic brio, and nakedly hurt in his hour of humiliation." Mirroring the bittersweet texture of the production, Zoë Wanamaker won favorable reviews for what Shrimpton characterized as her "touching, husky, gamine of a Viola, capable of shrewd comic touches." Despite its sombre tone, the production as a whole was well received by both critics and audiences. Christopher Edwards maintained that it was "a triumph of stagecraft, of acting and direction." The cast additionally included Miles Anderson as Orsino, Daniel Massey as Sir Andrew Aguecheek, Richard O'Callaghan as Feste, Sara Berger as Olivia, and John Thaw as Sir Toby Belch.

COMMENTARY:
Irving Wardle (review date 21 April 1983)

Quite a deal of poison has been seeping into this play over the past few years, but John Caird's production is the first I have seen that projects Twelfth Night as an all-out dark comedy.

This is good news not only for jaded old spectators who have seen the piece too often. There is a limit to the amount of fun that can be extracted from the drinking scene and permutations of Malvolio's letter in a play that was never more than intermittently uproarious. And there is everything to be said for muting the comedy for once and giving full attention to the central matter of the illusions and frenzies of love.

Illyria in this version contracts to a love shrine. Robin Don (making his Stratford debut) offers a gloomy rock-strewn promontory flanked by an overgrown gateway to Olivia's estate and surmounted by the bare ruined boughs of a towering tree. Here the obsessed Orsino is permanently encamped: and the only modification for the other scenes is the withdrawal of the gate. The air is filled with the surge of the sea and melancholy sea music (by Ilona Sekacz), sometimes projecting an atmosphere of heart-break, sometimes swelling into operatic violence as for the first appearance of the shipwrecked Viola.

What emerges in this setting is a tragicomedy of erotic errors. All those involved in it are possessed and hurried on to a fate over which they have no control. Mr Caird's company show most of the character, even the lucky ones, to be mismatched. There could be no more hopeless union than that between John Thaw's swaggering, bullying Toby and Gemma Jones's Maria, not a merry prankster but a prim household official, every bit as status-conscious as Malvolio, who characteristically dusts the tree stump before sitting down.

Sir Andrew is obviously a non-stater, but that news would be wasted on Daniel Massey, his face breaking into pathetically eager smiles at every sight of the icy Olivia. As for Olivia herself she speaks for all the others in her lines on catching the plague.

Sarah Berger plays her as a sharp-featured heiress to whom disdain comes easily, who is then reduced to naked vulnerable desire; and when she intervenes in the duel (Toby just having landed Sebastian a blow in the groin) she falls on the aggressor fists flailing and pummelling him to the ground.

Most pitiful of all is Emry James's Malvolio a strutting velvet uniformed grotesque who sheds all his self-love once his mistress seems to be within reach, and finally appears before her to put simple half-broken questions. When he gets his cruel answer, he bows respectfully to the company and only screams his last line after making a dignified exit. And it is no threat of revenge, simply an explosion of intolerable pain.

As one of the few who benefit from the happy wrack, Zoe Wannamaker's Viola is at a disadvantage in a show that reserves its main sympathy or the losers. Her Viola, blank-faced and inwardly suffering, encompasses lyricism and fun, but never takes over the emotional centre.

Of the non-lovers, the most interesting is Richard O'Callaghan's Feste. We have grown used to seeing Feste as the soul of Twelfth Night, but Mr O'Callaghan presents him as a razor sharp and spiteful observer of the surrounding follies: making a living out of them, and cherishing grievances with a real zest for revenge. The Topaz scene is the ugliest I can remember—even with the comic addition of the real Sir Topaz wandering bewildered over the back on his way to marry Sebastian to Olivia.

The set finally comes into its own at the news of the marriage and Orsino's (Miles Anderson) attempts to sacrifice Cesario. The madness is such that at that moment the shrine almost does become a sacrificial altar. As it happens, there is marriage instead of death, but as the nuptual parties take their leave there is a crash of thunder and Feste begins his song in the pouring rain.

James Fenton (review date 24 April 1983)

So, Twelfth Night (RSC Stratford) is, in fact a revenge play, in which the Clown's resentment of Malvolio provides the pivotal theme. Sir Toby Belch is the kind of bluff fellow whose bluffness is a cover for considerable nastiness. When things get out of hand, lives are not merely threatened—they are in real danger. Both the weather and the time of day are hable to change abruptly, just as love may turn to hate or the dead be restored to life, to the terror of their loved ones.

It is a reading which makes a virtue of what is often taken to be merely a worrying appendix to the piece—the unresolved resentment of Malvolio. When Emrys James delivers his last line, "I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you", from the wings, he rather makes one believe that in any sequel to the piece the revenge would be as out of proportion to the insult as the Clown's retaliation has been.

The Clown (Richard O'Callaghan) is only once given his name, Feste, and it is worth, considering him as a type rather than an individual in order to test the production's hypothesis. Most clowns get insulted pretty liberally in Shakespeare, and most seem to bear their insults pretty well. This one, exceptionally, takes grave exception. Malvolio in the First Act calls him a rascal, and points out to Olivia that unless she encourages him he tends to run out of gags.

Perhaps it is the professional nature of the insult which rankles. At any rate, Mr O'Callaghan conceals his hurt behind a dry manner and a gentle, unforced delivery of his lines. He bides his time, and while he does so his behaviour must be for the audience something of an enigma. The enigma is solved as soon as the Clown has Malvolio at his mercy. Then his behaviour becomes quite vigorously horrible. Playing the exorcist with a hand-bell, he goes to extreme lengths to convince Malvolio that he is possessed of the devil. Mr James has previously held the stage as a man of absurd pretentions. He emerges from the confines of his prison in a state of extreme shock. The society which the play's director, John Caird, has depicted, is one which will not scruple to kick a man when he is down.

The Clown tells Malvolio why he has had his revenge, and in the last song (the music is largely new, set by Ilona Sekacz) tells us why he is vengeful. When he was a child, he was greeted with indulgence. But when he grew up, he found that, being a knave and a thief, he was an outcast. At the time of his marriage, he learnt that he could not make his living as a bully. So he took to drink.

This is, or appears to be, what the song says. The wind and the rain of the refrain are an invitation to the sound effects which Mr Caird so generously employs. The whole tendency of the production is towards a consistent increase in dramatic tension.

Obviously the trick could not be pulled off merely on the basis of a strong reading of Malvolio and the Clown. After all, the centre of the comedy is Viola, and the main matter of the piece is the tale of mistaken sexual identity. The story is a romance in which the sea miraculously yields up its dead alive, and in which love is a magic element. But there is nothing mere about this magic. Viola learns in the course of the play what both sides of unrequited love are like.

The programme, which offers none of the usual critical gobbets, is strewn with Shakespearean sonnets—a gentle way of reminding the audience that the telling of such a romance is a way, for Shakespeare, of talking about love as experienced in his world, and indeed in ours. The richness of Viola's experience, the ambiguity of Orsino's feeling towards her, the pain she must undergo in her dealings with the doting Olivia—everything requires a most truthful kind of acting. The romance is really a mechanism to bring you up against the harsh truth.

For me, the decisive moment in Zoë Wanamaker's performance as Viola came when, reunited with Sebastian, she showed her deep fear that her drowned brother had returned as a ghost to frighten her. She had suffered enough already, and now, on top of everything, the spirit world was playing an unforgivable trick, trifling inexcusably with her deepest feelings of loss and grief.

Miss Wanamaker is a richly gifted comic actress, with a pert and eloquent nose and the ability to raise a laugh through the most modest twitch of her body or inflection of her voice. Secure in this ability, she concentrates upon the sad truth of Viola's experience. She truly makes us feel.

Orsino is played by Miles Anderson, with ease, authority and a beautiful voice. The household of Olivia (Sarah Berger) consists of John Thaw as the strikingly nasty Sir Toby Belch, Daniel Massey, cleverly cast against expectations as the loopy, passive and very funny Aguecheek, and Gemma Jones, who strains perhaps a little to contain her great gifts within the role of Maria.

Robin Don's set, evidence of the way in which Stratford designers are now diverging stylistically, provides a rocky hillside and the largest box tree I have ever seen (an Illyrian species, of course). The fights by Malcolm Ranson look, as usual, very dangerous.

Ann Pasternak Slater (review date 6 May 1983)

John Caird's production of Twelfth Night opens in an atmosphere of brooding impasse. Torpid thunder rumbles intermittently, achieving downpour only at the play's end—cued by Feste's "The rain it raineth every day". A sapless tree of wrinkled polystyrene overhangs the stage. Barren rascals and dry fools roister and languish beneath it, or climb its leafless branches. It dominates both the action and the programme notes. Evidently it symbolizes the fruitless love-quests in the play, where Aguecheek loves Olivia who loves Viola/Cesario who loves Orsino who loves Olivia—a neat little one-way system of Cupid's arrows, designed to keep characters and audience going round in circles. Only time can release us from the irrational directives of the heart: "What else may hap to time I will commit", says Viola towards the end of her first scene, sounding a dominant motif which she echoes later ("O time! Thou most untangle this, not I;/It is too hard a knot for me t'untie").

However, the whirligig of time brings in its revenges most pointedly on Malvolio, and it is Emrys James's Malvolio who is at the centre of this production. With justice, he takes the final solo bow and, indeed, the other players emerge as the merest weak echoes of his misguided, elephantine passion. His transformations are sillier, he suffers greater degradation, and exits (in the Lamb tradition) with the greatest pathos. The folly of love is embodied in him most grotesquely, but all the other lovers are touched with madness too. Olivia, for instance, is quickly proved mad for mourning her brother; later she admits baldly enough that she is as mad as Malvolio. Sebastian, too, constantly mistaken for Cesario, and set upon, comments: "Are all the people mad … ?" Yet, when he is propositioned by Olivia, a perfect stranger, he accepts the offer on hardly firmer grounds than Malvolio, saying, "Or I am mad …. Malvolio's mad pretensions are significantly modified in our minds by this fortuitous match and it is a virtue of John Caird's production that this parallel and others are brought out so dearly.

Failure to engage, embrace, or even understand is underlined in the fatuous non-encounter between Aguecheek and Viola/Cesario. Their fight (brilliantly arranged by Malcolm Ranson) is a hilarious parody—of a fight and of the events of the main plot. The contestants flourish their weapons, discard appropriately limp sheaths, grunt a great deal in Japanese style—yet come to no firm conclusions. Other equally good vignettes underline the burden of the play. liona Secacz's fine setting of "O Mistress mine, where are you roaming?" is at once beautiful and tinged with absurdity, as Aguecheek and Sir Toby add their muted, maudlin chorus. The atmosphere of painfully pointless infatuation recurs when Orsino listens to Feste singing "Come away, come away, death". He lies with his head in the startled Viola's lap—visibly suffering, laughably pathetic.

In this careful production the play's homosexual subtext also emerges unexpectedly poignantly. It is plain enough in Antonio's pursuit of Sebastian, and, mistakenly, of Viola/Cesario. But Caird also contrives to bring out (more clearly than any reading of the text could achieve) the harshness of Viola's assertion to Olivia. As the boy Cesario, she says, "I have one heart, one bosom, and one truth,/ And that no woman has, nor never none shall mistress be of it." For a moment, it sounds like a passionate vow of homosexual celibacy and we are precipitated into a darker, less comically tractable world, in which amorous impasse is finally insoluble. Once again, too, this theme of unrequited barren love is reiterated in the programme's lavish quotations from the Sonnets.

Yet if this makes the production sound over-schematic—a diagram of futility—one should add that the comic business is brilliantly staged in a pleasingly unbusy way. Emrys James's strangled attempts to vocalize the inconveniently arranged initials, MOAI, into something remotely resembling Malvolio is very funny. The cross-garters are excellent, too: not much to look at in the way of sartorial extravagance, but evidently tight as a tourniquet, they cause Malvolio to punctuate his sentences with unpredictable winces, little semicolons of sciatica, in all the wrong places. His final exit is also well-managed: dignified, dirty, discomfited, he bows stiffly and silently to an embarrassed court. Off-stage, we hear his shouted threat of revenge—a sad display of l'esprit de l'escalier he could not otherwise afford to risk.

Daniel Massey's Aguecheek is another excellent performance. Sheepish, pouchy-eyed, his upper lip an unbut-toned flap, doggily ambling, he has a vivid tic of tentatively touching back his dead straw hair. In fact, Malvolio and "the lighter people" dominate the evening, and you leave the theatre wondering, with a mild surmise, why you had ever thought Orsino and Olivia such important characters. Unfortunately this isn't entirely a function of the play's structure. Orsino (Miles Anderson) is best when he speaks little and confines himself to looking ugly and miserable. Olivia (Sarah Berger) looks beautiful, wilful and imperious, but her verse-speaking is nervous and unnatural. Shakespeare is partly to blame, though; he does badly by both of them in the last act. Only a natural could make "A sister! you are she" sound natural, and little can extract the jingle from "I'll sacrifice the lamb that I do love / To spite a raven's heart within a dove". Viola (Zoë Wanamaker) has also caught some of the Stratford vocal mannerisms, but improves as a pert little Cesario with credibly ambivalent attractions. The set is steeped in atmosphere, but there are too many fussy alterations to indicate different locations. The sky, too, is unnecessarily well-endowed with a selection of swirling clouds, sunsets, crescent moon, lightning, and an extraordinarily crowdy Plough. David Hersey's lighting is equally busy—hurrying the audience through a bewildering scurry of nights and days with little evident logic or justification.

But not all the theatrical dressing is over-intrusive. One piece of non-Shakespearian business seems to epitomize Caird's reading of the play. When Olivia sends her ring after Viola, Viola hangs it on the tree that dominates the stage. It hangs there, the only fruit, till the play ends. As thunder breaks and the rain falls. Feste plucks it, singing pointedly. "A foolish thing was but a toy". In this sombre production love is, in Larkin's words, a "wrangle for a ring"—a foolish thing, a toy for a fool to play with.

Richard Findlater (review date July 1983)

After six years with the RSC John Caird, one of its four resident directors has staged his first major production in the main Stratford house; and it is surely a good augury for the future that this is an all-round success in an older Avonside tradition. No gimmicky sound scores, fancy dress or constructivist sets: not a hint of agitprop or alienation; no gabbling or garbling of the text; no patronising of the characters in the play. Here be, in profusion, clear voices, lush feelings, rich sunsets, starry skies, storm light, moonlight, and the light of true Shakespearian romance. Everything happens near the sea where it all started, whose murmur we sometimes hear, and whose imminence we sense. A rocky path winds down from a mid-stage horizon to the shelter of a vast autumnal box-tree whose tangled branches, writhing upwards towards the flies, make convenient hiding places for 'the lighter people'. At its base lolls Orsino, fathoms deep in love with love, in the opening scene; and here, at the end, Feste curls up with his revenge. On the left are wrought iron gates to Olivia's house. A Cupid / Eros may be seen on one of the tall, leaf-wreathed pillars. This looks, from the first, as if it might be Illyria; with premonitory wisps of 'the wind in the rain' in the subtly pervasive music, it sounds like Illyria; and before the cast have been long at work, we know that we are there to stay.

John Caird's production combines reality with romance, visual pleasure with psychological insight, a respect for the text with a flair for theatrical effect which does not disdain the obvious, and it shows a fine company at their level best. It projects the authentic pain behind the games and deceptions of the key characters, but never permits a misplaced loyalty to realism to scrape the bloom from the bitter sweet lyric artifice. It uncovers the play's darkness without stilling its fun. With the help of Robin Don's set, Alix Stone's costumes and David Hersey's lighting it satisfies the eye as well as the mind and the heart. The pleasures of the play's language are not overwhelmed by Ilona Sekacz's music, and the songs—carefully and tunefully sung by Richard O'Callaghan as Feste—are given the right simple settings. There are perceptive reinterpretations of social context (like Maria's determination to soar out of her class by marrying her mistress's uncle) and unfussy inventions of comic business (like Sir Andrew's sudden horrified embroilment in the fight between Sebastian and Sir Toby).

Two prime reasons why Twelfth Night comes alive yet again with such fresh power lie in the performances of Emrys James as Malvolio and Richard O'Callaghan as Feste. This Malvolio is odious, even dangerous, in his moment of imagined triumph, taken with splendid comic brio, and nakedly hurt in his hour of humiliation: I shall long remember that last, lacerating hesitation in venturing a half smile at Olivia before he makes his final exit. A moustached, ear ringed, sardonically assured and almost piratical Richard O'Callaghan achieves his debut in Shakespearian repertory with an unforced mastery of his role: he imbues Feste with that inescapable here-and-now humanity, that existential presence, for which optimists wait patiently in vain from all too many classical productions. In this one, optimists will be exceptionally lucky. High praise to Daniel Massey, for his clumsy (and very funny) Sir Andrew, a smiling, gentle innocent at large: John Thaw, whose strong, callous, and resonant Sir Toby shakes off sentimental stereotypes; and Zoe Wanamaker, a pertly resilient Viola who makes up for her lack of vocal music by her abundance of comic intelligence and emotional truth. Bouquets are also due to Miles Anderson's Orsino; Christopher Neame's Antonio; Gemma Jones's Maria; and to Sarah Berger, an icily beautiful Olivia whose sudden thaw by the unrequiting Cesario is, like her treatment of the deluded Malvolio, surprisingly and winningly plausible.

Robin Don's set creates a few obvious anomalies. The buttery revels seem to happen alfresco like everything else in Illyria which makes nonsense of Maria's threat that she will turn the carousers out of doors; and it is inconceivable that a man like Malvolio would sally out of the Countess's house in his nightgown to venture forth down a rocky path in quest of Sir Toby and his fellow boozers.

I have a few other tentative quarrels with Mr Caird's production. Socially this Feste is, I feel, just a bit too conspicuously his own man even for an all licensed Shakespearean Fool. And my one reservation about Emrys James's Malvolio is that the full impact of that final cry I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you' is lost by being shouted off stage (in a manner somewhat reminiscent of Olivier). Still, if Malvolio had to do it in full view of the audience, they might well have missed that final look at the Countess.
John Caird's reading of Twelfth Night was extremely serious, especially in interpreting the lovers. Instead of quoting the usual tedious contemporary parallels and literary criticism, the program printed fourteen of the Sonnets, including sonnet 20, about the "master-mistress of my passion." Orsino spoke his first scene slowly and weightily; his obsession with Olivia might have seemed an affection to his lethargic courtiers, but was real enough to him. So was Olivia's grief for her brother, although this did not prevent her from accepting with a good grace Feste's proof that she was a fool to mourn for her brother's soul being in heaven, a point neatly underlined when she put on his fool's cap and he her mourning veil.

Viola was distracted with grief for her brother, but a warm light came up on her as she resolved to "serve this duke." She had obviously had an immediate impact on Orsino, for his next entry was not lethargic but vigorous, attended by halberdiers. Strong, clear light, as if to underline a moment of truth and genuine relationship, came up on Orsino and Viola as they listened to "Come away, death": Orsino lay with his head in Viola's lap, nuzzling her thigh; she was agitated, afraid to respond in her page's guise. "A blank my lord" was intense and desperate rather than bittersweet, and she broke down in tears at the thought that she might be "all the brothers" of her father's house; Orsino caught her in his arms to console her, so that she had to use "shall I to this lady?" to break free. He, for his part, spat out "Ay, that's the theme" almost wearily; he was tired of pursuing the countess and frustrated because he couldn't have the page instead.

The seriousness in the first half became violence in the second. Olivia actually struck Malvolio for his presumption in the cross-garters scene, as Maria foretold that she might, something I cannot remember ever seeing before; and as Maria also foretold, Malvolio took it "for a great favor." The duels were very extended and very violent, with vicious blows to the groin: Viola accidentally nicked Sir Andrew, but Sir Toby deliberately and repeatedly kicked Sebastian, thus provoking Olivia to strike him again and again. The atmosphere became so dark, and the rhythms so sluggish, in Feste's interrogation of Malvolio (imprisoned down a well) and at Malvolio's exit, that the production almost broke down altogether: after bowing dutifully to his lady and to his duke, Malvolio left the stage and bawled "I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you" from the wings. The circumstantial detail in Viola's meeting with Sebastian ("My father had a mole upon his brow" and so on) was not a delighted savoring of the joys of reunion, but a genuine wish to establish the truth, arising from a real fear that Sebastian might indeed be a spirit "come to fright us." The pent-up tensions between Viola and Orsino were released in a final impassioned kiss between Orsino and the master-mistress of his passion—at which there was a tremendous clap of thunder and a flash of lighting, heralding the rain which accompanied Feste's final song.

This was not a production for half-tones, for bringing out the mixture of sweetness and sadness, laughter and tears, in the play. Zoë Wanamaker was a grave Viola, with real tears in her eyes at the end, not so much "smiling at grief" as overwhelmed by it. Both she and Miles Anderson as Orsino spoke eloquently of their passions and frustrations, but Sarah Berger's attractive, clearly-spoken Olivia, like several other members of the cast, could make no headway against the cumbersomely Elizabethan costumes and the stifling realism of the set. The resonances established by the Sonnets in the program—"Music to hear, why hear'st thou music sadly?" and "Sin of self-love possesseth all mine eye"—might have echoed on the stage itself in a more airy, spacious setting that allowed the play room to breathe. Gemma Jones's Maria was genteel rather than a "gentlewoman," anxiously trying to please Sir Toby. Emrys James (Malvolio) had been more suitably cast as Feste at Stratford in 1969; here he simply borrowed Donald Sinden's effects from that version (pronouncing "M.O.A.I." as a complete word, showing the audience the letter, and so on) without a hint of the masterly use to which Sinden put them. In the early scenes, this was at odds with the seriousness of the production; in the later ones, his sobbing and shameless playing for sympathy embodied its excesses.

John Caird's production of Twelfth Night is a delight. It is a triumph of stagecraft, of acting and direction; interestingly it is a triumph despite its own melancholy view of Shakespeare's comedy. Gone, probably for good, is the idea that the Comedies can be played as if they were regions of warmth and sunshine. The knowledge of Shakespeare's dramatic career as a whole seems to oblige the director to hold in view the tragedies and 'dark comedies' that lie ahead whose shadows must be seen to fall across the earlier work. In Stratford the harshness of this production seemed almost wilful, as if Caird had taken literally the acerbic view put out by Auden that 'Shakespeare was in no mood for comedy'. On its transfer down to London the bitterness and discomfort are there still, but they have been allowed to mellow. The mood of comedy prevails, albeit in a minor key.

Robin Don's set keeps boldly in step with Caird's interpretation. Orsino's and Olivia's palaces are perched on the rocky edge of a stormy Illyrian sea-board, fringed with ruined columns, and dominated centre-stage by the looming withered tentacles of a huge box tree. Viola enters pursued by storm, as the skies and seas behind her writhe in flashing yellows and greys, and Iona Sekacz's apocalyptic strings and percussions erupt above. This talented composer's incidental music is always arresting, even if you take the view that chamber music ought not to be made to fight intergalactic battles with quite such abandon. Her searing dissonances, laid over pleasing string harmonies, sometimes blot out the mood carefully created by the actors and verse. That said, Feste's melodies are nicely wrought, and the original 'hey-ho the wind and the rain' theme is subtly threaded through much of the evening's music as a running motif.

The cast is strong, and includes a virile Miles Anderson as love-sick Orsino, and Zoe Wanamaker as Viola. Stephen Moore's Sir Toby Belch is a burly bully of a knight, designed to repel sympathy. The scenes with Daniel Massey's wonderfully credulous sot of a Sir Andrew Ague-cheek provide some of the funniest and most humane comedy I've seen from the RSC, in particular the wild midnight abandon as they dance accelerando to the utterly misnamed catch 'Hold Thy Peace'. Gemma Jones too gives a performance of the highest calibre as Maria—genteel, mischievous, an honorary chap and a true sporting beagle. However, Caird never lets high spirits in without a corrective dose of the caustic, and in this respect Richard O'Callaghan's Feste is the prevailing mordant spirit of the evening. O'Callaghan scorns the wistful zany put forward by Bradley; he has no illusions, and no heart either. He provides an excellent study of bitter fastidious poise but, of a sudden, touches a note of sad humanity in his wind and rain song, cowering pathetically into a crevice of the tree like an abandoned waif as the storm blows in again to close the play.

As with Shylock, the treatment of Malvolio is a question of focus rather than interpretation. There is no avoiding the cruelty of his gulling, and I cannot think of a single production which has underplayed the ugliness of the Sir Topas scene where he is treated as a madman. The decision, for modern sensibilities, is whether we should just sympathise with him as a victim, or take a robust view of the whole thing. It is surely important to show that, as a petty-minded bureaucrat, thick with self-love, Malvolio is repellent to himself and opposed to the good things in life, to the jollity and revelry represented by Sir Toby Belch. In other words Malvolio is wrong and deserves to suffer. John Caird doesn't share this view as Sir Toby is never allowed to get away with just being funny; his savagery and self-regard are underlined too and we are invited to side with Sir Andrew when Sir Toby rejects him at the end. The good things in life are not just fugitive, they are tainted as well.

For different reasons this is not the view shared by the actor Emrys James either. James plays Malvolio as an absurd, suffering all the loathsome features to be comically exaggerated until the character becomes almost lovably silly. He runs with a ridiculous springing motion and pompously sniffs the air about him with the cartoon expression of a self-righteous mole. All this is well done, but in the letter scene James suddenly enrols in the Derek Jacobi school of self-indulgent campery and turns this important exposé of his character into a virtuoso turn. It is an appeal to the audience's affections and succeeds in cocooning him from our contempt. Up in the box tree Sir Toby, Sir Andrew and Fabian rattle the branches in indignation at Malvolio's fantasies of preferment, but the result is one-sided and moralistic; Malvolio is not punished by an objective code of values, his incarceration appears vicious tout court. What is more, his departing howl, 'I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you', disturbs the harmonious resolution at the end. This, of course, is the intention; there is no harmony. Orsino finds Viola, and Olivia Sebastian, but they no longer enjoy the sanction of the world of romantic comedy; the knot of marriage guarantees nothing in Shakespeare's bitter Arcadia.

Sheridan Morley (review date October 1984)

Ever since Derek Jacobi's Cyrano spent the last act of that great production trying to keep his head above a sea of fallen leaves, the RSC has been obsessed by autumnal melancholy. Twelfth Night which has now come to the Barbican from last year at Stratford (with a couple of major casting changes) does admittedly begin to approach winter, but not the winter of indoor and jovial court charades generally suggested by the title. Instead the lights go up on Robin Don's wonderful set to reveal a bleak and wind-swept cliff-top with, at left, a huge wrought-iron gate from behind which you half-expect to see emerge not the gently mournful Olivia but instead the Baron Frankenstein or at the very least Mrs Danvers with news that Manderley is on fire at last.

The director John Caird has found here one of the late and barren travelogues rather than one of the early comedies: a Tempest or a Cymbeline rather than a mistaken-twin farce like Comedy of Errors, and in this the text very often bears him out. Moreover the casting of Miles Anderson as Orsino gives us from the very beginning of the play an indication of the way things are going: not the usual lovelorn prince but a grown-up Peter Pan, a character of strange obsessional love for men and women camped permanently outside the gate of a sinister never-never land. A melancholy God does indeed watch over this production, suggesting that Illyria is a lost kingdom to which have been sent the world's misfits, people nice enough in themselves but totally unable to relate coherently to anyone or anything around them.

Thus Daniel Massey's Aguecheek is not the usual wittering fool but a failed song-and-dance man forever trying to get his act together in front of an audience unable to work out what he really wants to achieve: Stephen Moore's Toby Belch has yet to settle in (Moore is replacing John Thaw in the Stratford original) but also suggests something altogether rare—a thin, intelligent fellow hoping that maybe there will be a party after all. Zoe Wanamaker is a marvellously touching and convincing urchin-Viola, Joanne Pearce (also new casting) a blandly imperious Olivia and Richard O'Callaghan an intriguingly ambivalent Feste, gentle enough until he gets the chance to turn the screws on Emrys James's manic Malvolio.

But the true star of this production, apart from Don's ruined-temple setting, is Liona Sekacz whose score soars through the Barbican underlining the play's themes of shipwreck and imprisonment. It is brave to have Malvolio's final cry for revenge played offstage, braver still to have Viola and Sebastian (Nigel Cooke) make not the faintest attempt to look like identical twins: those, you feel, are not in Mr Caird's view the issues at the heart of a play which emerges here as a matching set of personal tragedies. Only at the last, and largely by accident, do people start to get what they really want and even then it looks to me as though they may soon be going to discover that they don't want it after all. Is Olivia really going to be happy with a monosyllabic refugee like Sebastian? Is Orsino really going to settle down with a wife who was infinitely sexier when disguised as a man? Already we are starting to drift back to Peter Pan and not, I suspect, entirely by accident: this may not always have been a play about the impossibility of sex, but Mr Caird has successfully turned it into one about a group of exiles who can support anything except reality.

The set [of Twelfth Night] was part ruined garden, part graveyard. A vast autumnal tree overshadowed (for Orsino's court) a pair of rusting gates and (for Olivia's house) a mortuary chapel. Sarah Berger's black-gowned Olivia was ostentatiously in mourning for her dead brother, while Miles Anderson gave us an appropriately violent, sombre, and austere Orsino. Fabian was an old man, Feste a pensive intellectual.

Malvolio apart, the other clowns were correspondingly subdued. Daniel Massey played a gawky but soft-hearted Aguecheek, afflicted by fits of depression and easily moved to tears. John Thaw, as Toby Belch, was an upper-class thug, hearty rather than jovial, more cruel than comic. The drunk scenes were very drunk indeed and the uproar so uproarious that it could only be curtailed by blasts on Maria's pocket whistle.

As that detail suggests, Gemma Jones's Maria was the most original piece of characterization in the production. She was as tall as her mistress and substantially taller than Viola, so the references to her as a 'wren' and a 'giant' went for nothing. But her lanky elegance gave the clue to her social role. This was a high-spirited, horsey girl from a county background, now living in reduced circumstances as a paid companion. Part games-mistress, part romp, her worship for this Flashman of a Sir Toby was pure reversion to type.

Zoë Wanamaker was a touching, husky, gamine of a Viola, capable of shrewd comic touches (a wild shriek of panic on 'She loves me', for example) but very much in tune with the pervasive melancholy of the production. 'I am all the daughters of my father's house' reduced her to tears and prompted a disturbing cuddle from her handsome master. Unfortunately her Olivia was not up to her weight. Rushed and sometimes squeaky, Sarah Berger's lack of subtlety significantly reduced the erotic tension of their interviews.

Malvolio's extravagance of manner had a similar effect on his exchanges with Sir Toby. 'Dost thou think, because thou art virtuous, there shall be no more cakes and ale?' was delivered with great weight and force, but to such a fool of a steward that the clash between profligacy and puritanism remained elusive. Emrys James's interpretation of Malvolio involved a great deal of comic biz ('If this fall into thy hand, revolve'—spins round on the spot). The audience clearly adored it. But he and Olivia between them gave an oddly coarse-grained effect to what was otherwise a memorably picturesque, sensitive and sad production.

Zoë Wanamaker (essay date 1988)

In the following essay, Wanamaker discusses her performance as Viola in John Caird's Production of Twelfth Night.

I had played Viola some ten years before John Caird's Stratford production of Twelfth Night, in a version directed by Richard Cotterill for the Cambridge Theatre Company. The sense (the constant sense in doing Shakespeare) that that version had not come up to expectations left me, however, quite ready to accept a second invitation to attempt the part. I had been in the Stratford company only once before, in 1978, mainly to play in new work at The Other Place (Piaf and Captain Swing) though I had been on the main stage as Bianca in Michael Bogdanov's production of The Taming of the Shrew. Now I was back, dauntingly, for two major Shakespearean roles, Adriana in The Comedy of Errors, and Viola.
To undertake a major role at Stratford is to be haunted by the past. As you go into the Royal Shakespeare Theatre you are faced with twelve-foot high pictures of other actors who have done other performances of your part, and their history and their triumphs loom over you: 'Follow that!' It's like coming to Mecca; the ghosts are all around and the fear of failure is very great. Having been brought up through the sixties when new work by new writers was the prime objective in my kind of theatre, the thought of speaking Shakespeare's verse on the Stratford stage was inevitably frightening.

This sense of insecurity remained when the production opened. Was I speaking the text as it should be spoken, was I being true to it, to the production, to the character? After a year in Stratford, a year of struggle to be relaxed in the role and yet to keep it fresh, we moved to London, to the Barbican, where, with some modifications to the set and alterations to Viola's costume (and some cast changes too, including a new Olivia and a new Sir Toby), and some new ideas that I had been mulling over during the break, I found myself much more confident in the words and began to enjoy myself in the part. Confidence in the text as a springboard, an innate sense of not having to think about the words or about saying them right, these things allowed the play to become a conversation in which I was at home, to become organic. But a year to find that sense is a long time.

The basic aim of John Caird's production was to focus on the pain of love. Twelfth Night deals with many kinds of love: Viola's, the most pure, constant as the sea is constant, the sea that gives her her life, and her brother his, and her brother back to her; Malvolio's love, self-deluding, ultimately self-centred; Olivia's love of mourning, for her father and, reflecting Viola, for her brother; Orsino's adoring love, which puts woman on a pedestal; Antonio's faithful, painful love of Sebastian; Maria's dogged love of Sir Toby; Sir Toby's love of wasting time; each character disguising the truth about himself and from himself. The play is a fairly simple one, really, a story about time, about growing up and growing old. It has the concentrated quality of a chamber piece, and its form is a complete circle, a point we tried to mark in our production, which began with the sounds of storm and rain and ended with Feste singing of them as these sounds returned. Illyria seems to be a place that is frozen in time, where the social order is locked, where self-delusion, disguise, and hierarchy create an impasse for the people who live with them. And then Viola arrives and her presence disturbs everyone and moves the play through chaos and at last into seeming harmony but with that last strange coda of Feste's song, and Malvolio still locked in self-delusion, disguised even to himself. The catalyst, the driving force of the play is Viola; and the responsibility of that was on me.

To have played the part before was not helpful, not relevant. I wanted to come to it as a blank sheet of paper, to let it sit in my head while I was reading it, reading it once and just trying to find where my instincts were on that first reading, what my first impressions of the play were, trying to wipe out the old tunes of the way I had done it before. Much of that early reading, too, was for the sounds, the rhythms, the movement of the iambic line, which to me is not instinctive but something I have to work at, a secret code to be penetrated, like music; but for this text, certainly, a wonderful route to the deeper flow of the play—and, indeed, to the simple process of learning the words, which for me (touched with dyslexia) is not an easy process at all. In these early stages I was looking for all the clues I could find about what kind of person Viola is, what other characters say about her, what would happen to the story of the play if she were taken away, but always concentrating on the actual structure of her text, the precise choice of words. I also did a Utile research into the twin syndrome, though time, and the sense that Shakespeare's insistence on brother and sister twins being indistinguishable means that he is not thinking very realistically, left this avenue only partially explored. Rehearsals were, as ever, a tough and arduous search, a fumbling with the labyrinthine twists and turns of the script, a slow process of getting to know the other actors and their ideas, their interpretations of their roles; of argument and discussion and trying to fit it all in and to make the story of these people understandable and the play's ideas, wonderful and extraordinary, clear to an audience.

Eventually we got onto the set, designed by Robin Don and lit by David Hersey, a rocky landscape next to the sea, dominated by a tree, an autumnal-looking tree, its branches fanning out like a sea coral, above and beyond the proscenium arch. Costumes too were autumnal, in rusts and browns and olives, and traditionally Elizabethan. From the auditorium it was, I'm told, a very beautiful set, but for us, as we discovered at the technical rehearsals, there were huge problems, particularly with the terrain. The tree, and the rocky inclines, left an acting area only a few feet across, and though there was some levelling following the technical rehearsals, difficulties remained throughout the Stratford season. The set was partly supposed to represent a sort of nightmare, and the lighting was subdued to give an atmosphere of emotional turmoil, discovery of self, growing up, but the translation of these concepts into practical stage terms was not without difficulties for us.
It was hard to find your light, and the unevenness of the floor was exacerbated by the eight-inch wide trough for the safety iron, in which many an ankle was in peril of being turned during the season; getting down from the top of the rocks at the back was hazardous; and the tree, which had looked so delicate on the model, the Utile veins of the coral like a lovely leaf-skeleton, had to be made much more substantial because of the need to dismantle it so often during the season for changes of play in the Stratford repertoire system. All these things were part of the disappointment (not unusual) of turning initial concepts and ideas into concrete, and sometimes cumbersome, reality. At the Barbican I think the set worked better, partly, no doubt, because we were more used to it, but also because the wider stage allowed more room on either side of it, and there was some more levelling out, and altered lighting. In London I was much happier, too, with my costume, which had been such a disappointment when I first wore it at the Stratford technical rehearsal. The thick corduroy trousers and waistcoat, which to me had always seemed lumpy, were changed to a light suede and I found myself much more relaxed and easy, able to use the pockets. I felt much more like a boy in it, and the sense of greater ease was increased by cutting my own hair very short and so discarding the wig which had always bothered me. Audiences, I think, enjoyed the literal quality of the set, the tree, the rocks, and the thunderstorm, and the music by Ilona Sekacz, beautiful and magical, and the sound of the sea which was ever present, the giver and taker of life, dark and threatening yet at the same time mysterious and romantic.

The young woman who enters this Illyrian world from the shipwreck I took to be about seventeen or eighteen years old, brought up with her twin brother Sebastian by their father (their mother is never mentioned in the play), a man, I felt, of great intelligence and warmth, since her relationship with her brother is so close and trusting. She has already learned (or inherited) that straightforward common sense, that unclouded attitude to life, that sense of being a person without prejudice—the qualities that are so wonderful about her. I suspect that the death of her father has been a great blow to her and that her relationship with her brother is all the stronger because of it. With him she is taking a summer cruise, we imagined, a tour in the royal yacht, and then the storm, and separation, and the rocky shore of Illyria, and the memory of her father's talk of Orsino and the decision to serve him as the sole link with the lost past.

Viola's disguise allows her to know Orsino in a way that would never have been possible otherwise. In three days he confides everything to this boy, this stranger, something he would never have done to a woman. The intimacy of confidence disturbs him—and this was something we tried hard to bring out in the production—the strange love for this boy is something that he cannot understand or explain. Viola is let into his mind, his confidence, his imagination, in such a way that inevitably she falls in love with him, with this extraordinary, erudite human being. The strange inevitability of Orsino's love for her was something we constantly tried to explore. Viola's greatest quality, her directness, is in one sense liberated, in another trapped, by her disguise, through which Viola not only reveals Orsino to himself, but also discovers herself. In three days she has 'unclasped the book' of his 'secret soul', has herself fallen desperately in love with him, and now allows the audience to follow her secret, and to be led through the play observing her journey and the increasing burden of her hidden love: 'Yet a barful strife! / Whoe'er I woo, myself would be his wife'[I. iv.
41-42]. This sense of Viola entrapped by her disguise intensifies as the play goes forward, increasing the audience's eagerness for the resolution and Viola's own sense of helplessness. The character who has released others from self-obsession finds herself imprisoned. But it has been that ability to awaken others that has created the play. Without her nothing would go forward. Through her clarity, her simplicity, she releases from self-absorption, from death-obsession, Olivia and Orsino—by confronting them with themselves and what they are. Into the locked-up stillness of Illyria she brings life, and chaos, and hope; she is the catalyst of the play, stirring up the place, forcing them all up into a spiral, to wake up, to discuss, to learn about themselves, turning their world upside down. She arrives in Illyria like a life-force: 'What country, friends, is this?'

The moment of Viola's entry changed significantly for me between Stratford and London. I tried to make the audience witness, as it were, to that terrible moment of loss, of parting from someone so close to her as her brother, by introducing a hopeless, helpless scream, almost of an animal, to bring focus immediately onto the pain of this person. In this short scene we see not only the initial pain, but also the positive qualities, her hope, her perception of others, her belief in the power of Time. In listening to the captain's story of Olivia, shutting the door, shunning life, I used to think that this could never happen to Viola, she would never do that, she does not think of men as a threat, emotionally or physically. Life for her is not to be lived behind locked doors. So from the idea of serving Olivia she turns to Orsino, to her memories of her father's talk of him, and then, instinctively, to the idea of disguise. She does not really know who she is—having lost her past she is in search of herself—she does not want to leave the place that provides the only hope of further news of her brother, and there in front of her is (or was in our production) Sebastian's trunk, which has been washed up with her. She opens it and finds his jacket, his doublet, and puts it on. And the smell of it, and the memory of him, means that in some way she keeps alive something of her brother, not just a piece of clothing but part of his soul, and by having that, through some sort of osmosis, the hope that he really is still alive is carried with her, always. 'Conceal me what I am', and her hope begins to flow back and she decides to wait, to trust to Time, to use the confidence and hope that is in her to change the situation. And so from the despair of its opening this little scene moves to its wonderfully optimistic conclusion: 'What else may hap, to time I will commit … Lead me on'[I. ii. 60,64].

The meeting with Olivia, and the 'willow cabin' speech, were always difficult for me, rather like a horse going up to a jump, I used to feel. The scene is a conversation between two women, very different women, though similar in age, Olivia perhaps a little younger than Viola. It is just two women talking and you see the different perceptions of both of them, especially of Viola, who associates very strongly with Olivia's emotions (she too has lost a father and, she fears, a brother) and understands them. The apparent finality of Olivia's 'I cannot love him. / He might have took his answer long ago'[I. v. 262-3] forces Viola into her big wooing speech; she has to make it, she has to do her appointed job, and she just happens to get carried away with it and so applies it to herself. And thus she admits to herself her love for Orsino by saying it out loud to another woman. The springboard for the willow cabin speech is her want, her need, to talk about her own love; it comes from the depth of her own imagination and she gets so carried away with it that she surprises herself. She has reached a new stage of self-awareness by the end of it.

On her way back from Olivia's house she is overtaken by Malvolio with the ring. She recognizes Olivia's motive, her self-delusion, immediately: 'She loves me sure'[II. ii. 22]. What to do with this ring was the source of some discussion during our rehearsals, for it is never given back or referred to again. Eventually it was decided that I should hang it on a twig of the stage tree where it was found again by Feste at the end of the play. (Some members of the audience saw this as further evidence of Feste's secret love for Olivia, which they also thought they discerned at other points in the production.) As far as Viola is concerned, the significance of hanging the ring on the tree was primarily to be rid of something which she cannot accept without compromising herself. She cannot accept the responsibility of that ring, for the love which it implies is not truly given to her, should not be to her, and she does not want it to be to her. So she leaves it there for Time (or whoever) to discover, and with its rediscovery at the end we have the sense of the play coming full circle again. 'Time, thou must untangle this, not I'[II. ii. 40], she says as she takes stock of her situation, not a reckless surrender, but a declaration of trust and faith that Time, or something, is going to make things change. When we reach her next scene, however, her longest conversation with Orsino, she is losing that faith and touching her lowest point in the play.

The conversation between Orsino and Viola after the singing of 'Come away, death' I always felt a wonderfully close scene and an absolutely heartbreaking one. For here are two people in love who should love each other but cannot do so because one is incapable of seeing through disguises, not just hers but his own. Orsino deludes himself; he is blind about women and how they should be treated; supposes that they cannot be spoken to honestly or share the thoughts and feelings of men. Viola in this scene is, I think, in despair about her situation. All that Orsino says about women is so terrible for her to hear, so mistaken:

\text{no woman's sides}
\]
\[
\text{Can bide the beating of so strong a passion}
\]
\[
\text{As love doth give my heart; no woman's heart}
\[
\text{So big, to hold so much; they lack retention.}

[II. iv. 93-96]

Her reply, I felt, was defensive, and angry—'In faith, they are as true of heart as we'[II. iv. 106]—and the argument that follows catches her almost unawares. 'Ay, but I know’… 'What dost thou know?', and there she is nearly found out; through her unhappiness and frustration she has started into something and she has to explain: 'My father had a daughter lov'd a man’… to explain in the best way that she can … 'as it might be' … she's so close … 'as it might be, perhaps, were I a woman’ … she is so close, so close to saying 'I am a woman, and I love you', but she has to disguise it, to disguise it in a way that tries to say to him that love is not about dying and despair, as he seems to perceive it. 'And what's her history?', he then asks, and that's when she realizes her situation: 'A blank, my lord; she never told her love.' That's something important, the difference between him and her; this is what might happen to her—never to speak, to remain silent and patient, for ever. 'But died thy sister of her love, my boy?' (line 119). He wants only to know about the misery of it all and she is trying to educate him, to take him in another direction that he has never perceived. But he cannot see, and she has to go around: 'I am all the daughters of my father's house, / And all the brothers too.' She is here, I think, near to despair. 'And yet I know not': the glimmer of hope is still there, but this always seemed to me her darkest moment. For Orsino, too, it is a strange moment, when he cannot decide, when he's nearly turned, and then habit, and confusion, and obsession take over again and he returns to his self-delusion: 'To her in haste … my love can give no place'(lines 123-4). At the end of the scene we see Viola, for almost the only time in the play, really depressed.

On the way to fulfil this gloomy mission, however, she meets Feste. The scene came after the interval in our production, at the top of the second act. Her relationship with Feste is another of the small joys of the play. He too is one of the play's outsiders: Malvolio, Feste, Antonio, Ague-cheek, the Sea Captain, Viola—the play is full of loners. Feste, like all of Shakespeare's fools perhaps (but surely more so), has an extraordinary perception of life, an aptness of observation especially apparent in his scene with Orsino: 'changeable taffeta … thy mind is a very opal'[II. iv. 74-75]—he is exactly right about Orsino. And here, interrupted on her way to Olivia's, Viola contemplates the skill of the man who is 'wise enough to play the fool'[III. i. 60], and finds the diversionary pleasure of playing with words. She is always discovering things about life, and taking time off during the play to talk to the audience about them (now look at this person, isn't that interesting, isn't that wonderful, or odd), to share her sense of humour with them. Her relationship with Feste is an enjoyment of the mind—like her relationship with Orsino, if only they could break through to full understanding.

The chance of that comes by way of the recognition scene with Sebastian after her disguise has taken her through the comic absurdities of the mock duel with Aguecheek—comic and absurd for the audience, at least, though increasingly embarrassing and dangerous for Viola. The wonder of the recognition comes at an awful moment for her, as she is accused of having married Olivia, of beating Sir Andrew, wounding Sir Toby, denying the open-heartedness of Antonio's love, a crescendo of everything piling on top of her. And then, there is her brother like something out of a fairy story—just like a fairy story, indeed, that is what is so wonderful about it, the sudden appearance of Sebastian, the apple cleft in twain, the mirror of herself. It is a magical moment, the resolution of confusion, the meeting of self, of each other; the whirlpool and the tempest that brought them to Illyria die down and suddenly there is wholeness again, the magical moment of seeing someone you thought was dead, the other half of yourself. 'Do not embrace me', she says [V. i. 251], unable quite to make that contact whole until she knows again who she is by putting on her 'maiden's weeds', rediscovering that other half of herself through the ritual of dressing again as a woman.

After that comes Orsino's strangely hearty, and rather awkward, declaration:

Boy, thou hast said to me a thousand times
Thou never shouldst love woman like to me.

[V. i. 267-8]

Viola's reply is open and direct, honest and truthful as she has been throughout the play. In front of all those people she says:

And all those sayings will I over swear,
And all those swearings keep as true in soul
As doth that orbed continent the fire
That severs day from night.

[V. i. 269-72]

They are almost her last words in the play. I always thought it difficult for Orsino to make this sudden change from his obsession with Olivia, however carefully we had tried to prepare for it in the 'patience on a monument' dialogue. Viola (unlike Rosalind in As You Like It) is denied her 'woman's weeds'; there is no marriage ceremony, not even a formal offer from Orsino. 'Let me see thee in thy woman's weeds' he simply says, and a little later the bald statement that 'a solemn combination shall be made / Of our dear souls'(lines 383-4). The scene is a difficult one to make work, a director's nightmare (like the last scene of Measure for Measure, perhaps), and I do not think that our production ever really found it, though we worked hard at it and discussed and argued about it for two years! Perhaps the problem was just being a woman in 1983:
putting out a hand to say I am going to marry you seemed an anti-climax. Whatever it was, our final scene never seemed to me thorough enough; it was never fully clear to the actors so could not be to the audience. It is a very public scene, everyone gathered together, a royal event with high and low characters all present and all their stories coming together, and I don't think we ever resolved its complexity or found the play's real ending. But then came the clap of thunder that marked the end of our production, and the returning darkness, and Feste finding the ring on the tree and singing of the wind and the rain. Things have come round full circle; they have reached a point of happiness—for some of the characters at least—but will they be happy ever after? It is the last verse of Feste's song that is so extraordinary.

I do not know how successful our production was; to be so involved in a play means that you can never fully know its effect on those watching. Like my first attempt at Twelfth Night, this one did not quite come up to hopes and expectations. Trying to write about it now I feel inadequate, and a little pompous. I am no authority; I can only try to do my best given the materials I have, the director, the set, the costume. Twelfth Night is a story about Time, and growing up, and growing old, beautiful, and elusive; and whichever way people try to direct it or to focus it so that it becomes a '1983 production', or so that you do it standing on your head, or hanging from the rafters, whatever you do as you dig and dig, and get deeper and deeper, the text remains for another attempt. I shall always be wanting to try it again.

PRODUCTION:

Wilford Leach New York Shakespeare Festival 1986

BACKGROUND:
Leach's New York Shakespeare Festival production in 1986 generated hostile responses from reviewers. Mel Gussow explained that it was not "a question of liberties taken but of abandonment of the play's essential nature as one of the most irresistible of Shakespeare's comedies." This production advocated an approach to the play that stressed elements of low comedy and farce. Actors were clothed in Renaissance dress, and the set featured a revolving platform with a central stage tower that flashed "Welcome to Illyria." The butt of critical disapproval, however, was directed towards the central performances. Tony Azito's clownish rendering of Feste failed to tap into any of the role's deeper significance. Gussow described him as a "body in motion but out of sync with his character." Kim Greist's rendering of Viola fared slightly better. John Simon asserted "Miss Greist cannot act very much … but she has a tolerable voice, is not deliberately offensive, and tries hard." The sole performance to receive a modicum of praise was F. Murray Abraham's Malvolio. John Beaufort mirrored the opinions of most commentators in writing that Abraham projected "the fussy aplomb and self-infatuation that make the censorious steward all too susceptible to the cruel trick played on him."

COMMENTARY:

Diane Solway (essay date 29 June 1986)

Despite the sultry midday heat, all was astir in Central Park. At the Delacorte Theater, seemingly a world away, the actor F. Murray Abraham strode about the stage in straw hat, T-shirt and shorts reciting Shakespeare.

The actor—best known for his Academy Award-winning portrayal of Salieri in Amadeus—was rehearsing a scene from Twelfth Night in which his character, the vainglorious steward Malvolio, gets his comeuppance.

Behind him, stage hands were quietly transforming the Delacorte stage into the mythical dukedom of Illyria, set in 16th-century Yugoslavia. A figurehead was being affixed to the frame of a ship, a sign was being painted, and tiles were being secured to the roof of a yellow and lavender housefront, whose Slavic design was inspired by a book on Bulgarian monasteries. Undaunted by the activity, the actor gamely read the forged love letter that Malvolio assumes his mistress Olivia has penned to him, a letter that leads to his ludicrous appearance before her in cross-gartered yellow stockings.

"Don't forget your chicken walk," counseled the director, Wilford Leach, trailing behind the actor.

"Oh, yes, that's lost, isn't it?" replied Mr. Abraham. "It makes him seem grand," he added, as he stuck out his chest and broke into an exaggerated strut, much to his own amusement.

This Wednesday, the latest interpretation of Twelfth Night, directed by Mr. Leach and produced by Joseph Papp's New York Shakespeare Festival, officially opens the 31st season of free theater in the park.

As Malvolio in this knotty comedy of love, shipwreck and multiple mistaken identity, Mr. Abraham, 46, makes his debut in a leading Shakespearean role. It is his first major stage appearance since winning the best-actor Academy Award in 1985 and playing a rabbi in The Golem at the Delacorte two seasons ago. The Twelfth Night cast also includes Peter MacNicol—last seen in Rum and Coke at the Public Theater—as Sir Toby Belch, Kim Greist as Viola. Tony Azito as Feste and Kathleen Layman as Olivia. The production reunites Mr. Leach and the composer Rupert Holmes, both of whom recently won Tony awards for their collaboration on The Mystery of Edwin Drood, a Public Theater production that moved from Central Park to Broadway.
Mr. Abraham wound up in this production of Twelfth Night partially through a chance meeting about a year ago with Mr. Leach, to whom he expressed his longing to do comedy. Though Mr. Leach had never seen the actor in a comic role, months later, when casting the play, he easily imagined him as the farcical, yet sympathetic Malvolio.

"When Wilford suggested Murray, I thought 'Perfect!'" recalls Mr. Papp. "Murray has an air of comedy about him. There's always something slightly comedic about his manner and demeanor even if he's doing something quite serious."

Mr. Abraham, in turn, describes the experience of playing in Central Park "Camp Delacorte" and says he savors the opportunity to perform before a live audience. "On stage, I must rely on myself and that's why I love the theater, and comedy in particular. No one has to tell me if I was good or not. Either they laugh or they don't."

"'Present mirth hath present laughter,'" he says, quoting a song in Twelfth Night. "It's only funny if the laugh comes. Shakespeare would not be pleased if his lines didn't get any laughs. That's why updating Shakespeare's comedy is legitimate."

To make Malvolio ridiculous to a contemporary audience, the actor decided to play him with a stiff upper-crust British accent. He considers Malvolio "a pompous right-wing politician" whose puritanism, lust for power and lack of humor he sees reflected in modern-day religious extremists. "We may laugh at them, but they are really quite dangerous."

Mr. Leach also sees a value in approaching a classic with fresh eyes. Ignoring prevailing theories about Twelfth Night, he decided to examine it anew.

"The play is usually seen as a melancholy comedy," he says, "but I don't think it's in the material, and I don't think the Elizabethan audience experienced it that way. The play is much closer to the raw virile tradition of early street pageants than is generally thought."

In an effort to highlight the play's vibrancy, Mr. Leach opted for lavish color in the costumes, rather than the muted tones predominant in the contemporary theater. "Lindsay Davis told me he hadn't used colors like that since grade school," says Mr. Leach of the costume designer. The director likens the probable effect of his interpretation to the cleaning of the Sistine Chapel. "Now that they've removed the dirt from the ceiling," he says, "it's completely different, and many people find it too bright. I think that's what happens when you do a classic this way. To many people, it won't seem properly golden, it won't have that patina they associate with Shakespeare."

He credits Mr. Holmes's original music with capturing the mirth he feels is often missing from performances of the play.

"Comedy can be serious without being solemn," says Mr. Leach. "To me, the clown's final song says, 'Yes, death is a reality, so life should be lived with gusto,'" adds the director, who eschewed traditional approaches by choosing young actors for most of the roles. "One of the play's major themes is the madness of love. When your hormones are acting up, of course you're crazy. That's the way I understand the play—as mad kids going through all the torments and hell over love and then being able to flip right over to someone else."

In working with the actors Mr. Leach tries to remain as unobtrusive as possible. Says Mr. Abraham: "Simple directions take me very far, such as 'faster,' 'funnier.' That's why I love working with Wilfred. I trust my instincts and if a suggestion is made, I just go with it, I don't analyze it and discuss it. He let me pull out all the stops."
Mel Gussow (review date 3 July 1986)

Given Wilford Leach's record for brightening so many al fresco evenings with Shakespeare, as well as The Pirates of Penseance and The Mystery of Edwin Drood, anticipation about Twelfth Night was as high as the Belvedere Castle that shadows the hospitable Delacorte Theater. In addition, the show was headlined by that Oscar-winning actor, F. Murray Abraham, turning to Shakespeare and returning to comedy in the choice role of Malvolio.

Sad to say, almost everything is awry in this Illyria. It is not a question of liberties taken but of abandonment of the play's essential nature as one of the most irresistible of Shakespeare's comedies. Productions have, of course, artfully departed from, or reinterpreted the original text. Last season, for example, Twelfth Night was pleasurably transformed into a Cole Porter party by Mark Lamos at the Hartford Stage Company. However, Mr. Leach, principal director of the New York Shakespeare Festival, has simply unmoored the play in the interest of unmannerly broadness.

The director has chosen to set Twelfth Night in 16th-century Yugoslavia, a fact that would have remained the deepest secret had it not been so reported in an article in last Sunday's edition of this newspaper. The atmosphere is, instead, hugger-mugger, or Tatar-Cossack. Some of the actors look as if they are outfitted for a bus and truck tour of Kismet. Flouncing stands in for stage movement and mugging might be seen by a hovering helicopter.

As the evening begins, there is a hint that the performance is intended to be artificial, a play within a play, as in Edwin Drood. Actors roam through the audience and those on stage declaim their lines as if they are amateurs auditioning for a provincial company. Any minute one expects—and hopes for—a character such as that played by George Rose in Edwin Drood to step out and stop the performance. This does not occur; the imitation of bad acting is an end in itself, and, in some instances, it is totally successful.

One could perhaps chalk up the ineptitude of the actors in the romantic roles to inexperience. This is not possible with the character roles, for these are filled with actors of proven merit. First of all there is Tony Azito playing Feste as a kind of carnival roustabout. As this rubber-limbed clown has demonstrated on countless occasions (most notably as a policeman in The Pirates of Penseance), he can be a droll vaudevillian.

Here he is overcome by his own hand wiggles. He is a body in motion but out of sync with his character and when faced with the challenge of pretending to be two people (taunting Malvolio in captivity) he hopelessly blurs the voices while affecting an accent of unknown derivation. His singing—words by Shakespeare, music by Rupert Holmes—is closer to the mark. Together with William Duff-Griffin's Sir Toby Belch and Peter MacNicol's Sir Andrew Aguecheek, Mr. Azito is the hypotenuse of an effete triangle, each missing the ineffable shenanigans of these allied troublemakers.

Mr. MacNicol has chosen—or been encouraged—to play the persistent suitor, Sir Andrew, with a falsetto and a foolish grin. Though as misguided as his colleagues, the actor does earn a few smiles and in a less cavalier production his concept might be defensible. But, surrounded by fellow campers, he loses individuality.

Before the play begins, Mr. Abraham makes a brief appearance. Patiently we wait for his reentry, for him, in effect, to save the sinking show. In goatee and pantaloons, he looks something like a fakir. He is, however, merely a mildly aggrieved misanthrope. Except for some eccentric affectations—an unfunny chicken walk and a habit of prissily lifting the tails of his costume whenever he exits—his performance seems oddly uncommitted. It is as if the actor had been cross-gartered by his character.
In his principal set piece, when he spies the bogus love letter from his mistress, Mr. Abraham's Malvolio is passingly amusing, which is insufficient for a scene that, even in the hands of lesser actors, often rises to hilarity.

The production's variations offer no comic solace: Olivia holding up a cross to ward off Malvolio; the italicizing of innuendo; the sound effects that accompany the reaction of the actors. At the critics' performance on Tuesday, at times I felt as if I were at Wimbledon watching seeded players on an off day; every volley struck the net. The only relief could come, perhaps, from rain, which would curtail the match and allow for a revamping of one's resources.

About 40 minutes into the evening, rain briefly fell. The actors responded with an aplomb that was otherwise lacking. During and after the rain, the performance continued, sacrificing both "present mirth" and "present laughter" as well as the darker Malvolian side of the comedy.

John Beaufort (review date 9 July 1986)

"What country, friends, is this?" asks the ship-wrecked Viola in the second scene of William Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

"This is Illyria, lady," replies the captain of the sunken vessel.

And so it is, in a manner of speaking, Shakespeare chose the name of an Adriatic city with a history rooted in antiquity as the setting for this comedy of mistaken identities and love at cross purposes.

Taking his cue from the play's full title, Twelfth Night or What You Will, director Wilford Leach has given the production a 16th-century, Eastern European touch. Costume designer Lindsay W. Davis has met the challenge with a colorfully exotic wardrobe that turns out to be the most fanciful and picturesque feature of the New York Shakespeare Festival production at the Delacorte Theater in Central Park.

Possibly in an effort to offset an evident lack of classical experience among his players, Mr. Leach has settled for a broad, colloquial, low comedy style of playing.

The revival abounds in horseplay, sight gags, and gimmicks. Bob Shaw's neatly efficient scenery (a central stage tower atop a revolving platform) features occasional signs like "Welcome to Illyria." Sir Andrew's horse, Capilet, is heard to neigh offstage. (A critic, perhaps?) And when Malvolio struggles to smile, his painful efforts are accompanied by the amplified creak of a rusty gate. Such are the hey-nonny-nonny features of the Leach approach.

When it comes to the serious business of comedy and the even more delicate business of light romantic comedy, this Twelfth Night is not equal to the sum of its better parts.

As Malvolio, the admirable F. Murray Abraham (seen in the film Amadeus) projects the fussy aplomb and self-infatuation that make the censorious steward all too susceptible to the cruel trick played on him. Kim Greist's very modest experience has scarcely prepared her for the demands and rewards of Viola. The best that can be said of Miss Greist is that she perseveres. Kathleen Layman doesn't fare much more happily as Olivia, that "lady of great beauty and fortune" temporarily smitten with Viola disguised as Cesario.
The comics work hard and energetically to fulfill Leach's notions of Twelfth Night. Peter MacNicol makes a sunnily silly booby of Sir Andrew Aguecheek. William Duff Griffin minces through the role of Sir Toby Belch. Tony Azito—affecting one of the several pseudo-cockney accents encountered in this Illyria—clobbers Feste out of all recognition.

Other principals include Thomas Gibson (Orsino), Perry Lang (Sebastian, Viola's twin brother), and Meagen Fay (Olivia's serving woman, Maria, who sets the subplot in motion).

The pleasant incidental music and song settings are by Rupert Holmes. Stephen Strawbridge lighted the production, which is scheduled to continue the usual free Central Park performances through July 20. Perhaps this revival should have been retitled, Twelfth Night or What You Wilford.

John Simon (review date 14 July 1986)

Is it cynicism, insensitivity, or merely total benightedness that prompts the New York Shakespeare Festival to mount the kind of travesty of Twelfth Night now on view in Central Park? The subtitle What You Will was surely not meant as an encouragement to cast rank amateurs or equally rank professionals, and to camp up a high comedy into the lowest, most effete farce. Either Joe Papp and his director, Wilford Leach, think that a non-paying audience enjoying a night under the stars does not know any better or ask for more (which may be true, but is no excuse) or else they are incapable of responsible thinking and don't know any better themselves. Neither hypothesis is particularly cheering.

It is, of course, possible (though not advisable) to turn the more broadly comical scenes into outright farce, but a production in which almost everything is horseplay and bad acting, so that you don't even know where romance and poetry might come in, may be anything you will but isn't Twelfth Night. The tacit assumption here is that anyone can play Shakespeare, regardless of lack of training, lack of experience, or lack of basic suitability. Also, that it is fine to cast very young actors as the lovers, even if that most dubious of qualifications, youth, is all they've got, and that the director's vaudeville ideas will take care of the rest. With the kind of casting Leach has perpetrated, he could not have swung it were he ten times the director he is.

There are four major performances here that are beneath anything constituting acting. Kathleen Layman's Olivia, aside from having not the slightest style, timing, or stage presence, rattles off words without the faintest indication that they might have such a thing as meaning. As Orsino, Thomas Gibson is a simpering, mealymouthed, lowborn youth who perhaps could wait on tables in a lesser Columbus Avenue restaurant. Marco St. John's Antonio, rather than a noble sea captain, is a brutish stevedore who, instead of delivering a line, heaves it into the hold of the ship he is loading. As Sebastian, Perry Lang merely looks and acts cretinous, resembling his twin sister, Viola, as little as he does an actor.

A step higher is that dreadful clown Tony Azito, to my mind one of the more offensive presences in the New York theater, who turns Feste (exactly as he does every part) into an oleaginous lout with undertones of viciousness who adores himself every step of the way. It is the crudest kind of camp, mistaking ugliness for wit, but at least it is done with self-assurance and conviction. A step above is the Viola of Kim Greist. Miss Greist cannot act very much—she uses her arms, for example, as obsessive semaphores—but she has a tolerable voice, is not deliberately offensive, and tries hard.

Somewhat above this is the low-grade professionalism of William Duff-Griffin, whose Sir Toby is the sort of performance you get in provincial reps or summer theaters: correct as far as it goes, but wholly uninspired. Slightly better—more straightforward and well spoken—is the Fabian of James Lancaster, who, however, had the benefit of quite a bit of acting experience at Dublin's Abbey Theatre. I vastly prefer the Aguecheek of Peter MacNicol: Though as yet no Shakespearean, he has a great natural sweetness and intuitive playfulness. Much the best supporting performance is Meagen Fay's Maria, who, with better direction, could have been impeccable.

As Malvolio, F. Murray Abraham—an actor so enamored of himself that self-adulation oozes from his every pore and syllable—is properly cast and gives a thoroughly professional performance. He, too, could have profited from better direction, which would have eliminated, say, his holding up his coattails like a Trockadero ballerina while chasing after Viola. But he has a rich, fruity voice and a certain spontaneous oiliness that, in this role, come in handy. Even handier, however, is the huge incompetence of most of the actors around him.

Although Bob Shaw's scenery and Lindsay W. Davis's costumes are cute mostly in the likable sense, Leach's staging revels in the wrong sort of cuteness. If Leach has any notion of the historical, philosophical, social, and poetic concepts in this play, he certainly manages to keep it well hidden. Even the idea of turning Illyria visually into Greek Orthodox, Turkish-influenced Serbia is wrong; if anything, it would be Catholic, Italianate Dalmatia. But what Shakespeare had in mind was, clearly, England. And music—often verbal—as the opening Une makes plain. Significantly, this production switches the first two scenes and begins with the shipwreck. Talk about omens!

PRODUCTION:

Bill Alexander RSC 1987-88

BACKGROUND:

Alexander's RSC revival set Twelfth Night in an Illyria that resembled a sun-drenched Greek island. This feature, like the production as a whole, elicited contradicotry responses from critics. While Michael Ratcliffe, for example, maintained that "there can rarely have been a version of this disturbing comedy so bland, humourless and cold," Gary O'Connor hailed the production as "outstanding," commenting that the use of dazzling which architectural motifs in the set design accentuated "the confusion woven by illusion and self-illusion." The most controversial aspect of this staging was Antony Sher's Malvolio. Sher, whose costume was reminiscent of the liturgical garb of an Orthodox priest, took seriously the possibility that Malvolio becomes mad as a result of his confinement in the "dark room." For Stanley Wells, this portrayal was ultimately a failure. He maintained: "Sher technically as brilliant as ever, allows the effort to be both funny and original to take precedence over the establishment of a credible character who believes in himself."

Taking the opposing view, O'Connor lavishly praised the performance as "a gloriously infected piece of work," asserting that the actor's comic excess was "beautifully judged in its degree." Other principal performances included Harriet Walter as Viola, Bruce Alexander as Feste, David Bradley as Sir Andrew, and Deborah Findlay as Olivia. In 1988 the production transferred to the Barbican Theatre in London, where John Carlisle replaced Antony Sher as Malvolio.

COMMENTARY:

Michael Ratcliffe (review date 12 July 1987)

The current RSC production of The Merchant of Venice at Stratford, directed by Bill Alexander, designed by Kit Surrey, lit by Robert Bryan and starring Antony Sher, grapples with the savagery of the play more powerfully than any Merchant in recent years. The same team has moved straight on to Twelfth Night (RST, Stratford) and the difference is extraordinary. There can rarely have been a version of this disturbing comedy so bland, humourless and cold. Its destruction is completed by a star performance from Sher whose effect is about as subtle as a run-away truck.

Surrey sets the play, handsomely enough, on the little square of a white Greek island against a brochure-blue sky, but this architectural setting, which abounds in door-ways, roofline steps, windows and climbing-joists, is hardly used at all. It is mere scenery. There is little sense of time, heat, day, night, Greekness or any sort of enjoyed theatrical space.

The comedy is performed by an ensemble which, with one exception, has no natural comedians in it. The exception is David Bradley who plays Aguecheek like some grim and irritable newt, muttering all his remarks as though he would rather have snatched them back before releasing them to the sure mockery of the world. Bradley apart, the best performance comes from Deborah Findlay, the strange, ruminant colouring of whose voice makes something intelligent and sympathetic of the often tedious Olivia.

It is an evening of actors in distress. Three of the company's best struggle for firm ground beneath their feet: Bruce Alexander is a wilfully blank Feste (albeit exceptionally well sung); Harriet Walter is a gentle and self-effacing Viola confined to the outer edges of the play by the gross central performance and kept there by a drily conventional Orsino (Donald Sumpter); Roger Allam, who would make a Toby Belch of fastidious unpleasantness (and for that matter a marvellous Malvolio) elects instead to roar and bellow Sir Toby like Bottom seizing the lion's part, an offence against his own gifts. There is no attempt to illuminate the interesting and awkward conjunction of venality and pride which modern productions of Twelfth Night usually do.

It so happens there have been two exceptionally interesting and contentious ones, both playing to packed houses earlier this year. The touring Cheek by Jowl company explored the sexual ambivalence in the play, suggested that every character at some point or other runs slightly mad, and plumbed a well of deep feeling beneath the exuberant techniques of vulgarity, anachronism and shock. The text emerged with a glittering sharpness that has become rare in main house productions of the RSC. (Titus Andronicus in the Swan is another matter entirely). A Sheffield Crucible production set the play in some waking nightmare on the twelfth day of Christmas before Feste dowsed the crackling fiery tree in water and plunged the carnival back into night. Figures dreamed one another into existence and observed one another's confusion. Disorientation—territorial, sexual, social—is the master key to Twelfth Night. 'What country friends is this?' 'This is Illyria lady' but we all know there is more to it than that. Maria, for instance, does not have to be a tearful saxophonist (Cheek by Jowl) or a vengeful housekeeper bent on Malvolio's destruction (Crucible), but there is surely more to her than the dull soubrette Pippa Guard makes of her here.

Sher plays Olivia's steward like a mad holy man on the run, a corsetted hysterical with gobstopper eyes, stiff with terror at the prospect of losing his place, flipping his lid at the slightest reverse. It is a loud, violent desperately unfunny and miscalculated performance. Barren of genuine physical inventiveness and low on textual wit, it aspires to sensational tragic stature without earning it and passes clean through the middle of the play like a missile that destroys whilst leaving no trace.

Robert Hewison (review date 12 July 1987)

In the main house at Stratford the Royal Shakespeare Company presents ... Twelfth Night. Bill Alexander has chosen a specific Aegean setting, with mock-Mykonos architecture by Kit Surrey and superb costumes by Deirdre Clancy, which create a romantic but entirely consistent late 17th-century Greek world.
In spite of blazing white walls and blue sky, however, the initial atmosphere in Illyria is decidedly chilly, and only gradually do Alexander's intentions become clear. Thus the belligerently broad playing of Roger Allam's Sir Toby and the infinitely subtle silences of David Bradley's Ague-cheek are bright lights against a deliberate shadow, first cast by the pathos of Bruce Alexander's unaccompanied singing as Feste, a bitter clown, and then by the treatment of Malvolio.

Antony Sher, who has transformed himself into Simon Callow—or how Callow might look as a Greek majordomo—at first seems to be straining for laughs, but the stress turns out to be Malvolio's incipient madness. And unlike most Malvolios, once maddened, he stays mad. Alexander has borrowed the device of Peter Shaffer's Black Comedy, and presents the prison scene, not in darkness, but a blinding light. Malvolio is chained like a rabid dog, the object of real cruelty.

The strength of this conception, which eschews easy laughs, makes up for weaknesses elsewhere: as Viola, Harriet Walter has adopted a strange, adenoidal, mincing voice, effective in the first scene, when she is about to burst into tears, but distracting for the rest of the play. Donald Sumpter lacks all sex appeal as Orsino, and there is little passion, though some petulance, in Deborah Findlay's Olivia. But the moral tone of the production, under the baleful eye of Feste, is refreshingly right.

Stanley Wells (review date 17 July 1987)

I was once taken to task for describing Twelfth Night as the most elusive of Shakespeare's comedies, but Bill Alexander's new production confirms me in my opinion. Much about it feels right. The setting—an open space half-surrounding a mounting jumble of white, sunbaked archways, receding alleys, little steps, windows, and benches fixed to walk—permits one scene to flow into the next with an easy continuity. Although the firmly Adriatic setting (this is Illyria, Lady) sacrifices the sense of two distinct households, the ethnic costumes and customs provide a useful compromise between fantasy and localizing actuality.

In the opening scenes, the world of the play authentically establishes itself. On her first entry Viola, carrying her brother's clothes, is still choking back sobs for his apparent loss. Roger Allam's Sir Toby, younger and handsomer than usual, finds an easy unforced humour in his opening passages with Maria and Sir Andrew. Olivia's entry with her black-clad train, headed by Malvolio as an obsequiously zealous director of mourning, on her way to pay tribute to her brother's memory at a shrine let into the wall, helpfully establishes the resemblance between her situation and Viola's. And the production's heart seems to be in the right place during the wordless interplay of emotion within and between Orsino and Viola, as Bruce Alexander's unaccompanied singing of Feste's song "Come away death" moves Orsino with thoughts of his despairing love for Olivia and relaxes the disguised Viola to a point at which she comes close to revealing her love for Orsino. This is beautifully conceived and executed.

But as the action continues, the mood is too often broken. Sir Toby drunk is too like Sir Toby sober, except that he belches louder and longer and plays tricks with the smoke from his cheroot. Harriet Walter's Viola, though gently appealing in her wistfulness, lacks comic drive, vocal mannerisms obtrude, and her eyebrows develop a nervous life of their own. But the wrongest-headed performance is Antony Sher's, as Malvolio, because it seems more concerned to make a series of points about the character than to find a way of presenting him from his own point of view.

This stands in direct contrast to David Bradley's brilliant Sir Andrew, a coherent, self-consistent portrayal of a recognizable individual. Bemused, bedraggled, energetic in his efforts to keep up with his more sophisticated companions, he is touchingly uncomprehending in his failure to do so. Merely to contemplate him is enough to induce sympathetic laughter. On the other hand Sher, technically as brilliant as ever, allows the effort to be both funny and original to take precedence over the establishment of a credible character who believes in himself. As a result, his performance seems no more than a collection of actorish points, whether he is turning his hat and his pockets inside out to show that they too are yellow, or popping up unexpectedly close to Olivia in response to her call, or exposing himself to her attendants in gleeful self-satisfaction. The performance is based on a theory: that Malvolio goes mad as a result of the tricks played upon him. In the prison scene he emerges through a trap, tethered to a stake, visibly suffering. The darkness that surrounds him has to be mimed by Feste, who torments him with exploding caps, and a half-naked Sir Toby and Maria are seen at a window, more absorbed in their love-making than in what is going on beneath them. At the end Malvolio is distressingly insane, a broken man flailing out at "the whole pack" of those on stage like an enraged bear. This is as forced and sentimental as the efforts of actors other than Sher to provide a tragic conclusion to the role of Shylock. If Malvolio has a tragedy, it is that he is irremediably sane.

Sheridan Morley (review date 22 July 1987)

Stratford's new main-stage Twelfth Night, directed by Bill Alexander, has one of those sets (here by Kit Surrey) that do most of the acting before the players have a chance to take up residence. "Which country, friend, is this?" "Illyria, lady" is thus an odd opening exchange, since we are clearly in downtown Paxos or on some neighbouring Greek island where you constantly expect to find Zorba setting up a dancing academy for the tourists. A hugely picturesque, sunbaked and white-walled little square, with its own functional water pump and a candlelit shrine to Olivia's dead brother, might not appear to be the most likely location for this traditionally chilly play, and its permanence means that we cannot actually move with Feste from Orsino's court to Olivia's mansion or Malvolio's gaol: in order for anything to happen or anyone to meet, the cast have instead to assemble around the pump. But once you make that geographic leap, and get acclimatised to the heat, there emerge certain distinct advantages.

First of all, Antony Sher can play Malvolio looking like Groucho Marx dressed as a Greek none-too-orthodox priest, with black fez and pointed beard in a performance which allows for a reversal of the usual character development; this steward starts effectively mad, pursuing Viola around the square with Olivia's ring like a manic travelling salesman, and only becomes increasingly and alarmingly sane as he is incarcerated in a prison for lunatics. Yet, although he is single-mindedly taking on all the great Olivier roles in his time with the RSC, first Richard III and in this season a Shylock as well, Sher seems to recognise that he is not a natural or leading comedian: when the going gets tough, he neatly replaces Malvolio somewhere down the castlist in what then becomes a company play about mutual deceit.

The rest of the casting is equally offbeat: a thin and distinctly unjovial Sir Toby Belch from Roger Allam, an unusually meek Olivia from Deborah Findlay and a Viola from Harriet Walter who looks as though she would far rather be leading a troupe of Girl Guides on an archeological dig around the island than sorting out the complex romantic obsessions of Orsino and Olivia while disguised as her own missing twin brother.

Orsino himself (Donald Sumpter) is an aged, melancholic loner, out-classed even in this specialist category by David Bradley's superb Aguecheek, a man of such total exhaustion under a burning sun that he can barely drag himself to the end of a sentence, let alone the beginning of a duel. Add to them a Maria (Pippa Guard) who instead of the usual chubby housekeeper is far and away the most sexily glamorous character on stage, and it becomes clear that Mr Alexander wishes us to consider the play not only in a new setting but also peopled by eccentrics we have never really met before.

The result is a kind of holiday romp shot through with dark and scary moments when the sun suddenly goes behind a cloud and it gets unexpectedly chilly: there is no attempt to pretend that, even when all the partners do get sorted out into their correct sexes and couplings, the general happiness will last for much longer than the average summer romance, and we are left alone with Feste singing of the wind and the rain presumably somewhere well away from the offices of the local tourist board.

Shakespeare may have had the taste of olives in his mouth when he wrote Twelfth Night. Viola, Malvolio, Olivia not only have an anagrammatical closeness of sound, but during the play they are lovingly crushed, and while one yields pure oil, another a bitter taste, the three as characters have flavour rather than depth. The lovesick Orsino, his name a cross between arse and obscene, is himself as about as enticing as a whole bowl of olives; Feste, with his callous wit and melancholy songs, spits out the stones.

This outstanding production has been set by the director, Bill Alexander, and designer Kit Surrey, far from the Jacobethan box-hedges and well to the east of Illyria in a sun-baked village square whose Greek Orthodox ikon is tucked away in a wall niche. The confusion woven by illusion and self-illusion gains considerably from the dazzling whiteness. Olivia's entourage, when they cast away their mourning, wear alluring brocades of the traditional myrtle and vine. Feste, dressed in more sombre shreds and patches, benefits from the surreal indeterminateness of period: Malvolio, a character on the fullest Byzantine scale, disports himself in the neo-clerical black of Constantinople.

Given the stark setting the players themselves have to find the resources to show the comic and emotional changes wrought by so much mixed-up identity. Harriet Walter aims at and hits Viola's gruff and gritty side, offering escape to Olivia and Orsino by her managerial competence, and neatly sidestepping their narcissism. Orsino becomes, in Donald Sumpter's performance, a balding fakir of love, a Gandhi on the nailbed of desire. Deborah Findlay as Olivia, in her mixture of imperiousness and self-aware silliness, has rather more character, and therefore humour, than one might expect of Olivia. Bruce Alexander, as Feste, projects wit and songs alike with perfect pitch and acerbic modulation.

As engineer of the Malvolio subplot Pippa Guard portrays Maria as an enticing Machiavel: the passion between her and Toby Belch, not usually as torrid as this, is fanned by the sight of Malvolio cross-gartered and consummated when the poor steward, condemned as mad and tied to a stake, is abused by Feste in the disguise of Sir Topaz. This cruel and juvenile scene is heavily underlined and goes a bit far, yet the actors can hardly be blamed for a current taste for violence as primitive as that in the playwright's day. A youthful Belch, Roger Allam, played with excoriating variations on the activity enclosed within his name, is the best I've seen. No less funny is David Bradley's Aguecheek, who cunningly and intricately faceted, gives off glimmers of light as, like a shrunken planet, he revolves round Sir Toby.

'His very genius hath taken the infection of the device', Toby says of Malvolio. Antony Sher's interpretation of the steward is a gloriously infected piece of work, a blot or extravagance on the face of humanity. His self-deceit defies sexual limits as he flaunts the concealed stockings as much like a male flasher as like a French can-can girl. The comic excess is beautifully judged in its degree and if Sher effortlessly reaches the peaks of laughter it is because he is a master of the art of preparation. He can conceive himself as a theatrical image, climb in and out of himself, and stand the image on its head. This is a production the public will love without reservation.

François Laroque (review date October 1987)

Illyria this time has moved down to the shores of nineteenth century Greece, with cobalt blue skies, white blocks of houses, arched narrow streets, splashing fountains and open-air benches on both sides backstage.

The play opens on a frozen tableau-vivant. Orsino (Donald Sumpter), oldish, bald on top, with a curious, Chinese kind of plait of hair hanging on one side, holds a double lute to speak the first famous lines If music be the food of love.... The men wear hats, baggy breeches, and boots.

Sir Toby Belch (Roger Allam), wears a brown velvet coat, looks both young and very red in the face and he is courting a young, pert, and pretty Maria (Pippa Guard), which is a welcome change from the tradition of the nightgowned spinster. Sir Andrew Aguecheek, a very tall, awkward fellow with long hanging yellow hair (David Bradley) also wears baggy trousers, complemented by green stockings and leather slippers. He and Roger Allam form a wonderful comic pair, catching the audience's attention and raising laughter very early on in the performance.

Viola (Harriet Walter) finds no apparent difficulty in her change into a man and when she reappears as Cesario she wears deep bottle-green trousers and jerkin with her ginger hair now cropped short. Being rather tall, she will manage to carry the illusion of her transformation fairly well throughout. One may add here that the choice of the actor to play her brother Sebastian (Paul Spence) seems to have obeyed the same desire to lend credence to the central notion of the comedy of errors as the resemblance between them is fairly close.

Feste (Bruce Alexander) wears batik style motley, with hanging stripes, and he has rouge on his cheeks and a crew cut. He looks deliberately out of touch with the rest of the cast, but he will slowly, and with great talent, make himself part of the entertainment.

The tolling of the church bell prepares for the slow entrance upon the stage of the Lady Olivia (Deborah Findlay), who is followed by a mourning procession of women in black. They all have black veils on their faces and wear dresses of black and golden brocade.

Malvolio (Antony Sher) has a trimmed, pointed beard, and is dressed in black from toque to gaiters and has the appearance of an orthodox priest. His stiffness is reinforced by a thin straight white collar and the chain of office that hangs around his neck. He shouts a lot and seems to boss everybody around, but executes his mistress's orders with extreme zeal, as when he literally runs after Cesario to give him Olivia's message and ring. When Cesario arrives at Olivia's house, the black mourners that all walk round her convey the impression of an oriental harem.

Toby expectedly belches his way along for most of the play and he is sometimes answered in this by Aguecheek's as it were absent-minded farts, but this is more funny than vulgar and it represents a human and almost inevitable sign of their horrible abuse of food and drink in this period of festivity and excess. To keep up the atmosphere of carousing and merry-making, here more genuine than forced or sad (probably because Toby and Aguecheek look fairly young) Feste sings—with an excellent voice and without musical accompaniment. The three men then fall to their catches until Maria is woken up and joins in a dance that appropriately turns out to be a form of sirtaki, making for a highly entertaining moment in the production.

It is an empty bottle which Feste throws through his open window that rouses here the soundly sleeping Malvolio from his bed rather than the racket of the revellers. When he suddenly emerges on the stage to restore order, he comes with a net holding both his hair and beard into place, so that the contrast between the severity of his speech and his pompous stance on the one hand and his ridiculous aspect on the other is irresistible. This is the beginning of a series of astonishing transformations. In the letter scene, he becomes almost hysterical and starts jumping around, red in the face as he discovers the contents of Olivia's letter. When Toby and Fabian come on stage, just before the interval, they are split double with a contained laughter that seems so painfully intense that it takes a while before it breaks out into sound.
After a twenty minute interval, Feste arrives and starts beating on his drum in a rather maddening way. This raises our anticipation as the joke on Malvolio is about be taken a step further.

Toby now has a beard and Olivia wears a veil about her headgear. As for Orsino, with his Leeds accent and his bald patch, he seems to overindulge in his melancholy humour. He is probably too much of a foil to the rest of the company so that it is easier to understand why Olivia (who is here more of a coquette than a rich, cold aristocrat) rejects his suit than why Viola-Cesario secretly falls in love with him.

When Malvolio comes to sport his yellow crossed garters under his black coat, which he keeps flashing at Olivia with leering eyes, the comedy of love's misunderstandings reaches a farcical climax. His black toque, when turned inside out, also appears to have been lined with yellow. Then, like some eerie juggler, he pulls out more lining—from his pockets this time—which hangs like long yellow scarves, and follows Olivia around in a frantic and mysterious erotic dance. When his Lady has gone he splashes his face with water at the fountain as the cicadas begin to pulse louder in the heat of the day—a clear enough indication that Malvolio suffers from sun-stroke and midsummer madness.

Then Toby, Fabian, and Maria arrive with crosses and garlic garlands to exorcize him: Greece, as it seems, has how turned into a Transylvanian hotbed of vampires … But next comes a more straightforward medical allusion to madness with the urinal which Maria carries with her and deftly manages to have filled quickly during one of Malvolio's fits.

In the madness scene, Malvolio, pilloried, is brought up from below. He gives the impression of groping around in darkness while his voice is amplified to suggest a hollow cellar. When masquerading as Sir Topaz, Feste goes down a ladder which leans against the window where Sir Toby and Maria are watching the scene while exchanging love kisses. Malvolio is tied to a stake like a bear and he whirls round it like some mad animal. At the end of the scene, he presses Olivia's crumpled letter against his cheek, with a tormented, hallucinated look on his face. This is an extremely powerful scene, which suggests, in a pathetic way, that the borderline between the light abuses of festive misrule and real madness has now become an extremely thin one.

When Malvolio reappears on stage at the end, he is totally bedraggled and, red-eyed, tries to shield his sight from the recovered daylight. But after Feste has once more taunted him with the whirligig of time speech, Malvolio says the expected I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you in a curiously slow way that ends in a singsong. When he goes away, with a strange smile on his face, one understands that the joke has really been pushed too far and that he has become truly mad. This last, dark note is in keeping with Antony Sher's remarkable interpretation which manages to reveal the dark potentialities of Shakespeare's last comedy.

So, all in all, this is a superb and memorable production which brings out the festive as well as the serious dimension of the play. While Antony Sher as Malvolio gives an astonishing performance that sheds new light on the character, Roger Allam and David Bradley are no less remarkable and funny as Sir Toby and Sir Andrew. Pippa Guard, who was revealed by the parts she played in the BBC Shakespeare series and has now made a very welcome appearance on the Stratford stage, plays a lively, arch, and beguiling Maria. Feste also gives a strong performance and the rather disappointing Donald Sumpter and Deborah Findlay, who seem to have been miscast in the roles of Duke Orsino and Olivia, do not finally detract too much from our pleasure.

Edward Pearce (review date November 1987)

British theatre audiences who holiday in such places when they can. Most critics were reminded of Mykonos; I was inclined to see Lindos on Rhodes. But there, chacun à son goût.

The change of setting is valid. Geography, unlike poetry, was a hazy matter for most Elizabethans. Shakespeare tended to put Italian-named characters down in places like Bohemia or Illyria about which he knew gloriously little, and set them speaking English. Twelfth Night has, thank God, escapist tendencies. It asks for a faraway, faintly exotic Levantine place in which to set up Italianate Englishmen to play against women as English as cucumber sandwiches, and generally to get on with the show. A fancy, sparkling-white, island Greece will do very nicely—especially as it gives Anthony Sher a chance to play Malvolio as Archbishop Makarios in buttercup tights.

There are defects and weak performances—an Orsino (Donald Sumpter) as limp and perfunctory as a flannel dipped in lukewarm water, a Viola/Cesario (Harriet Walter) with a touch of the plucky lady lacrosse-player about her, and in Anthony Sher's Malvolio we go clean back in time to Actor's Theatre. Sher, a South African with application and talent in unstable proportions, has a lot to give. But we have to understand that with Sher we are back with Sir Donald Wolfit, a double-jointed, speeded-up, mocking and flailing Wolfit, without the old man's Churchillian pomposity but with the same carnivorous, team-despising presence on stage, very old-fashioned, an actaw, laddie, and no messing about.

Bill Alexander, the director here, likes nuance and refinement. Antonio and Sebastian are drawn to one another, Antonio knowing, Sebastian not; we are given to understand this, but nothing is done to make us wince and Mr Alexander famous.

Sir Toby is played as a coarse conman getting by on his wits. The part at all times hangs betwixt sympathy and dislike. This Sir Toby is at the dislikable end. He would be one of those marginal chancers raising money for the Conservatives before they are arrested. Sir Andrew is a grass-green innocent, a lame self-doubting shadow—funny in a way, but funny-pitiful.

Mr Alexander dithers happily between tragic and comic elements. He has an angelic Maria in Pippa Guard—too good and psychologically right, with the proper vivacity for this cousin of Beatrice's, to get the notices she deserves—but it is harder than ever to see why she would want to marry this one-jump-ahead-of-the RECEIVER Toby.

The tragedy acts out Feste's description of Malvolio in confinement, "Truly, madam, he holds Beelzebub at the stave's end", in a way which suggests that the stave has snapped. Malvolio (an insistence of the actor, or Mr Alexander's idea?) is noisily mad in a way which draws a lot of attention to Anthony Sher. It all hangs rather perilously between a moving pity and comic business. The overt jolly cruelty of the Elizabethans, who set dogs on to bears as well as writing sonnets, leaves a nation of compassionate souls with tin ears understandably jarred by the treatment of Malvolio. Lacking their rough complacency, we usually go overboard the other way. Sher's fraught freak simply goes crazy in spades.

The production, then, doesn't quite work. The limp premiers are more remote than usual from a comic plot which seizes power and declares a state of emergency, and Sher is allowed out on his own in a way never wise. Yet it falls honourably short. There are beautiful things in the bouquet of inconsistencies: Maria, for one; a sweet-singing Feste permitted the Morley tune, another. And anyway a production full of contradictions does no harm to a play which in all its manifest glory is full of them itself.

Irving Wardle (review date 11 April 1988)

John Carlisle's Malvolio (replacing Antony Sher) is the only major cast change in Bill Alexander's production since Jeremy Kingston reviewed it in Stratford last July; but the immediate impression is that its characters are meeting for the first time.

Nothing quite fits. There is a distracted, hollow-eyed Viola (Harriet Walter) who suggests more the last act of a tragedy than the opening of a comedy. Donald Sumpter's Orsino is a grizzled autocrat with none of the expected marks of a romantic lover. In years, at least, he is a match for Deborah Findlay's Olivia; but it then comes as a shock to meet her uncle Toby (Roger Allam) who could be half her age.

Feste (Bruce Alexander) is another middle-aged figure who pushes the privileges of folly to the limit of sardonic bombast and haunts the Illyrian courts in rags; though even his costume is more prepossessing than the bedraggled rompers in which the well-to-do Augucheek (David Bradley) hopes to seduce Olivia.

Illyria this time appears to be a part of the Greek hinter-land, represented (by Deirdre Clancy and Kit Surrey) with baggy trousers and embroidered full-length skirts; and a village setting with a bell tower at the apex of a honeycomb of massive walls, perspectives of deep blue sky through rough-cut archways, and benches on the the house exteriors. It is on those benches that the show starts taking shape.

Toby and Maria (Pippa Guard) flop down on one of them and start gossiping while she feeds him slices of melon. Olivia sits Feste down to advise him that his jokes are offending people. An intimate atmosphere at once springs up in this public square. It may not be the usual interior world of Twelfth Night—traditionally a play of mirrored rooms—but if affords the characters a means of coming to life.

On this occasion it is less an exquisite lyric comedy than a boisterous piece for the market place, animating every inch of the space. In particular, it excels in false exits, prolonged down narrow alleyways and out of sight, and then brought hurtling back like a ball just before the elastic snaps.

Harriet Walter shows signs of wilting in the face of all the full-blown ruderies, and comes into her own only when her knees turn to water before the Aguecheek duel. But the multiple intrigues go off like a bomb.

Allam's Sir Toby is a virile young hell-raiser, equipped with all the gentlemanly graces which vanish in a roar when the drink gets to him. Bradley's Aguecheek hovers round him as an grim-faced pleasure-seeker, always missing the point, and trying to preserve his dignity by pretending he understands perfectly.

It is a cruelly funny relationship, and the cruelty runs riot when it fastens on Carlisle's Malvolio, an invincibly stately personage who then arrives in the likeness of a Greek dancing girl before being chained up by the neck in a dripping dungeon. Seldom has the horror of the farcical climax been projected with such impact.

There is also comedy in the most unexpected places; as where Orsino's musicians flock round to give him lute therapy when Olivia finally rejects him; and in Toby's last act line, "I hate a drunken rogue" delivered straight to his patroness as a plea not to throw him out of the house.

PRODUCTION:

Kenneth Branagh • Renaissance Theatre Company • 1987

BACKGROUND:

Kenneth Branagh's production with the Renaissance Theatre Company set Twelfth Night in a wintry Illyria that evoked the England of Charles Dickens. H. R. Woudhuysen cautioned, however, that this was not "the Dickens of Pickwick or A Christmas Carol but of Bleak House and Little Dorrit, where secrecy and tragedy will eventually give birth to revelation and joy." Making full use of the play's seasonal associations, the set of the Riverside Studios featured a Christmas tree and a snowy cemetery in the center stage that was used for Malvolio's imprisonment. Critics generally approved of the director's sole liberty with the text: Branagh transposed the first and second scenes of the drama in order to combine the charm of the play with its underlying strangeness. Audiences and critics alike responded favorably to Branagh's direction; Kenneth Hurren declared it to have been "quite the most enjoyable production of the comedy I have seen for decades." This staging was further praised for several fine performances; outstanding among them was Richard Briers's Malvolio, which Hurren characterized as "as fine a realisation of that famous role as you could wish to see." Reviewers additionally praised the performances of Abigail McKern as Maria, Frances Barker as Viola, Anton Lesser as Feste, James Saxon as Sir Toby, and James Simmons as Sir Andrew Aguecheek.

COMMENTARY:

Martin Hoyle (review date 5 December 1987)

There's no stopping Kenneth Branagh. No sooner has his face disappeared from our Sunday night television screens and The Fortunes of War than it reappears on the large screen in A Month in the Country. The West End is already enjoying his production of John Sessions in The Life of Napoleon, and now Branagh's bravely named Renaissance Theatre Company opens its first full-scale Shakespearian enterprise at the Riverside Studios in Hammersmith. A dankness has seeped up from the Thames; for this Twelfth Night is a chill affair, sober, respectful and curiously mirthless.

Branagh as director opens the play with Viola enquiring of the sea captain what country this is, from behind a gauze. The ensuing scene is decently spoken, if fitfully visible, and sets the tone for the rest of the production. When the curtain rises (or rather falls to the ground) it reveals a spacious set, by Bunny Christie, that rather dwarfs the performances. Balustrades, broken masonry, scattered statuary, ivy-twined gates, bare trees, the odd piece of furniture—all combine for a cemetery with terraces and ramps, on one of which four musicians (wind, cello, percussion, piano) play Pat Doyle's melancholy music.

The mood takes its cue from the bitterly misanthropic Feste of Anton Lesser, a faintly gypsy-like hobo with a carpet bag, whose smouldering anger and contempt reach a natural climax with his furious baiting of the imprisoned Malvolio. This intriguing reading is saddled with a final setting of "The rain it raineth every day" that is vocally ungrateful and plainly a strain to sing; otherwise there is immense promise here.

Promise too in Caroline Langrishe's Olivia, immediately yearning for some sort of relationship when she sees the disguised Viola, genuinely upset by Malvolio's final humiliation. The Victorian setting provides her with fetching mourning—black velvet and jet—and she is patently an efficient as well as humane mistress of the household.

Inevitably attention focuses on what that superb comic technician Richard Briers will make of Malvolio. The fussy air of primly affronted fastidiousness faintly recalls the late Stafford Cripps. This dried-up functionary of the creaking voice thrusts out a Gladstonian jaw as he rumbles out his fantasies about Olivia in a tone of loathing. The opening of the hoax letter is a comic vignette: his final exit, ragged, begrimed and degraded, is taken with absolute dignity, and quite rightly left the house silent and embarrassed for him. There are signs that Mr Briers is holding himself in nobly. He may be a victim of the lack of buoyancy that causes the comic scenes to bog down. James Saxon's Toby is the most colourless and characterless I have seen, and James Simmons's Aguecheek is simply undeveloped.
The gem of the production is Frances Barber's Viola, played in what one can term the Judi Dench mould: plucky, loving, sweet-natured, warm-hearted, sturdily convincing as a boy in her three-piece grey suit. The reunion with her brother (Christopher Hollis, a little stiff) worked its magic. A thoughtful, intelligent production, then, that needs to relax and enjoy itself much more.

Michael Billington (review date 5 December 1987)

At first I thought we might be in for some shocks as Kenneth Branagh's production of Twelfth Night at the Riverside Studios reversed the order of Shakespeare's first two scenes. But it turns out to be a genial, generous actor-oriented production chiefly remarkable for its use of a Victorian Christmas setting and for Richard Briers's outstanding Malvolio, a cross between Mr Murdstone and Samuel Smiles.

The snow-flaked Christmas setting strikes me as very odd. It enables the designer, Bunny Christie, to fill the wide stage with white from Olivia's portals on the right to Orsino's tomb-decked manor on the left. It is also possible that the play was first performed as a post-Yule entertainment at Whitehall in 1601. But everything in it cries out summer. Olivia dismisses Malvolio's cross-gartered, yellow stockings as "mid-summer madness." Fabian describes Sir Andrew's challenge as "more matter for a May morning." That doesn't suggest to me a world of Christmas trees and gift-boxes.

But although Mr Branagh, in only his second Shakespeare production, comes armed with a strong visual concept, he gives his actors a lot of elbow-room. This works very well when—like Mr Briers and Anton Lesser—they are naturally inventive. It also leaves certain darker areas of the play unexplored. Nowhere in James Saxon's bland, checktrousered Christmas-card Sir Toby do I find a hint of the character's exploitative cruelty. And while Abigail McKern's Maria is a neat Victorian lady's maid, where is the doting admiration for a drunken sot and the attempt to impress him with a cruel practical joke? Mr Branagh leaves some of the relationships suspiciously vague.

The chief beneficiary of the Victorian setting is Malvolio whom Richard Briers plays superbly as a frock-coated, wildly-ambitious fanatic: a Mr Hudson who can't wait to get upstairs into his lady's chamber. With his flattened, centre-parted hair and mouth down-turned like a reversed crescent moon, he is almost unrecognisable; in the box-tree scene he skirts the usual innuendoes to stress his dream of being "Count Malvolio"; and when he bares his teeth in a distorted smile, it is like watching the unveiling of some grotesque monument from which you would hide the children's eyes.

Yet when Mr Briers crawls out of his prison cell on all fours like a wounded animal, he evokes one's pity without unbalancing the play or suggesting that Shakespeare was writing a Steward's Tragedy.

It is a star performance without being a stage-hogging one, thanks to strong casting elsewhere. Anton Lesser's shaggy-locked Feste (singing Come Away Death, incidentally, to Pat Doyle's arrangement of a Paul McCartney tune) looks as if he might be waiting for Godot rather than Olivia but has the right vindictive asperity. Frances Barber, crop-haired in grey flannel, makes Viola a clear-spoken and giggly sport: all I miss is the hint of orphaned melancholy with which Shakespeare invests the character. And Caroline Langrishe is a fine Olivia combining aristocratic beauty with clear hints that she cannot wait to get her hands on the boy- emissary as she buries her head in her lap.

They say there is a perfect Twelfth Night laid up for us in heaven. In the meantime, we have a briskly-enjoyable one on tap in Hammersmith. Mr Branagh's RTC (Renaissance Theatre Company) may not be quite ready to oust the RSC but it is right that Shakespeare should not be a Stratford monopoly and I shall long remember the sight of Mr Briers extending an outflung hand to an imagined Sir Toby like a Richard the Opal and taffeta—materials that flicker between one tinge and another—are both mentioned in Twelfth Night: appropriately for, placed at a time of the year when festivity shades back into sobriety, the play itself ceaselessly ripples between the bright and the sombre. Comic emotings clench into aching emotions. Appearances fluctuate, setting up undulations between pleasure and pain. It is entirely typical of the play's atmosphere that the songs of its clown, Feste, are forlorn.

Recognising all this, Kenneth Branagh's superlative production highlights it by setting the drama in nineteenth-century dress. The play's graver side gets translated into the Victorian preoccupation with mortality. Ivy-wreathed tombstones and a funerary monument form part of the scenery. The self-indulgent luxuriating in grief mocked by Twelfth Night is decked out in the extravagant trappings of Victorian mourning.

Olivia—her melancholic posturings gracefully caught by Caroline Langrishe—wears a jet-black velvet dress, swathes herself in a black veil and languishes on a black chaise longue. To convey Orsino's voluptuous mopings, Christopher Ravenscroft—at first too genuinely hang-dog, but gaining in affected strickenness as the play proceeds—paces round in a sable-coloured frock-coat.

In Twelfth Night, the memento mori—"Youth's a stuff will not endure"—both whets and dampens joie de vivre: decay is a reminder not to delay. Knuckling aside tears at thoughts of her brother's death as she briskly sets out to survive, Frances Barber's lively, lucid Viola demonstrates this sensitively and robustly.

Balancing the Victorian inclination towards the mortuary, the production stresses its gusto for Yuletide revelry. Stark wintry branches are silhouetted against the back-ground of Bunny Christie's set, but at its forefront is a candle-bedecked Christmas tree. Lanterns glow through flurries of snow. Swirls of music—by Pat Doyle and Paul McCartney—exuberantly accompany the whooping gamesomeness of Toby Belch and his cronies. Cheerily fleshed out by James Saxon, Belch resembles a genial toper in a nineteenth century print.

James Simmons' permanently wooden-faced Aguecheek looks like a Victorian toy soldier in his Hussar's uniform with its braid and frogging. Maria, performed with dashing skill by Abigail McKern, is a perky parlour-maid. Fabian—a slight role cleverly made substantial by Shaun Prendergast—becomes a dapper, knowing butler.

At the centre of the evening's success is Richard Briers' masterly Malvolio. Black-suited, shoulders hunched in tetchy sub-servience, cheeks biliously sucked in, he at first makes the character hilariously appalling, like a disgruntled undertaker gradually succumbing to megalomania. Then his portrayal modulates into something harsher—with astute help from the production.

Sparing none of the savagery of his tormenting and incarceration, it has Belch, Maria and Feste suddenly falling silent and avoiding each other's eyes in embarrassment as they realise how far their euphoric vengeance has taken them towards cruelty. Matching this, self-contempt regularly rips disgustedly through the professional foolery of Anton Lesser's restless, farouche Feste.

To the end, the production keeps up Twelfth Night's shot-silk shimmer between the cheering and the chastening. As the couples lope off enthusiastically, two casualties of the marital happiness—Antonio with his redundant love for Sebastian, and the rejected Aguecheek—are left alone at the sides of the stage.

Throughout, placing of characters is always finely judged—as is the pacing of events: so that the play's elegant structure stands out beautifully. In this production by the Renaissance Theatre Company, Kenneth Branagh has achieved a first-rate feat: doing sensuous justice to Twelfth Night's velvety surface while never letting you forget the bones underneath.

Kate Kellaway (review date 6 December 1987)

From the programme arranged like an advent calendar and the stage upon which at first you can make out only wintry shapes because of an expanse of gauze which veils the view, it is apparent that Kenneth Branagh's Twelfth Night (Riverside) takes delight in mystery and discovery.

And when the world is unwrapped, the gauze lifted on Bunny Christie's set, the effect is entrancing. Illyria is a luxurious but ruined place of broken balustrades, statuettes and fugitive furniture—a grandfather clock and chaise-longue stand out incongruously in the snow. Throughout the evening, high up on a stone terrace, musicians play Pat Doyle's and Paul McCartney's sweet but melancholy music, specially commissioned for this production.

The period is imprecisely defined, Edwardian perhaps—or Illyria's equivalent. Viola and Sebastian are both got up in grey flannel suits. Kenneth Branagh has made sure that they also resemble each other in mannerisms and tone—both are fervent, humorous and emphatic. Frances Barber's charming Viola has exactly the right blend of self-consciousness and excitement at the impropriety of her disguise. Grave and animated by turns, she is also wonderfully cheeky, delivering Orsino's compliments to Olivia with her hands stuffed into her pockets. Olivia (Caroline Langrishe) and Orsino (Christopher Ravenscroft) also, in a sense, resemble each other: their characters are, here, complementary: intelligent, courtly and obsessive in love.

Although this is a festive, magical version of Twelfth Night, celebration is never untouched by sadness. Feste (Anton Lesser) ensures that this is so, playing a sweet and bitter fool, supplier of champagne and sad songs—a fool and a wayfarer only because it is too painful to be wise. He drowns his sorrows in the company of James Saxon's wonderful, uproarious Sir Toby, a rosy reprobate popping Alka Seltzer pills, and of James Simmons's emaciated, self-pitying Sir Andrew Aguecheek who honours the role down to the last detail (his hair really does look like 'flax on a distaff'). Diminutive Maria (Abigail McKern) has an extraordinarily infectious laugh, but we do not need her help in responding to Richard Briers's memorable Malvolio. Briers plays him as an elderly valet stupefied with self-importance. Hilarity is followed by pity. When he appears at the end, mud-spattered and humiliated, the message is clear:

In nature, there's no blemish but the mind
None can be called deformed but the unkind.

Christopher Edwards (review date 12 December 1987)

Too much has been made of the supposed bitterness of Shakespeare's Arcadia. For instance, to Auden, Shakespeare was in no mood for comedy in this play. Instinctively, I side with Hazlitt who held that Twelfth Night was one of the most delightful of the comedies, containing little satire and no spleen: 'Shakespeare's comic genius resembles the bee rather in its power of extracting sweets from weeds or poisons, than in leaving a sting behind it.' At any rate, the spleen should not be seen as paramount. For this, among other reasons, Kenneth Branagh's generous-spirited, unsplenetic production at the Riverside Studios is very welcome.

Those mourning the passing of classically spoken blank verse may find only patchy comfort here, it is true. And those who prefer their Feste songs to be sung to traditional tunes may resist the contributions of Paul McCartney and Pat Doyle to the musical side of the evening. For my part, I disliked the crooning ballads but enjoyed the occasional accompanying passages. All the same, this is a skilfully wrought production—funny, moving and festive in its vaguely Edwardian Illyrian setting. Seasonal touches include generous helpings of false snow, a Christmas tree and an advent calendar programme. But it is Richard Briers's Malvolio who offers the most welcome cheer. At first sight it may have seemed just shrewd marketing by Branagh to cast a television sitcom star in the part, but Briers makes the part memorably his own, rising high above his cosy television persona.

The set, by Bunny Christie, is both skillful and serviceable. Shrouded at the back with white sheets, Illyria is an artful clutter of broken balustrades, odd pieces of furniture, bare wintry trees and, for Orsino's opening 'If music be the food of love' speech, a raised seat overlooking a graveyard. Despite its apparent bleakness, an essentially celebratory spirit lurks not far below the surface—vide Toby Belch's secret haul of liquor hidden beneath the fringed flap of one of the tombstones. Enter, in Scene HI, the round, bearded, pink-cheeked form of Sir Toby Belch himself (James Saxon). 'You must come in earlier o' nights,' says Abigail McKern's sprightly, engaging Maria, as she obligingly pops an Alka Seltzer into his glass. James Saxon is a worthy leading reveller; Sir Andrew Aguecheek (James Simmons) his natural, credulous and absurdly funny gull.

Briers's first entrance—dressed in black, hair slicked down, nose in the air—bears the true stamp of Malvolio's sickly self-love; the pinched, overweening air of self-importance makes us all willing collaborators in Maria's device to ridicule him. Immediately before the letter trick is sprung, his fantasies of preference are both ferocious and funny—Briers's eyes rolling dementedly as he fancies himself Count Malvolio, crushing Sir Toby and his followers. Briers is very amusing in these scenes, as he is painfully moving later on when he realises how thoroughly he has been duped. It is a notable performance.

Of course, there are elements of harsh discord in the play. Malvolio, locked up as a madman, is cruelly treated, but he deserves it and his punishment is, more or less, just. Nor is Sir Toby just a genial bon viveur. He cruelly exploits Sir Andrew, but here too he is punished with a cracked skull from the martial Sebastian. It is a question of focus, of what elements you allow to prevail. Branagh admits the minor notes but allows harmony to prevail.

Anton Lesser's Feste, as well as supplying much of the play's humour, channels those discordant elements. His clown is possessed of more than a merely professional cynicism. For all his wit he is also genuinely weary at the world's folly—at times he seems driven with impatience. Lesser, looking like a hippy pop star on a low-budget tour, carries the role through—crooning ballads and all—with effortless authority and pointed intensity. Finally, there is the unifying presence of Viola, played by Frances Barber with considerable (if at times slightly forced) charm, humour and spirit. For once, this Viola makes a very plausible-looking twin to Christopher Hollis's Sebastian.

Sheridan Morley (review date 16 December 1987)

"If music be the food of love, play on" is arguably the most famous and oft-quoted opening line in all Shakespearian comedy. It takes, therefore, a certain amount of courage to start Twelfth Night without it, or indeed that whole first scene. Instead, Kenneth Branagh's new production at Riverside Studios plunges us straight into scene two and Viola's shipwrecked arrival: "What country, friends, is this?" "This is Illyria, lady" but it is like no Illyria we have ever seen before. Far from any seashore, all later references to May mornings and sunshine ignored, we would appear to be deep in some park surrounding Anton Chekhov's winter residence. There, taking the play's title quite literally, the designer Bunny Christie offers us snowflakes, half-ruined statues, immense gothic tombstones and a generally ravishing if melancholic landscape apparently only waiting for someone to come and paint it as a Victorian Christmas card.

Through the snowflakes wander Aguecheek and Toby Belch and Maria and Feste and Fabian, not figures of the usual slapstick fun but poets and dreamers and losers apparently all in search of Vanya or at any rate the next train to Moscow: at any moment you expect to hear the fall of trees in some distant cherry orchard. This may not, therefore, be a Twelfth Night to appeal to Shakespearian purists: but it is one of the most thoughtful and beautiful of recent years, characterised by a haunting new score by Paul McCartney and Pat Doyle and crowned by a Malvolio from Richard Briers which is far and away the most comically tragic since Olivier played the role at Stratford all of thirty years ago.

Mr Branagh has all kinds of other ideas about the play: Orsino eventually gets his opening scene, albeit in flash-back, and we then get a dropout hippie Feste (Anton Lesser), a Viola (Frances Barber) who is alone the pure innocent abroad in a park where all are trying to betray her, a bully-boy Fabian (Shaun Prendergast) and a Belch/Aguecheek (James Saxon and James Simmons) double-act thin, enough to hide behind the Christmas tree which masks them from Malvolio.

Everything about this production suggests that the actors are back in charge, and that what they have done under Branagh's leadership for his own Renaissance company is to restructure an all-too-familiar text locate a palm court trio high above the stage and then go to work on an immensely intriguing collection of character studies. True, the Olivia and the Orsino are a little nondescript, and there are moments towards the end when invention and courage seem to flag, but that is a small price to pay for the realisation that Malvolio goes within an act from comic fool to tragic victim, so that his final off-stage scream of revenge is worthy of Lear, or that Viola alone retains awareness of a world elsewhere, far removed from all these manic Chekhovian romantic defeatists. It is a rare and wondrous Christmas treat: hasten along, as they close it in mid-January.

H. R. Woudhuysen (review date 18-24 December 1987)

It is ten to eight in Illyria, snowing, and Christmas is well under way. There are plenty of drinks and jokes, a tree and presents, as well as songs and hangovers. The twelve days of Christmas pass; there is more snow; time untangles the lovers' knot and Malvolio swears his revenge: it is still ten to eight on the grandfather clock. So many things have happened: the usual family rows and disagreements, barely suppressed jealousies and resentments, choice specimens of bad behaviour and semi-private romantic intrigues are all remembered through a haze of drinks which satisfy various appetites; Christmas has come and gone again, but clock-time for once has stood still. Illyria is not hot and sunny, but neither is it really cold. It has that warm dampness that comes with snow—a place somewhere between laughter and tears, but which is never merely sentimental.

The country has its large houses for Orsino and Olivia, but its only visible part is an iron-gated graveyard, broad enough for the Duke to feed his melancholy love, Olivia to mourn her dead father and brother, and where her Steward can be imprisoned and tormented within a convenient tomb. Illyria is not quite Victorian England but very like our Dickens-inspired idea of it: black, formal clothes, stiff, formal behaviour covering a world of restrained erotic desire and unrestrained imaginative power: not the Dickens of Pickwick or A Christmas Carol but of Bleak House and Little Dorrit, where secrecy and tragedy will eventually give birth to revelation and joy.

The pleasure principle lies firmly behind Kenneth Branagh's production of Twelfth Night, resulting in a carefully measured reading of the play which brings out its irresistible charm, without suppressing its undeniable awkwardnesses and strangeness. This is deliberately emphasized by reversing the order of the play's first and second scenes, making Viola's resolution to serve Olivia even more abrupt and lacking in credibility than Johnson found it to be. Branagh is well served by a young Viola (Frances Barber) and an attractive Olivia (Caroline Langrishe). Most of all, he has a first-rate Maria (Abigail McKern), who moves convincingly between her mistress and the five satellites of the household. This quintet, Belch, Ague-cheek, Malvolio, Maria and Feste, come perilously close to taking the play over, so assured and well worked are their performances. Indeed, in a sense, Twelfth Night offers less to the actors playing the four lovers (especially to the Duke and Sebastian) than it does to Olivia's house-hold. James Simmons and James Saxon as the thin man and the fat man, with Anton Lesser's sinister, long-haired Feste, under the supervision and direction of the expert Maria, are a real match even for Richard Briers's superb Malvolio. Briers creates a painfully credible Steward, in turns pathetic and hateful, both Uriah Heep and Mr Guppy, cruelly abused but, we feel, badly in need of some pain and humiliation.

It is no mean achievement to create a Twelfth Night which so successfully evokes and captures the moment and mood of the play. This is partly made possible by the production's well-judged lighting, but more is contributed by pleasing music written by Pat Doyle and Paul McCartney and played by a quartet of musicians (piano, cello, horn and timpani), who are on stage throughout the production, discreetly hidden by some bare trees. Perhaps the only disappointment of an evening otherwise completely without vulgarity, is Feste's singing in an American folk-song drone. But this is only a small failing in a production which fulfils most of what one wants and always hopes for from the play.

Kenneth Hurren (review date February 1988)

Confronted with the business of reviewing yet another production of Twelfth Night, which sometimes seems to occur about every three or four weeks. I have often thought to fill up a bit of the space by detailing the plot. Not in this journal, of course, but there are other readerships that must be constantly irked by reviewers' assumption that everyone is as familiar with Shakespeare's plots as they are. I have felt it would be helpful to these happy illiterates to distinguish, at least, between the two great transvestite comedies—Twelfth Night, whose heroine passes herself off as a boy so successfully that another woman falls in love with her, and As You Like It, whose heroine passes herself as a boy so successfully that even the man who has already fallen in love with her can't tell the difference.

The great kindness of this would ordinarily be to protect the innocent: it is a terrible thought that they should find themselves unwittingly exposed to Sir Toby Belch and his cronies when the worst they had mistakenly expected was Touchstone. But, as it happens, that would not be so terrible in the case of Kenneth Branagh's production. God knows, the low-comedy crew attached to Olivia's house-hold cannot be other than painful, and the more their 'business' is elaborated the worse they become. Here they are judiciously subdued. They go through the necessary motions of the Malvolio jest, but are otherwise handled with a discretion that precludes their actually becoming an active nuisance.

What a remarkable talent is amongst us in young Branagh. I begin to think there has not been such a boy wonder since Orson Welles. Not only is he one of the finest actors of his generation, he also writes plays (not, so far, with spectacular success, but that will may come), has formed his own Renaissance Theatre Company which has three major Shakespearian productions on its agenda in the next few months, and he directs—with, it may be said on the evidence of this Twelfth Night, considerable distinction.

This is quite the most enjoyable production of the comedy I have seen for decades, and it is achieved with, by today's lights, a merciful minimum of innovative 'interpretation' and wayward eccentricity. There are, to be sure, one or two aspects that may disconcert pedantic purists. The first two scenes, for example, are transposed—but that, I am persuaded, is advantageous to the flow of the narrative. And all is set outdoors in winter, which is less defensible when there is reference to 'midsummer madness' while snow is perversely falling; but anyway it makes for a pretty and seasonable setting (stunningly designed by Bunny Christie, with the residences of Orsino and Olivia at opposite sides of a white winter-garden with graveyard statuary, and a quartet of Spartans on the terrace to provide the music) and allows the conspirators to bring on a portable Christmas tree to hide behind in Malvolio's letter scene.

The costumes are vaguely Victorian, which seems odd when we come to the Viola-Aguecheek sword duel, but any tetchy criticism of period anachronisms is disarmed by the otherwise incongruous presence under a leafless tree of a grandfather clock, its hands stationary while the comedy's fancies and fantasies are enacted during some wondrous breathing-space in the history of the world.

All would be lost, of course, if the performances did not match the conception. Happily, they do; and while the Malvolio of Richard Briers is as fine a realisation of that famous role you could wish to see, encompassing all the gravity and absurdity of the man's pretensions with the confident technique of a superb comic actor and catching as well the touching pathos of his humiliation, it never unbalances the play into a one-man show. The wit and style of Frances Barber's Viola, the cool passion of Caroline Langrishe's Olivia, the dark hint of sadness in Anton Lesser's vagabond Feste, the sprightliness of Abigail McKern's piquant Maria, and indeed a cast without a single damaging weakness see to that.

Jill Pearce (review date April 1988)

The newly-formed Renaissance Theatre Company was launched in style at the Riverside Studios with a sell-out run of Twelfth Night, directed by Kenneth Branagh and produced by David Parfitt, who together direct the new company. Other interesting productions to be taken on tour in 1988 are Much Ado About Nothing (director, Judi Dench), Hamlet (Derek Jacobi), and As You Like It (Geraldine McEwan—who was taking a keen interest in Twelfth Night the evening we were there).

This was a very brightly-lit seasonal Twelfth Night with a Christmas tree used to hide the conspirators from Malvolio. The very wide stage at the Riverside Studios was unobtrusively broken up into different areas, and yet the size was also exploited cleverly (designer, Bunny Christie). On the left, a white door with steps leading up to it was used to great effect as the entrance to Olivia's house, while on the right, an ironwork fence and white backcloth gave an effective final exit to Malvolio, whose vow to be revenged on the whole pack of them could be heard as he made his way out of the green garden gate and down the path. A four-piece orchestra, set on a raised dais left stage, provided accompaniment to the songs, reworked by the Renaissance Company composer and musical director, Pat Doyle, in collaboration with Paul McCartney. Centre stage was dominated by a snowy cemetery, one of whose vaults provided Malvolio's prison. A ramp led up to a throne-like chair, perched in isolation, where Orsino was first to be seen, listening to the music, while the opening scene of the play, brought forward, was Viola's arrival in Illyria.

The costume was late nineteenth-century, and for the most part the colours were subdued greys, black and white. James Simmons as Aguecheek added a touch of colour when he appeared in full regimental uniform to fight his reluctant duel, and James Saxon as Sir Toby Belch was also more colourfully attired, although his performance was somewhat subdued. Maria (Abigail McKern) was seen to be the only driving force behind the conspiracy against Malvolio and rather overdid the merriment on observing the results of her efforts. Shaun Prendergast, pitching his voice very high, was good as Fabian. One only caught a brief glimpse of Viola (Frances Barber) in her maiden's weeds before she reappeared as Cesario, tightly buttoned into a three-piece suit to conceal a somewhat buxom figure. Her appearance was a little incongruous in the romantic lyrical part of her role with the melancholy and good-looking Orsino of Christopher Ravenscroft falling for her as heavily at the end as the beautiful and lively Olivia of Caroline Langrishe had earlier. However, it went well with Cesario's pert manner when trying to manage the recalcitrant Olivia. Christopher Hollis make a credible Sebastian and Tim Barker a sinister Antonio with a terrible birthmark. Anton Lesser played Feste as a gipsy with long tangled locks and ragged clothes, frequently swigging from a flask and always seemingly in the angry stage of drunkenness. It was an interpretation too heavy on the cynicism—the lines, We are some of her trappings … were uttered with venomous hatred—and it was at odds with the gentle melancholy of the songs which he sang in-differently.

The gem of the evening was Richard Briers' Malvolio. A centre parting and false teeth made it hard to recognize this well-known comic actor as he stepped out of Olivia's house and paused on top of the steps to dazzle us with his amazing smile. Everything about his performance was impeccable, his strut, timing, peevish manner, voice and measured speech and above all the dignity he maintained when he emerged dishevelled and ridiculed from his prison. He even managed to look dignified when he appeared in night-gown and Wellington boots to remonstrate with the carousing Toby Belch and company. He must rate as one of the great Malvolios.

It would certainly have been worth seeing this Twelfth Night for Malvolio alone, but other aspects will make it memorable, in particular, the effective wintry set.

PRODUCTION:

Peter Hall • Playhouse Theatre •1991

BACKGROUND:

Eschewing a recent trend that emphasized the ideological potential of the theatre, Hall presented Twelfth Night without imposing contemporary political and social concerns on the narrative. Critical opinion varied markedly as to the success of Hall's approach. Peter J. Smith argued that the production "failed to satisfy," despite having "captured both the magic and the melancholy of the script." Similarly, Eric Sams maintained that the staging was hampered by a lack of direction. Bernard Levin, by contrast, lavishly praised Hall's shaping of the drama, making particular mention of the cast's sensitivity to Shakespearean diction. Hall set the play in the Caroline period, and the stage designs presented an Illyria that Christopher Edwards described as a "glorious autumnal prospect—apple trees and falling brown leaves—which dips down to a stretch of mist-shrouded water." Among the performances, Eric Porter's Malvolio proved the subject of controversy. Irving Wardle, for example, maintained that nobody would shed any tears for Porter's "fatuously capering Malvolio," while Michael Coveney took the contrary position that "there is simply no better Malvolio in the world than Eric Porter." While this staging pleased audiences, critics such as Roy Walker voiced certain objections: "This was a Twelfth Night that did not altogether succeed, but a production that continually threw fresh light on a comedy about which most of us have long ceased to think freshly." The cast further included Dinsdale Landen as Sir Toby Belch, Richard Garnett as Orsino, Sara Crowe as Olivia, Maria Miles as Viola, and David Ryall as Feste.

BACKGROUND:

Benedict Nightingale (review date 1 March 1991)

Not long ago Twelfth Night was regarded as Shakespeare's most serene comedy. Then the scholars remembered that the great tragedies came only a few years later, and began to see darkness, danger and malice behind the play's smiles, and, inevitably, the directors followed. Toby Belch became a horrid, bulbous drone, the practical jokes he plays on Malvolio almost demanded investigation by Amnesty International, and Illyria seemed barely sunnier than Birnam Wood or Dunsinane.

Peter Hall clearly wants to edge back the pendulum. The orange tree in Timothy O'Brien's courtyard set is shedding autumnal leaves David Ryall's clown has his lugubrious moments, but otherwise melancholy is missing. Indeed, Dinsdale Landen's Belch, with his curls, looping moustachios, red Carolean garb and genial grin, seems to be auditioning for a famous painting by Frans Hals. He is not just a laughing Cavalier but a hilariously gurgling one. There is no more meanness in him than might be expected of Santa Claus after a tiring night spent clambering down the world's chimneys.

That is not the only trend Hall challenges. His production rejects the guileful detail, the verbal nuances, the pregnant pauses so beloved of the RSC in particular. That entails some loss (Landen burbles "byarenthrpshrn" for "be yare in thy preparation") but also a new briskness and momentum. Moreover, Hall takes pains to establish points important to the plot usually neglected by super-subtle directors.

Thus Richard Garnett's Orsino clearly feels a half-conscious pull towards Maria Miles's fine, bold Viola. At one moment he actually strokes her chin and kisses her lips. That makes it easier to believe his renunciation of Sara Crowe's pert Olivia for a girl he thought a boy. Again, Martin Jarvis has been encouraged to play Ague-cheek, not as the drip of tradition, but as the "great quarreller" the text calls him.

True, that doesn't explain why he dresses in what I at first mistook for a huge wicker picnic basket but later realised was a yellow plaid blanket that had been converted into knickerbockers stretching up to his wispy off-white hair. The visual impression is of Beckett's crazed Lucky playing celebrity golf. Nevertheless, this incongruous figure has a surly truculence, a macho swagger that for once explains why he is quick to cuff or challenge those he thinks he can beat, such as the "male" Viola.

That leaves what could, should and maybe will be the evening's major performance, Eric Porter's Malvolio. Certainly, his clay-coloured, pock-marked face exudes a wonderfully wintry disdain. Certainly, he twists in plausible glee when upmarket fantasies seize him, and certainly he frisks comically enough in his yellow stockings. But if the idea is to suggest that inside the old, gristly mutton is a lamb, waiting for release, it does not yet come off. His two Malvolios have yet to cohere into one. Time may do it.

Malcolm Rutherford (review date 3 March 1991)

Sir Peter Hall's production of Twelfth Night at the Play-house Theatre is remarkably pretty to look at. The dominant colours in the set are red and green: a tree with bright red apples, the windfalls lying on the grass. Nature spills over into the costumes. Sir Toby Belch appropriately has more than a touch of red about him. There is also the black and yellow of Malvolio.

Other characters are more flaxen. This is late summer or very early autumn. The Playhouse has a very tall stage which lends itself well to this display of colour schemes. There is a shade of opera rather than drama to the production.

Otherwise, this Twelfth Night is uneven. Since Sir Toby is played by Dinsdale Landen and Sir Andrew Aguecheek by Martin Jarvis, those performances at least are very professional. Their singing and drinking scenes are outstanding. The best of the bunch, however, is Feste, the Fool, played by David Ryall. He is older than you might expect, and also wiser. This is the first time that I have seen the Fool as the central figure in the play.
The main weakness among the performances is Sara Crowe's Olivia. Ms Crowe is the actress who recently played Sybil alongside Joan Collins's Amanda in Noel Coward's Private Lives and was widely praised for making so much of the part. Here she is a pouting, petulant spoiled child who looks and talks like a dumb blonde. Since we know that she can act and speak perfectly well, the blame cannot fairly be placed on her. Playing the role this way can only have been imposed from the top. The result is pointlessly perverse, mildly irritating and should be corrected.

Malvolio, played by Eric Porter, has his moments. He is especially good when reflecting on his social ambitions before finding the near-fatal fake letter. Yet I wonder if I am alone in finding some aspects of Shakespeare's comedies increasingly unsympathetic. The maltreatment of Malvolio, which starts as a joke but degenerates, is offensive to our age.

The current English Shakespeare Company's production of The Merchant of Venice tries to get round this kind of problem by being as sympathetic as possible towards Shy-lock. I suspect that Peter Hall is trying the same approach by being kinder than usual to Malvolio in his opening scenes. There are limits, however, to how far you can play against a text that is not overflowing with the milk of human kindness.

It is also possible, judging by this production, that Hall thinks that Twelfth Night really would be better as an opera. I am not at all sure that he is wrong. The twins, Sebastian and Viola, could just as well step out of Mozart. The brilliant designing and lighting are done by Timothy O'Brien and Rick Fisher respectively, both of whom, like Hall, have considerable opera experience. Their work here would look very good at Glyndebourne.

Irving Wardle (review date 3 March 1991)

Anyone who has kept up with the Shakespearian repertory over the past 15 years will have noticed a gradual erosion of the old boundary between the "dark comedies" and their popular counterparts. As You Like It now plunges the pastoral refugees into worse conditions than those they left behind; Much Ado About Nothing celebrates the union of two dislikeable, sharp-tongued wall-flowers, while Twelfth Night has been all but engulfed in cruelty, pain, and the sense of mortal transience.

Peter Hall's production calls a halt to this process. Nobody will shed any tears for Eric Porter's fatuously capering Malvolio; or recoil from the sadistic brutality of Dinsdale Landen's relentlessly genial Sir Toby. The show is out to reclaim the play's lost territory. It does nothing to gratify the critical appetite for ugly secrets; but I think it will please a lot of spectators.

Hall takes his cue not from the middle-period dark comedies but from the late romances. What he emphasises most is the story of a tortuous journey towards a long-desired reunion. Viola, a creature of the sea, continues her voyage on land; and if, as a heroine, she does little to navigate her own course, it is because she is no match for the surrounding elements. When John Caird directed the play in the early 1980s he set it on a desolate promontory and underscored the action with lavishly orchestrated sea music. Hall reduces the music (by Stephen Edwards) to a string motif that recurs like a distant memory, and opts for a masque-like setting—a formal park overcast with cypresses (by Timothy O'Brien) where the Caroline velvets and satins glint darkly as in a Watteau fête champêtre.

The mood is melancholy without becoming oppressive, and responsive to delicate atmospheric shifts. Orsino (Richard Garnett) languishes through the opening scene to an onstage lute number which then mingles with the sea music as the castaways crawl ashore: thus the show distinguishes from the outset between narcissistically self-induced emotion and the feelings of the heart. Melancholy evaporates like the sea-mists when Toby is trucked on, a scarlet hogshedd boozing in his half-timbered inglenook; but once Feste joins the party with "O mistress mine", his oafish listeners, too, are overcome with a shared sense of loss and regret.

Otherwise, their usual relationship is reversed. Landen plays a perpetually beaming Toby to a truculent Ague-cheek (Martin Jarvis) who is always looking for a pretext to draw his sword; which pays handsome dividends when he arrives at the duel scene. There is not much depth in the comic partnerships: Aguecheek is spared his erotic humiliations, and Maria (Diane Bull) is simply a bundle of fun with no evident marital designs on Toby. But that way darkness lies.

The spirit of the show resides in the casting of the remaining four principals so as to contrast youth with age. Maria Miles's gamely cherubic Viola and Sara Crowe's virginally strangulated Olivia are at the beginning of their emotional lives: Porter's grizzled Malvolio and David Ryall's wearily laconic Feste at the end of theirs. It takes some believing when the stately Porter erupts into a last tango for a partner who could be his granddaughter; but at least he emerges as the production's supreme victim of erotic delusion. Ryall, who controls the house with his songs and abandons his gags as a lost cause, appears to be savouring the human comedy from long distance; and then, from the Sir Topaz scenes, moves into action as the cruelllest character in the piece. Hall has preserved one small area of darkness.

Michael Coveney (review date 3 March 1991)

It would be charming, but dishonest of me, to be complimentary about Twelfth Night at the Playhouse, the theatre you can never quite find near Charing Cross. There is simply no better Malvolio in the world than Eric Porter, who repeats the silkily incensed Puritan he first launched in the RSC's very first season in 1960 and repeated, more gustily, at the ill-fated St George's in Tufnell Park some years ago.

But all the rest is not so much dire as dull. This can be the most tedious of comedies if played without sex appeal and inventive comic inflection. It is here played without sex appeal and inventive comic inflection, although it is seductively designed by Timothy O'Brien. Sara Crowe's Olivia talks in a curdled, irritating voice similar to the one she employed in her over-praised Private Lives role. I would hate to think that she might talk like this all the time, but I am beginning to worry since seeing her performance in the television ads for soft cheese. What country, friends, is this? This is Philadelphia, lady.

The purplish red leaves of the garden tree are picked out in the costume of David Ryall's incipiently ancient, foot-sore Feste, an admirably painstaking performance. Maria Miles is Viola, and is excellent in the first scenes, tolerably delightful in the wooing by proxy, competent in the farcical byways. But you have to love Viola, or at least get to know her, and Miss Miles is miles away. Dinsdale Landen plays Sir Toby as a laughing, snorting cavalier, and Martin Jarvis is a traditional Aguecheek.

Peter Lindford makes something positive of Sebastian, no mean feat, and David Hargreaves is an honest, nautical Antonio, living up to the 'notable pirate' tag. Rick Fisher's lighting is haphazard, but Diane Bull's Maria is anything but.

John Peter (review date 3 March 1991)

Sir Peter Hall's new production of Twelfth Night (Playhouse) is a labour of love, but I do not mean that as a compliment. Hall last directed this play in Stratford 31 years ago: the brilliant 29-year-old who had just founded the RSC and set out to rediscover, underneath Shakespeare the Romantic poet, Shakespeare the hard-headed political writer, the ruthless psychologist, the ironic joker. I saw that first Twelfth Night as a young student and still remember its irresistible freshness, its vigour and its hard but generous humour. Hall showed you precisely how the exquisite lyricism was constantly being undercut by irony: how people laughed through other people's tears.

He now revisits the play in a spirit of uncritical generosity. It unfolds like a Caroline idyll, bathed in soft light and melancholy music. Orsino is a lovesick cavalier whose longings have no subtext: you would never think, from Richard Garnett's statuesque performance, that all this poetic elegance is meant to cover up a heavy streak of exhibitionism and self-pity. Dinsdale Landen's Sir Toby comes on twinkling and rubicund, like Frans Hals's Laughing Cavalier, lovably tipsy: you would never think that the man was a professional sponger who was busy fleecing Aguecheek, almost playing Iago to his Roderigo.

Aguecheek is thus reduced to a comic; and perhaps because he has little to press and fight against, Martin Jarvis turns in a most uncharacteristically actorish performance. I liked Sara Crowe's spoilt, petulant Olivia at first, but she has none of the gravitas of a great lady (which would make her situation even funnier), and I did not think that her cutglass voice was always fully under control.

Eric Porter's Malvolio is quite another matter. This is an authentic Shakespearian victim, sombrely conscious of his status, unaware of mockery, analysing the famous letter like a Foreign Office mandarin studying a coded diplomatic message, the melancholy prune face cracking into a pitiful smile. The other gem of the production is Maria Miles, whose Viola is a troubled adolescent, both innocent and touchingly calculating, taking her first steps into adult-hood as if it were a minefield. During Feste's song, Orsino casually takes her hand: Miles's face is a study in pain which is only just beginning to be understood.

Yes, this play is a cruel romance, a comedy with real tears. But the production as a whole has a decorous, nostalgic air about it, as if Hall had met a long-lost friend and decided not to remember his faults. You hardly ever feel that anyone could get hurt. It leaves you emotionally safe—and, no Shakespeare play should ever do that.

Christopher Edwards (review date 9 March 1991)

Peter Hall has directed a charming, intelligent and enjoyable production of Twelfth Night. These qualities, by themselves, may not satisfy the dwindling band of diehards pursuing novelty or deeply topical reinterpretations of Shakespeare. Feste is not projected as a proto-Green, nor is Malvolio a Shi'ite Muslim. Instead, the play's delicate shifting moods and its magnificent language are, on the whole, allowed to operate upon us with a minimum of interference.

Timothy O'Brien has designed a Caroline Illyria. In Orsino's court a chandelier hangs above dark-stained floor-boards. Everyone wears Cavalier costume. Beyond the court is a glorious autumnal prospect—apple trees and falling brown leaves—which dips down to a stretch of mist-shrouded water.

After Orsino's opening, 'If music be the food of love …' (a speech, and indeed a performance, handled with rather too much self-mockery by Richard Gameti), a bedraggled Viola (Maria Miles) emerges from the mist. This young actress is delightful. Fresh, earnest and captivating (the willow-cabin speech is particularly well delivered), she succeeds in retaining her essential femininity while coming across plausibly as a boy.
Sara Crowe's Olivia is the only oddity in the production. She completely upstaged Joan Collins in last year's production of Private Lives, with her performance of Sybil. Everyone said how hilarious she had made Sybil sound with that squealing, scalded, brittle, baby-doll caricature voice she gave her. Oh dear. It seems that the voice belongs to Sara Crowe. Olivia is heavily Sybilised, at some cost to the poise and gravity of her feelings.

Dinsdale Landen is an excellent laughing cavalier of a Sir Toby Belch (although, along with the cakes and ale, he does swallow some of his lines). Huge-bellied, bearded and rubicund, he is content cheerfully to lead Sir Andrew Aguecheek on. Often we are shown a Sir Toby whose love of pleasure has a decidedly malicious bias—not just in the gulling of Malvolio, but in his exploitation of Sir Andrew. Dinsdale Landen does not overdo the malice: he is funny, good company and not particularly nice, except to Diane Bull's spritely Maria. He sees Sir Andrew as a rich twerp and treats him accordingly. The subtle part of Martin Jarvis's portrait of Sir Andrew is that, while retaining the twerpy, he also fleshes out the character's frustration and resentment. His final exit, head broken by Sebastian, rejected by Sir Toby, his amorous designs shot through, is both comical and touchingly dignified.

Eric Porter's Malvolio is one of the most convincing I have seen. His sense of his own importance, flawed though it makes him, has a wonderful kind of integrity about it. Eric Porter is funny enough, but dignified as well. His reading of 'Olivia's love letter is a superb study in self-delusion. I was very impressed too by David Ryall's dry, philosophic Feste. This Feste really has seen it all before, and the experience shows in his manner which manages to sound world-weary while remaining quicksilver. His taunting of Malvolio at the end is cruel enough and the moment when Feste bangs down the trap door on his imploring face is uncomfortable. Malvolio deserves some of his punishment, but he justly complains that he has been 'notoriously abused'. All the same, this prison episode is not handled in a spirit of pointed viciousness. It is this refreshing lack of insistence—of letting the text speak for itself—that helps make the production so enjoyable.

Bernard Levin (review date 23 March 1991)

Others abide our question; thou art free. But for many years now, thou hast been anything but free. When, and how and why, did the modern vogue for buggering Shakespeare about start? More to the point, why do we put up with it? True, we smile tolerantly when we read of the outrages to which he was subjected by 18th century actor-managers; but surely we should have progressed beyond the crudities of earlier times?

Well, we should, certainly, but let me give you a mild example of our modern equivalent of the habit (quite customary two centuries ago) of giving King Lear a happy ending.

Not long ago, there was in London a production of The Merchant of Venice, I do not name the director, for a reason he will spot if he reads on. In the trial scene, an extraneous, almost aleatoric, item was included, which Shakespeare had not written or indicated. Three actors, playing louts, were perched in the gallery of the court, and as Shylock was indicted they chanted, "Jew, Jew, Jew".

Clearly, the director was convinced that audiences had never noticed that Shylock, in the play, is reviled as a Jew; until that pioneering interpolation, they had always been under the impression that he was a rigid Presbyterian and, for good measure, chairman of the Lord's Day Observance Society. It was then that I began to take to Shakespearean performances a rabbit's foot, which I would surreptitiously finger in the dark in the hope (vain, as it turned out) that it might bring me at least as much luck as would be needed to discover which play I was seeing.

A symbol, that; but perhaps a significant one. I could not possibly count my evenings of Shakespeare in the theatre, but it must be many hundreds by now; I think I have not missed a production at either the RSC or the National for many years, and of course I have seen many elsewhere. (I bet I am the only man you know who has seen The Taming of the Shrew in Danish.) And I own to a powerful conviction that the quality of Shakespeare on out stages has declined, and is still declining. I think it is worth wondering why.

I must not recall the past to belabour the present. I am just old enough to have seen Gielgud's last Hamlet and Olivier's Hotspur, and easily old enough to have seen Ashcroft's Cleopatra. On such memories I inevitably dwell; who wouldn't? But I think it is now getting very rare indeed for younger Shakespeare theatre-goers to experience a production or a performance that they will be able to treasure, and to call up at will, for the rest of their lives.

When to the sessions of sweet silent thought
I summon up remembrance of things past.
I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought.
And with old woes new wail my dear times' waste …

Of course, all is not yet lost, as anyone who saw Ian McKellen as Coriolanus recently will agree, but if you did see it and now try to think of a recent half dozen of such memory-catchers, you will, I assure you, be disappointed.

What happened? Naturalism became the watchword, or rather the vogueword, perhaps encouraged by the verismo of directors such as Zeffirelli, Visconti and Strehler in their sensationally successful rescue of Italian opera. It soon conquered the Shakespearean stage; but in so doing it opened the gates to disaster. In no time, declamation was a crime, scansion a disreputable disease, elocution itself was unnecessary—nay, there was no need for all, or even most, of the words to be heard by the audience, provided sufficiently striking things were happening on stage.

Soon, the Royal Shakespeare Company (in one dire season all the players seemed to have been told to talk only out of the corners of their mouths), followed smartly by the National, had added to the belief that audibility was old-fashioned the notion that Shakespeare wrote some lovely lines but didn't really know his job, particularly in the matter of stress and cadence; the former, it was argued, should be used at random, and the second abolished entirely if the audience was to stay awake.

So it went on, year after year, until it seemed that never again would Shakespeare's words take precedence over lesser people's ideas. But hark! Who comes, with drum and fife, to raise the siege? If you are as parched as I am for the real thing that once reigned almost universally, go quickly to the Playhouse, hard by Charing Cross. There you will see that real Shakespeare has not vanished entirely, that there are actors and actresses who not only speak verse as though it is verse but speak it so every word—every single word, I swear—is audible, meaningful and Shakespeare's. For in that theatre, Peter Hall has directed Twelfth Night, and the counter-revolution has begun.

The diction throughout is not just impeccable; Hall has got out of his players a lode of truth by the very sound of the words. Clarity is only the start; every word is caressed and honoured, and the effect is to deepen the joy of the play and the feelings it offers. But the reason it has this effect is that Shakespeare, contrary to the belief widespread in our theatres, knew his job; he knew that if the rhythm in which he wrote was followed, the force of the words would work effortlessly. Is it not shocking that actors and directors putting on Shakespeare today repeatedly reveal that they do not understand that precious rule?

If you think I exaggerate when I commend the scrupulous clarity of these players, I offer you a tiny, infinitely delicate, proof. In Act I, scene 5, Sir Toby Belch is assiduously living up to his name, and after one tremendous eructation he matters as excuse the Une, "A plague on these pickle herring". Dinsdale Landen (a wonderfully crisp as well as ripe performance, remembering, as few Tobys do, that he may be a roistering gentleman but he is a gentleman none the less) speaks the words just as I have printed them. But if you look at the First Folio, you will find that then of "on" is elided; the Urtext has "A plague o'these pickle herring". Thus, Hall and Lansden have given Shakespeare more than he asked for, Can fidelity to an author go further?

I must not give the impression that we are here for a talk on diction; the production, and most of the players, are pure enchantment from the very first moments, as we savour Timothy O'Brien's lovely, simple set and Rick Fisher's magical lighting. But when I said that the counter-revolution is upon us, it was not just a metaphor; Hall's production could indeed set new standards and see them, over time, adopted.

What is so wonderful at the Playhouse is not just the complete absence of the usual anachronistic absurdities and perversions of Shakespeare's words; Hall has taken an immense risk. For the production is well-nigh invisible; when Shakespeare wants a character to move, he or she moves, and everybody else keeps still. When Maria Miles, for instance, a lovely, innocent, bruisable Viola, gets to, "A blank, my lord, she never told her love", she stands still, looks at Orsino, and delivers, without affectation, fidgeting, or wrenching the words the wrong way, let alone speaking the lines while riding a bicycle round the stage. (Her performance was the more creditable for the fact that she was suffering from an appalling cold. Why wasn't she bundled off home and put to bed? I would willingly have brought her orange-juice and read to her.)

Or Aguecheek; Martin Jarvis is one of the most interesting I have ever seen, but it is hard to say why, until you sit back and realise that he simply takes each word and squeezes ripe juice out of it, thus demonstrating that if you trust Shakespeare he will never let you let you down. The same goes, even more strongly, for David Ryall, a sad and autumnal, though never cynical, Feste; I have never known an audience so turned completely to stone for the final song. As for Eric Porter, this truly great actor has seized Malvolio as firmly as Olivier did, and gives the part not just three dimensions but four.

But I said that Hall had taken a risk; where lies it? Read the reviews and you will know. The tone is generally of disappointment; the clue lies in the use by more than one critic of the word dull. But it is not Hall's work that is dull; they have been dulled by what they have seen and heard for so many years, until they cannot see authenticity and beauty if it is quiet and simple and real and pure and faithful to Shakespeare. Let them revisit to the Playhouse, where their eyes, and ears, may be opened whereupon the repentant sinners could help further the revolution. To the barricades! To the barricades!

Eric Sams (review date 29 March 1991)

Surprisingly, and disappointingly, this production lacks direction. Its aim is plain, and deserving of applause; let Shakespeare speak, without superimposed interpretation. The play itself, from its first line to its last, pleads for just such a performance. It avowedly strives to please us by presenting love and drama in terms of music, of which we can also make what we will. For this purpose, Peter Hall eschews both the broad approach of the English Shakespeare Company and the subtler individual detail of its Royal counterpart. His musical models are neither choral works nor Lieder but Mozart operas; in theory, the perfect paradigm for the exposition and resolution of sexual ambiguities and tensions. At The Playhouse, the actual onstage music is minimal, if not minimalist; but the quasi-musical effects are pervasive. Thus Maria Miles, who has an occasional twinkle of star quality, inserts a deliberate pause before each of her set speeches, as if to introduce a Viola solo. The three merry men in the caterwauling scene are arranged as an operatic trio. Above all, the dénouement works wonders by stage grouping and delivery. Against the background of real ungrudging reconciliation, as in Figaro and Cosi, the added theme of revenge strikes a painfully jarring and unresolved discord. The great era of Shakespearean tragedy is waiting round the corner, out of sight.
So, sadly, is much of this comedy. As yet, the company is hardly an entity, let alone a unity; and it achieves no more than a good concert performance, in which the artists address the audience. In consequence there is too little sense of the required interplay within the play. The characters fall in or out of love with themselves instead of each other; so no independent dramatic world is created except by individual effort, which is fitful. The steadiest highlight is Eric Porter's Malvolio, whose malevolence is not merely nominal. His study could achieve greatness, if it were more strongly supported by stage action and reaction. But his tormentors are unhelpfully lightweight. Dinsdale Landen offers too much literal Belch and not enough poetic Sir Toby; that malicious mischiefmaker is concealed in a cozy Santa Claus character and costume. No one could have guessed from Diane Bull's Mrs Mopp impersonation that Maria is a gentlewoman, still less the brains behind the counterfeit-letter plot. Martin Jarvis makes an intelligent Aguecheek, which is a genuine achievement; but that paradox proves impossible to sustain. The glum laughter and sad clowning of David Ryall's Feste, on the other hand, are convincing enough; but his dry, throwaway style of singing does little for lyricism in Illyria. Sara Crowe's amorous metamorphosis from dark mourning into bright morning is well effected, with the help of costume and lighting changes. But neither aspect of Olivia makes any special appeal to Richard Garnett's Orsino, who seems strangely serene for so desperately frustrated a lover. His philosophical reading remains unperturbed even when his page turns into a woman before his eyes. As her non-identical twin brother Sebastian, Peter Lindford makes the most of his part; so does David Hargreaves, who for some brief but compelling moments not only holds but dominates the stage as the sea-captain Antonio.

Of course there is much else to admire and relish, including many a deft directorial touch if no very strong or consistent grasp. The design and décor are unobtrusively expressive and relevant; the autumnal setting of flamecoloured foliage with a hint of frost to follow, and the alternation of smoky mists with sunny radiance, are modestly yet memorably managed. But where are the expected fire and warmth?

Peter J. Smith (review date October 1991)

In its potted history of the Playhouse Theatre, the programme boasts that 1988 was the year in which "Jeffrey Archer, politician, novelist and playwright, acquires the controlling interest in the Playhouse". For those on the Left in England, Archer's threefold description might sound slightly exaggerated, perceived, as he is, as a Tory-party fundraiser and writer of potboilers, but, be that as it may, he is now the controlling share-holder in a newly reopened theatre.

Archer's theatre houses everything one might expect. Gaggles of beautifully turned-out public-school children, besuited businessmen and furred, ostentatiously encrusted, and almost unfeasibly hugely shoulder-padded women. At the risk of sounding like Jimmy Porter, there is something about this kind of theatre that smacks unembarrassedly of privilege. "From 1991", the programme triumphs, "the Playhouse will be the home of the Peter Hall Company". Twelfth Night is then the company's first production in its new venue and, fittingly, it seemed to espouse the values and the ethos of the Playhouse itself.

Along with the iconoclastic revaluation of Shakespeare in academic circles, Shakespearean production has also altered. Companies like the English Shakespeare Company with their full-time commitment to educational backup and the even more theatrically radical Cheek by Jowl, treat these plays as vehicles for discussing political and social issues as inseparable from theatrical ones. Theatre, as it was in Shakespeare's own day is, once again, inherently ideological. This approach is anathema to Hall and consequently his Twelfth Night is a production that is about thirty years out of date.

Recently, Hall's predilection has been for the Caroline period. Like all of his late plays at the National in 1988, this new Twelfth Night was full of Van Dyke figures. Richard Garnett's Orsino looked like the fated king himself with long hair and sharp beard. The Caroline setting made stage sense in as much as Viola and Sebastian were allowed to look strikingly similar, in long feathered hats and pantomime boots, but apart from this, one is tempted to make a connection between the self-indulgence of the Caroline court and the escapist and essentially mystical tone of the production itself. Hall's attitude to the Bard is that of the 'enlightened' Caliban to Prospero—respect and absolute trust; indeed, at times, this Twelfth Night was close to an act of blind faith. Hall's ethereal production was underscored throughout by the sounds of the waves' repeated fresh collapse (as Larkin has it) and the atmospheric music of Stephen Edwards which, reminiscent of the work of Brian Eno, comprised synthesised tonal impulses rather than melodies.

Timothy O'Brien's set was, like the costumes, full of rich colours. The cyclorama was suitably marine blue, while Illyria was composed (almost compost) of deep autumnal reds and browns. Rick Fisher's lighting was warm and comforting. Benevolence and reconciliation seemed to be watchwords. Sara Crowe's beautifully youthful Olivia languished on a floral swing as her ladies swept up around her and Garnett's gracefully refined Orsino indulged himself in his rich language while a cavalier lutenist (Robin Jeffrey) played live music in the background. Garnett's performance was the best of the evening. He caressed Cesario's cheek as he noted that all is semblative a woman's part and inclined his head to kiss 'him' in response to the page's story of his lovesick sister. The delicate homoeroticism of the relationship was touchingly conveyed and the Count's abrupt return to male bravado in response to Cesario's question, Sir, shall I to this lady? was a fitting mixture of egocentricity and pragmatism, Ay, that's the theme. The impetuosity and self-pity were galvanised into dangerous wrath in the final scene as he threatened first the countess and then his page with a wildly flourishing dagger.

Against what was for the most part a lingering mildness were set the figures of Eric Porter's Malvolio and David Ryall's Feste. The former's was a disappointingly undistinguished performance from a rightfully distinguished actor. One of the major focuses of the play was, here, transformed into a mere foil for the malevolence of Belch and Fabian. There was little in the way either of Malvolio's withering condemnation of the drunks or of a pathos which he so often attracts when incarcerated and taunted by the oxymoronic Sir Topas. The box tree scene was the most subdued I have ever seen and the audience found Maria's later hysteric about the approach of the cross-gartered and yellow-stockinged steward, a little exaggerated having not been adequately prepared for it earlier.

Feste's motley was faded and tired. He was an old grey fool, a hanger-on (as the play makes clear) from the house-hold of an earlier generation. There was a nice touch as he directed his question to an audience that, as he soon realised, was too new-fangled ever to have heard of his authorities. For what says Quinapalus? he asked us hopefully, before resigning himself to the reality that, as Olivia tells him, his fooling has grown old and people dislike it. His wailing of the songs was melancholic and his final rejection occurred as Olivia rounded on him, blaming him for the torture of Malvolio. She drew herself up and shouted at Feste, He hath been most notoriously abused. Like Falstaff, Feste was finally outcast by the court and he retreated into his doomed and pathetic final song, beating his tabor faster and faster to simulate the increasing rainfall.

Aguecheek, played by Martin Jarvis, was an interesting and original, if not entirely successful, version. This Andrew was blustering, crotchety, crossly-assertive and thoroughly dislikable. Even his usually pathetic I was adored once too, was issued here as a challenge or a "So there!" rather than as a piteous lamentation. Andrew, in daft yellow checked culottes and huge yellow hat which he snatched off and hid behind his back when Maria told them that yellow is a colour [Olivia] abhors, was closer to Belch's description of him as an ass-head, and... a thin-faced knave than usual. Dinsdale Landen's Belch with his falstaffian twinkling eye was both corpulent and competent, but, as with Porter's Malvolio, he brought nothing of great interest to the role. His drunken stagger, his stage belching (a plague o'these pickle-herring) and his phallic business with his walking stick, as he jokes about the housewife taking Andrew between her legs and spinning off his hair, were all features of the knight I had seen before, though at Sneck up, Belch wittily and irreverently lifted Malvolio's nightshirt on the end of his cane. Maria (Diane Bull) broke down during the taunting of Malvolio the madman and this gave real force to the desire of Toby to be well rid of the business.
One of the central problems of the production, for this reviewer, was the woeful undercasting of Viola (Maria Miles). There was no time, in her performance, for Viola to think. Olivia drew back her veil and asked if her face was not well done. Viola's double-edged response was instantaneous, Excellently done [no pause] // God did all. When Malvolio offered her the ring that she had apparently just left with his lady, there was not a glimmer of recognition that Olivia had engineered the gift as a sign of her burgeoning attraction to the page. She took the ring of me, I'll none of it, followed too fast upon Malvolio's lines. Viola's resignation to the constructive forces of time (thou must untangle this, not I) was again wasted—shouted straight up into the flies rather than thought through. Indeed, Miles had a tendency throughout to shout and lacked the verbal modulation and the intelligence that make Viola such an adroit personality.

Hall's Twelfth Night is at home in the Playhouse. It looked superb and its richly indulgent and autumnal spirit captured both the magic and the melancholy of the script. The production though somehow failed to satisfy; fundamentally, it was unchallenging—accomplished, detailed and consummate but unmoving, without verve and, at times, tired. At its most basic, the problem is this: that Hall's crafted professionalism is not all that interesting to watch and it is a problem of which the Peter Hall Company will have to take account whether it finds its new roost in Archer's well-feathered nest or elsewhere.

PRODUCTION:

Ian Judge RSC 1994

BACKGROUND:

Judge's 1994 RSC production was faulted by several critics for a lack of depth, though it charmed the majority of commentators with what Irving Wardle termed its "fresh and truthful detail." The set design featured a wintry Jacobean representation of the city of Stratford-upon-Avon itself. Judge explained: "When I look through the hedges of New Place or sit in the gardens of Hall's Croft, I understand Illyria." The director emphasized the comic and wistful nature of the play, thereby softening its melancholic elements. While praising the clever staging of this production, Jackson nevertheless deprecated its lack of "carnival or carnality," arguing that "theatregoers who prefer their comic worlds a little more romantic may find this tame, and it will be too sentimental for those who want more bite in their comedy." Among the performances, commentators generally admired Desmond Barritt's Welsh Malvolio, whom Irving Wardle characterized as "an immobile, puddingy poseur, galvanized into a garter-snapping flasher, and then into a tragic clown, howling frantically in the dark." Additionally, reviewers frequently singled out Derek Griffiths as Feste, Tony Britton as Sir Toby Belch, Clive Wood as Orsino, and Emma Fielding as Viola.

COMMENTARY:

Nicholas de Jongh (review date 26 May 1994)

Although Twelfth Night is Shakespeare's most sexually subversive and ambivalent comedy, most modern directors steer clear of its erotic potential. So it proves in Ian Judge's jovial new production, which plays the broad comedy to the hilt, with picturesque flourishes. The romantic and sexual aspects drift discreetly into the shade.

Not surprisingly then, Judge seizes upon Malvolio, impersonated with dazzling comic buoyancy by Desmond Barritt. The puffed-up Welsh puritan due for his come-uppance is the production's chief example of the self-deceiving and self-unaware.
But the prime sexual business happens elsewhere in the play. Duke Orsino and the Countess Olivia both fall in love at first or second sight with a youth, or rather with Viola, who convincingly passes herself off as male. The aristocrats' wooing ought be comic, ironic and disturbing all in one fell swoop.

But for that to happen, Viola must be played—as in Shakespeare's day—by an actor, or by a thoroughly androgynous actress. The Viola of Emma Fielding—a small girlish figure with matching hair—hardly comes across as boyish, let alone a young man.

So Orsino, to whom a long-haired Clive Wood gives the look of an unromantic lecher and the manner of a flaunting Narcissus, and Haydn Gwynne's anxiously mourning Olivia, do not communicate the play's sense of sexual danger. The notion that love is a game of wild caprice, in which the androgynous win, passes us by.

Miss Fielding, nearly everyone's most promising young thing in 1993, disappoints by suggesting so wanly a Viola awakened to secret love and grief. She reacts with studied calm—and little comedy—to the tentative touchings of duke and countess alike. And there is no feeling of heart-felt discovery, or self-discovery, when at last brought faceto-face with the brother she thought dead. Judge disastrously stages this crucial scene as a display in which they circle each other like a pair of suspicious dogs.

Yet the production is atmospherically powerful and precise. John Gunter, the sumptuous designer, conjures up a Tudor village with distant houses pictured in gloomy mid-winter, decked with evergreen trees and bare branches. And Miss Gwynne's Olivia presides over a household in which Mr Barrit's Malvolio looms as a comic enormity. Acting as foil to Tony Britton's bluff Toby Belch, Joanna McCallum's bland Maria and Bille Brown's over-pantomimic Sir Andrew (silly hat, walk and voice) this lightly-moustachioed Malvolio achieves Lady Bracknell's outrage and the ponderous self-importance of Mr Pooter. He oozes pomposity from every pore until the idea of Olivia's love catches him out.

Then he swaggers on, swathed in masses of black and yellow like a trussed wasp, as he ogles his astonished mistress with a leer-like smile, tongue flicking in and out like a toad. Confronted with the truth, he has all the pathos of a very large balloon, impaled after the party.

This Twelfth Night may make too little of the warning against dangerous romanticism but Barrit's Malvolio lights up the evening and makes it.

Alastair Macaulay (review date 27 May 1994)

Part of what makes young Emma Fielding, the RSC's new Viola in Twelfth Night, so captivating is that she is made up of contrasts. She is elfin, tiny, vulnerable, with vast eyes; and yet she is forthright, living intensely in the moment, with an inquiring little nose that is a vital part of her profile, and an eager stance whereby her weight rests keenly on her toes. This mix of opposites is why she was so heartcatching as Thomasina when Stoppard's Arcadia was new; and no less so in Jonathan Kent's School for Wives at the Almeida.

She is heartcatching again in Twelfth Night. Her voice is deep, strong, firm (though she does not always enter words cleanly enough), until in an instant some new thought renders it high, clear, light. This sudden illumination from within is what makes Olivia lose her heart, when in male disguise Viola tells her that she/he would "call upon my soul within the house … And make the babbling gossip of the air/ Cry out 'Olivia!'" And it is what halts Orsino and confuses him when Viola/Cesario tells him that the history of her father's daughter is "A blank, my lord. She never told her love …"
She is surrounded here by a fine cast, but I am in two minds about the production that frames them. Ian Judge, the director, tells the play's story surely and briskly. Sometimes he is alert to its affecting shadows: the way we see both Viola and her brother Sebastian is potent, as is the moment of their final reunion. Sometimes, however, he treats it like the merest artificial farce. The funereal cypress shadows of the text are absent. And erotic affliction, which so possesses Orsino, Viola and Olivia, is never serious.

Smiling charm abounds. The ending and the curtain calls are as sweetly neat as a chocolate box. John Gunter's Elizabethan scenery is pretty but needlessly symmetrical and boxy: a tourist view of Olde England. And though Nigel Hess has written some fair songs, the taped muzak that he has provided at regular intervals makes Twelfth Night feel like a MGM musical.

That it keeps turning back into a beautiful play, both robust and tender, is largely due to a superb cast. Desmond Barrit's Malvolio, a sour Welsh Frankie Howerd of unusual force, is a triumph of comic self-importance. Liverishly he fantasises about the day-bed "where I have left Olivia" (pause, then, with lascivious delicacy) "sleeping". Bitterly he sobs out "I thank my stars I am happy". Tony Britton makes a touchingly noble Sir Toby Belch. The way he gently plants a line like "She is a beagle" into the still air has the true Twelfth Night magic.

There are excellent moments too from other players, notably Haydn Gwynne's elegant and eloquent Olivia. But the production lets her dwindle into an ignoble silly, and it never lets Bille Brown's Andrew Aguecheek grow from his hilariously absurd beginning into a three-dimensional study of perpetually feckless adolescence. Clive Wood is a commanding Orsino, both virile and narcissistic; but I never believed that either love or music had overwhelmed his senses. As Feste, Derek Griffiths projects his songs clearly; but his voice is far from mellifluous, and his manner the least charming onstage.

I have the same mixed feelings about Ian Judge's Love's Labour's Lost, currently at the Barbican. Truly mixed. In Twelfth Night, I love the way that, in the final scene, he suddenly beclouds the farce with Malvolio's fury. Then, after Barrit has hissed "I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you," the way he wipes a long strand of hair back across his bald pate returns us, ideally, to comedy in an instant.

Just as fine are the thunder and lightning at the end, and the way Maria turns Feste out of doors—where he sings to us of "the wind and the rain". If Judge can build his understanding of these glorious moments into the whole fabric of a play, then he will be a great director of Shakespeare comedy. Right now he is a very good one who is sometimes not good enough.

Paul Taylor (review date 27 May 1994)

No one can work an audience better than Desmond Barrit: he is to engaging camp what a butter mountain is to butter. Whether as Toad in Wind in the Willows or as Brazen in The Recruiting Officer, this gifted, corpulent comedian has the knack of totally winning you round to characters who would otherwise be objectionable. Is this a talent, though, you would wish to see applied to Malvolio, the killjoy steward in Twelfth Night? If the first night audience for Ian Judge's tourist-friendly production is anything to go by, the answer is an overwhelming yes. This, then, is a minority report.

Barrit is, of course, very, very funny. With a mournful Welsh lilt and feeble strands of hair forced, kicking and screaming, across his bald pate, this Malvolio perambulates his massive circumference about in a parade of dignity he cannot possibly bring off. Enjoined to smile more, he practises by pulling his mouth up in a lewd, lopsided pucker, such as might get you arrested, and then remodels it with his fingers into a grimace that merely suggests stark insanity. Barrit's Malvolio takes to the fashion hint about the yellow stockings cross-gartered in a big way, for when he whips off his cape in front of Olivia (Haydn Gwynne) he's a sheer vision in yellow and black—ruff, slops, the lot.

What you don't get, thought, is any real sense of the character's repression or of the danger posed by his interfering zeal. True, many good Malvolios have shown there's a dandy waiting to burst out of the buttoned-up wrappings, but Barrit's version of him seems congenitally stage-struck, which is ironic when you reflect that men of Malvolio's ilk were to close down the theatres only 40-odd years after Twelfth Night's composition.

Instead of conjuring the complex, mixed atmospheres of the play, Judge panders to rudimentary tastes. For example, although Derek Griffiths's Feste sings well, the awful saccharine plaintiveness of the music suggests that this Fool must have been the Johnny Mathis of the Jacobean world. It is haunting, but more like toothache than heart-ache. Like the dinky half-timbered houses in the distance and the utterly palatable drunken disorderliness of Tony Britton's Sir Toby Belch and Bille Brown's Sir Andrew Aguecheek, it would go down a storm, you feel, at Chichester, where they enjoy a challenge about as much as Sir Peter Hall likes rest.

Emma Fielding has some affecting moments as the disguised Viola, although her most touching speech is undercut by the staging. Would a page and master really find themselves both sitting on the latter's bed in their night-clothes like a couple of girls at a stop-over party? And wouldn't Viola's emotional plight be communicated better if you stressed rather than made light of the social constraints? Steven Elliott is allowed to give due emphasis to Antonio's homosexual crush on Robert Bowman's Sebastian, and, near the beginning, we even see this pair dis-gorge, clutching each other, by the storm-tossed sea. For the most part, though, this crowd-pleaser of a production coughs up nothing surprising.

Benedict Nightingale (review date 27 May 1994)

What a delight Ian Judge's production more than compensates for the weird concoction—Orsino's court as Dartmouth Naval College, if you please—that masqueraded as Twelfth Night at this address three years ago.
In Desmond Barrit we have the funniest Malvolio since Donald Sinden back in 1969 and in Emma Fielding as moving a Viola as I have seen since I can't say when. With Toby Stephens's Coriolanus doing wonderfully supercilious things with his nose, chin and voice at the Swan next door, this is proving an encouraging week both for the RSC and for tomorrow's British theatre.

"If music be the food of love, play on, give me excess of it," cries Clive Wood's fine Orsino from his cushions, sounding like a wine-buff who has had to subsist on tap-water for a year. There is plenty of music in this production, and plenty of atmosphere, too. Up goes the vast tapestry that dominates this voluptuous prince's luxurious lair, and suddenly black clouds are scudding, lightning crackling and white billows surging.
Enter Fielding's half-drowned Viola, carried by the sea-captain, and, after they have left, enter her twin brother Sebastian, carried by Antonio.

This last is, of course, interpolated dumb-show. So is the following scene, in which Olivia is seen weeping beside her brother's grave. But Judge's revisionist touches are almost always apt. Most of his production is played against a row of Elizabethan houses, emphasising what the text makes clear, that Illyria is actually Shakespeare's England. Again, extra business prepares us for much that is to come; intimate looks between Belch and Maria, who will marry; a sensual kiss for Viola from her future husband, Orsino; a friendly pat from Olivia for Malvolio, provoking the mad erotic fantasies that doom him.

Barrit's Malvolio trundles on, a lugubrious man-mountain with a face as colourful and alive as a slab of cold veal that has sat too long in the fridge. He catches the frostiness, the solemnity, the vanity, and the exhilaration that eventually bubbles out. When his Malvolio is forcing his lips into something he calls a smile—actually a highly experimental blend of a twisted dinghy and some bared piano keys—he is hilarious. So he is when he is massively pirouetting about in yellow. So he is again and again.

A caveat Barrit slightly over-elaborates some of his comic business, and, maybe as a result does not achieve the pathos he might when his tormentors have trapped him in prison. Elsewhere, too, Judge misses opportunities to show that Twelfth Night, while hardly the darkest of Shakespeare's comedies, is not the lightest either. Bille Brown plays the mincing, prancing, silly-ass Aguecheek of theatrical tradition with great panache; but there is, surely, more to the role. Again, Haydn Gwynne could find more than grace, sweetness and warmth in Olivia.

Still Tony Britton is a strong, gentlemanly Belch—"because thou art virtuous, shall there be no more cakes and ale?" is an outraged cry from the bar of the Athenaeum at some low-church temperance preacher—and Emma Fielding makes an infinitely touching Viola. She will clearly survive all that life throws; and yet, for instance when she sits forlornly gulping as Derek Griffiths's Feste sings of death, she makes you feel it has already thrown a lot.

I don't think I have heard the famous speeches about love delivered with more freshness and candour. This is an actress sure to go far.

Irving Wardle (review date 29 May 1994)

With its cute Warwickshire street scenes (John Gunter) and lush orchestral underpinning (Nigel Hess), Ian Judge's production of Twelfth Night has all the signs of a number one tourist attraction. It also overflows with fresh and truthful detail—beginning, if you please, with a comic Orsino (Clive Wood) whose pretended grand passion collapses in ruins once he meets Viola and experiences the real thing. No wonder, given Emma Fielding's performance, which combines the high romance of a bereaved castaway with a commanding comic attack—as in her peremptory treatment of Olivia (Haydn Gwynne) before submissively modulating into the praise speech.

Where you most expect comedy there are fewer laughs than usual. Neither Bille Browne's ostrich-like Aguecheek nor Tony Britton's over-gentlemanly Toby add much to these outlines, and their drunken party consists of stiffly rehearsed routines with not a drink in sight. But any comic team would probably be eclipsed by Desmond Barrit's Welsh Malvolio: an immobile, puddingy poseur, galvanised into a garter-snapping flasher, and then into a tragic clown, howling frantically in the dark. The show ends with the sight of Feste (an exquisitely melodious Derek Griffiths) being thrown out of the house to sing his last song under the night sky. For once, Malvolio gets his revenge.

Michael Coveney (review date 29 May 1994)

On the main Stratford stage, 'Doctor Feelgood' (Motto: 'Here's some Shakespeare, it won't hurt a bit') strikes again. The director Ian Judge has become the RSC's 'warm glow' specialist, and his Elizabethan, Stratfordian Twelfth Night is a third knockout RSC comedy experience following the surreal Comedy of Errors and the Edwardian Love's Labour's Lost (now running at the Barbican).

Emma Fielding's small, impetuous Viola is magically washed up in a cinematic flood on the shores of Illyria, Warwickshire. John Gunter's beguiling design (with fine costumes by Deirdre Clancy and superb lighting by David Hersey) places Clive Wood's Orsino in a tapestry-walled enclave with candelabra; and Olivia's palace, unambiguously, on Shakespeare's home patch, with a tantalising prospect of the medieval guild chapel, timbered façades of Scholar's Lane and, in the gulling of Malvolio, the barren, wintry flower beds of the knot garden in New Place.

Frost and snow coat the Stratford rooftops. Judge, like Kenneth Branagh in his 1987 Renaissance Theatre production, is mindful of the play's title. The cosiness might be cloying without the sulphurous Welsh Malvolio of Desmond Barrit, for the melancholic strain below stairs is missing to such an extent that when we learn that Sir Toby (Tony Britton) has married Maria (Joanna McCallum), no-one gives hoot.

Despite this vague and regrettable Chichester Festival tendency, Judge supplies several elements missing from recent RSC Twelfth Nights: a Feste, Derek Griffiths, who is a genuine singing clown; an Aguecheek, Bille Brown, who can cut a ridiculous caper; a Viola you can hear; and a Malvolio who is easily the best since Donald Sinden's.

Barrit, in a bald wig smeared with Bobby Charlton-style strands of greasy hair, grinning and cross-gartered in a pair of painfully dainty boots (later spotlit in the prison), appears before the willowy, winsome Olivia of Haydn Gwynne like a huge, flashing bumblebee.

He finds the tragic dimension in the extreme comedy of Malvolio's self-delusion. The misapprehended bedroom invitation propels him across the stage, rolling his tongue lasciviously around his slack chops. The performance is one of abject and hilarious physical decline, scrambling on his knees in a pathetic pout of sensual surrender before quivering in tepid isolation in the cell. The intention of revenge is announced with sad and doleful menace and a defiant gesture of pride as he rearranges a dangling strand across his boiled-egg pate. You laugh, and you cry.

Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 26): Comparisons And Overviews

T. W. Craik (essay date 1975)

[In the following excerpt, Craik comments on Twelfth Night in performance, focusing his attention on various theatrical interpretations of setting, costume, character, and scene.]

The following selective account is concerned, first, with the vicissitudes of Shakespeare's text in the theatre; secondly, with the general history of stage performance, with special reference to setting and costume; and thirdly, with various theatrical interpretations of the play, and of particular scenes and characters.

The only recorded performance of Twelfth Night in Shakespeare's lifetime is that at the Middle Temple on 2 February 1602 witnessed by John Manningham. Performances at court by the King's Men took place on 6 April 1618 (as Twelfth Night) and on 2 February 1623 (as Malvolio). When the theatres reopened after the Restoration, Twelfth Night was in the repertory of D'Avenant's company (the Duke of York's) and was in production by 11 September 1661, when Charles II saw it and Pepys was also in the audience. Pepys saw the play again on 6 January 1663 and 20 January 1669. The performances he saw (no text survives) may have been adapted by D'Avenant. In 1703 Charles Burnaby published his Love Betray'd: or, the Agreeable [sic] Disapointment [sic]; 'Part of the Tale of this Play, I took from Shakespear', he wrote in his preface, 'and about 50 of the Lines', these including the opening words and Viola's image of patience on a monument. His play (which was not a success) is of no importance to the history of Twelfth Night in the theatre (most of Shakespeare's design being changed beyond recognition), though it is of some interest in confirming the un-Shakespearean temper of its time, at least with regard to Shakespearean romantic comedy (Pepys had a low opinion of Twelfth Night). Shakespeare's comedy itself, after a long period of neglect, returned to the London stage in 1741, with Macklin playing Malvolio at Drury Lane, and thereafter it continued to be regularly performed until in 1820 it was again briefly supplanted by a thoroughly altered version, this time a musical production devised by Frederick Reynolds (who had in 1816 and 1819 presented similarly 'operatic' renderings of A Midsummer Night's Dream and The Comedy of Errors); it contained 'Songs, Glees, and Choruses' selected from Shakespeare's other plays and poems and set by various composers, chiefly Henry Bishop, who was responsible for the vocal and orchestral arrangements. Since that time there have been no such thoroughgoing transformations of Twelfth Night, though omissions, additions and transpositions have been frequent. The Clown's songs in II. iii and II. iv, for example, were omitted from Bell's acting edition (printed from prompt-books, 1773-5), along with their context of dialogue, but it is more usual to find them (and others) in unexpected places and sung by unexpected persons. One would nowadays hardly expect Olivia to sing, though in 1771 Mrs Abington did so; still less Sebastian, for whom Henry Bishop supplied a song in 1818 and 1819 (in the 'operatic' age of Reynolds, admittedly). As recently as 1932 Olivia joined the Clown in the final verse of his final song, and in the same production Orsino had 'Come away, death' sung to him in the opening scene (not by the Clown). Acting upon many readers' conviction that because Viola declares in I. ii that she can sing to the Duke she must have been originally intended to do so, Eduard and Otto Devrient gave 'Come away, death' to her in 1893 at Carlsruhe. This change, though I think it mis-conceived, was at least based on a theory of dramatic propriety. The merely ornamental introduction of songs, however—a relic of the 'operatic' period—reappeared as late as Daly's production of 1894, where (in an otherwise wordless scene following III. iv) Orsino's musicians serenaded Olivia with 'Who is Olivia? What is she?' adapted from the serenade to Silvia in The Two Gentlemen of Verona and sung to Schubert's deservedly famous setting. It is true that Daly had here contrived a dramatic and romantic context which may well be defended on its own terms, but his opening of the play, with the two 'shipwreck' scenes II. i. and I. ii preceded by 'Come unto these yellow sands', was an incongruity wholly indefensible.

Songs—omitted, interpolated or transferred—are a relatively unimportant alteration to the text (however seriously they may affect the mood), provided that Shakespeare's dialogue and his scene-order are preserved. Alterations to these, though often made with good intentions or for compelling reasons, are capable of affecting the play more drastically. In fact, the verbal alterations have been few and unobjectionable. One can sympathize with Kemble's excision of 'Castiliano vulgo' from I. iii. 42-3 on the evident grounds of its unintelligibility; one can understand his rewriting of Viola's lines, I. ii. 55-6, as

I'll serve this duke;
Thou shalt present me as a page unto him,
Of gentle breeding, and my name Cesario:—
This trunk, the reliques of my sea-drown'd brother, Will furnish man's apparel to my need, since it gets rid of her embarrassing word 'eunuch', prepares the audience for her assumed name, and undertakes to explain how she came to be dressed just like her brother—though all these points may well be trivial or even superfluous. His omission of her line (v. i. 135)

More, by all mores, than e'er I shall love wife is an interesting pointer to his judgment (he probably thought 'by all mores' an eccentric phrase and the whole line dangerous to the seriousness at which he was presumably aiming in Viola's asseveration of her love for Orsino). Finally, his interpolation later in the same scene (v. i. 385: between 'We will not part from hence' and 'Cesario, come') is specially interesting because it shows his awareness, as a man of the theatre, that Orsino and Antonio must quench their enmity during the final speeches of the play:

—Go, officers, We do discharge you of your prisoner. [Exeunt officers.]

Antonio, thou hast well deserv'd our thanks: Thy kind protection of Cesario's person, Although thou knew'st not then for whom thou fought'st, Merits our favour: Henceforth, be forgotten All cause of anger: Thou hast a noble spirit, And, as Sebastian's friend, be ever near him.—

This production of Kemble's was the first to reverse the order of the first two scenes, a regrettable change often made since, and occasionally found even today. There are at least three reasons why the order of Shakespeare's scenes has been, on various occasions, altered. One is the desire to improve on Shakespeare's dramatic art. A second is the need to get late-comers seated without their or other spectators' missing, or suffering distraction from, the first appearances of the more important characters: thus Daly's 1894 production began with il. i (Antonio and Sebastian) before I. ii (Viola) and I. i (Orsino). A third is the fact that, in the nineteenth-century theatre, relatively un-localized scenes were conventionally presented before a lowered front curtain which was afterwards raised to disclose a representational stage-set (such as Orsino's palace, even though this was required for only forty lines); it was chiefly for this reason that so many productions, from Kemble's time onwards, began with 'What country, friends, is this?—a question to be asked indeed when nothing indicated the answer.

Changes of elaborate scenery (accompanied by many and long intervals) were characteristic of the nineteenth-century theatre; the principal set of Tree's 1901 Twelfth Night was Olivia's terraced garden, copied by Hawes Craven from a picture in Country Life, while Sir Barry Jackson refers to an unspecified production ending with 'a double marriage ceremony in the Illyrian Cathedral'. The basic stage requirements of Twelfth Night are, of course, minimal: no appearances 'above', no 'discoveries' or 'concealments', no trap-door entrances or exits, are called for, and, apart from the 'box tree' where the overhearers hide (II. v) and the exterior of the 'dark room' where the supposedly mad Malvolio is confined 'within' (IV. ii), place never needs to be visually suggested, and stage furniture, if used at all, needs only to be of the most elementary kind. A fundamentalist return to Elizabethan simplicity, as he conceived it, was made by William Poel in 1895. Though coldly received by Max Beerbohm, Poel's similar production of 1903 prepared the way for Granville Barker's of 1912, in which the settings were formal and uncluttered; while the 'twisted pink barley-sugar pillars' of Orsino's palace and the 'Noah's-ark trees' of Olivia's garden might look affected to us today, these settings were well fitted to Barker's sense of dramatic rhythm. Since then, splendour of setting has never been allowed to obstruct the flow of the play. In terms of setting and costume, the theatrical treatment of Twelfth Night has been prevalingly 'Elizabethan'. Wheatley's 1774 drawing of the duel scene (III. iv) shows Fabian wearing the deep lace collar and cuffs of the Caroline period, and Sir Toby in a small ruff, a laced jerkin, and the boots to which he refers in I. iii, though Sir Andrew's dress, apart from ruffles at the wrists and rosettes on the shoes, is that of the 1770s, and Viola's, more ornate and worn under a long cape, is similar, the only Illyrian touch consisting in her turban-like hat with an ostrich plume. The nineteenth century saw a steady movement towards consistency, though Malvolio's cross-gartering was often misinterpreted as extending to his ankles, and though there was a tendency to clothe Viola in a tunic, belted at the waist, such as is shown in many photographs of actresses in the role (a concession, perhaps, to the confusion of Messaline in the play with Mitylene in Greece, but more probably to a feminine sense of what was 'becoming': one feels sorry for the male Sebastians of these productions). An interesting and very satisfactory compromise between the androgynous and the Elizabethan appears in the two 'Cesario' costumes for Granville Barker's Twelfth Night preserved in the London Museum. Naturally, in the present century, producers have experimented with other times and place than the England of Shakespeare, though it is very rare indeed to find the play done in familiar 'modern dress': indeed, the usual motivation of experiment seems to be the creation of an unfamiliar world in order to make the 'unrealistic' main plot more acceptable (hence the use of the French eighteenth century, or the English Regency, or the late Victorian periods). However, as John Russell Brown has shown [in his Shakespeare's Plays in Performance, 1969], Twelfth Night returns again and again in its language and action to 'English countryside and domesticity', and, as he says, the stage picture can help to establish this world, 'not insistently, but with subtlety'. Despite occasional references to shipwreck on the Illyrian coast, eunuchs and mutes, 'the Count his galleys', the 'rough and unhospitable' manners of the natives to strangers, and the Italianate names of most of the characters, the greater part of the action takes place in and near Olivia's house, which is the typical great household of Shakespeare's day, with its lady, her waiting-gentlewoman, her steward, and her fool. Sir Toby Belch (her kinsman) and Sir Andrew Aguecheek are no strangers in this society, as are Sir Politic and Lady Would-be in the Venice of Volpone, but are indigenous. Dogberry and Bottom similarly confirm the Elizabethan Englishness of the air they breathe, though it will rightly be replied that Messina and Athens, and Illyria, have also (whenever it suits Shakespeare's purpose) romantic atmospheres of their own, in which Antonio's idealistic loyalty to the friend he adores finds its natural element, as do Orsino's ardent despair and (near the end of the play) his fierce jealousy. Sir Toby's remark about 'the bed of Ware in England', like Trinculo's 'Were, I in England now, as once I was', is designed to keep us simultaneously and humorously aware of both worlds at once. Both are, of course, in their different ways, Elizabethan, and call for Elizabethan costume.

Nothing is known for certain of how the roles were distributed among the original performers. Even Robert Armin's taking the part of the Clown is not an established fact but merely a probability, based on the considerations that Will Kempe had left the company and that Armin may have had musical talent. It is, of course, unsafe to suppose that because he was familiar with his fellow-actors, Shakespeare had his mind's eye continually upon them in creating his characters. Though Kempe had left, Sir Toby is a Kempe part, and he and Sir Andrew recall the Kempeand-Cowley pairing of Dogberry and Verges. Sir Andrew is never explicitly said to be thin, though this may perhaps be deducible from his surname, from the 'flax on a distaff' simile (I. iii. 99), and also from the word 'anatomy' (III. ii. 61) if it is descriptive, as it had been when applied to the 'hungry lean-faced' Pinch in The Comedy of Errors (v. i. 238). He has, it is true, much in common with Slender in The Merry Wives of Windsor, but then Slender's wit is quite as slender as his body could possibly be. John Sincklo, who played the thin Beadle in 2 Henry IV (v. iv), seems unlikely to have taken so large a part as Sir Andrew's, and, in any case, Shakespeare had a fancy for 'thin man' jokes whether or not they demand a specially thin actor. It would be specially valuable to know who played Malvolio.

It is not part of my purpose to give later cast-lists (which can be found elsewhere). It is, however, interesting to find that (as one man in his time plays many parts) in the eighteenth century Richard Yates graduated from the Clown to Malvolio, and John Palmer from Sebastian to Sir Toby, while in our own century Leon Quartermaine has been first the Clown and later Sir Andrew, and Laurence Olivier has been successively Sir Toby and Malvolio, a part which John Laurie filled after beginning (like Yates) as the Clown. When Shakespeare's company acted Twelfth Night at court in 1618 and 1623, the casts would, in all probability, be different (certainly as regards the boys) and might include similar graduations from one role to another.

John Palmer's majestic figure must have suited Sir Toby far more than Sebastian, and how the lack of resemblance between him as Sebastian and the actress playing Viola was made endurable it is hard to guess. When Ben Jonson visited William Drummond of Hawthornden in 1619, he confided to him (with doubtful seriousness?) that he had ane intention to have made a play like Plautus's Amphitrio but left it of, for that he could never find two so like others that he could persuade the spectators they were one.

Although Viola and Sebastian must not be wildly unlike (a bearded Sebastian would be the ultimate absurdity, and therefore, no doubt, we shall see so much if we live so long), it is in fact the natural difference between the actors in this and similar plays which prevents the spectators' sharing in the general confusion and makes them able to distinguish the twins as the other characters cannot. As far as I know, identical twins have never taken the roles (to be truly identical they would need to be of the same sex, which would not be impossible if a boy were to play Viola or a girl Sebastian). On the professional stage, the parts have sometimes been taken by sister and brother; by Mrs Jordan and Mr Bland in 1790, and by Mrs Henry Siddons and William Murray at Edinburgh in 1815. A more daring venture is for one actress to double the two parts. This has occurred from time to time in the past century or so: first in a German translation of the play at Dresden in 1851 (Henry Crabb Robinson, the diarist, noted that Mme Baier Bürick adopted a manliness of voice and step as Sebastian); later by Kate Terry in 1865, and Jessica Tandy in 1937, and also by the actress (whose name I have not been able to discover) in a French version by Jean Anouilh in 1961. On all these occasions the audience must have anticipated the final scene with apprehension. In the production of 1851, another person, who managed to hide his (or her?) face, came on, and in 1961 the reunion took place in silhouette behind a screen; Anouilh's solution had the limited merit that the actress was able to speak both parts. Yet however the end is contrived, the experiment is a dramatic perversity, memorably condemned by A. S. Downer in his review of Anouilh's production [in Shakespeare Quarterly XII (1962)]:

For four and a half acts the complex structure of Twelfth Night prepares the audience for the confrontation of the twins. Shakespeare rewards our patience with seventy lines of anagnorisis, a long and gratifying tribute to the comic view of life. It is a necessary scene, and Shakespeare does not cheat even when improbability might have tempted him to do so. To share in the triumph of the improbable is the true delight of Twelfth Night, but Anouilh will be tinkering.

In short, if spectators are reluctant to embrace theatrical illusion in the theatre, they had better stay away. Strong resemblance of costume, and tolerable resemblance of personal appearance, are quite enough to preserve this particular theatrical illusion in Twelfth Night.

It is perhaps best to discuss the stage interpretation of the characters before proceeding to specially important scenes, though it is evident that the two go together; the reports of the earlier productions commonly dwell on how this or that actor played his part, and it is only later that detailed accounts of the treatment of whole scenes can be found. Generally speaking, it seems that eighteenth- and nineteenth-century audiences gave their special attention to Viola, Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, and Malvolio. Before the present century one hears little of Orsino and Olivia, and little of the Clown (who has been called several times the centre of the play).

Sir Toby and Sir Andrew have traditionally been recognized as a pair of united broad-comedy parts (Sir Andrew never has a scene without Sir Toby, and Sir Toby only two without Sir Andrew), with Sir Andrew as Sir Toby's 'anvil', as Theobald well described him. It was also traditional that Sir Toby should be Falstaffian and Puckish, Sir Andrew tractable and idiotic. Lamb's brilliant account of James Dodd's performance of Sir Andrew stresses the genius with which he made 'slowness of apprehension' the natural product of Sir Andrew's mental metabolism ('He seemed to keep back his intellect, as some have had the power to retard their pulsation'), not a grotesque exhibition. In the role of drunken Sir Toby (according to another critic [William Dunlop, as quoted in William Winter's Shakespeare on the Stage, 1911]) 'Palmer's gigantic limbs outstretched seemed to indicate the enjoyment of that physical superiority which Nature had given him, even while debasing it to the lowest of all vices', though Lamb felt that John Palmer 'did not quite fill out' Sir Toby's 'solidity of wit' and put too much 'swaggering gentility' into the part. Early actors and reviewers alike seemed in no doubt as to the nature and relative simplicity of both characters: it was a matter of how well the agreed features were portrayed. To say this is, of course, to speak rather too generally: even Sir Andrew has his moments of pique and disillusionment, and neither he nor Sir Toby is all of a piece throughout. But in the present century we have seen a larger range of interpretation, with Sir Toby sometimes conspicuous for his glazed and fuddled dignity, sometimes for his vivacity, sometimes even for his tenacious maintenance of his place at Olivia's (with consequent bitter hostility to Malvolio who seems to threaten it in II. iii); and 'a melancholy Sir Toby', compensating himself for his sense of failure in life, is not quite impossible (though I feel this conception goes against the grain of the play and of most of his lines). [According to John Russell Brown] 'Sir Andrew Aguecheek can be patient, sunny, feckless, gormless, animated or neurotic', or even a 'paranoid manic depressive, strongly reminiscent at times of Lucky in Waiting for Godot'; he has been equipped with a Scottish accent and bagpipes, presumably on the strength of his Christian name, but this is carrying inventiveness too far (and I doubt whether he could have mastered the pipes any more than the viol-de-gamboys, since he has not studied the arts). The more natural the touches, the better, like his 'vanity of authorship' when Sir Toby reads aloud his challenge.

Audiences have always recognized in Malvolio the centre of the play's conspicuously comic scenes, and actors have interpreted him in a variety of ways. It is of great historical importance that the first notable Malvolio, Charles Macklin in 1741, also played Shylock: the two parts (each of them the leading unromantic part in a romantic comedy) have often been in one actor's repertoire, and there is a long-standing critical tradition (more long-standing, perhaps, than well-grounded) of treating them as comparable. Malvolio, though at the centre of the play's broadest comedy, is no part for a clown. After Macklin, though David Garrick never played him, important actors like Robert Bensley and John Henderson (who also played Hamlet) did so. Everyone is familiar with Lamb's eulogy of Bensley's performance ('He looked, spake, and moved like an old Castilian'), and even though the performance may have been amended by Lamb's imagination, it must have included solid respectability as well as fantastical vanity. Whatever faith we may place in Lamb's account, it is clear that by his time the opportunities offered by the role were being explored. Samuel Phelps, in 1857, emphasized the steward's 'self-love' by regarding the world through eyes 'very nearly covered with their heavy lids'; his thoughts were turned inward. 'Walled up in his own temple of flesh, he is his own adorer': Henry Morley's phrase captures the impassiveness with which this versatile actor (whose parts included Hamlet and Christopher Sly) played the part to the very end. Morley had clearly read Lamb's essay, and his description [in The Journal of a London Playgoer from 1851 to 1866] suggests that Phelps had read it too: 'Few who have seen or may see at Sadler's Wells the Spanish-looking steward of Countess Olivia, and laughed at the rise and fall of his château en Espagne, will forget him speedily.' Henry Irving, in 1884, likewise aimed at consistency and credibility. He too played with half-shut eyes, and with beard of pointed Spanish cut, but he exploited his lean and intellectual appearance to evoke a more genuine dignity than that which Phelps had attempted. A reliable contemporary account [by Sir Edward Russell, in The Fortnightly Review (1 September, 1884)] makes it clear that Irving conceived the character humorously (in the lightness of his steward's wand there was 'something of fantastic symbolism'), though essentially as an exhibition of real personality.

Later actors seem to have generally presented Malvolio as human rather than fantastic, with the exception of Beerbohm Tree who played him in the vacuous-vain tradition, with pompous gestures and a quizzing-glass. At his first entry (followed by the attendants whom the Clown bids 'Take away the lady'—four smaller copies of himself) he fell down a flight of steps—a feature of his elaborate garden setting—without losing his composure. Tree also, according to Crosse, set the fashion for Malvolio 'to wear a night-gown in the kitchen scene, a refinement that has been adopted by most of his successors'; yet Crosse, though 'refinement' is obviously ironical, commends his whole performance [in his Fifty Years of Shakespearean Playgoing, 1941], particularly in 'Malvolio's loyalty to Olivia, and his reluctance to give her away' towards the end. Most Malvolios of this century may be very roughly classified into the old kill-joys and the young upstarts. Granville Barker had in the part Henry Ainley, pallid, middle-aged, and convincing; John Laurie, in the 'Victorian' Stratford-upon-Avon production of 1939, was 'consumed by a wintry ambition and by gout'; Ernest Thesiger was in 1944 a 'sour Grey Eminence', Michael Hordern in 1954 a tortured, El-Greco-like figure, and of Roger Mitchell (at the Colorado Shakespeare Festival, 1960) it was well said [by R.L. Perkin, in Shakespeare Quarterly XI (1960)] that 'when he read the line where Malvolio is instructed to smile, you could hear the ice crack in his lips'. By contrast John Abbott, a brisk young Malvolio in Tyrone Guthrie's Old Vic production of 1937; 'might have been seconded from the Illyrian foreign office'. One of the most distinctive younger Malvolios was Laurence Olivier's in 1955 at Stratford-upon-Avon, 'whose speech suggested his origin by an affected, lisping veneer that flaked away suddenly to reveal the barrow-boy vowels' [according to the Illustrated London News (23 April 1955)]. He was not the first to hint at a Cockney background (Maurice Evans had done so in 1939), nor the last (Ian Holm followed in 1966): Robert Speight remarks [in Shakespeare Quarterly XVII (1966)], 'The new convention insists that Malvolio comes from the "suburbs [by] the Elephant" ', but, of course, the idea has not hardened into a rigid convention, and Malvolios continue to appear in great variety.

Space forbids equally full treatment of the Violas. At the risk of over-simplifying, it may be said that Viola is a character universally attractive to audiences and to performers, and it would be a sorry day for Twelfth Night if any producer were so perverse as to take a whim to dislike her. The only problem—though it requires delicate judgment to solve—is how to balance the viveliness and the poignancy in the moods and situations created by her disguise. Beatrice is sad only for Hero's sake; there is hardly a cloud in Rosalind's sky; but Viola's opening lines strike a pathetic chord; yet on her embassy to Olivia she is confident and able to brush aside impediments; and yet again her newly disclosed and newly discovered love for Orsino hangs over the dialogue with Olivia (whom it is not quite correct to call her rival). This juxtaposition, and even combination, of moods runs right through the play. The sort of traps that exist for the unwary, or the challenges that can be created by the audacious, lie in phrases like 'Excellently done, if God did all' (I. v. 236) or \[ \text{And make the babbling gossip of the air} \\

\text{Cry out 'Olivia!'} \]

(I. v. 273-74)

It is clear that the first of these should not be shouted crudely or delivered maliciously, and even the 'graceful impudence' of Ellen Terry (commended by Clement Scott) has its evident danger. As to the second, a Peggy Ashcroft can [according to Richard David, in Shakespeare Survey 5 (1952)] bring off the effect of 'a hastily remembered substitution' of the name Olivia for the name Orsino, but it is not, I am sure, an effect that naturally grows from the scene or the speech or from the Shakespearean attitude to women in the comedies: 'We should be woo'd, and were not made to woo.' The soliloquy in II. ii is a kind of test piece for Violas, who must choose whether to make a comic point of 'I am the man' (and, if so, how to make it) or to let the verbal irony do its own work. So, above all, is the scene with Orsino (II. iv):

\[ \text{When she said, 'I am all the daughters of my father's house', her manner and the despairing sadness of her tone almost revealed her sex to the Duke, and, as Orsino turned towards her with a look of mingled surprise and inquiry, she rapidly, confusedly, and also comically, added, 'a—-a—and all the brothers too!'—thus obtaining a laugh instead of a tear [William Winter on Ada Rehan as Viola].} \]

A laugh so bought costs the scene dear. Of course, the femininity of Viola must be stressed where it is possible to stress it (to attempt a convincing male impersonation in all the Cesario scenes is fatal to the play), but not in such inappropriate ways as this. It is always salutary to remember the boy actor, though no actress could be expected to reconstruct his performance, nor would it be desirable for her to try to do so. The great thing to remember is that Viola's part culminates in her eloquent avowal of her love for Orsino, and in her reunion with her brother, which Peggy Ashcroft made so memorably beautiful:

At the end, as Sebastian faces his sister, he cries: 'What countryman? What name? What parentage?' There is a long pause now before Viola, in almost a whisper (but one of infinite rapture and astonishment), answers: 'Of Messaline' [J.C. Trewin, in John O’London’s Weekly (8 December 1950)].
Olivia, as has been concisely pointed out by Sprague and Trewin, has, in the twentieth century, changed from 'a stately Countess' to a young and often foolish girl. Though partly connected with the riper age of leading ladies in the past, the change is more obviously attributable to a general trend in twentieth-century criticism and production which may be called antiromantic, a trend towards extracting the potentially ironical and ridiculous in Shakespeare's dramatic situations, which I regard as wholly regrettable. Young she must be, if she is to marry Sebastian, but apart from her passing levity of response to the Duke's messenger in I. v there is nothing to suggest frivolity in her character, and there are both the Captain (I. ii. 36) and Sebastian (IV. iii. 16-20) to testify to her virtue and her discretion as ruler of her household.

Meanwhile, as the same writers notice, Feste has been growing older. Granville Barker's own Feste in 1912 was Hayden Coffin, then aged fifty. Occasionally, as with Robert Eddison's Old Vic performance of 1948, there is a mystic sadness about him. More usually, however, he is merely ageing and has seen the best of his time, 'retained not for his wit but for his length of service'. He is also, nowa-days, often insecure as to his future employment, and we are sometimes allowed to think that in his epilogue-song he is out of a job. Gone (with happy exceptions, usually on the amateur stage) are the days when [according to Gordon Crosse] 'Mr John Laurie, like Frank Rodway, let us see that Feste was a human being as well as a professional funny man, and also that he thoroughly enjoys his own fooling'. In 1960 Tom Courteney's performance was criticized [by Robert Speaight, in Shakespeare Quarterly XII (1961)] because the part needed 'more weariness and weight of middle age'.

Orsino and Maria are pretty straightforward, and highly actable, roles. Orsino's nobility (I. ii. 25), despite his love-sickness, should be never in question. Nor should Maria's youth and liveliness: the ageing Maria of John Barton's 1969 production at Stratford-upon-Avon, to whom (and not to Sir Andrew) Sir Toby most incongruously addressed the phrase in his last speech in II. iii, 'Tis too late to go to bed now', should have retorted, parodying Marlowe, 'Never too late, if Toby will consent'. Her social status, as Olivia's gentlewoman, needs to be made clear; she is socially a fit match for Sir Toby.

Of the performance of particular scenes much has already been implied in considering the portrayal of the characters. Only on one or two of them a little needs to be added.

The humour of the so-called 'kitchen scene' (II. iii) has often been buried beneath gross stage business, sometimes supposedly arising from the text (as in 'Sir Toby, there you lie', 1. 107) but usually quite extraneous, involving flapping of arms, crowing, and the blowing-out of candles and throwing of tobaccopipes. Malvolio's night-gown (allegedly introduced by Tree) has already been referred to; in fact a prompt-book of 1864 for a performance at Brooklyn already specifies the night-gown, night-cap and slippers. Sprague and Trewin rightly insist that Malvolio gives offence, not suffers it, in this scene as written by Shakespeare, and remind us that the only line referring to Malvolio's dress invites him to rub his chain with crumbs, thus implying that he has appeared in full ceremonial costume to put down the revelry.

The 'duel scene' (latter part of III. iv) is traditionally, and rightly, taken as comic, but it need not therefore be farcical. It is a great test of a producer's discretion. Even Sir Andrew's terror should not be overplayed, and to demand similar fooleries from Viola (even though on a smaller scale) is pernicious. Self-control, like that of Dorothy Tutin at Stratford-upon-Avon in 1958 and 1960, is what she should show, though her lines sufficiently express her feelings of alarm.

By contrast, the 'prison scene' (IV. ii) has often, with the emphasis placed on a pathetic Malvolio, been pushed towards the painful. Despite the Folio's unambiguous direction Malvolio within, audiences have often been treated to a sight of him manacled, or 'stretched on the straw of a dungeon worthy of Fidelio'. How he and the Clown are thus to share the stage, unless it is partitioned into left and right halves, I cannot imagine. In any case, this is the Clown's scene rather than Malvolio's: he should have the whole of the stage to himself. A modern way of granting him this and also providing a part-visible and clearly-audible Malvolio is to situate the 'dark room' under a grating (that is, beneath a trap), through which Michael Hordern's hands are shown protruding in a photograph of 1954.

The dominant interest of the play's closing minutes is Malvolio's enlightenment. J. R. Brown has an excellent paragraph on the effectiveness of Malvolio's silence during which the deception is explained to him, the emotions which he may register, and the pent-up dramatic expectation which is released with his single exit-line, 'I'll be reveng'd on the whole pack of you!' Various pieces of business which have accompanied this line—Tree tore off his steward's chain, Sothern tore the forged letter—serve both to concentrate the audience's attention on a material object and to indicate Malvolio's state of mind. The speaker's intonation and general manner are also of great importance, and can range from Phelps's expression of undented pride to Olivier's utterance of the line as 'the cry of a man unmade'. Perhaps Olivier's manner, though highly effective at the moment, alienated Malvolio so completely from the rest of the characters as to undermine the Duke's assumption that he could be entreated to a peace, and hence to damage the tone of the ending. A merely angry Malvolio might—if it was made worth his while—relent. Tree's tearing off of his chain also perhaps damaged the ending, by its suggestion that Malvolio is giving up his post: no doubt Olivia's household could carry on without him and a replacement be found, but at the end of Twelfth Night one does not like to be asked to look beyond the conclusion of the action. This is a further reason why the Clown should not end his part as an outcast, especially since no one has cast him out. The final mood should surely be one of harmony. Not every reader, I am well aware, will agree with this; but, even though we may take our pleasures differently, we may unite to agree with Gordon Crosse that 'a really good performance of Twelfth Night is the perfection of pleasure that Shakespearean acting can give, at any rate in comedy.'

Ralph Berry (essay date 1981)

[In the following essay, Berry examines the evolution of Twelfth Night in production, describing a move from the festive and comic stagings of nineteenth and early twentieth-century productions to the darker interpretation of modern directors.]

Twelfth Night is the statutory comedy, as often as not, in a summer festival season. Any moderately dedicated playgoer must have seen it several times, and passed up many more chances. Like Hamlet, it tends to be absorbed into the general textures of the current theatre, and it is not usually associated with revolutionary productions. Moreover, it is not the focus of any great academic or theatrical debate. Its meaning is not in doubt: Twelfth Night is widely accepted as a supreme harmonizing of the romantic and the comic, sweet and astringent. The admirable production, then, is held to be one which holds these elements in balance. It is in the inflection which a production gives to Twelfth Night that the special interest lies. And this inflection has undoubtedly modulated in recent years. Broadly, and crudely: Twelfth Night used to be funny, and is now much less so. What has happened?

I want to describe two models of Twelfth Night productions, old and new. The seamless fabric of theatre history does not lend itself to radical departures, yet I think I can point to a date for the founding of the New Model Twelfth Night: 1969. For the old, I shall turn to the late nineteenth century, and synthesize a few productions. This is less for their antiquarian interest than for their continuing influence. The nineteenth century reveals in caricatured form contours of a Twelfth Night that were recognizable until quite recently, and are still visible in the outer provinces of theatre.
The essence of the old model was its direct appeal to laughter and romance. Of Augustin Daly's production in New York, 1894, Odell tells us [in his Shakespeare from Betterton to Irving, 1920]: 'Moonlight was brought into play as never before in this comedy; Viola dreamed on a bench as Orsino's minstrels warbled Shubert's sic "Who is Olivia (Sylvia)"?" The New York Herald-Tribune has this:

"The scene is Olivia's garden. The time is evening. Viola, disguised as the minstrel Cesario, having received an intimation that perhaps her brother, Sebastian, has not drowned, has spoken her joyous soliloquy upon that auspicious thought, and has sunk into a seat, in meditation. The moon is rising over the distant sea, and in the fancied freshness of the balmy rising breeze you can almost hear the ripple of the leaves. The lovelorn Orsino enters, with many musicians, and they sing a serenade, beneath the windows of Olivia's palace. The proud beauty comes forth upon her balcony, and parting her veil, looks down upon Viola… Not a word is spoken and not a word is needed. The garden is all in moonlight; the delicious music flows on; and … the curtain slowly falls. It was a perfect triumph of art, in the highest and best vein."

It is, however, through the appeal to laughter that this piece must be gauged. The old prompt-books give us a fair idea of the mechanisms of production.

Take the great drinking scene (II, iii). The main thrust of production was to play up the drinking, singing and general merriment. The standard stage direction was Table and 3 chairs discovered. Tankards and long clay pipes on tables. Feste, incredibly, might be the life and soul of the party. 'Clown jumps over table, and all three dance in circle.' Some interpolated songs were usual. Sir Andrew sang 'Christmas comes but once a year/And therefore we'll be merry' after the catch, which has the double effect of defining the title more closely and alloying it with the spirit of simple revelry. This spirit dominated the scene's end. A hallowed interpolation (after 'Come, knight') was

Sir Andrew: Sunday, Monday, Tuesday,
   Which is the properest day to drink?
Sir Andrew:
Sir Toby: This is the properest day to drink!
Clown.

Note the upbeat ending, after Shakespeare has written in a downbeat cadence (matching the opening). Henry Jewett's production (Boston, 1915) went farther, with much business of people sliding around in the dark, falling candles, and the ominous direction 'MUSIC PIANO JOVIAL'. The general commitment to revelry was unquestioned.

This comes out, naturally, in the garden scene (II, v). This scene has to be played quite straightforwardly for laughter: as one prompt has it, 'Bns of Bobbing from behind Trees all thro' this'. But the ruthless insistence of the Neilson prompt on the laugh-quota is interesting. After Malvolio's exit from the garden the play-text reads: 'Omnes. Ha! ha! ha!' (shades of Greyfriars). And following Maria's entrance and Sir Toby's 'Wilt thou set thy foot o' my neck?' 'all laugh and keep it up as long as possible'. There is a similar instruction to Fabian after Malvolio's cross-gartered scene. It is really an anticipation of canned laughter. Fabian is the audience's stalking-horse, and he dramatizes the risibility of the play.

There is, I think, a hint of realization by the directors that the laughter-elements need to be 'protected' or played up. There is no real need for cuts aimed at shortening the piece—Twelfth Night is not long—so all cuts tend to reveal a shaping impulse. Sir Toby's 'I would we were well rid of this knavery. If he may be conveniently delivered, I would he were, for I am now so far in offence with my niece that I cannot pursue with any safety this sport to the upshot' [IV. ii. 67-71] disappears from Irving's prompt. Thus, a singularly unpleasant passage, which markedly qualifies our view of Sir Toby as a jolly dog, yields in the interests of a rounded stereotype.

Malvolio presents a central challenge to Sir Toby's view of the action, and solutions vary. Irving played his virtually uncut, taking his chances for pathos for all they were worth. (He notes 'crying' in his prompt for 'Ay, good fool' in the prison scene.) Daly cut Malvolio totally from the fifth Act; the prison scene was his last. But cuts in Malvolio's final appearance were common. Neilson cut his 'And tell me, in the modesty of honour' to 'That e'er invention played on? Tell me why!' Olivia's 'Alas, poor fool, how have they baffled thee' goes, together with Feste's bitter 'whirligig of time' speech: thus, some painful elements are expunged. Malvolio's 'I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you' is in response to Fabian's 'on both sides passed'. This shows an awareness of the problem. Feste is to be 'protected' against his own words, and Malvolio is less pathetic—the fewer words he has, the less poignant his plight is.

As so often in the nineteenth century, Feste's 'whirligig of time' speech seems to have been felt rather strong, even though elsewhere a coarse communal sensibility is evident. Neilson, as we have seen, cut it. Jewett left it in, but followed Feste's 'revenges' with 'Laugh. Bus. Mai. down C. and turn up tear off chains. Mal. music for exit.' ''Malvolio music…' Still, the direction identifies the problem.

The conclusion formalizes the old view of Twelfth Night. It was customary to interpolate these lines for the Duke (after Malvolio's exit):

And now after twelve nights of tastes and pleasures,
Let me commend you to your dancing measures.

A dance followed. Thus, an invocation to revelry, and not Feste's downbeat 'When that I was and a little tiny boy', ended the play. In short, the old model took every opportunity to play up the farcical and comic elements; it softened the asperities of Malvolio's humiliation; it projected, finally, an apotheosis of romance, good-humour and social accord. But it strained somewhat at the text to achieve these effects. One senses a directorial awareness that the play is not so easy, or so reassuring, as all that.

II

The new model, to my observation, starts edging into view in the 1950s. Historically, I am content to relate it to the profound shift in sensibility which occurred in the English theatre around 1956. Of course one can find earlier evidence of productions with modernist elements, of a performance (say) that restored Sir Toby to the knighthood. Such a one was Granville-Barker's at the Savoy (1912), a production 'unimpeded by detail [which] allowed the creative artifice of its conception to do its work' [according to J. L. Styan in his The Shakespeare Revolution: Criticism and Performance in the Twentieth Century, 1977]. But this play gathers business relentlessly, and Sir Toby is prone to relapses: his surname, historically, weighs down his title. For all Granville-Barker's innovations, the old model was still recognizable into modern times. Hugh Hunt's production at the old Vic (1950) and John Gielgud's at Stratford (1955) with Olivier as Malvolio can be thought of as a culmination of the earlier type. They were refinements of a traditional perception of the text. After the Gielgud Twelfth Night, one can observe the scene changing. I limit my case here to a couple of critical reactions. So intelligent a critic as Laurence Kitchin writes [in Mid-Century Drama, 1960], 'Twelfth Night, even in the drinking scene, is not farce'. He would not have needed to say that a few years later. One locates social time through the démodé, and Muriel St Clare Byrne is especially dismissive of an Old Vic production that got it wrong. 'Farcical' is the word that recurs in her long review. Malvolios who cross-garter both legs together will no longer do.
That was in 1958. In the same year Peter Hall, as we should expect, got it right. His Stratford production was costumed in a Cavalier style that suggested, a shade ominously, Van Dyck. Robert Speaight took the point [in Shakespeare Quarterly IX (1958)]: 'Mr Hall had conceived his Illyria in some English autumn not too long before the outbreak of the Civil War. Autumn is, conceptually, the key word: it comprehends the gold and russet-brown of Lila de Nobili's set, and the subliminal notion of nostalgia for the golden age, the pastoral ante-bellum world. “That luckless apple did we taste./To make us mortal, and thee waste?” Years after, Hall's successor at the RSC, Trevor Nunn [quoted in Ralph Berry, On Directing Shakespeare: Interviews with contemporary Directors, 1977], had no doubt that this Twelfth Night was 'definitively right. He had touched a Chekhov-like centre in the play; it was unarguable.’ Yet at the time critics felt that Hall's casting took certain liberties. The focus of displeasure was Geraldine McEwan's Olivia. This actress has since become best known as a comedy-of-manners specialist—she has played very successfully in Congreve, Lonsdale, Maugham, for instance—and her poseuse Olivia, complete with giggles and squeaks, undercut the Romantic tradition. Olivias used to be played in the County Matron manner. For the rest, Sir Toby (Patrick Wymark) was a gentleman. (To take Sir Toby seriously is a sign of a modern production.) Malvolio (Eric Porter) was a recognizable human being. Above all, Max Adrian's intelligent and melancholy Feste dominated the play. His final envoi [according to Robert Speaight] ‘a distant and elegant pavane'.

The casting of Twelfth Night is open to a wide variety of options; the text is extraordinarily elastic. I don't want to discuss these options in detail, but I stress the dualism of the matter: Belch (with its humours, stereotypic suggestion) or Sir Toby. (We could remember Elgar's epigraph for his Falstaff, ‘a knight, a gentleman, and a soldier’.) Olivia plays well as a grande dame or as an aristocratic ingénue. More than that, some parts seem designed as functional variables, as spaces left open for the director to fill. Fabian is the leading instance. Neutral and unaligned, he can be played old or young, penny plain or tuppence coloured, English or Welsh ('I would exult, mun'). Maria, as we shall see, turns out to be another variable. But any discussion of individual parts is apt to miss the point. The point lies in the constellation of relationships, in the overall system of checks and balances. If you want a melancholy Feste, someone has to cheer us up; if you plan a bleak Twelfth Night, you need a Feste with vivacity.

And that leads us to the initial production of the contemporary era, John Barton's RSC production of 1969 (revived in 1971). Much admired and much contested, this is a directorial statement that rests solidly on the title: Twelfth Night. It is curious that this has been so widely interpreted as an unequivocal call to revelry. In fact, most people understand perfectly well that the last day of the Christmas festivities finds one sated. One more party, and then thank God for work. The mood is caught beautifully in II, iii, when Sir Toby wants the party to go on while everyone else wants to go to bed. So the title states a central dualism: a feast, an end to feasting. And, astonishingly, Barton illustrates the point through Maria.

Who is Maria? There's a question about her social position that is functionally puzzling. She is some kind of companion. A younger daughter of local gentry? Is she in Olivia's household to get married, or because she has failed to get married? Does she rank with the servants or the great family? Evidently, she's on the blurred edge of the class-lines, above and below Malvolio. When Cesario puts the boot in ('No, good swabber, I am to hull here a little longer') Maria has no answer to the social insult. She is usually cast as a soubrette, pert and bouncy. Barton made her an elderly spinster. (First Brenda Bruce, then Elizabeth Spriggs.) This Maria [according to Gareth Lloyd Evans in Shakespeare Survey 23 (1970)] 'is ageing, left on the shelf; she waits desperately for the word from him, and what she often gets is a dusty answer. The words "Tis too late to go to bed, now" are spoken to her.' Sir Toby, a well-born failure, is intelligent enough to be aware of his own parasitism. But he is Maria's last chance. So there's an elegiac quality at the heart of even the comic action.

The act of presentation of this Twelfth Night was genuinely original. The 1971 revival had it perfectly gauged. The audience takes its seats to find Richard Pasco's Orsino listening to his musicians. Presently an aural disturbance comes upon the music. It grows louder, and is identified as the sound of the sea crashing upon the shore. This sea is the background to the action; it enters into the imagery of Orsino's opening speech.
'Receiveth as the sea') and intermittently returns to the audience's consciousness. The sea implies a sense of the canon's unity. It intimates that Twelfth Night is the beginning of the long swell that culminates, beyond the breakers of the tragedies, in the final romances. This Twelfth Night understands, and is aware of, The Tempest. For Richard David fin Shakespeare Survey 25 (1972) 'the sound of the sea reverberating through key moments in the play' served 'to remind us of that sense of the changes and chances of life that is surely intrinsic in the mood of the play as in its basic situations'. Robert Speaight had experienced a sharper sense of 'the howling of the gale outside the gilded cage of Orsino's palace; reality at odds with romanticism … , ["Shakespeare in Britain," Shakespeare Quarterly XX (1969)]. It is a metamorphosis of that calm untroubled seascape that Daly provided for the New Yorkers of 1894.

III

John Barton's Twelfth Night is the classic of recent times, and its statement, though modulated in later productions, has not, I think, been seriously challenged since. Basically, he takes the action seriously. From that perspective endless variations remain possible. Take the relationship between Sir Toby and Sir Andrew. It is, on Sir Toby's part, contemptuous and exploitative. And it ends in the unequivocal 'Will you help? An ass-head and a coxcomb and a knave, a thin-faced knave, a gull?' Now, how far is the director prepared to go in acknowledging the truth of this transaction? In the old days, no problem: Sir Andrew simply looked shocked at Sir Toby saying such terrible things. In the Regent's Park production of 1972, Sir Andrew stood stock-still for a long second, head bowed, as one pondering an irrevocable decision. He then marched off like an automaton, stage left, casting no glance at Sir Toby. Sir Toby limped off stage right. The audience could have no doubt that the friendship was permanently shattered.

Illusion, clearly, is what the director now perceives in this network of relationships. The concept became an emblem in Peter Gill's RSC production of 1974. The figure of a golden Narcissus hangs over the stage, the only pictorial element in a bleak box. The programme cites, of all people, R. D. Laing:

Narcissus fell in love with his image, taking it to be another….

Jill is a distorting mirror to herself.
Jill has to distort herself to appear undistorted to herself.
To undistort herself, she finds Jack to distort her distorted image in his distorting mirror.
She hopes that his distortion of her distortion may undistort her image without her having to distort herself.

The atmosphere is vibrant with erotic undertones. Orsino's bisexuality is marked, and at least one critic had no doubt that Orsino was ready to grope the nearest, any time. A boyish Viola (Jane Lapotaire) contributes to the general sexual confusion. Maria's maturity has become an RSC orthodoxy; Sir Toby is a gentleman, and intelligent—a decision that invariably imparts a stereoscopic depth to his scenes. David Waller has since explained, in interview [quoted by Peter Thomson in Shakespeare Survey 28 (1975)], that his reading of the part is based on 'I hate a drunken rogue'. 'And it seems quite clear to me that he's referring quite consciously to himself.'

The bleaker elements were intensified in this Twelfth Night. Barton had allowed himself a Feste with a certain Celtic charm (Emrys James), but Gill's Feste, Ron Pember, [according to Peter Thomson] 'hinted always at a radical's social distaste for the antics of privilege…. He was discomforting, an outsider, almost malevolently satur-nine, defying the sentimental response to Malvolio's plight by pressing home his final accusations with heartless accuracy in Act V. Pember sang his songs with the gritty voice of the modern unaccompanied folk-singer. There's more than a hint of Brecht in this. But there could in any case be no question of minimizing the effect of the final scene, given the major casting decision of this production: Nicol Williamson's Malvolio.

Nicol Williamson's salient characteristic is his capacity to portray pain. It is of a voltage that sets him apart from any other actor on the English stage. Not that his Malvolio was unfunny. His accent—which critics varied in finding Welsh, Scots, and veering from one to the other—placed him in the Baptist-Presbyterian tradition of the intolerant Nonconformist preacher on the make. More subtly, it placed him as an outsider (Illyria is set in the effete South of England). This Malvolio took his chances superbly in the garden scene, but his final humiliation was shattering. Michael Billington's verdict [in The Guardian (25 August 1974)] is precise: 'But what Williamson does so brilliantly is to blend high comedy and deep emotional pain … he tears Maria's epistle into minuscule fragments before departing to his own permanent, private hell, all dignity destroyed. Williamson seems to have experimented with his final line during the production. When I saw it, the line was inaudible, spoken through the hands covering the face. Robert Speaight writes of a 'fourfold repetition' [in Shakespeare Quarterly XXV (1974)]. The wound is open, and Orsino cannot heal it. The shock waves travel back through the entire action.

IV

Narcissism, eroticism and alienation, illusion ending in anguish: is this the last word of the current era on Twelfth Night? I don't think so; it appears to me rather as an over-compensation, an emphatic rejection of a stage cliché that had hardened into a lie. The modern statement on Twelfth Night has its textual justification: one has to ignore a great deal to build a production around the celebration of cakes and ale. And the play has to respond to certain tendencies of our own era. To cite a few, a taste for dark comedy has long been prevalent. The most influential (upon the stage) of recent Shakespearean writers, Jan Kott, treated Twelfth Night in a chapter [of her Shakespeare Our Contemporary, 1967] entitled 'Shakespeare's bitter Arcadia'. Moreover, the Problem Plays have, so to speak, territorially expanded. Measure for Measure and Troilus and Cressida are played far more often than even before, and they now look like mainstream Shakespeare, not aberrations. Then again, we ought not to ignore the oblique impact of Chekhov.

I earlier cited Trevor Nunn's identification of the 'Chekhov-like centre' of the play, and the point is worth pursuing. One often uses the word 'chekhovian' loosely, to indicate an autumnal atmosphere surrounding agreeable but rather futile people discussing, in an aimless way, what to do next. The word tends to drift away from its moorings. 'Chekhovian' means like Chekhov, and his importance on today's stage goes beyond his actual productions. Quite often one sees a Twelfth Night with II, iii, played as a homage to Chekhov: the sense of lateness and futility, the pauses, the alternation of manic gaiety and brooding, the inconsequentiality and missed connections:

Sir Toby: Does not our lives consist of the four elements?
Sir Andrew: Faith, so they say: but I think it rather consists of eating and drinking.
Sir Toby: Th'art a scholar; let us therefore eat and drink.

The scene—it occurs in Olivia's household but comes over as a tavern scene—reminds us of the tavern scene in 2 Henry IV, as the old Falstaff fondles Doll Tearsheet—'do not bid me remember mine end'—and recalls the RSC's Chekhov-oriented production of the mid-sixties. (I think it true that contemporary taste prefers the second part of Henry IV to the first; and this used not to be so.) It is not in question that Chekhov is the father of Beckett and Pinter; he is important today in a way that Ibsen is not. Not everyone will go all the way with Christopher Booker's judgement: 'It is for our recognition of this melancholy, arid picture that I believe we have quietly elevated Chekhov into the supreme "serious" playwright of our age' ["Mirror of our Melancholy," Daily Telegraph (26 February, 1977)] We have none the less to acknowledge him as an unseen presence in the world of comedy. Through him, one catches at the implications of 'autumnal'. The subtext of autumn is winter: and one wonders if winter is not after all the right season for a setting of Twelfth Night.

Chekhov, if you like, is a surface presence. But there is an underground subsidence that affects even more our view of Twelfth Night. The practical joke has vanished. I don't mean that it has ceased to exist; but its sanctions have. Our ancestors, as the memoirs testify, took a robust pleasure in practical jokes. The fondness for them persisted through the nineteenth century. In the last generation or so, the relish for them has ebbed away. As I take it, we know too much about the sadistic undercurrent of much practical joking to be at ease with it. It is one of the social changes of our lifetime that the historian should learn to document. Its passing means that the entire network of assumptions sustaining the old Twelfth Night has collapsed. And that raises the whole question of what is called, for want of a better word, comedy. The theory of comedy is the search for a better word. Perhaps all theoreticians of comedy should take their lead from Aristotle, who passed up the opportunity of making up his lecture-notes into a book, opting for the easier field of tragedy. His reviews have probably gained from that heroic evasion. A modern production of Twelfth Night is obliged to redefine comedy, knowing always that its ultimate event is the destruction of a notably charmless bureaucrat. There it is, and it happens. Do we laugh at it?

Twelfth Night, which appears as a machine for inducing laughter, discloses itself in the end as a machine for suppressing it. One is always aware of mixed responses in the theatre, of laughter in the wrong places. It's a general hazard of playgoing, and one accepts it without comment. But once, at a repertory production under a man who knew his business, I understood it as the dramatist's design: what had seemed an imperfection of theatre experience became the truth of the play. Malvolio's entrance in Act V created a storm of laughter. The interventions of Fabian and Feste, and the dawning awareness of Olivia, became the implacable advance of a reality that stifled laughter. The laughter of others, but not of oneself, became the experience of the drama. One by one the laughs ceased, like lights going out in the house, as the edge of the great play, dark as logic, moved over the consciousness of the audience. It received in total silence the destruction of Malvolio, and the strained half-moment that followed 'I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you' bore the meaning of the play. That silence, that end of laughter, is today's Twelfth Night.

Michael Billington (essay date 1990)

[In the following essay, Billington presents a stage history of Twelfth Night, highlighting notable productions and performances, as well as critical reaction to both.]

Twelfth Night may be Shakespeare's most perfect comedy. It is also one of the hardest to bring off in the theatre because of its sheer kaleidoscopic range of moods. It contains some of Shakespeare's most lyrical writing about love. It also contains scenes, such as the baiting of the confined Malvolio, that to a modern sensibility seem extremely cruel. It is about the impact of truth upon fantasy and about the journey of discovery undertaken by Orsino, Olivia, and Malvolio. At the same time it is about the cyclical nature not only of the seasons but of human Ufe itself. It takes place in the imaginary world of Illyria. Yet it also exists in the concrete world of the Elephant (an inn in Southwark), Mistress Mall's picture, the spinsters and the knitters in the sun. To realise the play's complexities and contradictions required, suggested John Russell Brown, five years' study or a repeated return to its problems in a succession of productions. Even for the fortunate directors of the RSC, it is usually a matter of months rather than years of study, six weeks' rehearsal, and a chance to get it right (or not) on one specific occasion.
Looking back over the history of Twelfth Night in the British theatre (and abroad) two things are immediately apparent. One is the way different characters become, at different times, the pivot of the play. Some productions belong to Malvolio: others to Viola. But, in conversation, the quartet of RSC directors [Bill Alexander, John Barton, John Caird, and Terry Hands] suggests that Sir Toby is the motor that drives the plot and Feste the character who determines the mood. One has also seen productions where either Olivia or Sir Andrew emerges as the dominant character. It is Shakespeare's most Chekhovian play in that the attention is shared by half-a-dozen characters any one of whom may emerge as the most individually arresting. But stage history also indicates there is a constant debate about how the play should be staged. Does Illyria yield up its secrets to realism or to the imagination? Between the archaeologically exact terraced gardens of Beerbohm Tree at one end of the scale and the neo-Elizabethan simplicity of William Poël at the other there seems to be an infinite number of options. The debate still continues.

When was Twelfth Night first performed? In a book published in 1954, The First Night of Twelfth Night, Leslie Hotson plumps assertively for 6 January 1601. We know that a Court play was performed in Whitehall that night. We know that the Lord Chamberlain, Hunsdon, was ordered to provide a play that, amongst other things, had 'greate variety of Musicke and dances.' We also know that the guest of honour at the Court revels on that specific Twelfth Night was the Italian Duke Virginio Orsino. In Hotson's argument, Shakespeare's play becomes a topical comedy run up to please both the Queen and a visiting grandee; though since Shakespeare's Orsino is something of a deluded narcissist, it may be just as well that the Italian Duke spoke no English. But Professor Hotson pushes the argument much further and suggests that the arena staging adopted for the Great Chamber at Whitehall was the model for all Elizabethan theatres. He posits a production of Twelfth Night with the spectators on tiered benches 'all Round abowte' and 'on every side' and with a couple of tents to represent Olivia's and Orsino's houses. This is, in fact, theatre-in-the-round. But although it makes sense to suggest this is how Shakespeare's play was first presented in a hall ninety feet long, it is presumptuous to argue that this was therefore the model for all Elizabethan theatres.

Hotson's theories are speculative. But we do know, for a fact, that Twelfth Night was played in the Middle Temple Hall at the Inns of Court on 2 February 1602, because a barrister who was present, John Manningham, recorded the event in his diary:

> At our feast we had a play called Twelfth Night or What You Will; much like The Comedy of Errors or Menæchmi in Plautus, but most like and near to that in Italian called Inganni. A good practice in it to make the steward believe his lady widow was in love with him, by counterfeiting a letter as from his lady in general terms, telling him what she liked best in him, and prescribing his gesture in smiling, his apparel, etc. And when he came to practise, making him believe they took him to be mad.

What is significant about Manningham's account—apart from getting a minor point in the plot wrong by making Olivia a widow—is that the play is both associated with a 'feast' or revels and that it is Malvolio who sticks most firmly in his mind. Today Twelfth Night is so regularly performed that it has lost any association with a specific event, but it is worth recalling that it had its origins in revelry and was presumably seen as a celebratory comedy. Manningham also does not simply seize on Malvolio but sees the other characters' pretence that he is mad as a good joke. I am not for a moment suggesting that we should attempt to recapture that ethos today but Manningham's observations may come as a salutary corrective to those actors and directors who seek to transform the play into Malvolio's Tragedy.

You could say, in fact, that the Malvolios of this world got their revenge in 1642 when Parliament issued the 'First Ordinance Against Stage Plays and Interludes' which ordered that 'public stage plays shall cease to be foreborne', that the theatres should be pulled down and that 'players shall be taken as rogues'. The savagery of those decrees is a reminder that Shakespeare, in satirising the Puritan spirit, was harpooning something that was philistine, pleasure-killing and destructive.
After the Restoration, Twelfth Night (in common with many of Shakespeare's plays) was interfered with by Sir William Davenant, which puts in perspective Samuel Pepys's comment in 1662: 'But a silly play and not related at all to the name of that day.' It wasn't, in fact, until the next century that Shakespeare's text began to be performed in anything like the original version. The Irish actor, Charles Macklin (whose Shylock drew from Alexander Pope the memorable couplet 'This is the Jew that Shakespeare drew') started the vogue for authenticity with a revival at Drury Lane in 1741: himself as Malvolio, Hannah Pritchard as Viola.

Macklin's success, and the growing influence of women on the theatre, firmly established Twelfth Night's popularity: between 1741 and 1819 it was rarely out of the bill at either Drury Lane or Covent Garden which then enjoyed a monopoly on legitimate drama. But the most vivid account of an eighteenth-century Twelfth Night is provided by Charles Lamb in his graphic description, in Some of the Old Actors, of a 1780s revival. Robert Bensley's Malvolio, he said, came near to being the perfect Don Quixote. And Dora Jordan as Viola obviously had the precious ability to make the lines appear new-minted. 'When', wrote Lamb, 'she had declared her sister's history to be a "blank" and that she had "never told her love", there was a pause as if the story had ended—and then the "worm in the bud" came up as a new suggestion—and the heightened image of "Patience" still followed after that, as by some growing (and not mechanical) process, thought springing up after thought, I would almost say as they were watered by her tears.' That could be a description of Judi Dench almost 200 years later. The foppish comedian, James William Dodd, also brought all his skill to Ague-cheek. 'You could see', wrote Lamb, 'the first dawn of an idea stealing over his countenance, climbing up little by little, with a painful process, till it cleared up at last to the fullness of a twilight conception—its highest meridian…. A glimmer of understanding would appear in a corner of his eye, and for lack of fuel go out again. A part of his forehead would catch a little intelligence, and be a long time in communicating it to the remainder.' That's great criticism: vivid, descriptive and exact.

In the nineteenth-century, Twelfth Night was rarely off the London stage: Samuel Phelps staged it at Sadler's Wells in 1848, Charles Kean and Robert Keeley opened the new Princess's Theatre with it in 1850, the Royal Theatre of Saxe-Meiningen (ancestor of our modern ensembles) imported it to Drury Lane in 1881. That makes it all the odder that when Henry Irving staged the play at the Lyceum in 1884 he had apparently never seen it acted before. Twelfth Night was also one of Irving's most marked failures as both actor and producer. Part of the problem was his own Malvolio which, rising to the ungovernable vehemence of a Shylock in his final line, was short on comedy. Ellen Terry, playing Viola, also had the misfortune to go through the first night with her arm in a sling and had to play many of her scenes sitting down. But the real problem was that the sets, designed by Hawes Craven, smothered the play in a decorative romanticism. Orsino reclined on a velvet couch, tasselled in gold, while behind him in a dim mysterious alcove, dark with painted glass, minstrels played their seductive melodies. And, in the final scene, the spreading portico of Olivia's house was flanked with branching palms beside a blue sea while guards, pages and courtiers stood picturesquely by. It was difficult for Shakespeare's comedy to survive such overweighted, picture-book literalism.

But the late Victorian and Edwardian era seems to have oscillated between the extremes of spectacle and simplicity. The American manager and distortionist, Augustin Daly, in 1894 frantically rearranged the text in order to meet the demands of scenic realism. His version at Daly's theatre in London began with the arrival of Sebastian and Antonio, proceeded to the star-entrance of Viola (Ada Rehan) and then went on to play the first and fourth scenes of the first Act, featuring Orsino, so that the sea-coast could give way to a fantastically elaborate ducal palace. Those who complain about modern excesses of 'directors' theatre' would sometimes do well to look back in the archives and see what happened in the days of managerial domination. If Daly's approach was absurd, Herbert Beerbohm Tree's at Her Majesty's in 1901 wasn't much better. He had Malvolio followed everywhere by four miniature stewards. And, seeking verisimilitude, his designer copied Olivia's garden from a picture in Country Life. According to a contemporary critic: 'It extended terrace by terrace to the extreme back of the stage with real grass, real box hedges, real paths, fountains, and descending steps. I never saw anything like it for beauty and vraiesemblance. The actors were literally in an Italian garden.' The only problem is that the characters weren't, and the set 'was perforce used for many of the Shakespearean episodes for which it was inappropriate'.

Irving, Daly, and Tree went to one extreme: William Poöl to another. In 1894 he founded the Elizabethan Stage Society 'to give practical effect to the principle that Shakespeare should be accorded the build of stage for which he designed his plays'. Shaw, seeing their Twelfth Night at Burlington Hall in 1895, admitted that the amateur cast was rank bad ('The clown made no pretence of understanding a single sentence he uttered: it sufficed for him that he was a clown'). But he welcomed the prominence the platform stage gave to the actor, applauded the use of Elizabethan music played on viol, lute, and viola de gamba, and suggested that Irving and others might come down and have a look at what they could do 'on the sort of stage which helped Burbage to become famous'. Max Beerbohm (who in a letter to Florence Kahn later wrote that 'poor William Poël's honoured name is a guarantee of badness') was less persuaded. Seeing the Elizabethan Stage Society's Twelfth Night at the Royal Court in 1903, he made the perfectly fair point that Shakespeare wrote at a time when scenic production was in its infancy and was conscious of its limitations. 'We', wrote Beerbohm, 'have developed that science and it is only when Shakespeare's plays are produced with due regard to this development that they seem to us living works of art.' Beerbohm, pace Sam Wanamaker and his projected Globe Theatre of today, was right: one cannot simply turn one's back on the present. But surely there had to be some way of presenting Shakespeare—and the opal-like comedy of Twelfth Night in particular—that was neither scenically top-heavy nor filled with an owlish solemnity and detachment.

There was; and it came, at long last, in Granville Barker's legendary production which opened at the Savoy on 15 November 1912. This, by all accounts, was Shakespeare as we understand it today. Norman Wilkinson's blackand-silver setting, evoking a half-Italianised Elizabethan court, combined beauty with intimacy: there was a formal garden with a great staircase right and left, with drop curtains and a small inner tapestry set for the carousal. The verse was spoken with lightness, speed, and dexterity. 'It goes slick but not too fast,' wrote The Times. 'It is a most agreeable sensation to feel that for once you are listening to Shakespeare as he wrote.'

But, above all, Granville Barker got rid of all the false accretions of stage tradition and sought for the essential truth of character. Lilian McCarthy's Viola was praised for not 'making fun of the equivocations due to her disguise'. Writing to Granville Barker shortly after the premiere, John Masefield said: 'Lilian often got the most exquisite effects with a sort of clear uplifting that carried us away, and I believe that the women scenes were never once allowed to drop to the dreamy and emotional; they were always high, clear and ringing, coming out of a passionate mood.' Arthur Whitby's Sir Toby was not simply an eructating sot but a gentleman with, in Robert Speaight's phrase, 'the beaming roundness of a full moon'. Henry Ainley's Malvolio was a Puritan prig who flamed up in fury on 'I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you.' But, most significantly of all, Granville Barker broke with tradition by treating Feste (Hayden Coffin) not as the conventional hop-skip-and-jump youthful jester but as a sad, mature man through whom ran what the director himself called 'that vein of irony which is so often the mark of one of life's self-acknowledged failures'. Coffin was, in fact, a musical comedy performer who nineteen years before had starred in George Edwardes's production of A Gaiety Girl, and presumably brought with him just that touch of frayed melancholia you often find in veterans of the popular stage past their prime. It was also a mark of Granville Barker's precision that the part of Fabian was not tossed away but played as an elderly respected family retainer. Modern Shakespeare production, one feels, began with Granville Barker's Twelfth Night.

Barker also greatly admired a production of the play by a director who shared something of his own idealism, intellectual refinement, and preoccupation with text: Jacques Copeau. Copeau's French-language version opened at the Théâtre du Vieux-Colombier on 15 May 1914, with Copeau himself as Malvolio, Louis Jouvet as Aguecheek, Suzanne Bing as Viola, and Duncan Grant designing the costumes. Copeau's avowed aim was to bring 'true beauty and poetry' back to the French stage and in this production he seemed to have succeeded handsomely. According to Robert Speaight, the play was presented in curtains with stylised trees and simple cubes for seating. Viola was clad in white doubled with thin black strips, Augue-Cheek in sky-blue top hat, Feste in pink and blue and a red cap shaped like the claws of a lobster. Reviewing the production in The Observer when it was revived in 1921, Granville Barker noted several flaws (far too bright costumes for Olivia and a household in mourning), but declared that the French actors spoke Shakespeare better in French than English actor spoke him in English: they had 'precision, variety, clarity and, above all, passion'. What Copeau achieved was also something that, before Barker, few English productions had ever realised was possible in Shakespeare: a quicksilver fluency. You sense that most clearly from Copeau's own description of the opening scenes:

While the Duke, followed by his gentlemen, slipped into the shadows on the left, Viola emerged from the other side in a different light, veiled in pink and holding a palm leaf in her hand. So, right from the beginning, the comedy discovered its rhythm and began to trace its winding pattern. Hardly had the grave and slightly melancholy voice finished speaking than a woman's voice—Suzanne's—clear and bell-like, transported us elsewhere without the slightest jolt. 'What country friends, is this?' 'This is Illy ria, lady.'

How many productions, even today, achieve that crucial ability to dissolve one scene meltingly into the next?

For both Granville Barker and Copeau the text had the sanctity of a musical score: something to be viewed in its entirety rather than as a collection of parts. Reading about the various productions in London and Stratford in the inter-war years, one gets the feeling that the play once again simply became an occasion for some memorable individual performances. Indeed William Bridges-Adams who ran the Shakespeare Festival in Stratford-upon-Avon from 1919 to 1934 (in both the old and new theatres), rejected many of Barker's innovations in Shakespearean production, including the use of a brilliant white light which he described as 'germ free'. Strange liberties were also taken with the text in between-the-wars productions. At Stratford, Bridges-Adams cut the prison-scene, thereby softening the play's cruelty. At London's New Theatre in 1932 (where James Agate said of Jean Forbes-Robertson's Viola that the character's 'steel-true and blade-straight quality, her sticking to the spirit as well as the letter, of Orsino's instruction can never have been conveyed better'), the director, Robert Atkins, gave the last verse of 'The wind and the rain' to Olivia. Donald Wolfit, in his touring production first seen in 1937, suggested that Malvolio enjoyed a last-minute return to Olivia's favour.

But the lesson taught by Granville Barker—that any Shakespeare play, and Twelfth Night most particularly, requires some controlling directorial vision—took a long time to sink in. Between 1918 and 1939, it is hard to trace one single production that commanded universal respect. What one got instead was a string of notable performances. Edith Evans's Viola at the Old Vic in 1932 was admired by some, though J. C. Trewin felt that 'Her Viola sounded oddly heartless. This was the Restoration ship-wrecked upon the Illyrian coast.' Tyrone Guthrie did what he called 'a baddish, immature' production at the Old Vic in 1937 with Jessica Tandy doubling Viola and Sebastian, and Laurence Olivier playing Sir Toby, in the words of one critic, 'like a veteran Skye-terrier, ears pricked for mischief. Copeau's nephew, Michel Saint-Denis, also staged the play at the Phoenix in 1938, in what many thought was a fussy, overloaded production that prettified Illyria in the manner of a fancy-dress ball. Its chief glories were Peggy Ashcroft's Viola, full of charm, warmth, and wit, and Michael Redgrave's Ague-Cheek based, in part, on that of Louis Jouvet: not so much a fool as a man whose intelligence was, for a whim, deliberately fantasticated. The temptation of lead actors is always to go for Malvolio. Ague-Cheek, however, is the part that often yields up the most surprising comedy.

The critic W.A. Darlington once said that there is a perfect production of Twelfth Night laid up for us in heaven. What is fascinating is how hard it was, post-Barker, to come by the perfect one on earth. Time and again, one finds one aspect of the play emphasised at the expense of another: usually prankish comedy at the expense of delicate melancholy. When Twelfth Night was chosen to reopen the Old Vic on 14 November 1950, it was given a production by Hugh Hunt filled with commedia dell'arte fussiness; there was a chorus of boys in beards and girls in urchin cuts rounding off each scene with skipping dances, clapping of hands, smacking of knees, and lots of hurraying. Only Peggy Ashcroft, playing Viola again after a gap of eleven years, gave the production real distinction. She was much praised for her rapt stillness in the scene where Orsino talks of love and Feste sings 'Come away Death.' She also showed the true Shakespearean actress's ability to focus on a particular moment and give it an un-swerving truth. When Viola (in the guise of Cesario) is confronted by Sebastian, who asks 'What countryman? What name? What parentage?', there was a long, charged, beautifully held pause before she quietly breathed 'Of Messaline'. How rarely since then has one seen an actress seize on the pure poetry of that moment.

In the immediate post-war years at Stratford, productions of the play once again seemed to miss the mark. In 1947 Walter Hudd directed a revival that transposed the first and second scenes of the play (something Kenneth Branagh did forty years later at the Riverside Studios): a pointless reversal that completely ignores the first scene's announcement of the play's major themes. In 1955 Sir John Gielgud directed a Stratford production starring Sir Laurence Olivier as Malvolio and Vivien Leigh as Viola. Gielgud himself has written: 'Somehow the production did not work, I don't know why…. It is so difficult to combine the romance of the play with the cruelty of the jokes against Malvolio, jokes which are in any case archaic and difficult. The different elements in the play are hard to balance properly.' My own chief memory of that production is of Olivier's Malvolio: a bumptious arriviste with faintly Hebraic appearance and an insecurity over pronunciation. When Olivier came to 'Cast thy humble slough' in the reading of the letter he agonised endlessly over whether it should be 'sluff' to rhyme with 'cuff' or 'slow' to rhyme with 'cow'. He also rocked back and forth on a bench in the garden with such ecstasy that at one point he fell over backwards. If one had to sum up his performance in a word it would be 'camp'; and it was redeemed only by the whiplash fury he revealed in Malvolio's exit line which introduced a note of Lear-like revenge into Illyria.

But in 1958 (two years before he officially took over as director of what soon became the Royal Shakespeare Company) Peter Hall created a production at Stratford that solved many of the play's problems. Most directors of Twelfth Night see the play as made up of a romantic half and a comic half. Hall's genius was to see that these divisions were not watertight: that the romance was invaded by high-spirited fun and the comedy by a grave melancholy. Hall's most radical decision was to cast Géraldine McEwan—in her mid-twenties and best known as a delightful West End ingenue—as Olivia. Stage tradition always had insisted that Olivia was a grave, mature woman. Ms McEwan presented her as a pouting, giggling, squealing poseuse, affecting a love for her dead brother that she didn't really feel and bored to death with acting the role of the great lady.Erotically stirred by Cesario, she threw herself on her knees in front of him (her) on 'Nor wit nor reason can my passion hide'. And when Sebastian later responded to her overtures, she entered mischievously beckoning with her forefinger to a priest. There were those at the time who resented this drastic re-evaluation of the character. John Wain wrote in The Observer that Olivia was 'played as a kittenish typist on holiday from a City office.… It isn't her (Ms McEwan's) fault that Shakespeare made Olivia a countess full of authority and aristocratic hauteur.' But is the Olivia who rushes so speedily to the altar with Sebastian ('Blame not this haste of mine') all that full of aristocratic hauteur? And isn't there something suspect about her reported determination to 'water once a day her chamber round with eye-offending brine'? But if Hall tapped a new vein of comedy in Olivia, he also (possibly less originally) unearthed a sweet melancholia in Ague-Cheek. Richard Johnson played him, in Mr. Wain's description, as 'a paranoid manic-depressive strongly reminiscent at times of Lucky in Waiting For Godot'. In his long flaxen wig, Mr. Johnson looked like a lachrymose spaniel: he was the eternal, dogged trier who wants to be a great blade and a roaring lover but who can never quite make it. I recall still Mr. Johnson's look of wan hopelessness as, having claimed to be a very dog at a catch, he was squeezed out by Sir Toby and Feste.

Hall’s ability to merge, rather than separate, the play's romantic-comic elements was also embodied in Dorothy Tutin's Viola. For a start, in her Caroline pageboy, 'And when did you last see my Father?' costume, Ms Tutin made a thoroughly convincing Cesario and cut through all the academic arguments about the oddity of the Shakespearean boy-girl heroine. But she also balanced a genuine amusement at the confusion created by her disguise ('Poor lady' was done in a mischievous drawl that got a big laugh) with a lyrical sense of passion. Her 'Ay but I know …' to Orsino was a soaring cry from the heart halted just in time and brought down in the vocal scale to a more moderate 'Too well what love women to men may owe'.

The design by Lila de Nobili, a distinguished Italian painter who had worked with Visconti at La Scala, Milan, also suffused Hall's production in a warm romantic glow without ever becoming cumbersome or heavy. I cannot better Robert Speaight's description of it: 'Peter Hall's Caroline Twelfth Night was a rich symphony in russet, designed by Lila de Nobili. The cavaliers were gathered round Orsino in a panelled hall out of Nash's English Mansions, and just as this gave way to the cloud-capped towers of a transitory Adriatic, so these quickly dissolved into an English garden and Sir Toby Belch enjoying an obviously continental breakfast.' But the gauzy romanticism of the design was offset by touches of realism: when Viola clambered ashore in Illyria after the shipwreck she had the wet-wigged, drowned-rat look of someone extremely happy to have at last reached terra firma.

Such a production was too good to die; and in 1960 Hall revived it at Stratford as part of his opening season devoted to exploring the range of Shakespearean comedy. By then, there had been some major cast-changes, proving how much the delicate balance of this particular play depends upon the right match of ingredients. In place of Geraldine McEwan, Barbara Barnett now played Olivia: a good but immature actress who mistakenly tried to ape the cooing vanity of her predecessor without her spontaneous sense of the ridiculous. Ian Richardson capably replaced Richard Johnson as Ague-Cheek without quite achieving his exquisite hangdog mournfulness. But two of the other new arrivals greatly strengthened the production. Eric Porter's Malvolio was logical, precise, outwardly rational, and rather like a civil servant trying to master a difficult brief in his reading of the letter. He also kept the comedy within bounds, conveying the construction of the cross-garters by thrusting all his weight onto one foot; and in the famous last line he exuded a wronged dignity rather than tragic suffering. But possibly the greatest gain of all was Max Adrian's Feste. Hall followed Granville Barker in casting a mature actor for the role, and one equipped with a peculiar gift for sardonic sadness, well caught by Alan Pryce-Jones in The Observer:

It would be possible to make a case for Feste as the ancestor of the modern anti-hero—a resounding tinkler, a caretaker, a mad mother all rolled into one. Not an inflection is lost by Mr. Adrian, who not only speaks his lines with singular distinction but conveys the psychological subtlety of a character whom it is easy to dismiss as a mere clown. In fact, Feste is much the most interesting character in the comedy; he provides in his own person the interplay of light and shadow which makes it memorable.

But it is worth recalling that Twelfth Night is a play that it is hard to get exactly right first time; and even Hall's production only achieved a mellow perfection when it transferred to the Aldwych in December 1960 with a cast that combined the best of the two seasons' work. McEwan and Johnson returned, Porter and Adrian stayed, and at the centre of it all was Turin's enchanting boy-girl Viola, eyes glowing with mischief at the thought, 'Heaven forbid my outside hath not charmed her'. It is fascinating to note that even now, thirty years on, Hall is contemplating a return to this most Mozartian of comedies.

A first-rate production like Hall's is, whatever directors may say, a hard act to follow: so it proved when the RSC next turned to the play in June 1966. It was directed by Clifford Williams, who four years previously had given the company one of its most spectacular early triumphs with a production of The Comedy of Errors run up in a hurry to give Paul Scofield extra time to work on King Lear. It might have seemed the magic could work again. Once again we had a comedy about twins separated by ship-wreck and mistaken for each other. Once again we had a coolly austere set by Sally Jacobs, consisting of an elegant row of Roman arches topped by a minstrels' gallery. There was even Diana Rigg, from the cast of Williams's Comedy of Errors, to lend her beauty and intelligence to the role of Viola. But somehow, on the first night at any rate and in spite of a front-rank cast (Alan Howard, Estelle Kohler, Brewster Mason, Norman Rodway, David Warner), the ingredients failed to mix. Where Mr. Williams's Comedy of Errors worked because of its dazzling uniformity of style, his Twelfth Night didn't because the rich individuality of the characters was only half-realised.
But out of Twelfth Night, like Africa, there is always something new. On this occasion, it was one memorable piece of business and one original performance. The classic bit of business came when Maria said of Malvolio, 'He will come to her in yellow stockings and 'tis a colour she abhors', at which point everyone looked at Ague-Cheek dressed from head to toe in vilest yellow. And the one genuinely finished performance came from Ian Holm as Malvolio, expertly described by Ronald Bryden: 'He plays him as Olivia's sergeant-major, a small dapper disciplinarian with NCO vowels, who knows his authority resides only in his rank. Under it he combines the odd sexlessness of the military bachelor (brought from his bed by Toby's carousing, he appears in a nightcap which conceals paper curlers) with the frail petulance of a middle-aged child. For no obvious reason he's made up in the likeness of the Droeshout portrait of the Bard, but the irrelevant joke somehow fits. Holm convinces you that this is the face of self-made, middle-class Elizabethan industriousness.'

Outside the context of the RSC, Twelfth Night was inevitably seized on in the sixties as a high camp hymn to unisex: the most celebrated example was a New York musical, Your Own Thing, which predated Hair by three months and which used the framework of Shakespeare's play to advocate an unbuttoned sexual liberality. It played in London at the Comedy Theatre in 1969, but was over-shadowed by the much more melodious and free-spirited Hair. It was John Barton, however, who returned to Shakespearean basics with a legendary production that opened at Stratford in August 1969, moved to the Aldwych the following year, and was revived again at Stafford in 1971. The casting underwent a number of permutations and combinations, but the constant factors were Judi Dench's Viola, Donald Sinden's Malvolio, and Emrys James's Feste: those and John Barton's unremitting exploration of text and sub-text, his detailed exploration of character, and his well-nigh perfect achievement of the balance between comedy and tears. It was the most Chekhovian Twelfth Night most of us had even seen.

Barton's production was staged in the context of a season devoted primarily to Shakespeare's late plays for which the designer, Christopher Morley, devised an enveloping white box. He modified this, however, for Twelfth Night, as J. W. Lambert indicated in The Sunday Times:

> Christopher Morley has set this play in a long receding wattle tunnel decorated by four stately, flickering candlesticks but lit from the outside, sometimes a sombre twilit umber, sometimes soaring into sunburst brilliance. No bright colours are allowed in Stephanie Howard's costumes, though a pleasing muslin flutter invades Lisa Harrow's fresh young Olivia as she emerges from the comfortable certainties of mourning into the perilous playground of desire. But the essential furniture is all a silvery white, including the shrubbery.

The depth of perspective afforded by the tunnel was brilliantly used. At the beginning of the second scene, doors at the far end were thrown open and Judi Dench's Viola appeared in a swirl of smoke, moved slowly downstage and became, in J. C. Trewin's words, 'a figure entering a world of fantasy and uttering suddenly that romantic line, "What country friends is this?" "It is Illyria lady"; and Illyria is the country of a dream.' It was a strong contrast with Peter Hall's much more realistic entry for Viola, gratefully arriving on some distant Adriatic shore. But Barton also used the long perspective to great comic effect for the entrance of Donald Sinden's Malvolio. He entered down through the slatted tunnel practising behaviour to his own shadow, loftily extending his hand and giving curt orders in dumbshow. Before he had spoken a word, we realised that Malvolio was in the grip of his own fantasy.

But the real secret of Barton's production was that the characters were presented with all their contradictions intact and endowed with a wealth of detail. Judi Dench's Viola, for instance, in her wooing of Olivia on Orsino's behalf was more ironic than impassioned on 'Make me a willow cabin at your gate'. But the comedy gave way to something deeper in the short scene where Malvolio catches up with her to give her Olivia's ring: innocent astonishment was replaced by tremulous self-doubt on 'Disguise, I see thou art a wickedness Wherein the pregnant enemy does much'. And, yet again, this gave way to the anguish of un-spoken love as she bit her lip while watching the effect of Feste's 'Come away, come away, death' on Orsino. But this was not a performance made up of momentary effects. J. W. Lambert again got it right when he wrote: 'Miss Dench manages to be sturdy, steadfast and—if the word doesn't sound absurd—spiritual at the same time; not least in her tiny scene with the Fool and his tabor, where bickering upon a bench they seem to discover in each other the same bewildered hard-pressed love of life.'

For a description of Donald Sinden's Malvolio, I commend you to the actor's own chapter in his book Laughter in the Second Act. It offers a vivid account of the way an actor builds up a character partly by creating an imaginary biography for him and partly by seeking visual inspiration in the outside world: in this case, it was Graham Sutherland's portrait of Somerset Maugham with its turned-down mouth, its thinning hair, and its vaguely jaundiced look. Sinden also records mild disputes with John Barton about the propriety of Malvolio's responding to Olivia's injunction, 'Run after that same peevish messenger', by himself repeating the word 'Run'. Barton disapproved and asked Sinden to leave the gag out on nights when fellow-scholars were known to be in front. But Sinden is also fascinating on how he reconciled his detailed characterisation with his ability to address the audience directly. I have never, in fact, seen a Malvolio make more of the letter-reading scene simply by acknowledging our response to his words. I recall even now Sinden on 'These be her very C's, her U's and her T's; and thus makes she her great P's, shooting a lock of mock-reproof to the gallery at its burst of unseemly laughter. Sinden managed to play the house without, in any degree, diminishing his ability to play the character.

But Barton's most intriguing innovation in this production was his upgrading of the ages of the characters. The Viola and the Olivia (Lisa Harrow) were both young. But Bill Fraser's Sir Toby was an ageing, far-gone Falstaff with a touch of melancholy defeat about him. Barrie Ingham's Sir Andrew was a hapless Scot, beadily scrambling for the smallest coin in his sporran or proffering unwanted posies to Olivia: hearing that she couldn't abide anything yellow, he quietly and sadly concealed the little bunch of prim-roses with which he had been hoping to woo her and there-after carried only pink flowers. The age of Sir Toby and Sir Andrew lent extraordinary poignancy to Feste's delivery of 'O Mistress mine': the two of them sat listening to the song in a state of rheumy-eyed retrospection while Feste watched them with tender irony. And by playing Maria (first Brenda Bruce, later Elizabeth Spriggs) as a fiftyish governess rather than a pert serving-maid, Barton deepened the sense of pathos: one recalls this Maria lurking in a door's shadow to look back anxiously at Sir Toby draining one more tankard.

Barton invested Twelfth Night with psychological detail without depriving it of its magic. Indeed, J.C. Trewin picked out a revealing example of the way Barton's immaculate sense of detail enriched the production. Trewin highlighted 'the passage when, as Sebastian comes down-stage with "This is the air, that is the glorious sun", we hear faintly, from underground, the baffled sobbing of Malvolio.' This gift for allowing the mood of one scene to linger into the next is not only the mark of a great director. It is also the surest way to realise Twelfth Night to the full and to give us the play in all its emotional complexity.

'Everyone is connected to everyone else,' Ronald Bryden wrote of Barton's production, citing as an example Olivia's troubled glance after Malvolio thrust his chain of office into her hands and stumbled away. The exact opposite was true of the next RSC revival directed by Peter Gill in 1974. The dominant image on the back wall of William Dudley's bare set was of Narcissus gazing down into his pool, and we were presented with a group of characters all intoxicated with their own reflections. The function of Viola and Sebastian, as Irving Wardle noted in The Times, was 'to put them through an Ovidian obstacle course from which they learn to turn away from their mirror and form real attachments'.

All very well in theory; but, in practice, it led to a somewhat cold, unfeeling production, short on comedy and lacking that dense network of relationships one found in the Barton production. It was hard, for instance, to imagine Patricia Hayes's busy-bee Maria forming any attachment to David Waller's gruff, free-loading Sir Toby. And although Frank Thornton's Sir Andrew (elaborating on a now familiar RSC joke by wearing in his hat a yellow feather—the colour Olivia abhorred) was a rather good dejected White Knight with no will of his own, he seemed to have no particular interest in Olivia. Even the late John Price's Orsino, lying back on cushions fondling whichever favourite happened to be nearest, was simply a variation on the theme of romantic narcissism. Self-love may have been the theme, but what one missed was a particularised sense of Illyria, once excellently described by Hugh Leonard as 'a fairyland with back streets'.

As so often in a moderate Twelfth Night, one was left admiring one single performance: in this case, Nicol Williamson's Malvolio. While not being in the same class as Sinden's, it was founded on a combination of innate loneliness and emotional pain. His snarling, peremptory dismissal of Ron Pember's cockney Feste for once justified the plot against him. In the garden-scene, he cut a sadly ridiculous figure as he distended his mouth into grotesque shapes in an attempt to make the cryptic letters form a meaningful word. And in the final scene he tore Maria's epistle into miniscule fragments before departing to his own permanent private hell. Malvolio was the greatest narcissist of the lot; and the only one who finally resisted cure.

But although the production was based on a sound logical principle, it lacked lyricism and laughter. Mr. Gill made his name as a director with his meticulously realistic productions of three plays by D. H. Lawrence. But instead of applying the same kind of detail to Shakespeare, he stripped the action of social context and human warmth. It was a modest production rather than an indifferent one; but it suggested again that the dreamlike environment of Illyria needs to be realised on stage with a fierce particularity without going to the absurd lengths of the Victorian hyper-realists.

The play came round again in 1979 in a production by Terry Hands: an Anglicised reworking of a version he had originally created for the Comédie Franâaise. Some found it extravagantly original: others (myself included) thought it tended to underscore things that should rise easily from the text. Thus Mr. Hands had Geoffrey Hutchings's turnip-faced Feste (who, incidentally, was on stage throughout) repeat the line 'Youth's a stuff will not endure' [II. iii. 52] at the end of the drinking-scene lest we had missed the point. But the production was blessedly funny and offered a drastic re-interpretation of one particular role. Visually, Mr.
Hands's (and the designer John Napier's) chief conceit was to take the title literally. The evening began in midwinter with snow underfoot, bare, silvery branches, frosted crates serving as both seats and as lanterns when illuminated from within, and with a blurred, watery full moon above. Only after the interval did daffodils begin to peer and trees to blossom. As Garry O'Connor pointed out in The Financial Times, 'all very effective and decorous but it does ignore the necessity that Act Three Scenes One and Two (in which Viola returns to the proxy wooing of Olivia and Sir Andrew is dissuaded from returning home) must follow a matter of hours only after the previous scene.' The time-scheme of Twelfth Night is, in fact, a crucial matter to be explored in discussion.

But Mr. Hands's boldest stroke was to capitalise on the youthfulness of his Olivia (Kate Nicholls) by emphasising that she was smitten hip and thigh with love for Cesario. It is a mark of how much Shakespearean production had changed that back in 1955 Maxine Audley, in the prettified Gielgud production, followed stage-tradition by playing Olivia as a serene, mature beauty: Kate Nicholls was more like an Angela Brazil head-girl discovering the giddy delights of young love. Benedict Nightingale in the New Statesman approved mightily and described vividly:

She has no sooner swept on stage than she has thrown aside her mourning veil to reveal a lavish auburn mane that at once justifies her overweening vanity and gives due warning of her torrid temperament. Before long this pre-Raphaelite beauty is proclaiming her loves and hates with a flamboyance that must be audible halfway across Illyria, and enthusiastically matching voice with movement and gesture. She flirtatiously rubs up against Malvolio, flings aside the wretched Ague-Cheek, and proceeds to astonish Cesario-Viola with the physical frankness of her unruly emotions. 'To one of your receiving enough is shown,' she cries, and promptly disproves her own words by leaping at her, cuddling her, and pursuing her pell-mell through the garden. At one moment of high excitement she seems actually to be trying to rape her, and at another she blunders into and very nearly knocks flat one of the spindly, woebegone trees that cower onstage, like crones in a gymnasium. It is as if defloration were not enough: this rampaging lady will be satisfied with nothing short of deforestation.

But in addition to a rampaging, headstrong Olivia, there was a Viola from Cherie Lunghi full of wit and feeling. In her first scene, where she was shivering, barefoot and palpably shipwrecked, you actually saw her slowly forming the idea of appearing as 'an eunuch' to Orsino as if in love with the notion of him before she had seen him. And later, as they listened to Feste's 'Come away, come away, death', she wrapped him protectively in her cloak while gazing at him with enslaved intensity. John Woodvine's Malvolio was also extremely funny. For once it seemed entirely plausible that he should fall into the waiting trap since Olivia frequently nuzzled and caressed him and treated him as a useful platonic escort. Mr. Woodvine also went the whole hog by appearing not just in yellow-stockings but in a saffron body-stocking with bulging codpiece, which he periodically flashed, and in a ringleted hairdo that Harpo Marx would not have disowned. It may not have had the precise social placement of Sinden's performance, but it undeniably worked. The originality of this production, however, was that it put Olivia and Viola right at the very centre of the play, and seemed a further exploration of the idea which Shakespeare offered a couple of years earlier in As You Like It that 'Love is merely a madness'.

If Terry Hands's production was full of the wild exuberance of young love, John Caird's 1983 RSC revival was widely perceived to be dark, autumnal, and melancholic. Partly this was because of Robin Don's outdoor setting, apparently inspired by Giorgione's La Tempesta in the Academy at Venice and well described by Michael Coveney in The Financial Times: 'The play is set on a neo-classical exterior with Illyria a cliff-top retreat where the waves beat against a distant shore and a jutting, craggy knoll pushes out and away into the sky. A great gnarled tree dominates the stage. To the left, we see the neglected pillars and wrought-iron gates of Olivia's fortress. To the right, a chapel with a flickering candle by the door.' Never before had we been made so aware of the elements in a production of Twelfth Night. What is more, the permanent set managed to accommodate the play's various shifts of locale. Orsino's court was encamped on the craggy knoll. The below-stairs revels were out in the open as night gave way to dawn. The gulling of Malvolio was observed by his persecutors entwined in the branches of the overhanging tree. The Sir Topaz scene was played with Feste addressing his victim down a well. Obviously the alfresco setting made for a few textual oddities (such as Olivia's reported request to Malvolio to turn the nocturnal revellers 'out of doors') but the success of the production depended very much on its creation of a complete and plausible Illyrian world. Illona Sekacz's music, filling Illyria with waterwashed sounds, also brought the play closer to The Tempest than the inland pastoral world of As You Like It.

Inside this fantasy-world, however, there was a strong sense of emotional reality: something Mr. Caird may possibly have inherited from the production of Peter Pan that he had earlier co-directed with Trevor Nunn. Gemma Jones, for instance, made Maria a social-climbing gentle-woman, conscious of her status in Olivia's household, but also thrilled to be in the company of John Thaw's acerbic bully of a Sir Toby and raptly determined to become Lady Belch. You could even see the precise moment (her fierce bellow at Malvolio—'Go shake your ears') when she decided to burn her boats in Olivia's household and throw in her lot with the opposition. The same care was invested in the Viola-Olivia relationship. Unlike some previous Violas, Zoë Wanamaker was not tickled or amused to discover her own sexual drawing-power, but palpably troubled both by Olivia's declaration of love and by her own equivocal response to it: a contemporary female equivalent of the sexual ambiguity inherent in any Elizabethan production when two boys were thrown into close emotional contact. Without going quite as far as Mr. Hands's Olivia, Sarah Berger was also young, vehement, and quick to strike twelve, as when she intervened in Sir Toby's attack on Cesario by raining fierce blows on the back of her sottish cousin.
'Brooding' was the word Giles Gordon used to describe Mr. Caird's treatment of the play, but the comedy, where appropriate, was given due measure. The late Emrys James was always a full-blooded actor and his Malvolio was characteristically robust. One thing about the character has become increasingly clear over the years. If Malvolio is no more than an uppish steward, then the plot against him leaves behind a sour taste. If, however, he is genuinely threatening, the machinations of Maria and the rest have some motive. Emrys James realised that, making him an obstreperous, finger-wagging tyrant who genuinely deserved a moral lesson. But Mr. James (Feste in the Barton production) had also learned something from Sinden's technique of acknowledging the audience: in this case, Mr. James whipped himself into a state of erotic fervour while reading the letter, which he then proceeded to brandish at the front stalls in a state of sheer disbelief. The comedy in Mr. Caird's production was there (not least in Daniel Massey's goofy, limp-stockinged Ague-Cheek, constantly looking on at the witty folk in dazed incomprehension) but it derived from character and served as a counterpoint to the autumnal setting.

Four years later the play came round again at Stratford-upon-Avon in Bill Alexander's production: a highly enjoyable one that raised many fascinating questions. The determining feature was Kit Surrey's geographically precise set: a sun-kissed, white-walled, travel-brochure Greek island full of shadowy ginnels and exotic arches. This was an Illyria that existed as a real place on the map. But, in dispensing with such traditional features as a ring of box-trees for Olivia's garden, Mr. Alexander had to come up with new solutions to old problems: thus in the gulling of Malvolio the malevolent jokers were not placed immediately behind the uppity steward but peered at him through overhead windows. Some, such as Michael Coveney, welcomed the jettisoning of generations of hackneyed stage-business. Others, such as Stanley Wells in Shakespeare Survey 41, debated the wisdom of relocating that particular scene: 'Much of the scene's comedy', wrote Professor Wells, 'derives from the tension between Malvolio's self-absorption and the danger that they (Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, and Fabian) will burst into it with their outraged reactions to his presumptions. Placing them in windows where they had little freedom of movement upset the balance of the scene, throwing too much emphasis on Malvolio's fantasies, too little on the tricksters who had stimulated them.'

But in Stratford-on-Avon, where Antony Sher played the part, Malvolio's fantasies were very much at the heart of the production. Mr. Sher and Mr. Alexander had worked together twice before, on Richard HI and (earlier in the same season) The Merchant of Venice: the result, on each occasion, had been a crucial redefinition of the central character. The intention here, quite clearly, was to push both the comedy and tragedy of Malvolio to its utmost limits: opinions varied wildly on how far the device succeeded, but it was certainly an audacious experiment.

In the early scenes, Mr. Sher was outrageously funny. He came on looking like a bug-eyed Archbishop Makarios dressed in black from his fez to his gaiters. You could see that he was totally enslaved by Olivia by the way he rushed off to rinse her tear-stained handkerchief under the village pump and by his unnerving habit of popping up from behind walls like a private eye every time she cried 'What ho'. In the cross-gartered scene he even turned the linings of his pockets and hat inside out to show that they too were yellow.

The real controversy centred on the final scenes, which Mr. Sher played as if Malvolio had been driven out of his wits: in the prison-scene he was tethered to a stake by a halter and he was last seen essaying cross-gartered high kicks as if totally deranged. Stanley Wells made the point that 'If Malvolio has a tragedy, it is not that he goes mad but that he remains irremediably sane.' But, for Charles Osborne in The Daily Telegraph, Mr. Sher remained 'the most charismatic Malvolio I have seen since Donald Sinden and Laurence Olivier'.

But the production was not sheer Sher. Harriet Walter's Viola had a gentle erotic melancholy: I also retain an image of her, at the moment of Sebastian's reappearance, standing with hands flattened against the wall, like a knifethrower's apprentice, in stunned disbelief. David Bradley's Auge-Cheek was also far and away the best since Richard Johnson's in Peter Hall's production. Mr. Bradley's mournful, spaniel eyes and long, lean body, tapering down to spindle shanks in bedraggled green stockings, induced laughter every time he came on stage.
He also combined the manic with the depressive. During the midnight revels he suddenly went wild and started jumping vehemently up and down on the spot as if treading invisible grapes. But when urged later by Roger Allam's strong, bullying Sir Toby (Hardy to his Laurel), he vaguely demurred and limped off to his cubiculo, only to crawl back seconds later to fulfil his role of eternal whipping-boy. A brilliant performance in a production that (as often happens) matured between Stratford and London, and that raised many important questions. To what extent is Illyria a state of mind or a real Mediterranean locale? And how much is the play Malvolio's tragedy or simply a turning-point in Shakespearean comedy in which, for the first time, the merry fooling is pervaded by a sense of loss?

It is a measure of the extent to which new young companies capable of performing Shakespeare are springing up that in the same year (1987) as Mr. Alexander's production opened in Stratford, two other versions of Twelfth Night were seen in London. Diversity is good—but both of the rival productions raised fundamental questions about the staging of Shakespeare and the extent to which liberties may be taken with the text.

Declan Donnellan's production for Cheek by Jowl, which arrived in London at the Donmar Warehouse after a long provincial tour, was by far the more irreverent of the two. It began with Viola's arrival in Illyria. It treated Ague-Cheek as, in Michael Ratcliffe's phrase, 'a tumescent jack-rabbit from the boondocks of Middle America', and gave the saxophone-playing Maria a Brooklyn twang. It had Orsino petting Cesario as heavily and unequivocally as Olivia did. It showed the gay Antonio at the last striking up a liaison with Feste. And, most controversially, it had the midnight revelers singing a drunken, bellowed version of 'My Way'. How one reacted was a matter of choice. For Michael Ratcliffe in The Observer, 'This was a Twelfth Night for those who have never seen the play before and those who thought they never wanted to see it again.' For Peter Kemp in The Independent: 'Self-indulgence—mocked in Twelfth Night—is pandered to in this production. The cast strain to seem cute and street-wise. But, for all their contortions in search of "sophistication", clod-hopping callowness prevails.'

Kenneth Branagh directed a much more sober and intelligent production for the Renaissance Theatre Company at the Riverside Studios. I felt there were some mistakes. The snow-flaked Victorian Christmas setting swathed the production in a misleading prettiness. Some of the darker areas of the play went unexplored: the Sir Toby was simply a bland buffoon and the Maria a neat lady's maid with little hint of admiration for a drunken sot. And, once again, the order of the first two scenes was reversed, which implied a certain tone-deafness to Shakespeare's musical statement of his themes.

But, elsewhere, Mr. Branagh showed a sensitivity to the play's shifting mood and combined a first-rate Malvolio (Richard Briers) with a sense of ensemble. The Victorian setting helped to give social precision to a Malvolio whom Mr. Briers played as a frockcoated, wildly ambitious fanatic: a combination of Mr. Murdstone and Samuel Smiles. For once his ambitions had more to do with class than sex. In the box-tree scene, Mr. Briers skirted the usual innuendoes to stress his dream of being 'Count Malvolio'; and at his next sighting of Sir Toby he extended to him an outflung hand like a Richard the Third who had been boning up on Self-Help. It was a star performance without being a stage-hogging one, and was nicely balanced by Anton Lesser's shaggy-locked Feste, Frances Barber's clear-spoken Viola, and Caroline Langrishe's Olivia, who combined aristocratic beauty with clear hints that she could not wait to get her hands on Orsino's boy-emissary.

Looking back over its stage history, what is clear is that Twelfth Night is now and always has been an extremely elusive play. It rarely fails to afford pleasure or to yield a batch of memorable performances. But, equally, it is difficult to achieve what Stanley Wells calls 'the transmuting alchemy' that unlocks its ambivalent darkness and resonant comedy…. How does one achieve a balance between the play's light and dark aspects? How much of the mood of a production is determined by the casting and, specifically, the age of the actors involved? How far can one go in treating the play as a realistic picture of a particular society? Is there any one character who determines the tone of a production? How does one embody Illyria on stage?
Obviously there is no single, right or wrong answer to these or multifarious other questions. Each production throws up its own solutions. But only by addressing the questions with skilled practitioners can one begin to get to the heart of this most haunting, beautiful, and opal-like of all Shakespeare's comedies.

Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 26): Staging Issues

Harley Granville-Barker (essay date 1912)

[Granville-Barker was a noted actor, playwright, director, and critic who, in his productions of Shakespeare's plays, emphasized simplicity in staging, set design, and costume. In the following essay, originally published in 1912, he provides an account of how Twelfth Night should be staged and acted.]

Twelfth Night is classed, as to the period of its writing, with Much Ado About Nothing, As You Like It, and Henry V. But however close in date, in spirit I am very sure it is far from them. I confess to liking those other three as little as any plays he ever wrote. I find them so stodgily good, even a little (dare one say it?) vulgar, the work of a successful man who is caring most for success. I can imagine the lovers of his work losing hope in the Shakespeare of that year or two. He was thirty-five and the first impulse of his art had spent itself. He was popular. There was welcome enough, we may be sure, for as many Much Ado's and As You Like It's and jingo history pageants as he'd choose to manufacture. It was a turning point and he might have remained a popular dramatist. But from some rebirth in him that mediocre satisfaction was foregone, and, to our profit at least, came Hamlet, Macbeth, Lear, and the rest. Hamlet, perhaps, was popular, though Burbage may have claimed a just share in making it so. But I doubt if the great heart of the public would beat any more constantly towards the rarer tragedies in that century and society than it will in this. To the average man or play-goer three hundred or indeed three thousand years are as a day. While we have Shakespeare's own comment even on that 'supporter to a state,' Polonius (true type of the official mind. And was he not indeed Lord Chamberlain?), that where art is concerned 'He's for a jig, or a tale of bawdry, or he sleeps.'

Twelfth Night is, to me, the last play of Shakespeare's golden age. I feel happy ease in the writing, and find much happy carelessness in the putting together. It is akin to the Two Gentlemen of Verona (compare Viola and Julia), it echoes a little to the same tune as the sweeter parts of the Merchant of Venice, and its comic spirit is the spirit of the Falstaff scenes of Henry IV, that are to my taste the truest comedy he wrote.

There is much to show that the play was designed for performance upon a bare platform stage without traverses or inner rooms or the like. It has the virtues of this method, swiftness and cleanness of writing and simple directness of arrangement even where the plot is least simple. It takes full advantage of the method's convenience. The scene changes constantly from anywhere suitable to anywhere else that is equally so. The time of the play's action is any time that suits the author as he goes along. Scenery is an inconvenience. I am pretty sure that Shakespeare's performance went through without a break. Certainly its conventional arrangement into five acts for the printing of the Folio is neither by Shakespeare's nor any other sensitive hand; it is shockingly bad.…

I believe the play was written with a special cast in mind. Who was Shakespeare's clown, a sweet-voiced singer and something much more than a comic actor? He wrote Feste for him, and later the Fool in Lear. At least, I can conceive no dramatist risking the writing of such parts unless he knew he had a man to play them. And why a diminutive Maria—Penthesilea, the youngest wren of nine—unless it was only that the actor of the part was to be such a very small boy? I have cudgelled my brains to discover why Maria, as Maria, should be tiny, and finding no reason have ignored the point.
I believe too (this is a commonplace of criticism) that the plan of the play was altered in the writing of it. Shakespeare sets out upon a passionate love romance, perseveres in this until (one detects the moment, it is that jolly mid-night revel) Malvolio, Sir Toby and Sir Andrew completely capture him. Even then, perhaps, Maria's notable revenge on the affectioned ass is still to be kept within bounds. But two scenes later he begins to elaborate the new idea. The character of Fabian is added to take Feste's share of the rough practical joke and set him free for subtler wit. Then Shakespeare lets fling and works out the humorous business to his heart's content. That done, little enough space is left him if the play is to be over at the proper hour, and, it may be (if the play was being prepared for an occasion, the famous festivity in the Middle Temple Hall or another), there was little enough time to finish writing it in either. From any cause, we certainly have a scandalously ill-arranged and ill-written last scene, the despair of any stage manager. But one can discover, I believe, amid the chaos scraps of the play he first meant to write. Olivia suffers not so much by the midway change of plan, for it is about her house that the later action of the play proceeds, and she is on her author's hands. It is on Orsino, that interesting romantic, that the blow falls.

Why should I not, had I the heart to do it,
Like to the Egyptian thief at point of death,
Kill what I love?—a savage jealousy
That sometime savours nobly.
[V. i. 117-20]

On that fine fury of his—shamefully reduced to those few lines—I believe the last part of the play was to have hung. It is too good a theme to have been meant to be so wasted. And the revelation of Olivia's marriage to his page (as he supposes), his reconciliation with her, and the more vital discovery that his comradely love for Viola is worth more to him after all than any high-sounding passion, is now all muddled up with the final rounding off of the comic relief. The character suffers severely. Orsino remains a finely interesting figure; he might have been a magnificent one. But there, it was Shakespeare's way to come out on the other side of his romance.

The most important aspect of the play must be viewed, to view it rightly, with Elizabethan eyes. Viola was played, and was meant to be played, by a boy. See what this involves. To that original audience the strain of make-believe in the matter ended just where for us it most begins, at Viola's entrance as a page. Shakespeare's audience saw Cesario without effort as Orsino sees him; more importantly they saw him as Olivia sees him; indeed it was over Olivia they had most to make believe. One feels at once how this affects the sympathy and balance of the love scenes of the play. One sees how dramatically right is the delicate still grace of the dialogue between Orsino and Cesario, and how possible it makes the more outspoken passion of the scenes with Olivia. Give to Olivia, as we must do now, all the value of her sex, and to the supposed Cesario none of the value of his, we are naturally quite un-moved by the business. Olivia looks a fool. And it is the common practice for actresses of Viola to seize every chance of reminding the audience that they are girls dressed up, to impress on one moreover, by childish by-play as to legs and petticoats or the absence of them, that this is the play's supreme joke. Now Shakespeare has devised one most carefully placed soliloquy where we are to be forcibly reminded that Cesario is Viola; in it he has as carefully divided the comic from the serious side of the matter. That scene played, the Viola, who does not do her best, as far as the passages with Olivia are concerned, to make us believe, as Olivia believes, that she is a man, shows, to my mind, a lack of imagination and is guilty of dramatic bad manners, knocking, for the sake of a little laughter, the whole of the play's romantic plot on the head.

Let me explain briefly the interpretation I favour of four or five other points.

I do not think that Sir Toby is meant for nothing but a bestial sot. He is a gentleman by birth, or he would not be Olivia's uncle (or cousin, if that is the relationship). He has been, it would seem, a soldier. He is a drinker, and while idleness leads him to excess, the boredom of Olivia's drawing-room, where she sits solitary in her mourning, drives him to such jolly companions as he can find: Maria and Fabian and the Fool. He is a poor relation, and has been dear to Sir Andrew some two thousand strong or so (poor Sir Andrew), but as to that he might say he was but anticipating his commission as matrimonial agent. Now, dull though Olivia's house may be, it is free quarters. He is, it seems, in some danger of losing them, but if only by good luck he could see Sir Andrew installed there as master! Not perhaps all one could wish for in an uncle; but to found an interpretation of Sir Toby only upon a study of his unfortunate surname is, I think, for the actor to give us both less and more than Shakespeare meant.

I do not believe that Sir Andrew is meant for a cretinous idiot. His accomplishments may not quite stand to Sir Toby's boast of them; alas! the three or four languages, word for word without book, seem to end at 'Dieu vous garde, Monsieur.' But Sir Andrew, as he would be if he could—the scholar to no purpose, the fine fellow to no end, in short the perfect gentleman—is still the ideal of better men than he who yet can find nothing better to do. One can meet a score of Sir Andrews, in greater or less perfection, any day after a west-end London lunch, doing, what I believe is called, a slope down Bond.

Fabian, I think, is not a young man, for he hardly treats Sir Toby as his senior, he is the cautious one of the practical jokers, and he has the courage to speak out to Olivia at the end. He treats Sir Andrew with a certain respect. He is a family retainer of some sort; from his talk he has to do with horses and dogs.

Feste, I feel, is not a young man either. There runs through all he says and does that vein of irony by which we may so often mark one of life's self-acknowledged failures. We gather that in those days, for a man of parts without character and with more wit than sense, there was a kindly refuge from the world's struggle as an allowed fool. Nowadays we no longer put them in livery.

I believe Antonio to be an exact picture of an Elizabethan seaman-adventurer, and Orsino's view of him to be just such as a Spanish grandee would have taken of Drake. 'Notable pirate' and 'salt-water thief,' he calls him.

A bawbling vessel was he captain of,
For shallow draught and bulk unprizable;
With which such scathful grapple did he make
With the most noble bottom of our fleet,
That very envy and the tongue of loss
Cried fame and honour on him.
[V.i.54-9]

And Antonio is a passionate fellow as those west countrymen were. I am always reminded of him by the story of Richard Grenville chewing a wineglass in his rage.

The keynotes of the poetry of the play are that it is passionate and it is exquisite. It is life, I believe, as Shakespeare glimpsed it with the eye of his genius in that halfItalianised court of Elizabeth. Orsino, Olivia, Antonio, Sebastian, Viola are passionate all, and conscious of the worth of their passion in terms of beauty. To have one's full laugh at the play's comedy is no longer possible, even for an audience of Elizabethan experts. Though the humour that is set in character is humour still, so much of the salt of it, its play upon the time and place, can have no savour for us. Instead we have learned editors disputing over the existence and meaning of jokes at which the simplest soul was meant to laugh unthinkingly. I would cut out nothing else, but I think I am justified in cutting those pathetic survivals.

Finally, as to the speaking of the verse and prose. The prose is mostly simple and straightforward. True, he could no more resist a fine-sounding word than, as has been said, he could resist a pun. They abound, but if we have any taste for the flavour of a language he makes us delight in them equally. There is none of that difficult involuted decoration for its own sake in which he revelled in the later plays. The verse is still regular, still lyrical in its inspiration, and it should I think be spoken swiftly.…

I think that all Elizabethan dramatic verse must be spoken swiftly, and nothing can make me think otherwise. My fellow workers acting in The Winter's Tale were accused by some people (only by some) of gabbling. I readily take that accusation on myself, and I deny it. Gabbling implies hasty speech, but our ideal was speed, nor was the speed universal, nor, but in a dozen well-defined passages, really so great. Unexpected it was, I don't doubt; and once exceed the legal limit, as well accuse you of seventy miles an hour as twenty-one. But I call in question the evidence of mere policemen-critics. I question a little their expertness of hearing, a little too their quickness of understanding Elizabethan English not at its easiest, just a little their lack of delight in anything that is not as they thought it always would be, and I suggest that it is more difficult than they think to look and listen and remember and appraise all in the same flash of time. But be all the short-comings on one side and that side ours, it is still no proof that the thing come short of is not the right thing. That is the important point to determine, and for much criticism that has been helpful in amending what we did and making clearer what we should strive towards—I tender thanks.

The Winter's Tale, as I see its writing, is complex, vivid, abundant in the variety of its mood and pace and colour, now disordered, now at rest, the product of a mind rapid, changing, and over-full. I believe its interpretation should express all that. Twelfth Night is quite other. Daily, as we rehearse together, I learn more what it is and should be; the working together of the theatre is a fine thing. But, as a man is asked to name his stroke at billiards, I will even now commit myself to this: its serious mood is passionate, its verse is lyrical, the speaking of it needs swiftness and fine tone; not rush, but rhythm, constant and compelling. And now I wait contentedly to be told that less rhythmic speaking of Shakespeare has never been heard.

Herbert Farjeon (essay date 1937)

[In the following essay, originally published in 1937, Farjeon comments on several issues associated with the staging of Twelfth Night in the late nineteenth and early twentieth-centuries.]

In the Henry Irving edition of Shakespeare, published fifty years ago, the famous actor-manager marked in all the plays those passages which, in his opinion, might suitably be left out when the plays were performed. Many of these cuts were made on the ground of propriety. In Twelfth Night, an unusually "pure" play, sixteen offending passages, now fearlessly spoken and unblushingly heard, were square-bracketed. That, in the Victorian age, was only to be expected. Other excisions are more difficult to account for. The first really startling cut comes in the drinking scene, where the passage preceding, following, and including the singing of "O mistress mine" is recommended for omission. The second really startling cut is the passage preceding, following, and including the singing of "Come away, come away, death". Thus the leading Shakespearean manager of the 'eighties and 'nineties made his C's, his U's and his T's. Now, the melancholy god protect him!

Playgoers have only to see the present production of Twelfth Night at the Old Vic to appreciate the dramatic value of Feste's songs. "O mistress mine," concentrating into a dozen lines of divine harmony all the philosophy of Omar Khayyam, makes the moment it apostrophizes one with the eternity it is reluctant to contemplate. Sir Toby and Sir Andrew, under the melting influence of music and canary, become demi-gods (if rather obfuscated demigods!) as they listen. Hearing the song, as we do, through their ears, how much lovelier it becomes than when sung out of context, though even then it is lovely enough. "Come away, come away, death," we hear again through the ears of those on the stage. Orsino is the First Listener, for Olivia becomes the "fair cruel maid" by whom he is "slain". Yet one hears this song at second remove through the ears of Viola, the Second Listener, who does not receive the air directly, for Orsino is between her and it, and all through the singing she, whose emotions are realer and stronger than Orsino's, reacts to his reactions. This is a relationship not explicitly set down in the text but so inevitable that no actress playing the part of Viola ever misses it. As for "When that I was", here is surely the most perfect conclusion to any comedy ever devised, though the cuckoo song in Love's Labour's Lost runs it close. Even Henry Irving—a great actor but not a great Shakespearean—could not bring himself to blue-pencil this.

Augustin Daly, who was a far greater offender than Irving, did not Gut out songs. He put them in. When he produced Twelfth Night, he began with a storm on the sea-shore, for the first scene of this amazing version was that between Antonio and Sebastian. Then, similarity to The Tempest having been established, on came a band of blithe seashore, warbling "Come unto these yellow sands". A little later Viola sat up on a bench like patience on a monument while Orsino's minstrels serenaded Olivia with "Who's Olivia? What is she that all our swains commend her?" This put Mr. Daly in some perplexity when he came, later, to produce The Two Gentlemen of Verona. Beer-bohm Tree's version was better, but so elaborate was the setting of Olivia's garden, with "real grass, real fountains, paths and descending steps," that it could not be shifted and had to be used for episodes that were quite out of place in it.

Shakespeare's plays are full of mysteries, and there is one mystery in Twelfth Night which has always perplexed me and which I have never seen discussed. When Maria forged her letter, why did she write "M, O, A, I," instead of "M, A, I, O"? As Malvolio says, M begins his name, but "A should follow … there is no consonancy in the sequel." Although the letter goes on, "If this fall into thy hand, revolve", this hardly dissipates the doubt which was the last thing Maria wanted to set up in Malvolio's mind. Why, then, did Shakespeare write "M, O, A, I"? Is there some latent sequential consonancy that was understood by the audience? If so, what was it? I should be glad to hear theories. So here, Baconians and Oxfordians, is your chance.

If music be the food of luv, ply on,
Give me excess of it; that soorfayting
The appeteet my sicken and saw deec.
That strine agen, it had a deeing fahl;
Aw, it kime o'er mee air, leek the sweet soond
That braythes upon a bank of veeolets, Stayling, and giving odour.

[Li. 1-7]

The above is a very rough transcription of the opening lines of Twelfth Night as they would have sounded, according to professors of phonetics, if you had attended a performance of the play in Shakespeare's day. So the strange symphony would have continued. You would have heard Viola declaring that her father's daughter "never tawld her luv" (north country) but "sat leek Pytience on a monument smeeling at grief." You would have heard the Clown sounding his k's in "knave" and "knight"—"Ee shall be constrined to cahl thee k-nive, kneecht." And the proceedings would have concluded with the cockney lament that "The rine it rineth every dye."

For the Old Vic to plunge back to Elizabethan pronunciation would be disastrous, but in the case of words used for rhyming purposes, as "adieu" rhyming with "you", should not the pronunciation be consistently Elizabethan throughout? And should not the same principle be applied to words used for punning purposes, since modern pronunciation sometimes makes the sense of Shakespeare's puns unintelligible? Take this passage in Twelfth Night:

Sir Andrew. I would I had bestowed that time in the tongues, that I have in fencing, dancing and bear-baiting. O, had I but followed the arts!
Sir Toby. Then hadst thou had an excellent head of hair.
Sir Andrew. Why, would that have mended my hair?
Sir Toby. Past question, for thou seest it will not curl by nature.

Sir Toby's explanation leaves modern audiences completely fogged. Shakespeare's pronunciation clears the matter up, for in his day "tongues" and "tongs" were pronounced alike.

Who is Fabian? What is he? Where does he spring from? Why is he introduced into the play at all? Here is a Shakespearean mystery that has been left unexplored. Is there any other character in Shakespeare with so many words to say who remains so completely characterless? Sometimes he is played young, sometimes middle-aged, sometimes bearded, sometimes clean-shaven, sometimes well-born, sometimes plebeian: a jack-of-all-types. Nearly all the lines that Fabian speaks could be spoken equally well by some other character on the stage. It is almost as though Shakespeare had dodged up an extra part at the last moment to give a player a job.

The English climate was as damp in Elizabeth's day as it is now. The groundlings must often have stood in the rain (being as enthusiastic as football crowds) during open-air performances. If 1601 was a wet summer, what an apt song for an auditorium open to the sky must have been the Clown's "With hey, ho, the wind and the rain!" Can't you see the groundlings, as they join in the chorus, drawing their old cloaks around them?

Arthur Colby Sprague (essay date 1944)

[In the following excerpt, Sprague examines the handling of stage business in various productions of Twelfth Night.]

The fact that this most delightful of Shakespeare's comedies was on the boards in the sixteen-sixties, when Pepys saw it more than once—"a silly play," he calls it, "and not related at all to the name or day"—may well be misleading. For though, in 1703, Twelfth Night furnished ideas and a certain number of lines to a negligible piece by William Burnaby called Love Betray'd, it was not acted again until 1741, this time, we may be certain, without the slightest guidance from tradition.

It has long been customary for Viola, in the second scene, to be accompanied by two sailors carrying a "trunk" or "chest." Why, by the way, it is perfectly seemly for Viola, landing, in Illyria, to have luggage, when it would be slightly ridiculous for Hamlet, setting out for England, to have any, is matter for thought. Miss Helen Hayes, I recall, upon entering pretended to shake sand from her shoe.

Sir Andrew Aguecheek's demonstration of dancing and capering is the most notable bit of business in Scene 3. In one of two Twelfth Night promptbooks prepared by George Becks (this one identified by a reference to Adelaide Neilson), when Sir Toby says "Let me see thee caper," "Sir A does so—Sir Toby taps his cane on stage—higher &c.—Sir Toby laughing & applauding"—and the friends go out "laughing & capering." A "Walkg Cane each" for the frolicsome knights is called for in Mrs. Shaw's prompt-book (c. 1850). For a more subtle touch [in Gordon Crosse, Fifty Years of Shakespearean Playgoing, 1941], one reads of Norman Forbes, the Aguecheek in Tree's production, that "his startled look when he caught sight of Maria over Sir Toby's shoulder as the knights embraced, was by itself worth the money." Equally happy was an idea of Kate Terry's in the next scene: Viola's "quick turn at the sound of [Orsino's] voice in the question 'Where's Caesario?'" Tree as Malvolio entered in state, attended by "four smaller Malvolios, who aped the great chamberlain in dress, in manners, in deportment. He had a magnificent flight of stairs on the stage; and when he was descending it majestically, he slipped and fell with a crash sitting." Mr. Bernard Shaw [in Herbert Beerbohm Tree, 1920] yet finds that this was not "mere clowning.… Tree, without betraying the smallest discomfiture, raised his eye-glass and surveyed the landscape as if he had sat down on purpose." Irving had entered with upturned nose, "and eyes half shut, as if with singular and moody contemplation [Edward R. Russel, "Mr. Irving's Work," Fortnightly Review (September 1, 1884)]. Sent to admit Cesario, Malvolio has sometimes returned with him, to linger on the stage for whatever values might be obtained from his silent presence. Thus, Daly made Cesario's "some mollification for your giant, sweet lady" [I. x. 204] apply to him and not to the little "wren," Maria—and was taken to task by Archer for doing so. Two mid-nineteenth-century prompt notes of John Moore's may be quoted in passing. Sir Toby's entrance is "with slightly unsteady gait—Hat over eyes, and cloak awry," and, before "A plague o' these pickleherring!" "Pause slight Belch." Later, when Olivia says "I thank you for your pains," it is, "Retreating gradually to wing her eyes fixed on Viola—suddenly and eagerly advances to her and offers a purse."

Malvolio has long carried a wand; but it seems to have been Tree who first used the still familiar business of slipping Olivia's ring over the point of this wand and dropping it, churlishly enough, at Cesario's feet. In Viola's soliloquy, which follows this incident in Act II, Scene 2, Mrs. Charles Kean (Ellen Tree) is criticized by George Henry Lewes [in The Leader (October 5, 1850)]:

> The look with which she said "I am the man" was perfect; but that little saucy tap on her head, with the playful swagger which followed it, though they "brought down the house," appeared to us to betray a forgetfulness of Viola …

a passing into "the lower orbit of a soubrette." Julia Marlowe used regularly to check off on her fingers the several items in Viola's complicated account—"My master loves her dearly," etc.

Voices have been raised from time to time in protest against the farcical extravagances of the so-called Kitchen Scene (II, 3). Thus, Joseph Knight in 1878 was "almost certain" that the traditional business dated back "to the time of the Restoration"—though not to a still earlier period, because there were too few of the elder actors who survived the long years during which the theatres were closed. Even so, he found the behavior of the drunken knights "preposterous, unnatural, inartistic, and wholly out of keeping with the general scope of the play." Mr. G. R. Foss, in 1932, not only spoke out against the same ancient abuses, but advanced reasons for supposing that the scene does not take place in a kitchen at all. He even denies that it is a drinking scene! Rather, Sir Toby and Sir Andrew upon their return from carousing have ventured into a part of the great house where their uproar is audible. Twice they call to Maria "to bring drink, but she never does." The last point seems to me indemonstrable.

Our first glimpse of the scene is pleasant enough. Dunlap saw Twelfth Night at Drury Lane about 1785.

> The picture presented, when the two knights are discovered with their pipes and potations, as exhibited by Dodd and Palmer, is ineffaceable.… [Dodd's] thin legs in scarlet stockings, his knees raised nearly to his chin, by placing his feet on the front cross-piece of the chair (the degraded drunkards being seated with a table, tankards, pipes, and candles, between them), a candle in one hand and pipe in the other, endeavouring in vain to bring the two together; while, in representing the swaggering Sir Toby, Palmer's gigantic limbs outstretched seemed to indicate the enjoyment of that physical superiority which nature had given him [History of the American Theatre, 1833].

A generation later, the drunkenness of Liston's Sir Andrew made "his eyes dim and his feet tremble, without making his idiotism more senseless … his attempt to light his pipe was amusingly unsuccessful" [as quoted in the European Magazine (December, 1820)]. Mrs. Shaw's promptbook calls for a "Long Pipe" each, for Sir Toby and his companion—and they were still smoking when Mr. Crosse saw them in Daly's production, and in Benson's wielded churchwardens.

Shortly after Malvolio's entrance, comes this scrap of dialogue:

Clown, [sings] His eyes do show his days are almost done.

Mal. Isn't even so?

To. But I will never die.

Clown. Sir Toby, there you lie.

[In his Notes and Various Readings, 1779] Capell, who thinks often in terms of the stage, calls the last speech "a waggish remark in tune upon a great stumble of sir Toby's which brings him almost upon his nose." Bell's edition (1774) has Sir Toby fall down singing. Of course, Sir Andrew goes to his assistance, and of course, in time, he too falls down. Then, according to Beck's promptnotes ("1864"), "Maria & Clown assist them, put them back to back—&c &c—ad lib." "Mal gets L—Sir A X L tries to light his pipe at Mals candle—comic bus—blow it out"; and, as the intruder turns to go, "Clown crows, flaps his arms as though they were wings . . .". Moore has Sir Toby cross to Malvolio: "fills his fingers in his face—and Xes behind back to R.H. kissing his hand to Maria as he passes. Clown Xes in the same manner and round again to his place. Sir A. Xes, but is too drunk or stupid to say anything." Malvolio exists, "shaking his head & hand threateningly," and Sir Toby "throws his pipe" after him.

It would be tedious to dwell on such inanities. A general warning must, however, be offered. It is Malvolio who gives offense here; Malvolio who provokes vengeance. I well remember Maude Adams's angry walking up and down as the plan is taking shape in Maria's mind. "Go shake your ears!" she had flung after him, as he went. If, on the contrary, an excess of physical abuse is meted out to the Steward, in this scene, he may, himself, become the injured party with much loss of meaning to what follows.

Near the end of the scene, Beck's "1864" promptbook has:

Sir Andrew keeps repeating "Cut" as if it was the best joke in the world, laughing at it holding his sides—both Exeunt laughing loudly, or Sir Toby takes candle (also Sir A) from Table Comic bus—Toby mugs & holds candle to Sir A's face—he blows it out—then Toby tries to light it & fails—then make a desperate thrust—fails & both go up stairs—Sir Toby on hand & knees—when at top—rolls down.

Of a performance by the Benson Company at the Lyceum, The Athenæum (March 31, 1900) writes stuffily: "When Sir Andrew thrusts his long churchwarden tobacco-pipe through his belt as a sword, and when he and Sir Toby, after wild farcical business with their candles, stretch themselves out at full length … the effect is to us as depressing as it is inspiring to the uneducated portion of the public."

In the scene between Orsino and Viola (II, 4), Ada Rehan, upon receiving the chain which she is to give the Countess, "raised it to her lips and reverently kissed it." Julia Marlowe writes interestingly about another passage, the lines beginning "She never told her love." At one time, she had "endeavored to aid Shakespeare" and bring out the speaker's "shyness by coyly fingering Viola's little red cap. The result was that there was a great deal of red cap and not nearly enough of the maiden's perturbation." When, on the contrary, she had last played the part (this was written in 1901), she had "made an effort to keep everything still"—even to the ends of her fingers.
Experience has taught me that … we cannot go far wrong if we let the lines have the center of the stage and allow them to show the poet's meaning. We cannot aid him by a multitude of gestures or by creating of intricate "business." ["The Essentials of Stage Success," Theatre (December 1901)].

On Malvolio's approach, in the Letter Scene, Moore's promptbook has: "Sir A. goes to pick up the letter. Toby pulls him to bush, C." Sometimes, Sir Toby and Fabian have hidden themselves behind a tree, with Sir Andrew actually climbing the tree and putting his head out through the branches—a refinement of which Becks notes, "This is better after duel." The Steward reads—and greatness is thrust upon him. "How he went smiling to himself," Lamb writes of Bensley [in his Dramatic Essays, 1891], "with what ineffable carelessness would he twirl his gold chain; what a dream it was!" Or there was Charles Fisher, at Burton's Theatre in 1853: "When it comes home to him at last that he indeed is the favored of Olivia… he was inimitable. Already [in fancy] he is clothed in yellow-stockings and cross-gartered; and he smiles, as he struts, [writes William L. Keese in his William E. Burton, 1885].

In the third act there is little to detain us until we come to the Duel Scene. Henry Austin Clapp, writing of a performance by Daly's Company at the Hollis Street Theatre, Boston [in the Boston Advertiser (April 18, 1893)], protests vigorously against the impertinent and monstrously absurd introduction of Sir Andrew silently to threaten Viola with his sword in her chief scene with Olivia, as if Olivia's faintly ironical phrase, "Be not afraid, good youth," needed any explanation when followed without pause by "I will not have you."

There could be no better example, indeed, of "business out of keeping with the plain meaning of what Shakespeare wrote." When, in Scene 4, Malvolio enters, no longer "sad and civil" but "in very strange manner," we hear again of Lamb's Mr. Bensley:

All his peculiarities of deportment … aided his exhibition of the steward—the sliding zig-zag advance and retreat of his figure fixed the attention to his stockings and his garters. His constrained smile, his hollow laugh, his lordly assumption, and his ineffable contempt of all that opposed him in the way to greatness were irresistibly diverting.

Fancy such a Malvolio exposed to the familiarity of Belch's "How dost thou, chuck?" accompanied as it sometimes was by a slap on the back!

In the eighteenth-century theatre, two armed grenadiers were posted one on each side of the proscenium, where they remained throughout the performance mute and un-regarded. On October 28, 1763, one of these sentries, at Drury Lane, behaved most strangely, falling down "in a kind of fit" during the encounter between Viola and Sir Andrew. Explanations were promptly offered: as that his collapse was due to fear; that it resulted from excessive laughter, which seems somewhat more probable; that it had been arranged beforehand since "it was proper for Sir Andrew to place himself in that part of the stage the soldier occupied." Sir Andrew in later times has taken refuge in strange places. Mr. Liston, at Covent Garden in 1820, "violated the whole illusion of his duel-scene with Viola, by climbing up a part of the proscenium." Mr. Mason, in Edinburgh five years later, climbed up a rope-ladder—"but even that he makes in perfect keeping with the character." In Moore's promptbook, at line 342, the duellists advance towards centre—swords extended—but neither looking at his adversary, in centre the swords meet this frightens them, and they turn away ["causing Sir Toby and Fabian to bump together" inserted] & again are brought back by Sir Toby & Fabian—Advance as before Viola hits Sir Andrew on the leg—he holloas runs away and begin to climb tree L up stage.
By this time, however, if not before, he was more likely to postpone his climbing until Sir Toby crosses swords with Antonio. Then, when the brawl is over, Sir Toby calls him and he answers from among the branches—"Here I am.

As for Viola, enough perhaps that Madame Modjeska realized that her antagonist was not in the least dangerous, had a good opportunity to hit him, and refrained from doing so, out of "womanly generosity"; whereas Julia Arthur beat her Sir Andrew first "with her sword, and then with her hands across his bent back."

One last glimpse of the knight comes from The Examiner June 5, 1808, and is probably by Leigh Hunt:

The fixed and trembling posture of Mr. Mathews … his hard breathing which tried to recover itself now and then by a heavy sigh, and his occasional side bend of the head accompanied with a munch of the lips, like a person who has just swallowed a crust that had stuck in his throat, presented a perfect picture of feeble despair.

At the beginning of the Dark Room Scene (IV, 2), "Malvolio," according to Beck's notes, "gives a deep groan & passes his head by the window straw beruffled." The miserable man has "chains on wrists," too.

[According to William Archer in "Twelfth Night at the Lyceum," Macmillan's Magazine (August 1889)] Irving exhibited him in "a nerveless state of prostrate dejection … stretched on the straw of a dungeon worthy of Fidelio."

For relief, there is an account of Sir Andrew's final exit. John Bull, September 8, 1839, is grateful to Buckstone, at the Haymarket, for cheating us into hearty laughter by his whimsicalities in Sir Andrew … his parting look at Olivia, in the last scene, as if to ascertain whether there might not be a chance left for him, was characteristic, and in excellent keeping with his author.

Dyce, in 1853, could "well remember that, when Twelfth Night was revived at Edinburgh many years ago, Terry, who then acted Malvolio … had 'straw about him,' on his release from durance." Beck's "Neilson" Promptbook calls for "straws in his hair—one over hanging face—which annoys him for a time—finally pulls it out—Eyes red—terribly in earnest." His exit is a great moment. Phelps's restraint was striking. His Malvolio had gone through the play with half-closed eyes, as if there were "nothing in the world without that is worth noticing." Now "he opens his eyes on learning how he has been tricked," but they close again in happy self-content, and he is retiring in state without deigning a word to his tormentors, when, as the fool had twitted him by nothing how "the whirligig of time brings in his revenges," he remembers that the whirligig is still in motion. Therefore, marching back with as much increase of speed as is consistent with magnificence, he threatens all—including now Olivia in his contempt—"I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you!" [Henry Morley, Journal of a London Playgoer, 1891]

Tree tore off his steward's chain—the chain Maria had referred to with derision, early in the play, the chain, too, which he had found himself fingering instinctively in the Letter Scene: "I frown the while, and perchance wind up my watch, or play with my—some rich jewel." Sothern preferred to tear the forged letter into bits, which he threw on the stage as he went. And "there was something of great dignity in the manner of that exit." [Richard Dickens, Forty Years of Shakespeare on the English Stage: August, 1867 to August, 1907].

Ngaio Marsh (essay date 1955)

In the following essay, Marsh discusses his 1951 staging of Twelfth Night in the Antipodes, focusing on the elements of characterization and visual presentation as they relate to the tone of the play.

Each decade creates its own fashions in Shakespeare and only actors of distinction can survive them. The Shakespearian costumes of Macready's stage now 'date' almost as markedly as the crinoline itself. Is it not probable, moreover, that if we could look through the wrong end of our opera glasses at the Lyceum of the 1880's, the mannerisms of the lesser players would make us titter while Ellen Terry or Irving would still command our applause? In the portrait of Garrick as Lear the authentic look of madness in his eyes effaces the oddness of his wig and costume. One is able to believe that his performance, if we could see and hear it, would transcend the mannerisms of his period.

Fashions in acting and presentation are as extreme as those that control the garments worn by the actors. The points of view held by producers, critics, actors and designers are forever changing; there is a feverish anxiety in our theatres to keep up with, or better still, anticipate the mode. It is in the presentation of Shakespeare's comedies that this kind of stylistic snobbism is seen at its extremity and it is about an attempt to escape from fashion that I propose to write, with specific reference to the comedy of Twelfth Night.

The modern producer of Shakespeare's comedies believes himself to be up against a number of difficulties. Much of the word-bandying is, he says, disastrously unfunny while many of the allusions are obscure and some so coarse that it is just as well that they are also incomprehensible. He must cut great swathes out of his script and for the rest depend on comic 'business' funny enough in its own right to amuse the audience while the words may look after themselves. If he is honest he dreads the obligatory laughter of the Bardolators as much as he fears the silence of unamused Philistia. These are reasonable fears, and, in my opinion, he does well to entertain them.

There are, however, contemporary producers who in their search for a new treatment of an old comedy forget to examine the play as a whole and fall into the stylistic error of seizing upon a single fashionable aspect of a subtle and delicate work and forcing it up to a point of emphasis that quite destroys the balance of production.

In 1951 it fell to my lot to produce Twelfth Night with a company of British actors on tour in the Antipodes. As soon as I was made aware of my fate I began to look back at the many productions I had seen of this comedy. Some had been by distinguished producers with famous companies, others by repertory theatres and touring companies like my own. Of them all, the best, it seemed to me in retrospect, had been the simplest: the least pleasing, the most pretentious; and the most pretentious, those in which producers, actors and designers had apparently exchanged glances of dismay and asked each other what they could do to put a bit of 'go' into the old show. They had done much. There had been star Malvolios and star Violas. There had been remorseless emphasis on a single character or sometimes on a single scene. The words had been trapped in the net of a fantasticated style, lost in a welter of comic goings-on, coarsened by cleverness or stifled by being forced out of their native air. I had seen Andrew wither into a palsied eld, Malvolio as a red-nosed comic and Feste, God save the mark, as bitter as coloquintida or the Fool in Lear. I had seen productions with choreo-graphic trimmings and with constructivist backgrounds. I had, however, missed the production on ice skates.

It seemed to me that my best, indeed my only chance, was to put aside everything that I had seen, forget if possible the current fashions in Twelfth Night and start humbly with the play itself. It is, after all, a very good play. If I venture now to retrace this production of Twelfth Night it is with the hope that in doing so it may be possible to examine some of the problems of its presentation. Because it is also a very difficult play.

As I read it again I saw that in his story Shakespeare shows us the several aspects of love. He begins with Orsino's romantic absorption with the idea of loving the inaccessible Olivia and repeats this theme, burlesqued, in Malvolio's assumption that Olivia loves him. This in turn modulates into Olivia's completely unreal 'crush' on Viola. Through these three aspects of fancied passion he weaves three aspects of true devotion: Viola's for Orsino, Antonio's for Sebastian and, a delicate echo, the Fool's almost inarticulate adoration of Olivia. These variations on a dual theme are linked by the sum-dazzled flowering of Sebastian's love for Olivia, while skipping discreetly through the pattern is the buffo romance of Toby and Maria. Andrew's foolish acceptance of the role of suitor to Olivia is the final detail in an exquisitely balanced design. It is a pattern made by setting fancy against truth, dream against reality. Of course one did not hope, when one discussed the play with the actors, that an audience, in the ripeness of time, would go away muttering: "We have seen a comedy of eight variations on two aspects of love." One merely hoped that the production would be an honest one because the actors had referred their job back to their author.

As I prepared the script it seemed to me that if, following Stanislavsky's rule, one were to say in a single word what Twelfth Night was about, that single word would be Illyria. It chimes through the text nostalgically as if Shakespeare would make us desirous of a place we had visited only in dreams.

Viola. What country, friends, is this?
Captain. This is Illyria, lady.
Viola. And what should I do in Illyria?
   My brother, he is in Elysium….
[I. ii. 1-4]

Andrew is "as tall a man as any's in Illyria". Maria is "as witty a piece of Eve's flesh as any in Illyria". And so it goes on. The rehearsal period was journey in search of Illyria; the performance, we dared to hope, would be our arrival there.

And what happens in Illyria? By day the sun shines with a golden richness on boscage, on palaces and on well-tended gardens. At night a full moon presides over revels that for all their robust foolery are tempered with wistfulness. The inhabitants move with a certain precision. Toby, Andrew, Maria and Fabian step across their landscape to an antic measure, now lively, now reflective but always compact and articulate. Orsino, the Renaissance man in love with love, moons in the grand manner over the young countess Olivia, whose principal attraction rests on her refusal to have anything to do with him. She, for her part, mopes with adolescent excessiveness over the death of her brother. And moving between these two strongholds of romantic nonsense are the Shakespearian girl-boy, gallant and wise, and Feste, the errant Fool. The whole most lovely play is set down in words that are so exact an expression of its aesthetic tone that one wonders how one dare meddle with them.

However, meddle we must and one of our first concerns would be the visual presentation of Illyria in terms of a touring company. How must it look and what must its inhabitants wear? After consultation with our young Australian designer, it was decided to use a Watteau-esque décor. The dresses of Watteau belong to no precise historical period: they are civilized, rich and fantastic and they have an air of freshness. We had three little pavilions of striped poles and airily draped banners. There were flights of steps, dark green backgrounds, platforms and a cyclorama. A traverse turned the half-stage into the interior of Orsino's palace. A jointed screen in two sections mounted on wheels and painted with a formalized seaport design was pulled across for the front scenes. These changes, effected by two nimble pages in view of the audience, took a matter of seconds to complete. For the letter-reading scene, there was a formalized boxthrivehed and a group of flamboyant statuary with which Toby, Andrew and Fabian associated themselves to good comic effect. A giant be-ribboned birdcage, prominent throughout the garden scenes, afterwards became Malvolio's mobile prison, being clapped over his head, leaving his legs free. The colour throughout in paint, fabrics and lighting modulated from grey and blue-pink to full Watteau-esque gold and turquoise.

As I read the play again, I caught—and who could miss them?—its overtones of regret. It has a character that is, I believe, unique in English comedy, a particular tinge of sadness that is the complementary colour of aesthetic pleasure. One listens to it with the half-sigh that accompanies an experience of perfect beauty. This is an element that has much to do with music and nothing at all to do either with sentiment or with tragedy and it is the quintessence of Twelfth Night. The warp of regret is interlaced with a vigorous weft of foolery. The producer's job is to retain them both in their just proportion. It is because Twelfth Night is so gay that it is also so delicately sad.

I planned a swiftly running production with only one interval. This would come after the letter-reading scene and the coda of laughter that follows it. Toby would pick Maria up in a pother of giggles and petticoats and carry her off. Andrew and Fabian would follow arm in arm and the curtain come down. My aim at this stage of production was to catch the measure of the whole. That measure would be sustained by the occasional use of music. For this we chose Purcell's Golden Sonata, which seemed to me to be perfect Illyria.

It was now, when the script was plotted, the music chosen, the design in preparation and the first rehearsal called, that I was most forcibly reminded of the influence of theatrical fashion upon actors. I had in my company a number of young actors and actresses who had worked under distinguished direction and one senior actor of great talent, experience and discernment. It was among the youngest players that the fashionable attitude to Twelfth Night was most tenderly embraced. At least two of them were consumed with the desire to play up the regretful overtones for all and more than they are worth. "Infinite sadness" was a phrase much bandied about during the earlier rehearsals, minor overtones were remorselessly insisted upon, the horrid ghost of /Pagliacci/ seemed to lurk behind the boxtree hedge. I had seen all this sort of thing done and very cleverly done and had felt it to be an error in taste and discernment. The Fool in Twelfth Night is not the Fool in Lear, Malvolio's downfall was not conceived as a tragic downfall. He would not, therefore, be allowed to gloop himself into a sort of cross-gartered Richard II. No: he would be as acid as a lime and as lean as a preying mantis. He would have such an air of creaking dryness that when his transformation came about it would be as if he were galvanized into egregious gallantry. There must be no nonsense about making him sympathetic. Shakespeare disliked the fellow and so must the audience.

With Olivia I was able to air what had long been a fervent belief. There is another fashion in our theatres (stemming from who knows what forgotten managerial charms) that would make a mature woman of Olivia. For far too long, more than mature leading ladies have confronted us with the not very delectable prospect of solid worth extended in corsetted melancholy upon some comfortless chaiselongue, distressingly besotted on a girl-boy and finally marrying the latter's twin brother. Could anything be less Illyrian? I defy the fashionmongers to find in the text one single hint that the spoilt young countess is in fact anything but very young. There is not a ponderable note in Olivia: the bloom of adolescence adorns every word she speaks. Viola's impatience is with a girl of her own age who is making a little silly-billy of herself. Our Olivia was as pretty and young as a rosebud, her mourning was as nonsensical as Orsino's love-lorn dumps. Having shut herself up in a charming prison she fancied herself head-over-heels in love with the first personable boy to walk into it and was exasperated beyond measure when he failed to respond. None of my cast had ever thought of Olivia being played in this key. The concept of the stricken dowager dies hard.

There are, however, no fashions in Violas. She has, as far as I know, withstood the most determined onslaughts of the modish 'fun' merchants and has neither holla-ed Olivia's name through a megaphone to the reverberant hills nor yet disguised her fair and outward character in a track-suit. Our Viola fulfilled the first requirements of a heroine in a Shakespeare comedy by being an accomplished actress, very young, intelligent and a darling. She moved through the play with charm, wit and good breeding. By the command of a certain quality in her voice she was able to alight on her lyrical passages and in so doing bring about that sudden stillness in a theatre that tells an actress she is safely home.

And Feste? It was with Feste that fashion threatened most insistently to put up her unlovely visage, for it is through him more than any other of the Illyrians that Shakespeare shows us the reverse side of the coin of comedy. I had of late seen Festes who, by plugging at the minor theme in their part, had administered a series of excruciating nudges in the ribs of their audiences. "Goodness!" in Morley's phrase, they seemed to exclaim, "Goodness, how sad! Look!" But Feste is not Lear's fool. He must play against his own ruefulness and if he does this his ruefulness will speak for itself. It shows most markedly in the songs. "Youth", Feste sings, "is a stuff will not endure." "What's to come", he sings, "is still unsure." Beauty, he says, is a flower, and elsewhere the Duke reflects that "women are as roses, whose fair flower Being once displayed, doth fall that very hour". Viola agrees:

And so they are: alas, that they are so;
To die, even when they to perfection grow!

[H.iv.40-41]

Olivia swears by the roses of the spring. The shroud of white in the Fool's song of death is strewn with yew and "not a flower, not a flower sweet" on his coffin shall be strewn. This flower image is scattered through Twelfth Night like the daisies on a Botticelli lawn and it is Feste who most often expresses it. He wanders about the play mingling with its several themes. He is by turns listless and brilliant. He has an artist's resentment for Malvolio's criticism of his professional status and can be waspish. He is all things to all men and yet very much himself and very much alone. His devotion to Olivia drifts across the text with no more insistence than a breath on a looking-glass. He can be ruined by an actor who sees in him a chance to make a big thing of a light part. He sets the tone of the play.

I felt that there should be some visual expression of his function and looked for it in the flower image. On Olivia's first entrance, Feste, who has played truant from her household, sets about fooling himself back into her good graces. Our Feste mutely asked her for the rose she carried. It was refused and given to Fabian, that oddly occurring character whose sudden appearance is thought to have some reference to the departure of Kemp from Shakespeare's company and the arrival of Armin to take his place. Fabian seems to have been brought in arbitrarily to replace the Fool in the letter-reading scene and perhaps to suggest a rival to him in Olivia's favour. It was to sustain this suggestion that Fabian escorted Olivia on this first entry. Later, on his own line: "So beauty's a flower" [I. v. 52], Feste snatched the rose from Fabian and wore it on his motley for the rest of the play. At the end he was left alone to sing his wry song of the wind and the rain. At its close he laid down his lute on the stage and broke the rose between his fingers. The petals fell with a faint tinkle of sound across the strings. Feste tiptoed into the shadows and the final curtain came down on the lute and rose-petals, vignetted in a pool of light. This use of a visual symbol in the rose was the only piece of extraneous production imposed on the play and even this could be referred back to the text. There was comic 'business' enough, certainly, in the buffo scenes, but it was kept in style and played strictly to the general tempo of the production. The result, surprising to actors and audience alike, was the discovery that the comic scenes in Twelfth Night are funny.

It remains only to say that with the intelligent and patient co-operation of the actors this treatment of Twelfth Night became articulate. It was successful in performance. This, I am sure, was because we came freshly to the text and, seeking its true savour, bent all our thought and energy to serving it.

"If that this simple syllogism will serve, so: if it will not, what remedy?" None, I am sure, in any approach to the play that imposes an extrinsic fashion upon it. Whatever the style for Twelfth Night, it must be in grain. Only so will it endure the wind and weather of production.

John Russell Brown (essay date 1966)

[In the following essay, originally published in 1966, Brown investigates differing approaches to set design and character portrayal in Twelfth Night]

After the first dozen Twelfth Night's there are still surprises, new guises for the old masterpiece. Directors colour it golden, russet, silver or white; blue for dreams, and sometimes pink; or they allow red and even purple to dominate. They can make it sound noisy as a carnival, or eager, or melodious, or quarrelsome like children; it can also be strained and nervous. In 1958, Peter Hall at Stratford-upon-Avon hung the stage with gauzes and contrived what The Times called a 'Watteauesque light'. And critics report that a year previously, at Stratford, Ontario, Tyrone Guthrie contrasted Feste and Malvolio in 'psychological terms', allowing the final song of the 'wind and rain' to be 'as plaintive and wonderful as a Jewish lament.' Two years before that, at the English Stratford, Sir John Gielgud brought 'a faint chill to the air' of his production; the comics were on their best behaviour in defence to a pervasive 'charm'; The Observer said that the polite word for this would be 'formal', and the exact word 'mechanical'; it seemed as if, during rehearsals of the last scene, Sir John had stopped the actors and commanded, 'Be beautiful; be beautiful'.

This play might have been designed for an age when each director must make his name and register his mark. Yet there is one difficulty: in most productions some part of the play resists the director's control. In Sir John's elegant Twelfth Night, Malvolio yielded Sir Laurence Olivier a role in which to exploit his impudent and plebeian comedy, and in his last line—'I'll be revenged on the whole pack of you'—an opportunity for the cry of a man un-made. The gray and urban setting of the Old Vic's production in 1950 was enlivened by an untrained ballet of sailors and riffraff, but Peggy Ashcroft's clear, white voice was an unechoed reminder of other directions the comedy can be given. More commonly, without such trained stars to cross the director's intentions, robust comics usurp more attention than their part in the last Act is allowed to satisfy, or an intelligent Sebastian will deny his own words, a too gentle Orsino devalue Viola's ardour. There is need for vigilance: Margaret Webster, who sees Twelfth Night as 'filled with impermanence, fragile, imponderable'; has found that:

> The director will have to balance and combine his ingredients in carefully graded proportions, compensating for weaknesses, keeping a moderating hand on excessive strength. This play, above all, he must treat with a light touch and a flexible mind, keeping the final goal clearly in sight [Shakespeare Today (1957)].

What happened, one wonders, before there were directors to give directions?

For if we refer back, from the theatre to the text of the play, we shall observe a similar lack of simplicity and uniformity. Malvolio can be a 'turkey cock', a common 'geek and gull' who is told to 'shake his ears'; or a fantastic who asks what 'an alphabetical position portends' and speaks repeatedly 'out of his welkin'. Yet Olivier's petty, ambitious vulgarian is also true to the text when he addresses his mistress with 'Sweet lady, ho, ho!' and with tags from popular ballads. Even Michael Hordern's tortured Malvolio at the Old Vic in 1954, 'dried up, emaciated, elongated … (as) an El Greco'—his hands, reaching out of the pit in the scene where Feste visits him as Sir Topas, the curate, suggested to one critic 'the damned in the Inferno'—is authorised by Feste's disguise, by his own first words of 'the pangs of death' and 'infirmity', his account of how 'imagination' jades him, and his physical and psychological isolation at the end. And yet again, Olivia's high regard for Malvolio—she 'would not lose him for half her dowry'—justifies Eric Porter's performance at Stratford-upon-Avon in 1960, as a solid, efficient steward waking with practical good sense to worlds unrealised.

Actors seeking to express their originality will find that 'new' interpretations rise unbidden from a straightforward study of the text, Sir Toby is usually a domesticated Falstaff, but at the Old Vic in 1958 with tumultuous 'gulps and shouts', he was seen as a plain 'boor'; and for this there is plenty of support in his name, Belch, and in his talk of 'boarding and assailing', making water and cutting 'mutton'. And the same year, at Stratford-upon-Avon, Patrick Wymark made him young and spry with a sense of style; for this, 'she's a beagle, true-bred' was most appropriate language, and his easy confidence in 'consanguinity' with Olivia and expertise in swordplay were natural accomplishments. One might imagine too, a melancholy Sir Toby, tried in true service and knowing from experience that 'care's an enemy to life': his tricks upon Sir Andrew would then be a compensation for his own retirement, his wooing—off-stage and presumably brief—of Maria, a just and difficult tribute to her service for him; lethargy comes with drunkenness and he 'hates a drunken rogue'; he needs company, even that of a fool, an ass, and a servant.

Olivia is another role which can be seen to be of different ages—either mature years or extreme youth; and she can be melancholy or gay. Maxine Audley at Stratford-upon-Avon in 1955 presented a gracious lady, truly grieving for the death of her brother and strong enough to recognise an absolute passion for a boy; this Olivia had the 'smooth, discreet and stable bearing', the majesty, to which Sebastian and Orsino testify. And three years later, at the same theatre, Géraldine McEwen presented her as kittenish and cute, saved from triviality by fine timing of movement and verse-speaking, the dignity of 'style'. And yet another Olivia may be suggested by the text: a very young girl, at first afraid of meeting the world and therefore living in a fantasy capable of decreeing seven-years of mourning; then a girl solemnly repeating old saws with a new understanding of their truth;

Even so quickly may one catch the plague…. I do I know not what, and fear to find Mine eye too great a flatterer for my mind…. What is decreed must be … how apt the poor are to be proud … youth is bought more oft than begg'd or borrowed, and forgetting her 'discreet' bearing in breathless eagerness:

_How does he love me?… Why, what would you? … not too fast: soft, soft! … Well, let it be,… That's a degree to love…. Yet come again…. I have sent after him: he says he'll come…. What do you say?… Most wonderful!

Feste, the fool, can be melancholy, or bitter, or professional, or amorous (and sometimes impressively silent), or self-contained and philosophical, or bawdy and impotent. Sir Andrew Aguecheek can be patient, sunny, feckless, gormless, animated or neurotic. (In 1958 Richard Johnson gave an assured performance of this knight as a 'paranoid manic-depressive, strongly reminiscent at times of Lucky in Waiting for Godot'.) Orsino can be mature or very young; poetic; or weak; or strong but deceived; or regal and distant. The text can suggest a Viola who is pert, sentimental, lyrical, practical, courageous or helpless. Shakespeare's words can support all these interpretations, and others; there are few plays which give comparable scope for enterprise and originality. The characters, the situations and the speeches are protean.

This is evident in a director's ability to alter the trend of his production, even in the very last moments, to achieve what Miss Webster has called his 'balance', to arrive at his chosen 'final goal'. If sentiment needs reinforcing, Viola (as Cesario) can be given a down-stage position and a preparatory pause as the arrangements for her duel with Sir Andrew grow to a comic climax, and thus her 'I do assure you, 'tis against my will' can be, not the usual laugh-line, but a reminder of her other full-hearted struggles of will and passion; this momentary seriousness, the more impressive for its incongruous setting, was managed with great grace by Dorothy Tutin at Stratford, in Peter Hall's productions of 1958 and 1960. Still later in the play, there is another opportunity for the strong re-emphasis of Viola's depth of feeling: Peggy Ashcroft mastered this in 1950, and J. C. Trewin has well described its effect in performance:

At the end, as Sebastian faces his sister, he cries: 'What countryman? What name? What parentage?' There is a long pause now before Viola, in almost a whisper (but one of infinite rapture and astonishment) answers: 'Of Messaline'. Practically for the first time in my experience a Viola has forced me to believe in her past…. [John O'London's Weekly (8
More simply and without affecting any established characterisation, the balance of a production can be altered by the Priest's lines in the last scene, with their special idiom and assured syntax and timing:

A contract of eternal bond of love,
Confirm'd by mutual joinder of your hands,
Attested by the holy close of lips,
Strength'ned by interchangement of your rings
And all the ceremony of this compact
Seal'd in my function, by my testimony; Since when, my watch hath told me, toward my grave,
I have travell'd but two hours.

[V. i. 156-63]

If these lines are spoken in a weighty and measured way, they can restore a sense of awe, an awareness of general and timeless implications, to a dénouement which has become too headlong and hilarious for the director's taste. Or, at the last moment, Orsino can give 'guts' to an over-pretty production: the sight of Antonio permits an evocation of the 'smoke of war' and 'scathful grapple', and can legitimately bring a harsh quality to his voice which has hitherto been tuned to softer themes. When he invites Olivia to live 'the marble-breasted tyrant still' and turns to Cesario with:

But this your minion, whom I know you love,
And whom, by heaven I swear, I tender dearly,
Him will I tear out of that cruel eye
Where he sits crowned in his master's spite.
Come, boy, with me; my thoughts are ripe in mischief:
I'll sacrifice the lamb that I do love
To spite a raven's heart within a dove

[V. i. 125-31]

the director can call for physical as well as verbal violence towards Viola. The lines imply that Orsino cares more for his seeming boy than for the lady of his dreams and fancy, and thus they may be acted fully and strongly; the release of passion in a desire to kill Cesario shows the true object of that passion, and its power. (This reading of the subtext is authorised by Shakespeare, as by Freud and Stanislavski, for Orsino has just acknowledged that a 'savage' jealousy 'kills what it loves', not what it thinks it loves.) If the production is, at this stage of the play, too solemn rather than too sentimental or hilarious, there are opportunities in plenty for lightening the whole last Act: Olivia's 'Where goes Cesario?', after Orsino's outburst, can easily be spoken to invite laughter; and so can her 'Most wonderful' as Viola and Sebastian confront each other. Nearly all Sebastian's lines can be tipped the same way, as 'I do perceive it hath offended you'… 'Fear'st thou that, Antonio'… and (about the mole on the brow of Viola's father) 'And so had mine.' Antonio's 'An apple, cleft in two is not more twin' can be directed so that it implies laughter rather than rapt amazement, and Orsino's final 'Cesario, come' can be a jest at the whole contrivance of the last Act, or even at Viola's expense, rather than recognition of his own long, half-hidden affection for his bride-to-be.

The opportunities for swinging a production round into line with a chosen mood—to make it 'what they will', to reverse roles as in a 'Twelfth Night' revel—have encouraged directors to tackle Twelfth Night and to experiment widely in the search for original interpretations. But a second practical consequence of the freedom of interpretation is of greater importance: this play challenges us to provide a longer and deeper study than is normally given to a text in the theatre. We may be assured that the diverse ways of playing the characters and controlling the mood are not finally irreconcilable. The experience of seeing many independent productions and reading about many more does not create a multitude of separate memories; each new revelation reflects on earlier ones and, in the mind, a single view of the play is continually growing in complexity and range, and in understanding. We may believe that a single production might, one day, represent to the full our single, developing awareness. Our knowledge of Twelfth Night and of human behaviour may assure us that an Olivia is both mature and immature, according to which side of her personality is in view; a Sir Toby energetic and melancholic, vulgar and well-schooled; and a Viola lyrical and practical, and helpless. The world of the play is gay, quiet, strained, solemn, dignified, elegant, easy, complicated, precarious, hearty, homely; the conclusion close to laughter, song, awe and simplicity. And this is an understanding which begs not to be hid, but to be realised on the stage.

Of course, in the theatre it is tempting to simplify too early, in order to be effective and make a 'strong' impression. But with such a play as Twelfth Night we are drawn by another possibility, a more demanding course: five years' study, a repeated return to its problems in a succession of productions under different conditions and for different audiences, might make possible a production which would be original, not by one-sidedness, but by answering more fully than before to Shakespeare's text and combining the excitement of many interpretations. The time necessary to make this attempt would be an expensive investment; and it would be a risky one—for the speculator may not be capable of living up to the developing demands of his enterprise. Yet the business is a practical possibility, and must be considered. An exclusive pursuit of immediate effectiveness and originality leads to immature and in-secure achievements, in theatres as in other fields of activity; a play like Twelfth Night offers, therefore, an opportunity and a challenge which it would be salutary merely to envisage, regenerative to attempt. Shakespeare's stage-cunning, human understanding and poetic imagination, which are all implicit in the text would be fine assets.

The necessary conditions for such an achievement would be a concern for, and skill in, all the arts of the theatre—this is required for any sort of theatrical success—but, more peculiarly, a constant return to the details of Shakespeare's text. Here the popular misconception that close textual study is a dull and pedestrian activity, restricting originality and encouraging an exclusively verbal kind of drama—may inhibit the right kind of work, and must be denounced: a prolonged and careful study of Shakespeare's text, in association with other theatre skills, can awaken and enrich a production in all elements of a play's life. If we trust Shakespeare's imagination, we know that Twelfth Night was conceived as a whole with each apparently discordant element reconciled to its opposite: and our only clue to that original resolution is the printed words.
Every opportunity for visual realisation or elaboration, for movement and variation of grouping, for temporal control, for subtlety of elocution or stage-business, for creation of character and mood, emotion and expression, that the text can suggest should be searched out, tested, practically evaluated and, finally, given its due place in the responsible and mature production which each successive, partial and conflicting production of such a play as Twelfth Night invites us to consider, and to hope that one day we may help to stage or witness.

The combination, or growing together, of elements from new interpretations of roles is, perhaps, the best charted part of a difficult task; it calls for a developing sympathy and understanding, and a grasp of the progressive and formal presentation of character, but it does not require, at the beginning of rehearsals a single limiting choice; moreover the actors are always in obvious contact with Shakespeare's words. Perhaps the problems of a textually responsible production will be most perplexing in choosing the stage setting, especially if the play is to be performed on a picture-frame stage with the full range of modern equipment.

Twelfth Night has received many visual interpretations: the elegant, controlled and overtly dramatic, as a Tiepolo fresco, is a common one; or domestic with dark shadows, like the Jacobean interiors in Joseph Nash's Mansions of England in the Olden Times; or Italianate, free and colourful in the fashion of the commedia dell'arte. Or the stage may be spacious and clean, like one modern notion of what an Elizabethan platform stage was like, or pillared, tiered and substantial, like another. Some designers have introduced the satins and laces of Restoration England, and others the boaters and billows of the theatre of Charley's Aunt. The main difficulty is that all these, and others, are in some degree appropriate, usually in different parts of the play; and yet it would be distracting to a modern audience to move from one to another during a single performance, even if this were technically possible. If a mature production of Twelfth Night is to be considered, this problem will have to be solved in a single way—the more urgently because the proscenium arches and lighting devices of modern theatres have made the visual embodiment of a play, in setting, costumes and effects, a dominating—often the dominating—element of a production.

A resource to the text in the search for a comprehensive style and single stage setting does not involve the director in an antiquarian production which tries to reproduce original stage conditions; those are, in any case, irrecoverable, in their full complexity which involves specially trained actors and historically accurate audiences, as well as theatres which no longer exist. The study of the text can be of help in utilising the modern technical devices of a picture-frame stage, and in answering the expectations of any particular audience. The verbal imagery can, for example, give valuable help towards deciding which setting is most appropriate; it can tell the director the kind of visual images which were associated with the action and characters in the author's mind and which he may usefully transmit to the audience in visual stage terms.

Illyria, the world of Twelfth Night, is obviously a land of love, music, leisure, servants, a Duke and a Countess; it must have dwellings, a garden, a seacoast and a 'dark house' or temporary prison. Its institutions include a church and a chantry, a captain and officers of the law, an inn; and there must be doors or gates. Thus far the choice of a setting is not circumscribed; it might be English, Italian, French, Russian (before the revolution), or, with some adaptation, American or Utopian; medieval, renaissance or modern. But incidental details of speech and action at once limit the setting to something resembling, or representing, English countryside and domesticity. In the first scene there are mentioned a bank of violets, a hunt, sweet beds of flowers, and these are followed by wind and weather, a squash and a peascod, a willow, the hills, a beagle, roses, a yew, a cypress and box tree, and more flowers; familiar living creatures are a hart, a sheep-biter, a horse, a trout, a turkey-cock and a wood-cock, a raven, lamb and dove, and hounds; daylight, champaign (or open fields), harvest, ripeness, and oxen and wain-ropes easily come to mind; the songs of nightingales, daws and owls have been heard. The characters of the play do not talk of an elegant or fanciful scene, although the violets and beds of flowers might be interpreted in that way; their wain-ropes, sheep-biter and daws belong to a countryside that knows labour and inconvenience, as well as delights. Speaking of horrors and danger, they are neither sophisticated nor learned; they refer to tempests, the sea, fields, mountains, barbarous caves, and hunger. The domestic note is almost as persistent as that of the countryside: early in Act I, canary-wine, beef, a housewife and a buttery-bar are mentioned; even the Duke, Orsino, speaks of knitters in the sun; there is talk of pilchards and herrings (fresh and pickled) and of vinegar and pepper. If a director is to attempt a responsible production of the play, he should give substance to these references in his setting—not in an illustrative way which provides objects for the actors to point at, but in a manner which echoes, extends and, where appropriate, contrasts with the dialogue and stage business. This is the mental and emotional world of the dramatis personae as revealed by their language, and the stage picture can help to establish this, not insistently, but with subtlety.

It is the world of the play's action too, and its visual recreation will, therefore, aid the director towards an appropriate rhythm and acting style: an Italianate setting, which is often chosen, suggests the wrong tempo—the wrong temperature, even—and insists on distracting contrasts between dialogue and visual effect. An English summer takes three months to establish itself, through April, May and June, and so does the action of this play—as Orsino states explicitly in the last scene. It would be convenient, therefore, to show this passage of time in modifications to the setting during the course of the play: the first Acts green and youthful, the last coloured with roses in bloom and strong lights; the same setting but at different times of the year. In the first scene Orsino would be seeking the earliest violets; later 'beauty's a flower', 'women are as roses', 'youth's a stuff will not endure' would sound properly precarious in view of the visual reminder of the changing seasons; a 'lenten answer' would seem more restrictive and 'let summer bear it out' a fuller and more inevitable judgement. Orsino might stand in white, as the young lover in Nicholas Hillyarde's miniature (dated about 1590), over against frail, twining roses: this association represented for the painter his motto—'Dat poenas lau-data fides', or 'My praisèd faith procures my pain'—and it might serve in much the same way today. 'Midsummer madness' and 'matter for a May morning', which are spoken of in Act III, would be in key with the setting, and the talk of harvest, the grave and the immutable yew-tree would sound in significant contrast.

The course of single days might also be suggested in the lighting of the stage picture. Talk of hunting in the first scene establishes the time as early morning. In the third, Maria's remonstrance to Sir Toby about returning late 'a' nights' belongs to the first meeting of a new day, and then coming 'early' by one's 'lethargy' implies preprandial drinking. In II. iii, the chaffing about 'being up late', Malvolio's chiding about 'respect of… time', and 'its too late to go to bed now' all suggest midnight; so one 'day' is completed in due order. (Again Feste's song in this last mentioned scene, about 'present mirth' and what's to come and 'youth's a stuff will not endure', will be more poignant if it seems indeed to have been sung just before the 'night-owl', nature's reminder of death, is roused.) The following scene, II. iv, is clearly a new day with its first lines of 'good morrow' and 'we heard last night'; and the truth that' … women are as roses, whose fair flower Being once display'd doth fall that very hour's is more fully expressed if spoken in the transitory light of dawn. The next scene, II. v, beginning with 'Come thy ways…' and with news that Malvolio has been 'i' the sun practising behaviour to his own shadow this half hour', is still early morning. Act III, Scene i, which follows with Feste speaking of the sun shining everywhere, may be at noon, and later, when Malvolio supposes Olivia invites him to bed, his outrageous presumption would be more apparent if it were obviously not that 'time of day'. At the end of IV. ii, Feste visits Malvolio in prison and sings:

I'll be with you again,
In a trice,
Like the old Vice,
Your need to sustain;
Who, with dagger of lath,
In his rage and his wrath,
Cries, ah, ha! to the devil….

[IV. ii. 122-28]

—here stage lighting could simulate a sudden, passing storm, such as interrupts an easy summer's afternoon in England; it might culminate in thunder. This would be an elaboration impossible to stage in an Elizabethan theatre, but it would be appropriate in a play which is continually concerned with the summer countryside of England, with 'beauty that can endure wind and weather', and which ends with a song of the rain that 'raineth every day'. Sir Toby and Maria could take shelter from the storm, while the fool is left to bear it out and 'pursue the sport'. The sun would shine fully again for Sebastian's 'This is the air; that is the glorious sun; This pearl she gave me …', and for the high afternoon of the ending of the comedy. Towards the close shadows might lengthen and, as the marriages are postponed till 'golden time convents,' the sky might become golden with a sunset's promise of another fair day. Then as the other characters leave, to enter perhaps a lighted house, Feste might be left in the grey-green light of early evening to sing alone of time and youth, and of the beginning of the world and the conclusion of a play.

(There is in fact a double time scheme in Twelfth Night: three months for the development and fulfilment of the action, and two consecutive days for the sequence of scenes. The representation of both schemes in the setting and in the lighting may help an audience to accept this double sense of time which suits, on the one hand, the rapid fairy-tale transitions and the 'changeable' characterisations, and, on the other hand, the play's suggestion of the season's alterations and the endurance and maturing of affections.)
Such lighting effects require an outdoor setting for almost all the play. And this may be convenient for the action: Olivia's house might be shown to one side, with a terrace and garden before it, a main entrance and a way to the back door; and there might be a dovecote, small pavilion or gazebo on the other side of the stage to do duty as Malvolio's prison. There would be some inconvenience in staging the carousing scene between Feste, Sir Toby and Sir Andrew in a garden, but there is plenty of reference to outdoor affairs in its dialogue and the two knights could fall asleep around their table at the close of the scene and be discovered there next morning to be awakened by Fabian. The scenes at Orsino's court could also be in the open air, and could be set by bringing in tall cypress hedges to mask Olivia's house and garden, and to reveal part of the sky-cloth or cyclorama at the end of a long walk or vista in some spacious park. It would be appropriately affected for Orsino to seek the shade of such a walk in the early morning; there could be a stone seat on one side, and on the other a sculpture of Venus, or some such deity. For the brief scene outside Olivia's gate (II. ii) and for the Sebastian scenes, 'somewhere in Illyria' (II. i and III. iii), a 'wall' could be let down from the flies, with a gate in its centre: this would locate the action outside Olivia's estate and, if her house and the taller trees were visible over the top of the wall and through the gate, the audience would relish the physical proximity of Sebastian to his journey's end.

There remains one, apparently unrelated, scene (I. ii) which begins 'What country, friends, is this? This might also be played 'outside Olivia's garden', but Viola's mysterious entry into the play from the sea asks for a different visual presentation. It would be possible to play it in front of gauzes let down to hide the transition from Orsino's park of I. i, to Olivia's garden of I. iii; these might be lightly painted and lit to suggest a seashore, touched, perhaps with fluorescent material low down, as if catching the surf of a strange sea. If Orsino had been contemplating a statue of Venus in the previous scene that figure might be caught by a higher light as the gauzes came down, and then, in a moment of darkness, Viola might take its place to rise from the sea as the stage is relit. If this were effected tactfully, this scene could easily take its place in the chiaroscuro: its sea-effects might be echoed later as Feste is also isolated in the 'storm' of his 'vice' song; and echoed differently at the end of the play, as he is isolated in the evening. Moreover the myth-like transition and transference would be in keeping with the 'romantic' attraction of the lovers and the solution of their stories—the dream, or fantasy element, of the play.

The colours of setting and costumes could be those of an early English summer: clear, light blues, greens, yellows and pinks, and plenty of white. The buildings could be the honey-coloured stone of the English Cotswolds, with marble ornaments for Orsino's park. Olivia would, of course, wear black while in mourning, and Malvolio always—the only character to take no colour from the sun.

Such is one solution of the visual problems of Twelfth Night, and one which tries to answer the demands of the text in terms of the realism of the picture-frame stage—which is perhaps the furthest removed from Elizabehathan practice. Other stages and other visual styles would call for different solutions. This way of staging the play is worth consideration chiefly as an example: for if any production is to be undertaken with a belief in the unity and imaginative quality of Shakespeare's text, its choice of setting must answer the same demands and others like them, as more are revealed through further study of the text and further experiments in eccentric productions.

The quest for a responsible direction for Twelfth Night will not lead to a series of stereotyped productions: changing stage-conditions, actors and audiences will prevent that. Nor will we rest content with our achievements, for the 'idea' of the play, which grows in our minds as we meet it frequently in many guises, is most likely to remain several steps beyond our most truthful production. The desire for an authentic direction will not be satisfied easily, but those who try to respond to it will grow more aware of the wealth of Shakespeare's imagination and perhaps more expert in their attempts to give his masterpiece its theatrical life.

John Russell Brown (essay date 1976)
Twelfth Night is a paradoxical play. It is brilliant, compact, and riddling and, at the same time, delightful, easy, and enjoyable. It is full of fanciful and impossible events; yet it reflects domestic and personal life with exact realism. It has much theatrical, sexual, and verbal humor, much poetry and fine sentiment, and a little rhetoric; yet it is haunted by a continuous sense of pain and loss. Its mood is youthful; yet the play is aware of death, old age, and the changes that time brings. It is full of fervor, and also of weariness and disbelief. While reading Twelfth Night, one is reminded of Dr. Johnson's opinion that Shakespeare's tragedy "seems to be skill, his comedy to be instinct," and yet this congenial comedy is occasionally close in phrasing and idea to other plays written about the same time—Hamlet, Julius Caesar, and Troilus and Cressida—in which Shakespeare wrestled with political and moral issues of obvious difficulty.

As soon as one tries to cast the play for performance, the paradoxes come into focus. Sir Toby is a knight and yet he says he married a chambermaid for a joke. He is often drunk but swears that he "hates" a drunkard. Malvolio is a steward and yet he rehearses his behavior for more than half-an-hour before the day's work begins. Not only does he think himself the most attractive man in the world but also acts as if this were true. Olivia is a young heiress who has lost father, mother, and brother and who shuts herself up in her own house for seven years to avoid all men, and then she falls in love with someone else's servant. Orsino is a man of great responsibility who has fought a sea battle, and then he finds he wants to murder a boy. Viola, who is disguised as a boy for most of the play, is sometimes like "patience on a monument, smiling at grief" and, at other times, "saucy" or "rude," "fearful" or "mad"; in the last scene, she is "jocund, apt," and willing to die. The demands on the actors are large and various. Henry Irving, who cast himself as Malvolio and Ellen Terry as Viola in his production of the play, confessed afterwards that he ought never to have attempted it without having "three great comedians" in his company as well [quoted in Ellen Terry, The Story of My Life, 1908].

If the comedy is to be staged in a modern theater, with scenery and lights, the stage designer will find two main aspects to his task. The scene to be created is "Illyria," which is actually on the east coast of the Adriatic Sea, but more important than geographic and historical accuracy will be the need to give to the land that Orsino governs the twin realities of a wild seacoast and of the English countryside. There are allusions to dangerous seas, "barren mountains," and political danger on the one hand and, on the other, to "sweet beds of flowers," squash, peascod, willow, beagle, roses, violets, yews, and a box tree. Characters talk of daylight, open fields, harvest, ripeness, oxen, and wain-ropes, and of the songs of nightingales, daws, and owls. Olivia's house obviously has a kitchen, for there is talk of canary wine, beef, pilchards, herrings (fresh and pickled), vinegar, and pepper. There are both prisons and gardens as well as a house and a palace. Devils, fiends, and hell occupy men's minds as do a "holy man," heaven and a "good life," and "devotion."

The very title of the comedy emphasizes a double nature. Twelfth Night, or the feast of the Epiphany on January 6, was observed in England and throughout Europe as the last day of Christmas festivities. It was customary to choose, by chance or by election, a "king" or "Lord of Misrule." Thus a servant might act for one day as master of the household and preside at a feast in the great hall. There would be drinking, toasts, games, mock trials, divination, dancing, and processions. It was a brief occasion for license, feasting, and disguises. Often there were ceremonies, in this dead time of the year, that looked forward to harvest, seeking to avert disease or ensure plentiful crops. In the play named after this festival, there is not much dancing and only one scene of corporate singing—and even that is interrupted as it grows toward its boisterous conclusion. But the Twelfth Night revelry is represented by various disguises and the reversal of roles between master and servant: Malvolio, the servant, dreams of being "Count Malvolio" and begins his performance; Olivia does "she knows not what," loving servant rather than master, and then finds that rejection has meant acceptance;
Orsino loves one who has served him, and whom he will serve now; Antonio takes pleasure in his dangerous service to Sebastian, the man he has saved from the sea, and Sebastian lightheartedly becomes Antonio's "purse-bearer." There are reversals of luck, changes from sunlight to dark prison, and from death to life, and numerous mistakes of identity and intention. The Lord of Misrule is, perhaps, Feste, the fool whose very name is a form of "Fête" or "Feast." He seems to be a "merry fellow" who cares for nothing, but he sits in judgment on each of the other characters and through zany and complicated jesting tells them the "truth" of their own Uves. He himself does "care for something," but what it is remains a secret, not to be revealed even in his last riddling, childlike, and cynical song with which he concludes the whole festival-play after the others have walked offstage together to wait until "golden time convents." Feste remains to sing of the rain that "raineth every day," and some, at least, of his subjects are determined to make a "solemn combination" of their "dear souls."

The last scene of the play is complicated in its stage business, with many comings and goings and careful postponements of the full comical conclusion. The disguises are dropped and misunderstandings resolved only when it is abundantly clear that the twelfth-night festival of folly has led each character to a manifestation of "What they will." Through madness, folly, confusion, revels, and play, the "truth," as Shakespeare calls it, has become progressively apparent. Sebastian provides the clue to this basic movement in the play when he promises Olivia that "having sworn truth" he "ever will be true." Orsino's last words make the same point (speaking to Viola as if to Cesario, his servant):

But when in other habits you are seen,
Orsino's mistress, and his fancy's queen.
[V. i. 387-88]

The servant is to be the mistress, and she will rule the "fancy," the strange, demanding, "fantastic" source of what each character "wills."

The "will" is that part of the human comedy in which discordant forces, images, and appearances find their single truth. When Twelfth Night is performed, each member of the cast has to create an impression that his strangest words and actions are based on a strong, imaginative response to his fellow characters and the action of the play. For all the simple, domestic occurrences of the play, its conventional encounters between lovers, masters, and servants, and its madness and folly, each character is based on an individual, imaginative life—on "what they will," or wish, or desire, on what must happen if their inner "truth" is to be realized. (The word "will," for Shakespeare, encompassed all these meanings.) In one sense Twelfth Night is a comedy of unmasking; it is a winter celebration of new life, a release of what is usually confined. Each character has moments of "folly," "madness," "frenzy," "anger," "uncivil rule," or "wonder," which are the outward "shapes" of fancy and the "will," but by the end of the play the audience has been given opportunities to recognize the sustaining power of each individual, imaginative life, the still center of each being.

Viola, disguised as Cesario, gives a warning to Olivia that may be taken as a motto for the whole play, and a warning to reader, actor, director, and critic:

—I prithee tell me what thou think'st of me.
—That you do think you are not what you are.
—if I think so, I think the same of you.
—Then think you right: I am not what I am.
—I would you were as I would have you be.
—Would it be better, madam, than I am?
I wish it might, for now I am your fool.
[III.i. 138-44]
There are numerous episodes in the comedy that can be enjoyed with ease and immediate pleasure—evocations of beauty and assertions of desire, teasing and lovemaking, comic mistakes, practical jokes, absurd behavior, dramatic changes of fortune, displays of temperament, cunning, and enjoyment—but the comedy is also a riddle in that characters and statements are "not what they are." Shakespeare has created moments when the picture seems to go out of focus, and then the audience is invited to look more deeply and narrowly, or sometimes more widely.

In the theater, this play has had great and varied success.... In earliest records, Malvolio seems to have dominated the play, but actresses such as Julia Marlowe, Ellen Terry, Peggy Ashcroft, Katharine Hepburn, and Dorothy Tutin have shown that Viola can usurp that position. When Sir Toby and Sir Andrew are strongly cast and allowed to elaborate their performances, the romantic wooing and the gulling of the steward can take second and third places to the mellow clowning and character acting. In this century, Alec Guinness and Michael Redgrave (as Sir Andrew), and Robert Livesey and Leon Quartermaine (as Sir Toby) have given performances that are comparable with those described by Charles Lamb at the beginning of the eighteenth century as the height of an English comic tradition. Feste, the outsider, the singer, and the fool, can also dominate the play, especially when a director is determined, as Tyrone Guthrie was, to emphasize the melancholy strand running throughout the play.

It is the actors' play rather than a director's, for each character in turn is given sensitively written moments when he or she must control the whole theater by sheer acting. Most of the characters have been given silences, simple yet climactic words, physical actions, or delayed reactions that are left open to individual realization: so the actors can put their own stamp on their parts and give performances grounded in their own personalities, their actual, entire "presence," or being. Even the last scene, which brings almost all the characters onstage together, does not lead to a climactic group effect, like the dances and songs at the end of Love's Labor's Lost, As You Like It, or Much Ado, or like the group jesting at the end of The Merchant of Venice. It is a sequence of precise, individual confrontations, as "will" meets "will" and makes clear its own "truth."

The time in which the action unfolds is said to be three months, but the various events portrayed could fit into two successive days, each shown at morning, noon, and afternoon, and the first day passing into midnight. Time should pass lightly in this play, but with a consciousness of all the varying qualities of each day. The plot complications and resolutions should be accomplished with ease and variety, yet should yield an awareness of the immutable and secretive resources of individual imaginations.

The earliest evidence for the existence of this play is the record of a performance in the Great Hall of the Middle Temple in London on February 2, 1602. This hall still survives, although damaged in an air raid during the Second World War. Against the ornately carved oak paneling of this dining and assembly room for lawyers and law students, Shakespeare's Illyrian comedy was brought to life as a special and private entertainment. Although it was new to John Manningham who recorded this performance, a few topical references and literary borrowings argue that it had been written a year or more earlier. Probably it had already been seen at the Globe Theatre and at court in the season of 1600-01. Certainly it was revived at court in 1618, and again in 1623 under the title of Malvolio.

For the source of the main romantic story, Shakespeare almost certainly read Barnabe Riche's story of Apolonius and Silla in his Farewell to the Military Profession (1581). But he may well have read further, and earlier, versions of the same tale and some of the plays using the same basic material. Shipwreck and the subsequent confusion of twins were common elements in romance and in Plautine comedy, and Shakespeare had used them before in The Comedy of Errors. The device of a girl disguised as a page serving the man she loves is also common, and in The Two Gentlemen of Verona Shakespeare had already explored some of its dramatic possibilities. The Italian comedy Gl'Ingannati (The Deceived), performed at Siena in 1531, has numerous features in common with Twelfth Night, and in its Induction has a Fabio, a Malevolti, and a reference to "la notte di Beffano" or Epiphany.

For the scenes involving Malvolio, no one source has been identified, and here Shakespeare has probably relied more directly on his own general reading, his memory of theatrical gulling episodes, and his own observation of life in the households of Elizabethan gentlemen. Sir Toby Belch represents many younger sons of his own time, born into noble families but lacking an inheritance and so starting life as soldiers; when too old for their profession—and that might be in their early thirties—such men could only fall back on living with relations and idling time away. So the young Olivia has to tolerate her uncle and his casual acquaintance, Sir Andrew, whom he introduces to her house. This young knight has a small patrimony but little or no knowledge of how to make use of it; he represents scores of young men who left their homes to make some kind of fortune only to be tricked out of their money by less congenial means than Sir Toby's confidence tricks. Malvolio is an ambitious man, relying on his own "good parts" and sense of duty; as such, he is invaluable to his mistress but is isolated from the gentry and from the "lesser" servants. Several actual identifications have been suggested for Malvolio; the most elaborately worked out is that in favor of Sir William Knollys, a less lowly steward who was Comptroller of the Queen's household. Maria, the gentlewoman who acts as Olivia's personal maid, and Fabian, the servant of some education who carries a grudge against Malvolio for interfering with a bearbaiting amusement, are also familiar figures of an English country-gentleman's establishment and help to account for the wide range of domestic and countryside references in this play.

Feste, too, as a licensed fool, has a place in the same social setting, but here Shakespeare is also obviously indebted to theatrical tradition and the actual expertise of clowns in the actors' company for which he wrote. He must also have drawn on his own earlier writing for such actors, especially in As You Like It and the Launcelot scenes of The Merchant of Venice (in particular, III. v). Feste's dallying with words allows Shakespeare to relate the events of his main plots and the aspirations of each of his characters to a wide range of ordinary human activity, to piety, scholarship, lovemaking, war, avarice, hard work, old age and disappointment, and much more besides. By giving him songs and asking that the fool have a "mellifluous voice," Shakespeare has also introduced moments when immediate dramatic concerns are held back, and the audience is invited to attend to the music and simple words and themes.

To most critics, Twelfth Night seems to be the crown of Shakespeare's early work in comedy. Certainly it draws on many characters, themes, and situations that he had used before, from his first comedy onward, and which subsequently reappear only in very different contexts and appearances. In The Merry Wives of Windsor, perhaps written in the same year, the setting is wholly domestic and the characters for the most part are older and more dispassionate. All's Well, Measure for Measure, and Troilus and Cressida, which follow within a few years, add a more judicial or "problem" frame for romance, explore more deeply the confrontation of death and deception, and, in the last named, bring lovers to the field of battle and show the breakdown of faith. Thereafter followed the tragedies, King Lear, Macbeth, Antony and Cleopatra, Coriolanus, and Timon of Athens. Only in the last four or five years of his writing life, some nine or ten years after Twelfth Night, did Shakespeare return to comedy, but then in a very different mode to that of this paradoxical, brilliant, riddling, and delightful masterpiece.

Ralph Berry (essay date 1981)

[In the following essay, Berry examines the means by which Shakespeare manipulates audience perceptions of the characters in Twelfth Night.]
Let the claret which Shakespeare drank, as we know, on expense account symbolize the general experience of Twelfth Night. The taste of this play has the same tension between sweetness and dryness, which translates easily into the indulgent reveries of the opening and the realities of rain, ageing, and work, in Feste's final song. To analyse this tension is surely the business of criticism. The experience of Twelfth Night blends our sense of the title metaphor with the growing magnitude of the joke that goes too far, and with it our grasp of the relation between the gulling and romantic actions. It is a matter of changing expectations, of a modified sense of the initial données of the play. Twelfth Night is played out, as it were, on a meta-physical revolving stage, which slowly rotates through half a revolution: the profiles that were presented to us at the beginning are not those of the end. The heads remain the same, the presented view is much altered. In the end the audience is asked to revise its judgement, not simply of people, but of a convention, 'festive' comedy itself. And that is bound to be disturbing.

Let us sketch in the initial experience of an audience not closely acquainted with the text. Twelfth Night is advertised and known as a comedy; the audience expects to be amused and entertained. At once it encounters a romantic and lovesick Duke. In the second scene an attractive young lady emerges from a shipwreck, who determines to enter the Duke's service. We can see the future there clearly enough. In scene 3 we meet the comics, Sir Toby Belch and Sir Andrew Aguecheek: why, this is the best fooling, when all is done. The form is now clear. A romantic main action, with some comic relief from a bibulous knight, two varieties of fool, and an intolerable bureaucrat who is obviously to be done down. We have it. The play can run on metalled lines into the future.

And for some time yet, there is no need to rethink this position. The revels of act 2, scene 3 will secure the sympathy of the audience, and the great confrontation between Sir Toby and Malvolio does at the time seem like the life-force challenging the powers of repression and sterility: 'Dost thou think, because thou art virtuous, there shall be no more cakes and ale?' As presented, there is no chance of an audience denying this affirmation. (Or critic, one might add. There is an all but universal convention for commentators to stand up and be counted as in favour of cakes and ale.) And if Twelfth Night stopped at act 2, scene 3, there would be no need to modify C. L. Barber's view of the matter [in his Shakespeare's Festive Comedy: A Study in Dramatic Form and its Relation to Social Custom, 1959], 'The festive spirit shows up the kill-joy vanity of Malvolio's decorum. The steward shows his limits when he calls misrule "this uncivil rule" … Sir Toby uses mis-rule to show up a careerist.' But that verdict is slowly phased out by the play itself. Not at first: the garden scene is pure delight. Here we yield absolutely to the pleasure of the gulling. One has to stress the point, for in the later stages the ultimate theatrical effect of guilt requires that we should have participated fully in the garden scene. There is a certain moral responsibility, even culpability, which the audience assumes in Twelfth Night: I don't think the play can be understood without it.

The scene in which Malvolio makes a fool of himself before Olivia (act 3, scene 4) begins to insinuate unease into the audience's consciousness. It is a scene we have been prepared for, and kept waiting for, and it is an unholy delight; yet the thought is emerging that Malvolio has committed an irreversible bâtise. The activities of Sir Toby, Fabian, and Maria begin to look like open sadism, and we may make the subliminal connection between Malvolio and bear-baiting, mentioned earlier [I. iii. 93, II. v. 8]. Sir Toby's 'Come, we'll have him in a dark room and bound' contributes to the unease, and so does its continuation:

> My niece is already in the belief that he's mad. We may carry it thus, for our pleasure and his penance, till our very pastime, tir'd out of breath, prompt us to have mercy on him; at which time we will bring the device to the bar and crown thee for a finder of madmen.

[III. iv. 136-41]

The inexorable line of development holds into the cell scene of act 4, scene 2, and however this is played, the audience is now conscious that the affair is much less funny than it was. The joke has been taken too far, and we know it. Let us hold on to that formulation, and cast back to the beginning of the play. The entire construct prepares us for our realization in the later stages. (One cannot point to a precise moment in act 3, or even 4, when the audience becomes aware of its own queasiness; but it must surely happen.) The hints start, of course, with the title. Twelfth Night is a festival that has already been going on too long. Twelve days and nights of overeating and overdrinking, little or nothing done in the way of useful work: the Elizabethans were not so different from ourselves. By 6 January they were ready enough for one more party, and then back to work. The experience of satiety is confirmed in Orsino's opening words. They stem from a condition, 'If music be the food of love, play on …' that itself indicates an un-certainty about the festive mood. The terms that follow are excess, surfeiting, appetite may sicken and so die. Enough, no more,' Tis not so sweet now as it was before.

This last is the motto-statement, and it should stand not only before the play as a whole but before act 2, scene 3. This scene, more than any other, evokes the experience of Twelfth Night. That is because it is a revel, which goes on too long, and because Sir Toby actually hints at a seasonal festivity in his song 'O' the twelfth day of December' [II. iii. 84]. The opening and closing sections of the scene are worth pausing over. Sir Andrew would clearly be happy to go to bed, but Sir Toby insists on keeping the party going. He is the moving spirit in what is not simply a revel, but rather a revived and maintained revel—against the pressures of those who feel that enough is enough. The scene moves up from the lyric nostalgia of 'O Mistress mine' to the bar-room catch, 'Hold thy peace', and so to the intense climax of the confrontation: it then is stepped down to the lesser excitements of the projected plot, and finally reverts to the mood of the piano opening. Bottom is hit, apparently, with Sir Andrew's Chekhovian 'I was adored once too.' A moment's silence, a grunt, then 'Let's to bed, knight.' The scene has ended now, and with it the party? No. Sir Toby, needing more money from Sir Andrew, presses him to send for it; then he changes his mind about going to bed. 'Come, come, I'll go burn some sack,' tis too late to go to bed now. Come, knight, come, knight.' And those four monosyllables, which seem to symbolize the energy needed to lug a sack of potatoes from a room, close the scene. Who is there who has not shared and understood this episode? Whatever one's temperament, there is a time to move off and to bed. Someone else prefers to stay and keep things going, though the fire has died out of the occasion. It is a fault of taste, this failure to judge the natural life of a party, and someone always commits it.

I put it, then, that Sir Toby's interpretation of the Twelfth Night spirit prepares us for, as it is analogous to, his pursuit of the gulling action. Both impulses spring from the same mind. And this leads us to a concept which we have, I think, to contemplate in this play: the likeableness of the dramatis personae.

Likeableness, for obvious reasons, is not a critical concept. It looks like an invitation to the untrammelled subjectivities of all readers and playgoers—an abdication of critical decorum. All the same, we need the term here. That is because Shakespeare, as I view it, sets up a design in which we are to begin by liking certain characters and disliking others, and to end with reversing these judgements.

It is all focused on Sir Toby and Malvolio, though other characters can affect matters marginally. First, let us place Sir Toby, without preconception. I think C. L. Barber's 'gentlemanly liberty incarnate' hopelessly over-romanticized, just as I would think 'parasite' a misleading importation of modern values concerning employment. It is better to take Sir Toby as a dramatized case-history, with the implied caption 'This is the sort of person certain social conditions yield.' Sir Toby is a knight; he has no substance, no land or money; he lives with and upon his wealthy kinswoman. The order of relationship was familiar and sanctioned. Having no employment, he is endemically short of things to do, and his activities emerge as drinking, the pursuit of practical jokes, spectator sports, conversation. What else could be expected? Sir Toby is gripped by that ennui which is the condition of the unemployed, at all social levels. More, to base any dramatic system of festive values on Sir Toby is self-evidently absurd, for 'holiday' is a meaningless concept save to those who work. Sir Toby does not work, and therefore usurps the values of 'play'.
His revealed characteristics become steadily less appealing. His drunkenness is nicely poised: in act 2, scene 3 it can appear as a tribute to the good life, but in act 1, scene 5 his brief appearance is all but incoherent. (Perhaps the most telling comment on his state is Olivia's 'By mine honour, half drunk' (1. 116). What was the finished product like?) Stage drunkenness is always an ambivalent affair, for the sufficient reason that it is in real life. A drunk is funny, an alcoholic is not. The human mind contains diverse views of the matter, and its responses are generally mixed. So in Twelfth Night. On the whole, our experience of Sir Toby is in this respect probably analogous to our reception of anyone who, like the immortal Captain Grimes, 'puts in some very plucky work with the elbow': we warm to him more in the earlier than the later stages of the acquaintance.

Sir Toby's other characteristics are similarly disenchanting. His relationship with Sir Andrew emerges as contemptuous and exploitative. The comic glow protects his name for a while, certainly. Ask anyone who said 'Thou hadst need send for more money', and he will probably answer 'Iago', and he will be wrong. It is in the gulling actions that Sir Toby appears at his least appealing. There are two main points here. He pursues the Malvolio affair with a relentlessness that is disturbing: 'I would we were well rid of this knavery. If he may be conveniently deliver'd, I would he were, for I am now so far in offence with my niece that I cannot pursue with any safety this sport to the upshot' [IV. ii. 67-71]. Not remorse, but fear of the consequences for himself, inhibits 'gentlemanly liberty incarnate' here. No wonder this unattractive little speech is so often cut in performance. The other matter is the gulling of Sir Andrew and the arranged duel between him and Cesario. Here I stress the force of pattern, so often Shakespeare's way of imparting personality and being. One joke is inconclusive; two suggest a mind obsessively addicted to making sport out of others. It comes back to the ennui of the unemployed, and therefore to the social attitudes that condition Sir Toby's cast of mind.

'Art any more than a steward?' Everyone quotes the great tribute to cakes and ale; fewer recall, or perhaps in the audience even register, the words that immediately precede it. The greater quotation drives out the lesser. It is typical of this play's strategy that the reservation is set into the record, before being overtaken by the main tenor of the play's surface statement. Yet the question summarizes much of this play's concerns and tensions. All Shakespeare's plays exhibit some social tensions, if only within the same class. Twelfth Night, more than any other comedy of this period, reveals a discreet awareness of these tensions. Three of its personages marry upwards (Sebastian, Viola, Maria), and two seek to (Sir Andrew, Malvolio). This movement upwards is caricatured in Malvolio, but the others demonstrate it too. There is a general blurring of social frontiers in Olivia's household, and this contributes to the friction and resentments of the play. Malvolio is the administrator, formally in charge, and he has to deal with people who are or feel themselves to be socially superior to him. It recalls the resentments that Drake identified years before: 'I must have the gentleman to haul and draw with the mariner, and the mariners with the gentleman.' These resentments, dramatized most forcefully in the encounters of Malvolio and Sir Toby, are in fact most subtly expressed through Maria.

Maria need not be seen and played as the bouncy, vital soubrette of stage history. Her pattern is one of social resentment, a willingness to stir up trouble for others (while usually exiting rapidly from the scene of the crime), and a remorseless drive towards her postcurtain apotheosis: Lady Belch. (Her route there is charted via the subtextually unimpeachable 'do not think I have wit enough to lie straight in my bed', and whatever the director wants to make of 'Come by and by to my chamber'). With Maria, conversations tend to turn into threats to others. Sir Toby is in trouble; Feste may be fired; Cesario should be shown the door; Malvolio will come; Malvolio is mad. Maria's 'perfectly selfless tact' [in the words of C. L. Barber] is invisible to me. As with Sir Toby, we must reach out for a type from the characteristics of the individual. Maria endures the classic ambivalences of the lady-in-waiting, above the servants but not ranking with the great. Who is Maria? 'My niece's chambermaid' is Sir Toby's description, in her presence. It is not what we should term an introduction: Sir Toby is speaking to Sir Andrew, presumably just out of earshot of Maria. The editorial glosses are unanimous in their assurance that 'My niece's chamber-maid' means 'lady-in-waiting' or 'lady's maid'. But the OED does not confirm this certitude. The fact is that chambermaid did also, at this time, mean (as we should expect), 'female servant', roughly the usage of today. Interestingly, the OED marks the 'lady's maid' sense of chambermaid as obsolete: the latest reference cited is Swift's, in 1719. In other words, the editors limit the word to a sense destined to become historically moribund (perhaps, already so), while rejecting a perfectly healthy sense that has survived to our present day. I don't, of course, doubt that the editorial gloss substantially identifies the position Maria holds in Olivia's household. (Olivia herself refers to Maria as 'my gentlewoman', [I. v. 162].) I suggest that the 'servant' sense is present, and in Maria's mind; which is why Sir Toby does not speak the word to Maria's face. Chambermaid indicates a historic trap, out of which the most socially agile clambered—upwards. Why they should wish to is touched in during act 1, scene 5. Maria receives a deadly thrust from Cesario: her nautically-phrased intervention is met with 'No, good swabber, I am to hull here a little longer' (11. 203-04), after which no more is heard from Maria. Swabber is one who swabs down decks—and is therefore pure metaphor—but contains the lingering hint that Maria was engaged in a similar activity, as chambermaid. The social insult is all part of what the play identifies as the fluid and shifting lines of social demarcation.

In the collisions of aspiration and resentment Malvolio stands, or seems to stand, for an absurd and affected species of folly. That is the unmistakable verdict that we are required to arrive at in the first half of Twelfth Night. Yet the play's strategy is to pivot the dramatis personae around on their revolving stage, and the second half is insistent that we reconsider Malvolio. Notoriously, this poses problems for the actor. It is fairly easy to play the Malvolio of the first few scenes; it is fairly easy to play the Malvolio of the later scenes; it is difficult to knit the two halves into a whole, which is one reason why Malvolio is a star part. There are difficulties for the audience, and for the critic, too, since all are engaged in revising a settled position. As we look back on the early scenes, a few obvious points can be ticked off. Malvolio is a charmless and humourless bureaucrat, but honest and able, and Olivia thinks well of him. ('I would not have him miscarry for the half of my dowry', [III. iv. 62-3].) It cannot be easy to get Sir Toby to behave—Olivia cannot—and the functional opposition between them slips easily into antagonism. Then, the drinking scene (act 2, scene 3) is presented entirely from the view of the partygoers. We, the audience, are at the party, and we want it to go on. Yet everyone has had the experience of being woken up in the small hours by a crowd of late revellers, and of feeling precisely the rage that Malvolio puts words to (acting on behalf of Olivia, and Malvolio would never lie on a matter like that). That rage is the greater if one needs to get up to work—unlike the revellers, who can sleep it off. In the theatre there is only one case, that of the partygoers. In real life there is a quite different case, and our backward glance recognizes it. Malvolio, then, is not the simple anti-life stereotype that he is cast for in act 2, scene 3. But the on-stage case for Malvolio does not emerge until act 4, scene 2.

The cell scene is crucial. On the one side, we begin to detach ourselves from the sustained animosity of Feste, and from the self-interested sadism of Sir Toby. On the other, we recognize a 'different' human being emerging from the darkness. It is a rebirth, almost. I do not wish to support some of the excesses of stage history. Henry Irving, for instance, used to play the scene all out for pathos, with much weeping and an appeal to the 'poor man' response. What happens to Malvolio has nothing to do with pathos. It is a matter of human identity emerging, and it is all in the words. Take, as a simple comparison, Malvolio's opening lines, 'Yes, and shall do, till the pangs of death shake him. Infirmity, that decays the wise, doth ever make the better fool … I marvel your ladyship takes delight in such a barren rascal' [I. v. 75-84]. It is impossible to speak these lines without giving in some form the impression of an affected dolt. And now take:

    I say this house is as dark as ignorance, though ignorance were as dark as hell; and I say there was never man thus abus'd. I am no more mad than you are; make the trial of it in any constant question … I think nobly of the soul, and no way approve his opinion. [IV. ii. 45-56]

Unless one strains intolerably against the directions of the words, it is impossible to speak them in the manner and accent of a fool. They express a being of sense, and human worth. The words must be respected, and thus the speaker. Above all, the words express an identity, individual and social.
And what is this identity? It is that of a gentleman. The first phase of the cell scene, the dialogue with Sir Topas, shows Malvolio at bottom. This is the dark night of the soul, the communion with madness and (apparently) clerical imbecility. The second phase, with Feste speaking in his own voice, records Malvolio’s struggle out of the pit and towards the light. The themes are communication, relationship, ways and means. Phase two starts with the calls of ‘Fool!’ (which Feste affects not to hear) and, after ‘Who calls, ha?’, modulates into ‘Good fool’. What follows is decisive:

Good fool, as ever thou wilt deserve well at my hand, help me to a candle, and pen, ink, and paper. As I am a gentleman, I will live to be thankful to thee for’t. (11. 80-3)

The identity which Malvolio discovers for himself in the cell, and which he imparts to us, is the backing for his promise: ‘As I am a gentleman.’ Not, be it noted, ‘steward’. The identity of functional authority is rejected in favour of a term whose core of meaning lies outside, as well as within, social rank. The OED does not commit itself to a categorization of Malvolio’s word here—neither does Schmidt or Onions—but I judge sense 3 to be the nearest: ‘A man in whom gentle birth is accompanied by appropriate qualities of behaviour; hence, in general, a man of chivalrous instincts and fine feelings.’ Gentleman, of all social terms, casts the widest net. The word contains the ideas of birth, education, wealth, behaviour, and values; yet it allows no single aspect to dominate, nor can any element insist on its presence. Gentleman, that uniquely English invention, is at bottom the principle of ‘tolerance’ within the social structure, the moving part that takes the strain of fixed relationships. It is also, in dramatic terms, a variable, and it permits a case to be re-opened and the standing of Malvolio to be reconsidered, very late. The term accounts for Malvolio’s changed address to the Fool. Malvolio does not offer him a crude bribe, but a form of words that combines the hint of material reward with the understatements of courtesy. ‘I will live to be thankful to thee for’t… It shall advantage thee more than ever the bearing of letter did.… Fool, I’ll requite it to the highest degree’ [IV. ii. 82-3, 111-12, 118]. Under all is the implied admission of fellowship with the Fool. Not ‘fellow’, that socially ambivalent word Malvolio mistook from Olivia, but fellowship, is Malvolio’s discovery. The man who would be ‘Count Malvolio’, fantasy’s alternative to ‘Steward’, now founds himself on the truth of ‘gentleman’.

Shakespeare admits the claim, for Malvolio at the end speaks the language of a gentleman. Before his final irruption occurs the intermezzo of the letter. This episode throws some light on the dramatic origins of Fabian. Commentators have often wondered as to the point of this nondescript character, who appears, as few characters in Shakespeare do, to have been less created than manufactured. Of the functional reasons for his existence, the most important that I can detect is his reading of Malvolio’s letter. We need Fabian for the same reason that we need a newscaster for news: we require a fairly neutral and objective tone for the delivery of potentially explosive information. By universal assent, a too emotional, personal delivery distracts one’s reception of the message. Feste’s hatred of Malvolio bars a neutral reading, and he obviously mimics Malvolio’s voice; hence Olivia orders Fabian to read the letter. His colourless delivery is exactly the right medium, and the message comes through with undisturbed clarity. Malvolio’s deep sense of injury is expressed with both passion and control, and the Duke’s comment ratifies its inner decorum: ‘This savours not much of distraction.’ (This line is a perfectly-formed cell in the structure of the final scene: the aesthete’s word, ’savour’, confronts a reality outside the world of aesthetic contemplation.) Malvolio’s is a well-filed message, and by dramatic convention it is, like almost all letters, expressed in prose.

Hence the way is paved for Malvolio’s entry, and his climactic statement of injury. The tone and quality of that last speech are obvious to all. What matters formally is that the speech is in verse. For the first time in the play, Malvolio speaks in the language of the rank to which he had aspired. It is his ultimate irony, that in the moment of humiliation and disgrace he speaks in the tongue of social elevation and human dignity.

That final speech, leading to the appalling ‘I’ll be reveng’d on the whole pack of you’, is the climax of everything that happens in Twelfth Night. The experience must be confronted, and neither denied nor indulged. ‘Malvolio: a Tragedy’ is a sentimentalization of this play. But equally, one is struck by the large number of critics who, on this issue, seem bent on repressing instincts which, outside the theatre of Twelfth Night, they would surely admit. I cite a few instances, though my point could easily be illustrated at far greater length. To Joseph Summers [in "The Masks of Twelfth Night," University of Kansas Review 22 (1955)], 'Malvolio is, of course, justly punished.' [In "Thematic Patterns in Twelfth Night," Shakespeare Studies 1 (1965)] Barbara K. Lewalski concurs in the natural justice of the affair: 'Since he so richly deserves his exposure, and so actively cooperates in bringing it upon himself, there seems little warrant for the critical tears sometimes shed over his harsh treatment and none at all for a semitragic rendering of his plight in the "dark house".' For C. L. Barber, Malvolio is 'a kind of foreign body to be expelled by laughter, in Shakespeare's last free-and-easy festive comedy'. Most certainly he is to be expelled, if Twelfth Night is a 'free-and-easy festive comedy'; but supposing the intruder belongs in the play, what then?

How can one explain this critical imperviousness to the ending? One comes to view the critics here as a representative sampling of the human mind. They want, as we all do, a comedy; they do not want a disturbance to the agreeable mood created in Twelfth Night; it is easiest to find a response based on 'Serve Malvolio right: he asked for it: anyway, Olivia and Orsino will do their best to smooth things over.' They seek a formula that helps to suppress the disquiet one inevitably feels. In this they faithfully embody certain tendencies within the mind, and thus—as Shakespeare well knew—of his audience.

Even so, it is a failure of criticism. Hardin Craig catches the essence of the position I have illustrated, commenting [in his edition of The Complete Works of Shakespeare (1951)] that the reading of Malvolio's last line 'is by many modern actors so passionate and revengeful as to spoil the effect of the comedy; this cannot have been Shakespeare's intention'. Precisely: but it is only necessary to extend the thought an inch further, and ask: was it not Shakespeare's intention to 'spoil the effect of the comedy', and was not that the goal to which the entire dramatic enterprise was directed? Why not? Where is it laid down that a dramatist may not build into his design a threat to its own mood?

In the final stages, that threat all but destroys the mood of Twelfth Night. The minor action bids to overwhelm the major. The Illyrian world of fulfilled romance, genial comics, and harmless pranks metamorphoses into an image of the real world, with its grainy texture, social frictions, and real pain inflicted upon real people. Malvolio must bear the burden of the real world, as he did its festive release. The disposable person of part one has become the victim of part two, and thus the agent for showing up the festive spirit itself. The Duke's last nine lines exactly measure the play's attempt to pull together the vestiges of the mood of comedy. But this time the party, barring a last song from Feste, is really over. It is balm of a sort, and the audience needs it, for it has to recover from a climax in which it participated, to the origins of which it was privy. It is necessary for the mind's defences to re-group. They have, after all, to deal with shock.

I'll be reveng'd on the whole pack of you. 'The theatrical dimension of the line is all-important, and we need the historical imagination to grasp it. At pack, the subliminal metaphor discloses itself. It is a bear-baiting. The audience becomes spectators, Malvolio the bear. The theatrical voltage of the shock is immensely increased if we accept that bear-baiting actually occurred within the same auditorium. It is, however, unnecessary for me to argue here that theatres were 'multi-use auditoria'. The essential point is that the original audience would have witnessed enough bear-baitings, whether in the specific theatre of Twelfth Night (Globe), in other theatres such as the Hope, or elsewhere. The connections between theatre, bear-baiting, and festivity were well established. And the awareness of those connections would have governed the audience's experience of Malvolio. So would the delivery of the line. We see a Malvolio who must address his stage tormentors, roughly at right angles to the sight lines of the audience. He is addressing Orsino and company, not us. Imagine a Malvolio in the centre of the platform stage, addressing others downstage: he is surrounded on three (or all) sides by tiers of spectators, who are still perhaps jeering at him, and turns on his heel through at least 180 degrees to take in 'the whole pack of you'. That way the house, not merely the stage company, is identified with the 'pack'. It is theatre as blood sport, theatre that celebrates its own dark origins. That, too, is 'festive' comedy. What the audience makes of its emotions is its own affair. I surmise that the ultimate effect of Twelfth Night is to make the audience ashamed of itself.

REVIEWS AND RETROSPECTIVE ACCOUNTS

Mixed review of Margaret Webster's 1940 revival of Twelfth Night at the St. James Theater in New York, in which the critic asserts that the text of the production lacks a "poetic touch." The reviewer also suggests that both Helen Hayes as Viola and Maurice Evans as Malvolio are miscast.

Commends Peter Gill's emphasis on self-love and sexual ambiguity in his 1975 revival of Twelfth Night at the Aldwych Theatre in London. The critic notes, however, that in this interpretation the comic characters are presented less successfully than are the romantic characters.

Applauds the performances of Henry Irving as Malvolio, who "reads with consummate intelligence," and Ellen Terry as Viola, who "bore herself right manfully as a boy," in the 1884 production of Twelfth Night. The review was first published in The New York Herald.

Generally negative critique of John Barton's 1969 RSC staging of Twelfth Night at the Royal Shakespeare Theatre, Stratford-upon-Avon.

Faults Hugh Hunt in his 1950 revival of Twelfth Night at the Old Vic Theatre for altering Feste's position from that of a clown to that of "an ageing entertainer in faded motley who … is losing his grip and knows it." The critic ventures that, because the attention afforded Feste's character has not been given to the development of other characters—notably Malvolio, Sir Andrew, and Sir Toby—the production is flawed.

Argues that the 1940 production of Twelfth Night at the St. James Theater in New York was flawed because of such defects as obscure Elizabethan jokes and arduous plotting. Gibbs does, however, laud the portrayals of Viola and Malvolio by both Helen Hayes and Maurice Evans and commends the direction of Margaret Webster.

Favorable review of John Gielgud's 1955 staging of Twelfth Night at Stratford-on-Avon, with Laurence Olivier and Vivien Leigh in the starring roles.

Extols the "excellent, well-spoken, freshly characterized performances" of Kenneth Branagh's 1987 Twelfth Night cast at the Riverside Studios in London. James especially praises Richard Briers's puritanistic and comical portrayal of Malvolio.

Brief assessment of the 1974 revival of Twelfth Night by David William at the American Shakespeare Theater. Kalem finds the production tedious and one in which "the prankishness and the poetry are divorced instead of being mated."

Laudatory assessment of John Barton's 1970 RSC presentation of Twelfth Night at London's Aldwych Theatre; Kingston declares the staging a "fine and moving production."

Examining the setting, costuming, technical aspects, and music in John Caird's 1983 presentation of Twelfth Night at the Royal Shakespeare Theatre, Maguin concludes that the stage is "cluttered" and finds it "difficult to judge the actors… since all they are supposed to do is fit in with the set and survive between special effects."

Highly favorable review of Augustin Daly's 1893 revival of Twelfth Night at Daly's Theatre. The critic praises the production's whimsical, dreamlike quality, and commends in particular the performance of Ada Rehan, whose portrayal of Viola marked "one of the finest and richest examples of her art."

Commends the 1991 revival of Twelfth Night at London's Playhouse Theatre, finding that director Peter Hall challenges the scholarly trend to focus on the "darkness, danger and malice behind the play's smiles."

Brief mention of a revival of Twelfth Night by William D'Avenant at the Duke's playhouse, which Pepys found to be "acted well, though … a silly play."

Presents a brief overview of the principal actors in William D'Avenant's 1661 revival of Twelfth Night at the Duke's playhouse and speculates that the production may have been an altered version of the original text.

Asserts that Henry Irving's 1884 staging of Twelfth Night was "one of the least successful of [his] Shakespearean productions." Terry states that the play, which was booed by its opening night audience, fared better in America, though she still felt it was miscast and "dull."

Calling the work "a lively but uneven production," the critic offers a mixed review of Michael Benthall's 1958 version of Twelfth Night at the Old Vic Theatre.

Praising a "brilliantly resourceful" and comical performance of Olivia by Dorothy Tutin, the critic offers a generally positive assessment of Peter Hall's 1958 staging of Twelfth Night at the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre in Stratford-upon-Avon.

Considers Peter Hall's 1960 revival of Twelfth Night at the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre a success, though the critic finds fault with Barbara Barnett's portrayal of Olivia.

Brief and generally negative appraisal of Terry Hands's 1979 presentation of Twelfth Night with the RSC.

Applauds Sir Cedric Hardwicke's portrayal of Sir Toby Belch in Alec Guinness's 1948 production at the New Theatre, declaring that he has "seen no performance in Shakespearean comedy much better than this."

COMPARISONS AND OVERVIEWS

Summarizes the stage history of Twelfth Night, chronicling the productions from an early 17th century performance noted by John Manningham in his Diary, to a revival at the Birmingham Repertory Theater during the 1910s.

Assesses the 1958 stagings of Twelfth Night at both the Old Vic (Michael Benthall) and the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre (Peter Hall), finding the productions unconventional and lacking the "inner cohesion which is essential to full artistic satisfaction."

Provides excerpts from reviews of selected American productions of Twelfth Night, beginning with Margaret Webster's 1940 presentation at the St. James Theater and continuing through Michael Benthall's 1958 revival with the Old Vic company at the Broadway Theater. Swander also analyzes the text of the play in relation to staging issues, concluding "that there is no substitute for a genuine understanding of the meaning—and thus of the unity and theatrical potential—of the playwright's words."

STAGING ISSUES

Postulates that Johan de Witt, whose sketch of a scene enacted at the Swan Theatre might correspond with Act III, scene iv of Twelfth Night, may have viewed an early version of Shakespeare's play in 1598.

Argues that the first court production of Twelfth Night may have occurred during the Christmas festivities of 1601-02.

Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 34): Introduction

Twelfth Night

Written before the "problem comedies" such as Troilus and Cressida and Measure for Measure, Twelfth Night marks for many critics the most well-crafted of Shakespeare's "happy comedies," one rich in symbolism and complex in its exploration of love, its blurring of appearance and reality, its troubling of gender, and its portrayal of human psychology.

As in most of Shakespeare's romantic comedies from the 1590's, love motivates many of the characters' actions and attitudes. Some commentators, such as Peter G. Phialas (1966) and Charles Tyler Prouty (1966), have claimed that the characters interact in order to depict a Renaissance ideal of courtly love. Richard Henze (1975) has expanded this line of thought, arguing that Shakespeare resolves the play's contradictions through the interaction of characters, particularly through love-relationships. Similarly, Dennis R. Preston (1970) has asserted that the minor characters bind the seemingly disparate elements of the play, forming a unified whole. Other critics, including Terence Eagleton (1967), have contended that love in the play fuses language and reality, and thus questions the fixity of nature.

While some scholars have argued that love is the primary subject of Twelfth Night and have debated whether it has a unifying or dissembling effect on the dichotomy between appearance and reality, other commentators have identified this very dichotomy as the play's central theme. For example, Karen Greif (1981) has focused on Shakespeare's questioning of the nature of truth through the characters' "play," claiming that "Twelfth Night poses questions about 'the purpose of playing' and about whether illusion is perhaps too deeply embedded in human experience to be ever completely separated from reality." Other critics, including D. J. Palmer (1967), have contextualized Shakespeare within a tradition that conflates art and nature, and Walter N. King (1968), drawing on the history of philosophy, has considered Shakespeare to be consciously commenting on a Parmenidean approach to metaphysics. The resulting portrayal of nature has led commentators such as Karin S. Coddon (1993) to consider Twelfth Night as questioning the stability of social status by troubling a supposedly natural hierarchy in Elizabethan society.

In addition to Shakespeare's problematizing the fixity of nature, many feminist literary theorists have claimed that disorder in Twelfth Night also affects definitions of sex and gender, focusing primarily on the Viola/Cesario character. Scholars have extensively debated whether Shakespeare consciously or unconsciously uses Viola's role-playing to demonstrate the plasticity of socially constructed gender roles as well as whether the character calls supposedly fixed sexual differences into question. Stevie Davies (1993) and Nancy Hayles (1979), for example, have contended that Viola's role-playing questions the idea of a naturally determined gender. Others, such as Lorna Hutson (1996), have argued that Shakespeare affirms not only the plasticity of gender, but the rhetorical construction of sex as well.

Modern commentators have also studied the tenets of psychoanalysis to explore both the actions of the characters and the motivations of the author. Freudian and Jungian taxonomies have been used to dissect characters' actions (such as Viola's putting on the guise of a man) and their personification of psychological attributes. For example, Helene Moglen (1973) has contended that Twelfth Night portrays a psychological picture "strikingly similar to major aspects of Freud's own theory of psycho-sexual development." Critics such as Leonard F. Manheim (1964) have even applied psychoanalytic theory to Shakespeare himself, finding in Twelfth Night an expression of his unconscious attempt to enact an Oedipal fantasy.

Critical approaches to Twelfth Night have varied considerably, from strict examinations of the text alone to psychoanalytic evaluations of its author, from historical inquiries into Elizabethan love to feminist interpretations of sex and gender. Regardless, Twelfth Night continues to attract contemporary criticism, as commentators find in the play the height of Shakespeare's comedic art.

Peter G. Phialas (essay date 1966)

In the following essay, Phialas examines the elements of Twelfth Night that Shakespeare adapted from his earlier comedies, and he discerns in the play an ideal of love that emerges through the juxtaposition of Viola's selfless love and the self-indulgent love of Orsino and Olivia.

I

Twelfth Night has been called a masterpiece not of invention but recapitulation, a summing-up of the admirable features of the "joyous" comedies. It is certainly that and much more. Its connections with earlier Shakespearean comedies are many and they have to do with large elements of the plot, although of course we should bear in mind that some of these elements are present also in the sources of the play. In any case, it is clear that the confusion of twins goes back to The Comedy of Errors. The theme of a disguised lady serving the man she loves in his courtship of another woman, though present in the sources of Twelfth Night, had been employed in The Two Gentlemen of Verona. And here it may be worth mentioning that the disguised Julia in The Two Gentlemen of Verona calls herself Sebastian. Sebastian's devoted Antonio in Twelfth Night recalls Bassanio's equally devoted friend of the same name in The Merchant of Venice. With Much Ado About Nothing, as with other comedies, Twelfth Night has in common the motif of the disdaining lover, a motif it develops rather in the way of As You Like It, where Phoebe in some ways anticipates Olivia's fruitless love for a disguised lady. Another connection with As You Like It is an analogy in the roles of Viola and Silvius, both of whom undertake to advance rival love affairs of those they love themselves. Furthermore, and far more significant, is the fact that Feste, though of course a fresh, independent character, is a creation in the new manner of Touch-stone, and he is intended to supply something like the latter's point of view and commentary.¹ These and other features of earlier comedies Twelfth Night employs in fresh combinations, in an action that, in spite of these borrowings, produces the impression of complete novelty. But although the story is fresh and although Shakespeare invents episodes and characters, the total effect of the play, its chief thematic concern, repeats the large meaning we have discovered in the earlier plays and particularly in the other two joyous comedies. If we accept as the play's chief theme the education in the ways of love of the disdainful as well as the romantic lover then it is clear that in this it repeats the central ideas of As You Like It and Much Ado About Nothing. And if in addition we accept Rosalind as the representative of the ideally balanced temperament and exemplar of the proper attitude toward love, then we shall conclude that Shakespeare intends something very like that in his conception of Viola. This is not to say that the two heroines have the same temperament but rather that through them, in somewhat different ways, the dramatist defines the proper point of view towards life's processes. Through their intelligent, level-headed, and generous approach to the challenges of this "working-day world," they demonstrate the sure way to maximum happiness for themselves and those around them. Of this more presently.

In chronology Twelfth Night appears to have followed the other two joyous comedies, and its date can be fixed with fair accuracy. To begin with, the limits of that date are 1598, the year of Meres' Palladis Tamia, which fails to mention the play, and the first allusion to it on February 2, 1601/2 (Candlemas), in John Manningham's Diary, where he records that at "our feast wee had a play called "Twelve Night or What you Will."² But before this performance of February, 1601/2, the play must have been acted in a private or public theatre or both. The title strongly suggests that it was first acted on Twelfth Night, and this would defeat Dover Wilson's view that it was originally drafted for the performance at the Inns of Court on February 2, 1601/2, to which Manningham alludes in his diary.³ Two contemporary facts, though seeming to raise difficulties, ultimately contribute to a precise dating of the play. Shakespeare's company acted a play at court on Twelfth Night, January 6, 1600/1, and on that same day the Queen entertained Don Virginio Orsino, Duke of Bracciano, who was visiting her court. And what is even more tantalizing is his report in a letter to his Duchess that the Queen's entertainment had included una commedia mescolata, con musiche e balli, "a mingled comedy with bits of music and dances."⁴ Unfortunately Don Virginio gives no further details but promises his Duchess to tell her more by word of mouth. From this and other contributory records Leslie Hotson has concluded that Twelfth Night was the play in question, that Shakespeare's Orsino is a graceful compliment to the visiting Duke, that Olivia is intended to suggest the Queen, and that Malvolio is indeed, as other critics had supposed, an audacious though by no means impudent satiric portrait of Sir William Knollys, the Queen's controller.⁵ Some connection between the name of Shakespeare's Orsino and the Queen's royal visitor there must be, but it is scarcely possible that Shakespeare wrote the play especially for the Duke's entertainment. One reason is that he would have had scant time—just eleven days—to compose the comedy since firm news of the Duke's journey and of the probable date of his arrival reached Whitehall on Christmas Day, 1600.⁵ It was thus on Christmas Day or shortly thereafter that the Queen gave detailed directions to her Lord Chamberlain which he was to follow in planning the grand entertainment. Among these directions occur the following: "To Confer with my Lord Admirall and the Master of the Revells for taking order generally with the players to make choyse of [?the] play that shalbe best furnished with rich appareil, have greate variety and change of Musick and daunces, and of a Subject that may be most pleasing to her Majestic."⁷ The probability is strong that "to make choyse" here means select a play in existence, not commission a new one, a play with music and dance and a theme pleasing to the Queen. The care and minuteness of detail in the royal directions suggest that the Queen was unwilling to allow chance and improvisation to detract from the splendor of the royal celebration, and it seems logical to conclude that she wished to present to her visitor a play known to possess the qualities she specified. Furthermore, it is not certain that Shakespeare's Orsino and Olivia would have been sufficiently flattering to Don Virginio and his imperial hostess. In all probability the play was written later in the year 1601, when the name Orsino could be employed with greater propriety and the character could be presented with greater freedom than would have been possible in 1600. Other evidence points to a date after 1600. The new map alluded to in III, ii, 66, is that in Hakluyt's Voyages which was printed in 1600. In addition, 1600 is the date of Robert Jones's First Booke of Songs and Ayres from which Shakespeare borrowed the song "Farewell, dear heart," which is sung alternately by Feste and Sir Toby Belch. What all this does is to narrow this does of the probable play by placing it in or after 1600 and before Manningham's allusion on February 2, 1601/2. Since, as we have seen, 1600 will not do, the only Twelfth Night available was that of 1601, and this means that the play, the last of Shakespeare's romantic comedies, must have been acted for the first time a few weeks before Manningham's reference to it on February 2, 1601/2.

II

For the love story of the four chief characters in the play Shakespeare may have turned to a variety of sources, dramatic and non-dramatic. The chief of these seems to have been the story of Apolonius and Siila in Barnaby Riche's Farewell to Militane Profession, first printed in 1581. Here Shakespeare found the story of twins of different sexes, which would admit a romantic treatment of the sort of confusion of identity which in a different context had formed the central theme of The Comedy of Errors. In addition he found a ship-wreck on a strange coast which forces the heroine to take the sex and name of her brother. Thus disguised, Silla (Viola) seeks employment with Apolonius (Orosino), the man she loves, who sends her to court Juliana (Olivia) for him. The latter, rejecting Apolionius' suit, falls in love with the disguised Siila, who is later replaced by her long-absent twin brother, Silvio (Sebastian). Silvio's acceptance of Juliana's invitation, Juliana's revelation of her betrothal, her criticism of the page's refusal to acknowledge it, and the Duke's anger with his page—these matters are so close to the corresponding episodes in Twelfth Night that Shakespeare must have known Riche's version of the tale.

The alleged topicality of the conflict between Sir Toby and Malvolio has been the subject of much speculation. In addition to Leslie Hotson's theory alluded to above, it has been observed that another contemporary quarrel may have given Shakespeare the impetus and even details for the attack upon Malvolio. The quarrel was that between Sir Posthumus Hoby and two or three gentlemen, including Sir Richard Cholmley and William Eure, who, after a day's hunting in the country, invited themselves to spend the night in Hoby's house and proceeded to disturb that household with their boisterous drinking. The matter was brought to trial and seems to have been the talk of London during the years 1600-02. Still another source for the Malvolio episodes has been found in Sidney's Arcadia, in the broad comedy dealing with Dametas and his family. A more likely influence upon the episodes with Malvolio and his tormentors may have been the severe onslaught upon humour characters in Jonsonian comedy. Such influence may have been particularly strong in Shakespeare's conception of Malvolio and Sir Andrew Aguecheek. The latter may be seen in part as a composite of Matthew and Stephen, Jonson's city and country gulls in his Every Man in His Humour.

III

The materials available to Shakespeare were, then, extensive; and it is possible that he was indebted to a good many of them. But what is of great interest is that the two chief actions in the play, the mistaking of twins and the service by a disguised lady of the man she loves in his courtship of another woman, had each been dramatized in different plays by Shakespeare at the very outset of his career. In Twelfth Night, where he combines these two actions, he seems to complete the circle. But the way the two themes are combined and the conception of the characters, especially the heroines, clearly give proof of the distance Shakespeare had measured since the composition of The Comedy of Errors and The Two Gentlemen of Verona. And thus the structure of Twelfth Night, the way its episodes are conceived and related, the recreation of characters found in the sources, the invention of new episodes and characters, the function of music and song, and in general the mutual qualification of the play's several parts—these matters derive in great part from earlier comedies written in the long interval of nearly ten years. Whether Shakespeare was indebted to a contemporary quarrel or Sidney's Arcadia for a few details in the Malvolio episodes it is impossible to say. What is clear is that those episodes owe their presence to Shakespeare's concern with different attitudes toward love. And it is equally clear that those episodes are presented in close relationship to the chief events in the comedy. Malvolio is not simply the butt of the inebriated Sir Toby and Andrew Aguecheek. He is conceived in terms which bear close relevance to the love theme of the play. Malvolio is first and last one of Olivia's suitors, and his chief contribution to the play is in representing a particular attitude toward love as well as toward himself and his world. In this he recalls Jaques of As You Like It, and it is his peculiar response to love and his rigid objection to all indulgence which exclude him for a time from the happy and harmonious conclusion of the play. Malvolio's opposition to indulgence, in itself an important theme of the play, is the immediate cause of his undoing, but that undoing has to do with him as Olivia's suitor, one who represents a particular conception of love. Malvolio has clearly evolved out of Shakespeare's preoccupation, in his romantic comedies, with different and often conflicting conceptions of man's ideal relationship to woman.

Malvolio's love for Olivia, or what he takes to be love, is limited or rather vitiated by his extreme and humorless self-love. But there is another side in Shakespeare's conception of the pompous steward. The complete absence of humor and self-awareness in him is coupled with in this a fierce all liberality indictment and pleasure. In this he stands for an extreme view which, by juxtaposition with its opposite, is intended to point to an ideal attitude. But the theme of indulgence is not a gratuitous adjunct to the main concern of Twelfth Night. It is instead a theme dramatized in analogical relationship to the theme of love. Thus Malvolio, involved in both themes, must be seen as a central character, and the dramatist's conception of him is clearly dictated by thematic considerations. He evolves in great part out of Shakespeare's choice to dramatize the analogy between romantic love and self-indulgence.

Other features in the action of Twelfth Night which derive from earlier plays may be cited. The scene in which Orsino declares his love for Olivia in the hearing of the disguised Viola repeats in the main the action of a similar episode in The Two Gentlemen of Verona. There is of course an important difference, namely the fact that, unlike Proteus, Orsino is not violating any love vows made earlier to the disguised woman who loves him. And this difference is dictated by the dramatist's choice to stress different motifs in the two scenes. In the scene in The Two Gentlemen of Verona the emphasis is upon Proteus' violation of his vows and the effect of his action upon the disguised Julia. In Twelfth Night the stress is upon the Duke's manner of expressing his infatuation with Olivia, his hyperbolic romanticism, as well as upon its painful effect on the disguised Viola. Here there is no immediate question of fickleness on the part of Orsino in the sense of the episode in The Two Gentlemen of Verona. Orsino's outpouring of what he considers his great passion for Olivia is of course undermined by his rhetoric, but it is also thrown into comic relief in retrospect later on in the play by his all too sudden transference of that passion from Olivia to Viola.

Among the many links connecting the comedy with Much Ado About Nothing is the ruse employed in the intrigues aimed at the pair of reluctant lovers in the earlier play and at Malvolio in Twelfth Night. The ironic effect of the conversations which are intended to be overheard by Benedick and Beatrice is here repeated through the letter which Maria drops in Malvolio's path. Maria's letter is but a variation of Don Pedro's plan to bring Beatrice and Benedick together. There are of course the obvious differences in the circumstances of the ruse and its ultimate effects upon its "victims." But there are also certain striking correspondences of detail. Before he overhears talk of Beatrice's love for him, Benedick, it will be recalled, is shown in a long soliloquy attacking Claudio's recent transformation from soldier to lover. But at the conclusion of that passage Benedick asks if he, himself, could be changed by love in the same manner. The question and Benedick's uncertain answer reveal that he is vulnerable, indeed ready to receive the impact of Don Pedro's plan. In like manner Malvolio is shown in the act of revealing his own readiness to be duped by Maria's letter and its "revelations." He is presented in soliloquy imagining himself worthy of Olivia's love. Indeed he imagines himself married to her and in the act of making ready to deal rather severely with Sir Toby. And at that very moment his eye falls upon the letter. The episode is furthermore given a refinement which likewise recalls and surpasses something similar in the earlier play. Benedick is convinced that what he over-hears is not counterfeited: the very thought that someone is trying to gull somebody is instantly rejected. And this is brought about by having that suspicion utterly demolished by the grave witness of the elderly Leonato. The words onstage merge into Benedick's own thoughts so imperceptibly that he would have thought "this a gull but that the white-bearded fellow speaks it." And later he concludes that "This can be no trick." In Twelfth Night Shakespeare in like manner provided a device by which Malvolio is tricked into the conviction that Maria's letter is genuine. What Malvolio reads in the letter are of course his own thoughts and most devout wishes, but there is more. When we consider the letter's style, particularly in the last long passage—"Let thy tongue tang arguments of state; put thyself into the trick of singularity"—we can see clearly that this is neither Olivia's style nor Maria's but Malvolio's own. It is a brilliant stroke. Both the thoughts and words in the letter are so expressive of Malvolio's being that they produce instant conviction.19

IV

Shakespeare's dependence on earlier comedies for certain elements of Twelfth Night ranged beyond his use in fresh combinations of certain episodes. As we have already noted, he repeats certain characters, though of course he recreates them in a fashion to fit the structural and thematic necessities of the story he is dramatizing. This is true in the creation or recreation of minor as well as major characters. Though lacking the brilliant virtuosity of Rosalind and her superior comic awareness, Viola is nevertheless meant to represent the same balance of sentiment with common sense, the same steady and level view of the world around her. In this she repeats Rosalind's function in the earlier play, a function made indispensable by the dramatist's chief concern in these plays. But of course the dramatic terms of her existence require individual features in Viola which are quite different from Rosalind's. Rosalind could not be repeated. Certainly in Viola's position Rosalind would never allow Orsino to maintain even a semblance of an initiative. But her general attitude towards love is repeated in Viola, though more profoundly, albeit more obliquely expressed in the latter. Rosalind's direct attempts to "cure" both Orlando and Phoebe, the one of his bookish Petrarchism and the other of disdain, are repeated by Viola in the later play. But a glance at her scenes with Orsino and Olivia will show how tentative Viola's approach is. She seldom opposes Orsino's whims, and when she differs with him, her comments are gentle and indirect. When she confronts Olivia in their initial meeting, her comment on the latter's disinterest in love is gentler than Rosalind's similar criticism of Phoebe. But Viola's words to Olivia carry greater significance, a maturer vision as befits her own temperament and also the character and position of Olivia. To Viola's inquiry if she is "the lady of the house," Olivia replies: "If I do not usurp myself, I am." Viola's comment on this expresses one of Shakespeare's favorite themes: "Most certain, if you are she, you do usurp yourself; for what is yours to bestow is not yours to reserve." The import of such a speech would have been beyond Phoebe, and perhaps it is beyond Olivia as well. But what is far more significant is that the speech could not have come from Rosalind, for the words proceed from the sort of stillness and reflection we would not associate with her temperament. The attitude expressed in the passage, though repeating Rosalind's general point of view concerning the rejection of love, is enriched by evidence of serious thought. It is an attitude presupposing Rosalind's and transcending it. Although rationality and incisive intellect combine to produce that most attractive quality in Rosalind which we identified with the comic spirit, it is also true that she is not innocent of emotion and the romantic attitude towards love and her lover. But with all this, it must be admitted that Rosalind is master of her emotions; she is in complete control of these as she is of her destiny. Though exiled and forced to disguise herself for safety, she is never in any danger. Rosalind is never in pain, and this is one of the chief points in which she differs from Viola. While Rosalind has "convers'd with a magician" and can do "strange things"—she promises to unite all the lovers on the morrow—Viola is bewildered by her dilemma.20

O time! thou must untangle this, not I.
It is too hard a knot for me t' untie!

(II, ii, 41-42)

It may be said of Rosalind that she controls not only her emotions and her destiny but also the action of the whole play. The same cannot be said of Viola, whose role is somewhat passive by comparison.
This general difference in the conception of Rosalind and Viola is to be found also in other characters. Feste, for instance, though he repeats in part Touchstone's function, achieves his ends by more oblique means. Like Touchstone, his chief role is to comment upon and thereby deflate the sentimental pretensions of such characters as Orsino and Olivia. But his comment upon Orsino's love-melancholy and Olivia's capriciously excessive mourning is both more oblique in manner and more serious in tone than Touchstone's had been in the earlier play. In both cases Feste addresses his reducing commentary in part through songs of time's passing and lovers' deaths and thereby implies at once a subtler attitude towards the aberrations of Orsino and Olivia as well as a measure of sympathy. These features of Feste's character and function suggest greater reflection, perhaps we should say greater maturity, than is revealed in Touchstone.

This reflectiveness implied in the character of Viola and Feste accords with—and indeed generates—a sense of melancholy characteristic of the general mood of the play. In spite of much revelry in its action, Twelfth Night impresses one with a certain air of gravity which is quite different from the high spirits of As You Like It. The world of Twelfth Night appears a little more complex and thus more puzzling than that of the earlier comedies. And this complexity anticipates the greater seriousness not only of the tragedies which are soon to follow but also of the problem plays and the romances.

V

Another significant relationship between Twelfth Night and As You Like It has to do with an aspect of their structure, for here again Shakespeare presents the theme of love in analogical relationship with a secondary theme, the theme of indulgence. In an earlier section the point was made that Malvolio's role has to do with both love and the theme of indulgence which is presented in a special relationship to it. Malvolio is both a lover, one of Olivia's suitors, and also the exponent of opposition to all pleasure. His interest in Olivia, which he calls love, is vitiated by his self-love, and in this he is the antithesis of Viola, whose generous and self-sacrificing love of Orsino may be said to represent the opposite extreme. In his attitude toward indulgence, Malvolio is contrasted with Sir Toby Belch and Sir Andrew Aguecheek, whose overindulgence clearly throws into relief the steward's austerity. But although Malvolio rejects the kind of indulgence practiced by the other two, he overindulges in self-love, so surfeiting that in Olivia's words he becomes "sick of self-love." What is to be noted here is that Shakespeare presents extravagant attitudes toward the themes of love and indulgence, extremes which by juxtaposition tend toward mutual qualification. Malvolio is but one of the characters whose attitudes form the main action of the comedy. But he is central to that action in his double role of being both a lover, or would-be lover, and an exponent of a particular attitude toward indulgence.

The theme of indulgence, as we have said, is here presented in such a way that attitudes toward it are made to reflect upon analogous attitudes toward love. The relationship of the two themes can be seen as it affects other characters besides Malvolio. Orsino and Olivia are both gluttons in their way, both gorging themselves upon boundless sentiment: he upon extravagant passion (as he calls it) for Olivia, she upon equally excessive mourning for a dead brother. In effect he is overfond of love-melancholy, she of grief. Both, then, overindulge in certain emotions, and that extravagance, and especially the rhetoric of its expression, form yet another instance of comic reduction. And thus it may be said that Orsino, Olivia, Malvolio, Sir Toby, and Sir Andrew are presented in postures of overindulgence of one sort or another. Furthermore, that part of the plot which deals with Malvolio and his enemies dramatizes indulgence itself, that is, what in the main action is a metaphor here becomes a theme. And the comic reduction of excess in this part of the play, the comic comment upon extreme attitudes toward indulgence, reinforces the comic reduction of extreme attitudes toward love. And as we have seen, this last is accomplished in part by the metaphoric function of the term indulgence in the main action of the comedy. From the point of view of structure, this circumstance represents the highest point to which Shakespeare could raise the analogical relationship of the two themes.
The theme of indulgence, then, occupies an important position in the play, but we should remember that it is secondary to the theme of love, that it is employed in support of it. Because Twelfth Night is associated with revelry, it is quite possible to overstate this element of the plot. Thus one critic has proposed that "Twelfth Night is a philosophical defence of a moderate indulgence in pleasure, in opposition on the one hand to an extreme hostility to pleasure and on the other hand to an extreme self-indulgence." A related view finds that the play "develops an ethic of indulgence based on the notion that the personality of any individual is a function not of the static proportions of the humors within him, but of the dynamic appetites that may more purposefully, as well as more pragmatically, be said to govern his behavior." This is relevant and just so long as we do not raise the theme of indulgence to a position above that assigned to it by the dramatist. In a second and equally provocative essay on Twelfth Night, Professor Hollander sees the play as "representing the killing off of excessive appetite through indulgence of it, leading to the rebirth of the unencumbered self." Though an exciting notion of comic catharsis, such a view lays undue stress on what we have called the play's chief metaphor at the expense of its central idea.

In addition to the primary metaphor of indulgence, and most significantly associated with it, is the subsidiary concept of musical order and due proportion. Even as order and proportion are indispensable to harmony, whether musical, celestial, or political, so they are to the well-being and inner unity of the individual. Here music, which fills Twelfth Night, achieves the status of motif in the thought of the play. "The general concern of Twelfth Night," says Professor Hollander, "is musica humana, the Boethian application of abstract order and proportion to human behavior." This is unquestionably so, and what is said here of Twelfth Night applies with equal force to Shakespearean drama generally. But again it should be noted that the play is concerned with a particular application, an application to a particular aspect of human behavior. That Twelfth Night dramatizes the concept of proportion and moderation, there can be no question. We may go so far as to say that the play's chief theme has to do with proportion and moderation. But it is proportion and moderation neither in terms of general behavior nor of revelry, eating, and drinking, though these provide both metaphoric and thematic support. The play is primarily concerned with proportion and moderation in matters concerning romantic love, the general subject of all Shakespeare's romantic comedies.

VI

The chief idea of Twelfth Night has been variously identified. Some have argued that the leading note of the play is fun; others have held that the play's "lesson is ... 'Sweet are the uses of adversity.'" Unrequited love is another choice. Still another is social security. According to this view Twelfth Night is not a story of love "but of the very realistic struggles and intrigues over the betrothal of a rich countess, whose selection of a mate determines the future of all the major and most of the minor characters." Much closer to the mark than any of these is the view that Twelfth Night "exhibits in its action one of the fundamental motifs of comedy: the education of a man or woman." What needs to be added here is that the motif exhibited in the action of the play has to do with the education of characters in matters of love. As in the comedies we have so far considered, so here the main action presents in juxtaposition attitudes toward love, with the result that such attitudes by mutual qualification point to the best attitude possible in the world created by the play, a world ultimately not different from our own.

The initial episode introduces the two contrasting attitudes toward love which we have found at the center of Shakespeare's other romantic comedies. Orsino in his opening lines reveals and exposes to the censure of the comic spirit his immoderately sentimental conception of what he thinks is his passion for Olivia. His fancy is, in his own words, "high fantastical," and the pain it causes him is insupportable. For that reason he calls for music as a way to relieve his passion.

If music be the food of love, play on!
Give me excess of it, that, surfeiting,
The appetite may sicken, and so die.
Notwithstanding its "capacity," love may be so surfeited with music, he hopes, that its force will abate for a short while. It is all in excess, all expressed in one comic hyperbole after another.

O, when mine eyes did see Olivia first,
Methought she purg'd the air of pestilence!
That instant was I turn'd into a hart;

(11. 19-21)

With the entrance of Valentine at line 23 and his report to the Duke, Shakespeare matches Orsino's hyperboles with Olivia's own extreme sentimentality in rejecting his suit in order to abandon herself to excessive grief over her brother's death. The extravagance of Olivia's mourning, like Orsino's passion, is given a comic note by the language in which it is expressed. Furthermore, Valentine's description tends to qualify the genuineness of the vow by the elaborate insistence on its austerity:

The element itself, till seven years' heat,
Shall not behold her face at ample view;
But, like a cloistress, she will veiled walk,
And water once a day her chamber round
With eye-offending brine;

(11. 26-30)

The two attitudes toward love are here bound together more significantly than in earlier comedies. Orsino is the romantic lover who vaunts his alleged passion in hyperboles. And Olivia is the reluctant lover who rejects the Duke's addresses to her. But she is very different from such disdainful lovers as Phoebe of As You Like It, the king and his lords in Love's Labour's Lost, and Benedick and Beatrice. Like all these, Olivia rejects thoughts of love, but she does so in favor of something else, a passionate surrender to what seems to be her love of grief. In this, though she rejects Orsino, she acts very much like him. Both exhibit excessive sentimentality which shows as folly, though the object of that folly is different in the two characters. Their attitudes toward love and grief are extreme and they are best expressed by the thematic metaphor of indulgence, the very image the Duke employs in the opening lines of the play. Orsino and Olivia overindulge their passions or what they consider their passions. And so in the initial episode Shakespeare briefly but pointedly defines the comic errors of these two, errors to be recognized before the conclusion of the play. But he does much more in these early lines. He binds Orsino's and Olivia's contrasting attitudes towards love by means of an identical attitude towards their respective passions, love and grief. And furthermore he relates all this to the idea of indulgence, the theme of the secondary action.

The opening scene, then, presents Orsino and Olivia in contrasting attitudes towards love but in identical attitudes towards themselves. In the second scene the two are contrasted with Viola, both in their attitudes towards themselves and towards love. From the first lines she speaks Viola reveals the absence in her of sentimentality and self-pity.

Viola. What country, friends, is this?
Captain. This is Illyria, lady.
Viola. And what should I do in Illyria?
My brother he is in Elysium.
Perchance he is not drown'd. What think you.
sailors?

(I, ii, 1-5)
The captain encourages her to hope, for he saw her brother, "most provident in peril," "bind himself to "a strong mast that liv'd upon the sea." Whereupon she turns to the present moment and demands to know who governs Illyria.

Captain. A noble duke, in nature as in name.
Viola. What is his name?
Captain. Orsino.
Viola. Orsino! I have heard my father name him.
He was a bachelor then.

(11. 25-29)

Viola is as eager to know the Duke as she is unwilling to give herself over to excessive grief over her brother's feared death. Her feelings and the words expressing them are level and direct, avoiding the extremes we have noted in the alleged passions of Orsino and Olivia. In this she clearly presents a contrast to these two, and her role in the rest of the play will be to aid them in amending their ways. On the one hand, Viola essays to persuade Olivia that falling in love—with Orsino or another—is her unavoidable responsibility (else she usurps herself); on the other, she tells the Duke that he is not the only one who suffers from unrequited love. From the above we should conclude that Viola is intended to represent the norm, an attitude we might call ideal. And we may add that her words and acts are so aimed as to bring about comic recognition by Orsino and Olivia. In due course he learns that he was never in love with Olivia but someone else; and the latter soon discovers that far from being able to remain heart-whole she falls in love at first sight with Orsino's page, who she later finds is a lady in disguise. To such recognition and self-knowledge these two are led by the agency of Viola, by what she says and does, by what she is.

VII

But Viola is not the only character whose words and actions are employed to those ends. Feste, who as his name suggests occupies a significant position in the development of the theme of indulgence in the sub-plot, carries an equal responsibility in the conduct of the main action as well. In the subplot his chief purpose is to oppose Malvolio's austerity with the notion of revelry, though perhaps not in the extreme form practiced by Sir Andrew and Sir Toby. When Sir Toby tells Malvolio that there shall be "cakes and ale" in spite of the steward's "virtuousness," Feste adds: "Yes, by Saint Anne, and ginger shall be hot i' th' mouth too." In addition, Feste helps bring about Malvolio's comic retribution. He defines both the steward's austerity and his presumption that Olivia could love him as a kind of madness and thus proves him a fool. In so doing Feste in his own way essays to lead Malvolio toward a recognition of his folly. This is especially clear in the scene wherein Feste, both in his own person and as Sir Topas, engages the steward in conversation while the latter is locked in the dark room.

Feste's allusion to Malvolio's folly in his notions about Olivia is made obliquely in the song he sings to him:

Clown. "Hey, Robin, jolly Robin, Tell me how thy lady does."
Malvolio. Fool!
Clown. "My lady is unkind, perdy."
Malvolio. Fool!
Clown. "Alas, why is she so?"
Malvolio. Fool, I say!
Clown. "She loves another"—Who calls, ha?
(IV. ii. 78-85)
The steward's persistent calling of "Fool!" points ironically to the very term most properly applying to himself in the scene. And this is followed by an even clearer allusion to his folly in the following exchange with Feste a few lines later.

\[\text{Clown. Alas, sir, how fell you besides your five wits?}\]

\[\text{Malvolio. Fool, there was never man so notoriously abus'd. I am as well in my wits, fool, as thou art.}\]

\[\text{Clown. But as well? Then you are mad indeed, if you be no better in your wits than a fool.}\]

\[(11. 92-97)\]

Precisely the same purpose as shown here is to be seen in Feste's role in the main plot, that is, in the words he addresses to Orsino and Olivia. Again his most pregnant comments on the self-deception of those two are made through songs, that is, in the same oblique manner he employs in part in his treatment of Malvolio, for Orsino and Olivia in what they say and do enact extreme attitudes identical with those exhibited by the steward. Professor Dover Wilson is partly right in suggesting that Malvolio "reflects in a kind of distorting mirror the emotional situation of the main plot. For Malvolio is a dreamer, after his kind; like Orsino he aspires for the hand of Olivia; and like both Orsino and Olivia he mistakes dreams for realities."\(^32\) It is certainly true that there is something of the dreamer in a steward who is so self-endeared that he supposes himself the object of Olivia's love. Malvolio does not merely aspire for the hand of Olivia; he believes that she has chosen him for her husband. But it can scarcely be said that Orsino and Olivia are dreamers unless by the term we mean persons who by their extravagant posturings reveal utter failure to understand themselves and their relationships with others. Such posturing is perhaps more vulnerable to the comic spirit than dreaming can ever be. What is accurate in Professor Wilson's comment is the notion that Malvolio's comic shortcomings in the subplot are a reflex of Orsino's and Olivia's shortcomings in the main action. Hence Feste's analogous comment, in matter and form, upon the aberrations of those two.

When first confronted with Olivia, Feste proceeds to "catechise" her, to demonstrate in playful fashion that she, instead of himself, is the fool. Her calling him a fool is, he instructs her, "Misprision in the highest degree!" In contrast, he adds, his mistress has been acting foolishly in the excessive show of grief, especially since she believes her brother's soul in heaven: "'The more fool, madonna, to mourn for your brother's soul being in heaven.' (I, v, 76-77) This initial comment upon Olivia's folly is followed shortly by another, this one in the form of the clown's first song. Although "O Mistress Mine" is ostensibly sung for the delectation of Sir Toby and Sir Andrew, it really concerns Olivia, though of course she is not present while it is sung. But the content, from the first line, "O mistress mine, where are you roaming," to the concluding invitation to love since "Youth's a stuff will not endure," has exclusive application to her, gently reprimanding her careless wasting, in Viola's phrase usurping, her own youth and beauty. The lines are in a sense addressed to Olivia, pointing gently to her folly in refusing love in favor of immoderate sorrow. Furthermore, the song anticipates her eventual capitulation and hints at the strange conjunction into which she will be thrown. For it announces that her "true love's coming / That can sing both high and low." Olivia will fall in love with Cesario-Sebastian, but in the end all will be well.\(^33\)

Likewise the song Feste addresses to the Duke in the following scene serves the purpose of gently mocking his exaggerated sense of his own grief in love, a grief that could find release only in death. Because it expresses his love-melancholy as well as the self-pity occasioned by it Orsino prefers that song over all others. And he calls upon Cesario to heed its lines, little knowing that his page is the one who truly suffers genuine love-grief. In the lines following the song, Feste leaves no doubt as to its comic intention. For he adds to its mockery of the Duke's love melancholy his own direct comment. "Now, the melancholy god protect thee, and the tailor make thy doublet of changeable taffeta, for thy mind is a very opal." And he adds the further mocking note that he would have "men of such constancy put to sea, that their business might be everything and their intent everywhere." The gentle mockery of the Duke's inconstancy is resumed a few lines later when Orsino in conversation with Viola draws a distinction between the strength of his own passion for Olivia and a woman's love.

There is no woman's sides
Can bide the beating of so strong a passion
As love doth give my heart; no woman's heart
So big, to hold so much. They lack retention.

(II, iv, 96-99)

His insistence on his own steadfast passion in contrast to a woman's incapacity for such love not only anticipates ironically his swift transference of that passion from Olivia to Viola at the conclusion of the play but also points with equal irony to the latter's constancy and devotion throughout. And this difference between Orsino's extravagant protestations and her own reticence is further stressed by Viola in her allusion to her father's fictional daughter who, because of unrequited love, sat, like Patience on a monument,

Smiling at grief.

(ll. 117-18)

To which she adds:

Was not this love indeed?
We men may say more, swear more; but indeed
Our shows are more than will, for still we prove
Much in our vows, but little in our love.

(11. 118-21)

Both in the image of Patience smiling at grief and in the presence of rhyme in the second passage Shakespeare introduces a faint tinge of self-consciousness, perhaps even of self-pity, just sufficient to enrich Viola's attitude toward her dilemma.

VIII

The comic process of Twelfth Night, then, presents episodes which are intended to expose and reduce extravagant attitudes on the part of Orsino and Olivia as well as Malvolio. And the function of this comic reduction is carried out in the main by Viola and Feste. But there is a further action dealing with Sebastian, Sir Toby, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, and Fabian. Just as Maria initiates the intrigue against Malvolio, so Sir Toby puts into practice a second intrigue aimed at Sir Andrew Aguecheek and the disguised Viola. But Aguecheek is the main target. Sir Toby's purpose in forcing a duel upon those two is the sheer comedy of exposing Sir Andrew's pretensions to bravery. For some moments there is also the additional effect of Viola's discomfiture, perhaps intended as a comment upon the liability of her disguise. Structurally, the most significant effect of the intrigue is the challenge of the newly arrived Sebastian by Sir Andrew and Sir Toby. And the severe beating they receive at his hands is a kind of censure upon their overindulgence and boisterousness. But far more important, their challenge of Sebastian brings him into the action of the love-triangle so that his reunion with Viola resolves the lovers’ dilemma.
As noted above, the action of Twelfth Night presents episodes which expose and reduce attitudes toward love and the related theme of indulgence. That reduction is brought about by direct statement, by the juxtaposition of opposed attitudes, by song. And out of such action there emerges a simple conception of the way to happiness, namely through individual as well as communal integration. That level and sensible way is the way we reach through experience, leading to both self-understanding and a clear awareness of one's role as a social being. And this simple wisdom is precisely the meaning of the song Feste sings at the conclusion of the play.

Most critics have expressed doubts concerning the Among authenticity and dramatic appropriateness of the song. Among the very few who have defended it was A. C. Bradley, who thought it most appropriate to the singer, and even conceded that Shakespeare may have written the concluding stanza. Richmond Noble also defends the song as Shakespearean, a song of wise nonsense, fitting commentary on the events of the play. And he alludes to the following lines by John Weiss which he considers the most sensible interpretation of Feste's concluding song: "Then he sings a song which conveys to us his feeling of the world's impartiality: all things proceed according to law; nobody is humored; people must abide the consequences of their actions, 'for the rain it raineth every day.' A 'little tiny boy' may have his toy; but a man must guard against knavery and thieving: marriage itself cannot be sweetened by swaggering; whoso drinks with 'toss-pots' will get a 'drunken head:' it is a very old world, and began so long ago that no change in its habits can be looked for." This is indeed the general meaning of the song, a crystallization of that simple wisdom to which the comic spirit is always pointing. Such wisdom is a fitting epilogue not only to this particular play but to the series of comedies it brings to a conclusion. Whether in childhood, adulthood, or old age, we find that certain things are constant; they have not changed and we cannot change them. Such changes are really what Orsino and Olivia and others like them would bring about, but in the end they are made to shed their aberrations. The sovereignty of nature asserts itself in Olivia's precipitous falling in love, even as it does in the case of Benedick and Beatrice and the rest. Nor are other pretensions less vulnerable as Malvolio and Sir Toby and Sir Andrew discover. "A great while ago the world began" and its laws, which are but the laws of nature, cannot change to accommodate some strange caprice or posturing. The individual, in these plays the lover, whether romantic or disdainful, must become a part of society, must be integrated into it. But the lover must first achieve an individual fulfillment, an inner integration. How fitting, then, that in the closing song of this last of his romantic comedies Shakespeare should express through the wise fool's seeming nonsense, and in the simplest terms, the comic vision he had been dramatizing during the last decade of the century.

In form Twelfth Night represents the ultimate plane to which Shakespeare could raise the structure of his romantic comedy. For here Shakespeare at last achieved a completely independent and fully unified romantic plot, a plot from which he eliminated the kind of external obstacle to love's fruition represented by Don John's machinations in Much Ado and by the conflict of the two pairs of brothers in As You Like It. Instead, Twelfth Night unites the romantic concerns of the two earlier plays, that is, the two aspects of the internal conflict which for a time delays love's fulfillment. It combines the disdain of love, which forms the most absorbing theme of Much Ado, with the education of a romantic lover, which is at the center of As You Like It. Orlando and Silvius are here replaced by Orsino, while Benedick and Beatrice are replaced by Olivia. And, as was shown above, the two attitudes toward love are related metaphorically by the idea of indulgence which forms the theme of the secondary action. It is, then, in this perfect combination of the two master-themes that Twelfth Night may be said to represent the final and near-pure form of Shakespearean romantic comedy. But the play marks also another milestone in Shakespeare's dramatic career. It is the last of his romantic comedies. Having perfected a comic form through which he could reflect his responses to one aspect of human destiny, Shakespeare immediately turned away from romantic comedy and its theme of romantic love and proceeded to give dramatic expression to other responses by means of other modes.

This turn to other dramatic modes is anticipated perhaps in a special quality of Twelfth Night. Although it sums up and recapitulates the earlier comedies, the play differs from them in one particular. Its atmosphere, in spite of the play's revelry, is characterized by a reflectiveness which at moments tends towards gravity. This quality of the play is in great part associated with the temperament of Viola and Feste who, though deriving from earlier creations, prefigure later and greater studies to be placed in the graver air of the tragedies and the romances. Viola's character, though owing a good deal to earlier conceptions, really points to the heroines of the romances, particularly Hermione and Imogen. And Feste, though not unlike Touchstone in his function, is by temperament quite different. His individuality is to be seen especially in a certain quality of apartness which gives him a special perspective and also contributes to a measure of pathos in his relationships with others. In this and in the irony which plays about his name and circumstances Feste anticipates Lear's fool. If Feste's concluding song is by Shakespeare, it may well be that the dramatist thought of him and Lear's fool together, since the latter sings a stanza of the same song in King Lear. Indeed it appears that what is needed to draw from Feste the kind of devotion we see in the fool of the later play is a worthy object of such devotion, a great and greatly suffering nature such as Lear's.

In these matters Twelfth Night may be said to reflect, albeit distantly, Shakespeare's growing concern with those other aspects of human motive and destiny which were soon to fill the world of the later plays. But Twelfth Night is a romantic comedy, bringing to a brilliant conclusion Shakespeare's search for a comic structure which could treat most divertingly and significantly man's relationship to woman. Like its predecessors, and especially the other two "joyous" comedies, it projects a vision of the lovers' ideal, the best possible way to achieve inner as well as outer fulfillment, a unity within and a harmony with the world in which we live. That vision expresses man's longing for a state of being which transcends human limitation, the limitation against which it is here dramatized. And it is precisely in responding to and gratifying that longing by presenting the ideal as achievable that romantic comedy is so deeply satisfying.

Notes

1 There are other similarities with earlier plays. Viola's disguise recalls that of Portia and Nerissa, of Jessica and Rosalind. Sir Toby and Aguecheek recall Falstaff and Slender, and the trick played on Malvolio looks back to the trick played on Benedick and Beatrice.

9 Geoffrey Bullough, Narrative and Dramatic Sources of Shakespeare (London, 1961), II, 270-71. For minor details Shakespeare may be indebted to Gl'Ingannati, first performed in 1537, which is the ultimate source of all versions, including Gl'Inganni (1562) by Nicolò Secchi and Curzio Gonzaga's Gl'Inganni (1592). In the Induction to the play there is a Fabio and also a Malevolti, as well as a reference to la notte di Beffano, which some believe may have suggested the title of Shakespeare's play. Although Gl'Ingannati is closer to Shakespeare's play, it is nevertheless true that Curzio Gonzaga's Gl'Inganni gives Cesare (Cesario) as the name of the disguised heroine. In connection with the names of the chief characters it should be noted also that in Emanuel Forde's Famous History of Parismus (1598) there is a Viola who is shipwrecked while following her lover in the disguise of a page. See Bullough, Narrative and Dramatic Sources, II, 363-71. It has also been proposed that another play by Nicolò Secchi, L'Interesse, (c. 1547), may have suggested the duel between Sir Andrew and Viola. See Helen A. Kaufman, "Nicolò Secchi as a Source of Twelfth Night," SQ V (1954), 271-80.

11 See Fitzroy Pyle, "Twelfth Night, King Lear, and Arcadia," MLR, XLIII (1948), 449-55.

12 See Oscar J. Campbell, Shakespeare's Satire (New York, 1943), p. 83. See also 14 On the other hand it is perhaps going too far to say that Shakespeare "invented the story of Malvolio, and used it with rare skill as the foundation of the play." Milton Crane, "Twelfth Night and Shakespearean Comedy," SQ VI (1955), 7. Nor is it quite accurate to call Malvolio "the most comical and most ridiculous character in the play." Sen Gupta, Shakespearian Comedy (Oxford, 1950), p. 168. In Shakespearean romantic comedy the most comical characters are misguided or disdainful lovers, or the self-dramatizing lover whose language is fraught with hyperbole and his passion with sentimentality, the lover who believes himself a realist yet who all along responds to love in the romantic manner. The most comical characters in such comedy are the king and his lords in Love's Labour's Lost, Benedick and Beatrice, Orlando and Rosalind, Orsino and Olivia.

15 It is interesting to note that his cross-gartered yellow stockings may be intended to show him as a lover and more particularly as a jealous one. See M. Channing Linthicum, "Malvolio's Cross-gartered Yellow Stockings," MP, XXV (1927), 87-93; also M. P. Tilley, "Malvolio's Yellow Stockings and Cross Garters," SAB, XII (1937), 54-55. Yellow is also the color of the narcissus, that is, a symbol of self-love. See Hotson, The First Night of Twelfth Night, p. 98.

16 In his rigidity, his lack of self-awareness, and his obsessive concern with certain proprieties, malvolio approaches the Jonsonian humour character.

17 His raison d'être is thus much more significant than might appear on the surface. His role in the play is not, for instance, "so that Shakespeare's lovers may preserve their status free from the nothing-if-not-critical comic scrutiny which would otherwise expose their romantic pretensions to the withering winds of laughter," Melvin Seiden, "Malvolio Reconsidered," University of Kansas City Review, XXVII (1961), 106-7. Incidentally, the lovers do not escape comic scrutiny in the play.

19 Something like this takes place during the initial meeting of Touchstone and Jaques, reported by the latter, in which Touchstone tells him precisely what he wants to hear and in the terms he himself would have used.

25 This over-stress on the play's metaphor can be seen in Professor Hollander's suggestion that Orsino's name reflects and defines his nature: "Orsino—the bear, the ravenous and clumsy devourer." Ibid., p. 224.

31 It has been suggested that Feste and Viola "represent the golden mean of temperance, in whom reason and emotion are at poise." Tilley, "The Organic Unity of Twelfth Night," p. 558.

33 Whether written by Shakespeare or borrowed, the song illustrates his ability to endow complex function to music and song, both thematic and structural. For in addition to its obvious thematic meaning the song leads to more riotous singing which in turn brings the protesting Malvolio to the stage. And out of this emerges the conspiracy against him. In spite of this, some critics have failed to see the dramatic relevance of the song and its perfect blending with its context. See for instance L. B. Lathrop, "Shakespeare's Dramatic Use of Songs," MLN, XXIII (1908), 3; John H. Long, Shakespeare's Use of Music: A Study of Music and its Performance in the Original Production of Seven Comedies (Gainesville, Florida, 1955), I, 169. The authenticity of "O Mistress Mine" has been the subject of a long debate, dealing mainly with the relationship of the song in Shakespeare's play to a tune (without words) by the same title in Thomas Morley's First Booke of Consort Lessons (1599). Was the song, words and tune, an old one or did Shakespeare compose his own words, and if so did he employ Morley's tune? Did Shakespeare and Morley collaborate? Is there any connection between Shakespeare's song and Morley's tune? See E. Brennecke, Jr., "Shakespeare's Collaboration with Morley," PMLA, LIV (1939), 139-49; Sydney Beck, "The Case of 'O Mistress Mine,'" Renaissance News, VI (1953), 19-23. Edward H. Fellowes saw no connection between Morley's tune and Shakespeare's song and believed that the dramatist probably rewrote an old song. See Richmond Noble, Shakespeare's Use of Song (London, 1923), p. 82.

34 Capell thought it was either a popular song of the day or it was composed by William Kempe, who, he believed, had played the part of Feste. Furness, Variorum, pp. 313-14. H. B. Lathrop considered the song extraneous and not by Shakespeare. "Shakespeare's Dramatic Use of Songs," p. 2. L. B. Wright insisted that the song "has no relation to the play." "Extraneous Song in Elizabethan Drama After the Advent of Shakespeare," SP, XXIV (1927), 263. John R. Moore thought it might have been an interpolation. "The Songs of the Public Theaters in the Time of Shakespeare," JEGP, XXVIII (1929), 182. And John Dover Wilson is convinced that the song was written by Robert Armin. New Cambridge Shakespeare, p. 170. Finally John H. Long follows L. B. Wright and H. B. Lathrop, saying that "there does not seem to be any reason to doubt their conclusions." Shakespeare's Use of Music, I, 180.
In the following essay, Preston discusses the important functions of the minor characters in Twelfth Night: complementing prominent characters, maintaining the play's pace, and providing a complex of motivations for the action.

It is pretty well agreed upon that no matter what the central plot of Twelfth Night may be the total effect is musical, or, to make that flat analogy more descriptive, the characters of Twelfth Night, as disparate in function as the different instruments of an orchestra are, play in concert: Sir Toby's bass notes crash in on the lyric qualities established in the first two scenes of the play, only to be answered by Viola and Orsino, the soloists of those scenes, who "play" a duet in scene four. So the arrangement goes; never reaching symphonic heights until the denouement, but developing and introducing aspects of plot and character in short concerti which build to the final total chorus of voices. There are soloists in each scene in the sense that instruments of an orchestra are featured in concerto, but there are few truly soli passages.

The major characters—Orsino, Viola, Maria, Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, Feste, Olivia, Malvolio, and Sebastian—could not, by their interweaving of parts, maintain the pace which prevents any character from becoming a Hamlet or Macbeth. If the major figures attempted to accomplish this liveliness without assistance, the dramatic action would be thoroughly confused. The dramatic purpose is served, in keeping with the total musical effect of the play, and the confusion of the Italian novella avoided by the careful use of minor characters.

Unlike Shakespeare's other Italian romance comedies, where the minor characters make up a second or third plot which injects the play with native humor, Twelfth Night already has an Elizabethan plot involving major characters. The importance of the minor figures, then, does not rest in a single section of the play, nor do those characters act together as an example of a class or type. Twelfth Night demands, rather, a number of minor figures, coming from all of society and occurring throughout the play. Some of them fulfill such obvious functions as bringing a letter, performing a service, or announcing an arrival. Others, however, build contrasts, stand in for major players, further the action, or contribute a distinct character. None, even of the members of the first mentioned group, is left without sensible dramatic motivation.

I believe that a careful survey of the minor players of Twelfth Night can display how three common errors in the performance, reading, and criticism of lesser figures in Shakespearian drama may be avoided. The easiest way to deal with minor figures is to indicate their social standing. For many this method seems to be the final word in character analysis; however, a list of social "do's" and "don'ts" coupled with a social rank supplies only a necessary and handy framework for further investigation. The character has yet the dramatic justification of his presence and his lines. More important, especially as a minor figure, he must be related to the structure, themes, action, and major characters of the play.

The other two faults are especially dramatic ones, though the first often asserts itself in reading as well. Minor characters are likely to be skipped over. In reading, their lines seem often to be mere transitional devices, hardly the words of real people. In performance, their presentation is often so flat that they conflict
It is not necessary to prepare a set of director's notes to sketch in such a background of character. Characterization is not a question here, though, at times, it is necessary to indicate a particular rendering of a line, especially if the line is capable of diverse and conflicting deliveries. What can be made, however, is an indication of the role, in the broadest sense of that word, each figure is to play in the drama.

It is perhaps most difficult to deal with the really small members of the cast, for they usually take care of an immediate structural necessity and then disappear or remain silent. Whatever part of the action is moved by their message or appearance only reacts to a purely mechanical convenience, for what they have to say or do is more a total dependence on the demands of the action or a major character than a willful extension of their own reality.

This distinction between minor figures whose character is completely revealed by the immediate dramatic purpose and those whose character is further revealed in the outcome of some action or in their extended relation to other characters may be seen between the two officers who arrest Antonio in Act III.

The First Officer, evidently the superior, is not, as it might seem at first, only an identifier of Antonio and a bystander to the process of arrest:

1st Off. This is the man. Do thy office.
2nd Off. Antonio, I arrest thee at the suit of Count Orsino.
Ant. You do mistake me, sir.
1st Off. No, sir, no jot. I know your favor well, Though now you have no sea cap on your head.
Take him away. He knows I know him well.
(III. iv. 359-365)\(^1\)

Although, as he later explains to Orsino, the First Officer has fought against Antonio, this functionary now, perhaps due to times of peace or his advancing age, is a municipal officer in Illyria: "What's that to us? The time goes by—away!" And though it is the Second Officer's official duty to perform the actual arrest, the First, probably more familiar with military swiftness of procedure, is the one who finally demands Antonio's cooperation: "The man grows mad. Away with him! Come, come, sir."

Here, and later, when the First Officer tells Orsino of Antonio's crime against Illyria, the dramatic action depends upon and demands a specific individual with knowledge of specific details and events.

The Second Officer, no more than a type, meets only the dramatic necessity of number in handling the rough Antinio.\(^2\) His concern is purely official: "Antonio, I arrest thee at the suit of Count Orsino." Without the First Officer this policeman might prove a poor adversary to the daring seaman. The officers are not, however, guards of Dogberry quality. In spite of Orsino's love-sickness, he has kept an efficient state.
Other characters who suffer the minute demands of dramatic or linguistic necessity are Curio, the Priest, and the Messenger. Curio, however, requires more than the Second Officer, even though the Duke's servant seems to serve the dramatic action less than the policeman does. Indeed, his presence seems purely linguistic; he is a "straight man" to Orsino's pun on "hart". But even though Curio's line seems only to fill this need in the dialogue and supply a transition between Orsino's two speeches, it must be given some dramatic quality or motivation. The Second Officer had a job to do and an obvious motivation. Curio is in a less revealing position; his line, nevertheless, must partake of the same real qualities that the Second Officer's does.

Two possibilities are apparent; perhaps both are there. Aside from providing Orsino with a character to feed him his cue, Shakespeare probably intended Curio's "Will you go hunt, my Lord?" to contrast humorously with Orsino's rhapsodic speech. However, this stylistic purpose cannot be extended to the character. If the pun on "hart" is first Curio's, then he must be allowed an unlikely license with his Duke's serious thoughts. Only a jester (witness Feste's "catechizing" of Olivia) could dare make fun of such emotions in the nobility, and there is nothing in Curio's name, lines, or behavior to indicate that he is the court fool. If he filled such a position, he certainly missed a professional opportunity to make a disparaging remark about Feste, whom he fetches to sing for the Duke.

It is most likely that Curio is a serving man to the Count, older than Valentine, perhaps a follower of Orsino's father. Since Curio is aware that Orsino is more in love with love than he is with Olivia, he suggests the traditional Elizabethan cure for love-melancholia—hunting.³

In spite of the fact that more can be said of Curio than of the Second Officer, the Count's man is really no more than a verbal functionary, and his character, even when infused with dramatic motivation, is no more than a broadly defined type.

Of Valentine, Curio's social counterpart, more can be said. His report to Orsino, though consisting of information he got from Olivia's handmaid, is not framed in language he heard from Maria:

So please my lord, I might not be admitted,
But from her handmaid do return this answer:
The element itself, till seven years' heat,
Shall not behold her face at ample view;
But, like a cloistress, she will veiled walk
And water once a day her chamber round
With eye-offending brine—all this to season
A brother's dead love, which she would keep fresh
And lasting in her sad remembrance.

(I. i. 24-32)

In name and in speech Valentine seems well-suited to the task Orsino has set for him. Unlike Curio, whose character is formulated best by a reference to Elizabethan medical theory, Valentine is best understood in reference to the larger context of the play. He is called upon, as many minor Shakespearian figures are, to explain the first turn of the action: the love Orsino has described in the first lines of the play must go unrequited. Curio, on the other hand, speaks his lines before any plot has developed; his sole obligation is to Orsino's character. Valentine too contributes to the Count's character, but the contribution is by comparison rather than contrast. The love messenger continues the mood of Orsino's first two speeches. Like the Count's love, Olivia's rejection of it, as Valentine chooses to phrase it, is lengthy and descriptive. Furthermore, Valentine's speech, unlike Curio's brief cue, is one of the four poetic units which make up the first scene.
Curio's later lines, delivered when he is sent to summon Feste, tell nothing further about his character. Draper would say, however, that Valentine's gossipy remarks to Viola at the beginning of scene four are significant:

Val. If the Duke continue these favors toward you, Cesario, you are like to be much advanced. He hath known you but three days, and already you are no stranger.

Vio. You either fear his humor or my negligence that you call in question the continuance of his love. Is he inconstant, sir, in his favors?
Val. No, believe me.
(I. iv. 1-8)

Thus Viola takes over Valentine's thankless post. The older servingman is luckily not jealous, and kindly tells "Cesario" that she is like to be "much advanc'd," that Orsino is by nature constant in his favors; and with these felicitations, he seems to drop out of the play as if his task as unsuccessful intermediary had quite exhausted him. His magnanimity to Viola, without apparent motive, makes him seem a bit too good for this wicked world, for very few of us rejoice to be supplanted by others more successful.

The problem here is that the lines quoted above and by Draper occur at the very beginning of scene four, and nothing has passed to indicate that Viola or anyone else has been chosen to supplant Valentine. By line thirteen the audience knows that Orsino has spoken to Viola of his love for Olivia: "I have unclasped / To thee the book even of my secret soul." But the Count's first speech of the scene was, "Stand you awhile aloof." His words to Viola are private, and when, in line fifteen, he instructs Viola to go to Olivia, there is no reason to assume that this commission had been arranged earlier. The line Draper uses to substantiate the contrast between Viola and Valentine does not occur until half the scene is played out: "She will attend it better in thy youth / Than in a nuncio's of more grave aspect."

Rather than being magnanimous, as Draper would have it, Valentine is only indulging in court talk with Viola. She misunderstands his remark, and, uncertain of her new position, questions Valentine about the constancy of the Count's affections. Viola probably observes in Valentine, as she did in the Captain who brought her to Illyria, a "fair behavior" and thus permits herself to ask the serving man a frank question about his master. Aside from this confidence that Valentine must have inspired in Viola, there is little in this repartee to define his character further.

The minor figures of Olivia's household, except for Fabian, are even less significant than the Duke's serving men. The servant who tells Olivia in Act III that "the young gentleman of the Count Orsino's is returned" is simply a stand-in for Malvolio who is parading on stage with his yellow stockings and ambition. He, as steward, would ordinarily bring such news, as he did at Viola's first arrival. If he were otherwise involved, Maria would serve in that capacity, as she does twice earlier. In this scene, since Malvolio and Maria are both on stage, another servant must be inserted for the announcement.

The Priest who marries Olivia and Sebastian has a little treatise on marriage to deliver when he is asked about Cesario. Perhaps H. B. Charlton is right when he asserts that the main problem in Elizabethan comedy is the fusion of comedy and romance. Shakespeare has on stage an Italian delight: A woman disguised as a man is accused of courting her master's lady; the master is about to inflict a harsh punishment on the mistaken deceiver; she, all the while, loves the misguided master; the lady reveals that a marriage has already taken place; a formidable sea-pirate, whose case has been set aside, is, by association, kept on stage as a reminder of the real husband. Yet into this excellent comedy of romance Shakespeare chooses to insert a fatuous Priest whose lines could not have been taken seriously:

A contract of eternal bond of love,
Confirmed by mutual joindure of your hands,
Attested by the holy close of lips,
Strengthened by the interchangement of your rings.
And all the ceremony of this compact
Sealed in my function, by my testimony.
Since when, my watch hath told me, toward my grave
I have traveled but two hours.

(V. i. 159-166)

If the outline of the marriage ceremony does not make the Priest a marked man for a laugh, his notion of reckoning time will.

It is surely a mistake, though, to suggest that the Priest is comic relief for the potentially dangerous situation on stage, for romantic comedy thrives on such situations. The comic irony of differing levels of awareness, misunderstandings, and mistaken identities is the real basis of the romantic comedies. The Priest is an Elizabethan fault. Even in Twelfth Night, Shakespeare's greatest achievement in romance comedy, the dramatist did not pass by the chance to introduce one more genre figure. Instead of relying completely on the comic realization of the romantic plot, Shakespeare chose to add to an already complete situation. This is probably one of the few instances in Shakespeare where obtrusive lines should be delivered as unobtrusively as possible.

Two of the more important minor figures of the play have similar functions. The first duty of the two seamen, Antonio and the Captain who serves Viola, is to show by their attitudes and actions what attractive and likeable young people Viola and Sebastian are.

Viola's friend is agreeable at every turn. He gives Viola hope for Sebastian's safety, describes the situation in Illyria, and agrees to help Viola in her plan to serve the Count. Beyond this agreeableness, however, the Captain's character is something of a puzzle. It is difficult to draw the broad social boundaries necessary for a beginning. While Valentine's speeches show that he is on a plane of sophistication near the Duke's, the Captain's halting, overly-parenthetical speeches contrast sharply with Viola's flowing lines. However, his lines are set in poetic form, and, even though he admits that "what the great ones do the less will prattle of", he is well-informed about the situation in the Illyrian court. It is unlikely that he would knowingly classify himself a prattler. In spite of his halting lines, the Captain, instead of indulging in hearty sea-talk, alludes to court affairs and classical learning.

That he is not an ordinary seaman can be seen further in his gentle pun of Viola's "perchance", his attractive manner, and his ability to introduce Viola into the Illyrian court. Though M. St. Clare Byrne shows that accessibility to the great was unrealistically easy in Shakespeare's plays,⁶ it is difficult to believe that Viola's friend is merely a mechant seaman. Perhaps he, like the First Officer, is a former defender of Illyria and has gained the respect and admiration of the Count through service in war. His readiness to take a "fearfull oath", familiarity with the ways of the sea, and courtly manner all indicate that he might have spent earlier years in the Count's military.

The second seafarer, Antonio, is the most completely developed minor character, though the honor of most useful must be reserved for Fabian. Although Antonio introduces Sebastian and helps reveal his likeable qualities in the same way the Captain does for Viola in Act I, the rough pirate does not disappear from the action. Perhaps there is some question about his identity, but it need not be so involved as Draper would have it. By narrowly interpreting "breach of the waves", from whence Antonio saved Sebastian, to mean "shore", Draper assumes that Antonio has a house by the sea-side, was not a pirate or a seaman (since the boarding party onto the Tiger would probably have been led by a soldier), and entrusts too much friendship and money to Sebastian to be the "Notable Pyrate" he is called in Shakespeare's text.7

"Breach of the waves" is just as likely a reference to the break between the crests of the waves on the open sea. It is as well unlikely that Antonio, had he been a soldier serving a rival state, would choose not to reimburse Orsino had the government so demanded. He is most likely the commander of a privateer, where, as leader of a group of men necessarily fighters and sailors, he would have led the party that boarded the Tiger. The First Officer indicates that Antonio is a man of the sea: "I know your favor well, / Though now you wear no sea cap on your head." Orsino later explicitly states what Antonio's profession is: "A bawbling vessel he was captain of."

In Antonio's original motivation Shakespeare probably commits one error to gain several advantages. Sebastian directs his course to Orsino's court purely by chance. If a strong friendship had developed between the two men and Antonio sincerely wished to accompany Sebastian, the young man could surely have been persuaded to wander to less dangerous ground. That possibility is, of course, not open to the play, so Shakespeare must formulate Sebastian's hasty farewell and Antonio's decision to follow within the framework of strong friendship, hoping that that theme will dominate and Sebastian's illogical direction will pass unnoticed. Shakespeare uses this weakly motivated passage, however, to strengthen the two most important aspects of Antonio's character—daring and devotion:

I have many enemies in Orsino's Court,
Else would I very shortly see thee there.
But, come what may, I do adore thee so That danger shall seem sport, and I will go.

(II. i. 45-49)

Further corroboration for the likelihood of Antonio's seamanship and devotion comes from the highly suggestive parallel with Viola's Captain of Act I. Both are fatherly, though neither attempts to persuade his young charge to a different course of action. But, unlike the Captain's, Antonio's language is full of references to the sea: He has come far to find Sebastian, but his love "might have drawn one to a longer voyage"; Illyria, like the sea, may prove "rough and unhospitable to a stranger"; Antonio is in danger in Illyria because he has done service "in a sea fight, 'gainst the Count his galleys"; Sebastian, when pulled "from the rude sea's enraged and foamy mouth", was, like a ship in peril, "a wreck past hope". Thus in language alone Antonio does more than help define Sebastian's character.

This paradoxically gruff and doting seaman adds a distinct character to the already overflowing lists of Twelfth Night. He views the action from a completely different point of view, providing two excellent scenes of comic irony with Viola. In some sense he knows much less about the immediate situation than do the regular inhabitants of Illyria. On the other hand, his presence in the play is an added note of realistic awareness. At least his confusion involves Sebastian, a real person. All of Illyria, however, has been undermined by the Count's new favorite, "Cesario".8 Antonio brings with him, as well, a note of honesty which imperils his life. All have lied in one way or another; even Viola's Captain is a partner to her disguise, but Antonio is unwilling to assume a mask in a world of pretenders.9

His presence on stage, especially in the last act, substitutes for the absent Sebastian and indicates the probable outcome of the confusion. At the same time his rough character announces the disorder of the final scene.10 In other words, Antonio usurps the world of Twelfth Night as he has usurped the Count's peace. Although his faith in Sebastian has been shattered, his truthfulness and courage make him a suitable symbol for the strength of the time which will undo the knot Viola has found too difficult to untie.

The man of all work in Twelfth Night is Fabian. Although his very presence in the play is questioned, since Maria tells Sir Toby and Sir Andrew to "let the fool make a third", Fabian becomes essential, performing services Feste could not. Fabian is probably the second son of a country gentleman, and, having no place in the inheritance, he seeks his fortune in service. His language is particularly rich in allusions to the country, though occasionally his wit sparkles with a new-learned reference to travel, money, or theater.

Only Hugh Hunt has called Fabian's identity into question. He suggests that the clever servant may be a second fool, younger than Feste and much more circumspect. Hunt says that the actor who played Feste may have enjoyed too many liberties behind Malvolio's back during the letter scene, forcing the actor who did Malvolio to request a less ebullient background for his scene. Indeed, that segment of Feste's character which, especially in song, might be called melancholy would be given added significance if the old fool were about to be replaced by a youthful counterpart.

Like Curio, however, there is nothing in Fabian's name or manner or speech to indicate that he is a professional jester. Sir Toby would not address a fool as "Signior Fabian"; Feste would not call a professional inferior "Master Fabian". It is much safer to assume that Fabian is a well-born servant of the type rendered completely useless in the overstuffed Elizabethan house-hold. His affinity for good times has attracted him to Sir Toby, and the roaring knight no doubt looks on Fabian as a particular favorite. Although Fabian shows he is quick to pun by picking up many cues from Malvolio in the letter scene, he only once indulges in the counter-logical type of argument Feste is so fond of. He "proves" to Sir Andrew that Olivia's favors to Cesario in the orchard were directed subtly at the tall knight. Even this, however seems more like Sir Toby's proof that to be up late is to go to bed early than Feste's involved syllogisms.

Fabian enters the action of the play just in time to relieve the major players of their burden of contrapuntal effect. Only four scenes after the last major player has contributed his introduction to the speed of the play, Fabian appears. As if expecting disappointment or consternation at the absence of Feste, Shakespeare supplies an immediate motivation for Fabian's part in the device against Malvolio: "You know he brought me out o'favor with my lady about a bear-baiting here."

In the scene which follows Fabian restrains Sir Toby and Sir Andrew from giving away the plot and shows himself to be the quickest wit of the three. His role becomes increasingly important, however, when he is seen not only as an accomplice in the plot against Malvolio, but also as a confidante of Sir Toby's in the constant gulling of Sir Andrew. In the fourth scene of Act III Fabian supplies the necessary addition which prevents a simple two-part banter between Belch and Aguecheek. He moves the foolish knight as surely as Sir Toby does, and, since soliloquy is at a minimum in Twelfth Night, he allows Sir Toby to tell of his friendship for Sir Andrew: "I have been dear to him, lad, some two thousand strong or so."

In that scene Fabian is in and out, silent and witty as the action demands. He plays a minor role in the encounter with Malvolio but becomes a witty commentator when Sir Toby reads Aguecheek's challenge. In the duel he plays an even more important role, performing the service of "arrangement", a privilege Feste could not have aspired to. Except for the final moments of the play, Fabian is most essential in this scene. He frightens Viola with reports of Sir Andrew's skill and ferocity, warns Sir Toby of the approaching officers, and becomes silent as other minor figures help distribute the action.

Fabian disappears when Feste enters into the trick against Malvolio. Perhaps the Fool was afraid earlier to be outrightly involved in the plot but now enters into the fun when his anonymity as a tormentor seems likely. This almost obvious substitution seems to further validate the necessity for a character of Fabian's social standing in such sequences as the duel. This is hardly necessary, however, if only Feste is to be considered as a major counterpart to Fabian, for Fabian relieves the necessity for constant reappearance and cross play of the entire range of major figures who infest Olivia's household.

When Fabian returns he is in hot pursuit of Feste, who is carrying Malvolio's letter. In Act V Fabian must become a real part of the background. The stage directions indicate that he is before Olivia's house while Feste jokes with the Count, Antonio is heard, Cesario is accused, the Priest verifies the marriage, and Sir Toby and Sir Andrew enter from their disastrous duel. All the while he must remain, like Antonio, an unobtrusive observer. He has wisely avoided the conflict with Sebastian, but he and Feste lead the wounded revellers off. Fabian returns with Feste (after Sebastian has entered and ended the chief masquerade of the play) in time to be present for the unfolding of Malvolio's plight. He reads the letter which Feste refuses to read except, allowing Vox, as a "madman's epistle", and goes off to fetch the imprisoned steward. It is indeed Fabian who knows more about the Malvolio plot than any other person on stage at the end of the drama. Although Feste is happy to disclose himself as Sir Topas, Fabian must tell his mistress the history of Malvolio's downfall. He takes away from any serious tone Malvolio might inject with his "revenge" by explaining that the foolery "may rather pluck on laughter than revenge." Though Orsino is to repeat his taking of Viola ("But when in other habits you are seen, / Orsino's mistress and his fancy's Queen"), Fabian discloses the last important turn of action in the play: "Maria writ / The letter at Sir Toby's great importance, / In recompense whereof he hath married her."

Each of Twelfth Night's minor figures has been carefully employed for rather specific reasons, but the major effects of this conglomeration of individuals are speed and economy. The major characters have not been left alone to indulge in tiring repartee, but the play has never been crowded with unnecessary groups of hangerson. The play has never been invaded meaninglessly as Romeo and Juliet is by the musicians, nor has it been left bare at any time.

Especially noticeable is the fact that the minor characters at the first of the play—the Captain, Curio, and Valentine—perform specific chores and, since the introduction of the major characters is performing the contrapuntal function, disappear or remain unheard. The speed in the first part of the play is almost entirely dependent on the introduction of the long list of major figures which is finally complete at the beginning of Act II. After that, except for the very specific jobs done by the Priest and the Messenger, two more important minor players—Antonio and Fabian—serve as reappearing aids in the pace of the drama. Their significantly different points of view and degrees of awareness produce involvements in the irony, structure, and information of the play.

Even though Antonio and Fabian play more significant parts both as characters and contributors to the action, all the minor figures perform essential services, all the speaking parts can be dramatically justified. Although at times some minor characters fall below the expected Shakespearian mark of characterization or consistency, all contribute vitally to the contrapuntal weaving of people, events, and ideas that is the basis of Twelfth Night.

4 Draper, p. 165.

Critical interpretations of Twelfth Night are notable for the variety of contradictory meanings that their makers attach to the play. The play has been called, among other things, a vindication of romance, a depreciation of romance, a realistic comment on economic security and practical marriage, an account of saturnalian festivity, a "subtle portrayal of the psychology of love," a play about "unrequital in love" because of self-deception, an account of love's wealth, a dramatic account of Epiphany and the gift of Divine Love, a moral comedy about the surfeiting of the appetite so that it "may sicken and so die" and allow "the rebirth of the unencumbered self." Various critics have variously described the chief character in the play to be Malvolio, Viola, Olivia, or even Feste. The complexity of the play is such that each of these opinions is supported by considerable textual evidence. The play is about the vindication of romance and the depreciation of romance, but the romance that is vindicated is that of Viola and Sebastian reunited and chosen by love and not that of Orsino and his selfish, conventional, melancholic seclusion in a bower of flowers. The play does deal with both practicality and prudence—Viola tells us her very practical reasons for joining the duke's household, for example; but the play also shows saturnalian festivity in full sway under Sir Toby Belch, master of the holiday. The play shows Viola's epiphany of love and Toby's surfeit of the appetite—Viola's love fulfilled and Malvolio's love unrequited.

I should like to propose a solution to this puzzle of interpretations: that Twelfth Night is a play about opposites and that each of the interpretations above tends to treat just one of a pair of opposites in the play. The primary opposition in the play is the one implicit in the title, Twelfth Night; or, What You Will: epiphany and the divine gift of love or earthly appetite, desire, and choice. But as the play's action proceeds, oppositions become much more complicated and subtle than the single one in the title as they grow to include oppositions between characters, between actions, between images, and finally between the present mirth of the play and the continual indiscriminate rain of Feste's concluding song.
The most obvious opposition in the play is that between giving and taking: whether it is better to give or to receive is a question that the play continually poses and answers ambiguously. Viola gives freely, Sebastian takes unhesitantly. Maria gives, Toby takes. Ornino gives, Feste takes. Critics have described very well the giving side of the play, but not very fully at all its opposite—the constant taking of the play. The generosity is obvious: Viola gives freely of her money and herself; she even offers to give her life finally if Ornino will take it. Antonio, until he is captured, gives his money and himself for Sebastian; then he asks for his money back and regrets his generosity. Ornino gives money somewhat generously to the fool, himself very insistently to Olivia; Olivia matches Ornino by taking care to preserve Malvolio even while she forces herself upon Viola. Maria gives sport that delights Toby and deludes Malvolio. Sebastian gives himself to Olivia; Ornino finally gives himself to Viola. Gifts in the play are multiple even though giving is not always generous.

But taking is just as important in the play, and most evident in Feste's constant begging for tips and bribes, although Feste only begs so long as someone is bountiful toward him; he is never very insistent, but is often even hesitant in his pleas: as he says, "I would not have you to think that my desire of having is the sin of covetousness." Just as free from greed—and no beggar at all—is Sebastian in his acceptance of Olivia. Olivia and Ornino, on the other hand, lack full freedom from covetousness, although they covet persons rather than money. Less hesitant and more covetous still are Toby in his attempts to get Andrew's money and horse, Andrew in his attempt to get Olivia, and Malvolio in his conceited assurance that Olivia loves him and that he will soon have power over Toby.

Feste describes in the play a norm for getting what he wills without taking what others would not have him take. He differs from Sebastian in that he does not repay what he gets with a like gift; he differs from the other takers in his lack of covetousness, even though his profession is to beg. He is the generous taker.

The other norm, that of generous giving, is defined by Viola as she gives herself and her services to Ornino, money to the fool, and half her purse to Antonio. The others in the play, with the exception of Sebastian, violate one or both of the norms established by Feste and Viola. Ornino gives himself to Olivia, but he also tries to claim her as Antonio did his ship. Olivia seems to be generous: "What shall you ask of me that I'll deny, / That honour, sav'd, may upon asking give?" Yet she tries to buy Viola-Cesario with a show of wealth. Antonio is extravagant in his generosity toward Sebastian, but he is also a "salt water pirate" and very concerned about his own safety in spite of his hazard of himself. Malvolio's offer of himself is gross conceit; Andrew's is gross foolishness. Maria gives Toby sport but seeks to end Malvolio's freedom. Only Viola consistently gives freely and graciously with no expectation of profit or power; only Feste consistently takes freely and graciously without disturbing another's bounty and without giving himself in return.

The range in the action of the play is suggested by the characterization of Viola and Feste. Viola becomes the embodiment of gracious, nearly divine Twelfth Night giving, Feste of festive Twelfth Night taking. Yet, though they seem to contradict each other, Viola and Feste are more alike than they are unlike, for they share the essential qualities of graciousness, civility, and free disposition; they are both careful not to intrude on someone else's free disposition.

Free disposition in the play involves two things: that one be generous with one's money and one's self where the money and self are freely desired—and that one graciously accept what one is freely offered if to accept the gift does not intrude on the free disposition of giver or recipient. To be simply generous is not enough, for generosity can become terribly selfish if it is imposed on one who does not desire it. Simply to take is likewise not enough, for graciousness requires that one take only what one is freely offered. Viola and Feste demonstrate the right kind of generosity and the right kind of graciousness; Malvolio, on the other hand, neither generous nor gracious, opposes both Feste and Viola. As the characters become more like Viola and Feste and less like Malvolio, they acquire generosity, graciousness, and true civility.
The freedom that Orsino and Olivia finally acquire, freedom to give where the gift is desired, is the true festivity that Feste himself tends to symbolize in the play. Here the distinction is between Feste's true festivity and the belching, oversatisfied, what-shall-wedo-else sport of Toby. There will be cakes and ale to be sure, but cakes and ale are not all that life is. Feste's sport inspires generosity without intruding on free disposition; he begs only as long as one is freely generous, then he allows bounty to sleep a while. Toby on the other hand has no concern whatever for others' freedom. His sport is terribly ungenerous, endangering even Viola—free disposition itself—as well as Andrew and Malvolio. His sport is too indiscriminate, too little inclined to take into account person, time, and circumstances. He, like Falstaff, has too little to do with the time of the day.

A proper attitude toward festivity, the play implies, is one that recommends Feste and his freedom even while it rejects the excess of Toby Belch. But one's choice is not always that simple. Maria, for example, has to choose between Malvolio and Toby: in that case Maria, the embodiment of wit, properly prefers Toby's freedom to Malvolio's self-love; but she recognizes, at the same time, that Toby is out of order. So does the fool he too prefers Toby's attitude to Malvolio's, but he sees Toby for the drunk that he is.

The names of the characters indicate their symbolic qualities. Viola is both musical and free in volition; her counterimage, Malvolio is the embodiment of ill will who intrudes on free disposition. Feste is festive; his counterimage, Belch, is surfeited. Toby Belch, until his marriage to Maria, threatens to replace Twelfth Night's generous festivity with un-civil sport. For what you will to be fully satisfactory, it must be Viola's what you will and not Malvolio's. For the festivity of Twelfth Night to be fully satisfactory, it must be Feste's graciousness, not Toby's rambunctiousness.

The movement of the play is from ill will to true festivity, generosity, and the harmonic feast of marriage and friendship. Sebastian's arrival signifies the approaching success of the characters in arriving at that point, for Sebastian is a compound of Feste and Viola, one who freely gives and just as freely takes. He furnishes the single embodiment of the Twelfth Night spirit that Viola and Feste together define, and the final opposition of the play is the thorough opposition between Sebastian and Malvolio rather than the superficial one between Feste and Viola. Twelfth Night becomes what you will; desire and generosity operate in accord.

The play begins with Orsino's attempt to force himself upon Olivia. Orsino wants an excess of music, as Toby wants an excess of cakes and ale, "that, surfeiting, / The appetite may sicken, and so die." Such appetite hardly surfeits itself into correction, however; instead it threatens music, one of Viola's significances:

    for I can sing
    And speak to him in many sorts of music
    That will allow me very worth his service.

Like all false lovers Orsino considers himself like all true lovers, but in his demands on Olivia, his desire for solitude, his selfish submersion in melancholy, he is neither truly loving nor truly generous. While he "prizes not quantity of dirty lands," he demands the immediate surrender of Olivia, "that miracle and queen of gems," and thus shows himself to be more like witless Andrew and ill-willed Malvolio than like Viola.

Viola warns Orsino that Olivia may not wish to accept his gift:

    Duke. I cannot be so answer'd.
    Vio. Sooth, but you must.

Viola sees the threat to free disposition; the duke merely feels his appetite "all as hungry as the sea":

    Make no compare
    Between that love a woman can bear me
And that I owe Olivia.

The woman is Viola and we do make compare.

The sea which Orsino is "as hungry as" is the sea of love that can either support or devour, but the ships upon it are responsible for its quality; they can support one another or they can prey upon one another. Orsino describes that sea:

O spirit of love, how quick and fresh art thou,
That notwithstanding thy capacity
Receiveth as the sea, naught enters there,
Of what validity and pitch soe'er
But falls into abatement and low price
Even in a minute.

This metaphor of ships sailing on an ocean of love becomes the most important image in the play. The sea begins as the great devouring element that almost drowns Viola and Sebastian when their ship is destroyed in a storm. But their voyage on a sometimes supporting, sometimes devouring sea does not end when they drift ashore from the literal sea, for, safely ashore they begin a dangerous voyage toward a journey's "end in lovers meeting" on a sea of love where they continually encounter pirates and rocks. With the lovers finally together, the salt waves have proved themselves kind, to Viola at least, and the collision that gets the ships together is a fortunate wreck.

Not all ships fall, as the duke complains, into "abatement and low price" The waves threaten worthy vessel and pirate ship alike, but the worthy ships get through on the strength of generosity and graciousness while the pirates either sink or surrender. The sea does devour, but it devours those who trust rotten timbers of self-conceit and greed, who seek profit from the other ships and not at the journey's end. The prime example, of course, is Malvolio, who, in spite of his high self-estimation, loses, even in a minute, his value on the sea. Orsino, in his warlike assault on Olivia, is likewise at first too much the pirate. He sends Viola to board and claim a prize: "Be clamorous, and leap all civil bonds, / Rather than make unprofited return." To demand profit is both uncivil and ungenerous, like the prospects of Malvolio instead of the generosity of Viola. Orsino promises Viola a share in the profits if she succeeds:

Prosper well in this,
And thou shalt live as freely as thy lord,
To call his fortunes thine.

Orsino's promise is fulfilled in a fashion that he does not expect, and not because of any desire for profit on Viola's part.

In spite of Orsino's commission to her, Viola hoists her sail and accosts Olivia with "no overture of war, no taxation of homage; I hold the olive in my hand; my words are as full of peace as matter." Viola woos gently for Orsino, pities Olivia when she loves Cesario instead of Orsino, and finally leaves the whole problem up to time, the larger ocean that includes the sea of love and its coasts.

The difference between the generosity of Viola and Sebastian and that of Orsino is a difference in relationship to the sea of love. Orsino is himself as hungry as the sea, ready to devour Olivia. Viola and Sebastian, on the other hand, are provident and generous and able to survive misfortune on the sea. Viola has been saved by hanging "on our driving boat"; her brother, Sebastian, "most provident in peril" by binding himself (courage and hope both teaching him the practice) "to a strong mast that liv'd upon the sea." When Sebastian lands upon Illyria, and embarks on its sea of love, he proves himself just as provident in peril by binding himself to Olivia, another strong mast on the sea. Viola, on the other hand, hangs onto her driving boat, Orsino, until the wind calms on the sea and the preservation of Sebastian proves "salt waves fresh in love."

Olivia is not the pirate that Orsino is, but her generosity is hardly Viola's. She refuses to listen to Viola's suit for Orsino:

But would you undertake another suit,
I had rather hear you to solicit that
Than music from the spheres.

Viola hopes that "grace and good disposition attend your ladyship!" Such good disposition should be freer than Olivia's is at the moment. That very loss of freedom involves, as it does with Malvolio and Orsino, delusion:

Oli. I prithee tell me what thou think'st of me.
Vio. That you do think you are not what you are.
Oli. If I think so, I think the same of you.
Vio. Then think you right: I am not what I am.

In her delusion Olivia is, as she admits, as mad as Malvolio, "if sad and merry madness equal be." As madness is delusion on a sea of love that leads one to become uncivil or ungenerous, Olivia's madness is like Malvolio's; for both she and Malvolio attempt to board and claim a prize. Toby's merry madness, as it leaps the confines of holiday freedom and threatens Viola, becomes likewise piratical. Malvolio's "very midsummer madness" is contagious as long as the ships encourage the sea to devour rather than support the vessels that sail on it.

Love given unsought is good, as Olivia says, but only if it does not compromise the loved one's free disposition. Olivia is neither truly generous nor truly gracious when she forces herself upon Viola-Cesario and even attempts to purchase love: "How shall I feast him? What bestow of him? / For youth is bought more oft than begg'd or borrow'd." Olivia wishes that Viola "were as I would have you be." That is the problem. What Olivia wills compromises Viola's capability to give freely of herself; the opposition is an improper one between Twelfth Night and what you will, between what is given and what is desired.

Orsino and Olivia are alike; Viola is the opposite. She asks only Olivia's "true love for my master," although she would like to be his bride herself. She refuses even to accept a trip from Olivia: "I am no fee'd post, lady; keep your purse; / My master, not myself, lacks recom pense." Generosity to Viola requires, as it does for Antonio in The Merchant of Venice, the hazard of everything. With Orsino and Olivia, on the other hand, generosity is an uncivil attempt to seize power and profit on the sea of love. They are potentially generous; they indicate that by their treatment of the fool and Malvolio: Olivia would not have Malvolio "miscarry for the half of my dowry"; but until they both learn as Viola tells Olivia that "what is yours to be-stow is not yours to reserve," and learn to beslow it without hope of power or profit where it is freely desired, they will both breathe "thriftless sighs."

While Viola opposes false generosity with true generosity, Feste opposes false festivity with true festivity. Feste takes graciously when Orsino pays him "for thy pains":

Clown. No pains, sir, I take pleasure in singing, sir.
Duke. I'll pay thy pleasure then.

Clown. Truly, sir, and pleasure will be paid, one time or another.

As Viola tells him, he begs well. Of all the beggars in the play only Feste is capable of inspiring generosity without compromising his free disposition. Orsino and Olivia in contrast are both uncivil in their begging, while Sir Andrew has no manners or civility whatever. Only Feste, both wise and civil enough to play the fool, is able to "observe their mood on whom he jests, / The quality of persons, and the time"; and to practice foolery "full of labor as a wise man's art."

Toby's festivity and piracy lack such labor and wisdom. Where Feste does "care for something," Toby cares for nothing but his own enjoyment and profit, the food for his insatiable appetite. Like witless Andrew, Toby delights in "masques and revels sometimes altogether," because life "consists of eating and drinking":

And. Shall we set about some revels?
Toby. What shall we do else?

Toby's sport is sport, to be sure, holiday madness that gives plenty of matter for a May morning; but his sport is too much lacking in civility—as Maria points out: he has "no wit, manners, nor honesty, but to gabble like tinkers at this time of night." Cakes and ale are not enough. Civility, good manners, generosity are as important to the proper sport of life as eating and drinking. That Malvolio points out, although he is too much like Ophelia's preacher who "recks not his own rede": "Mistress Mary, if you priz'd my lady's favor at anything more than contempt, you would not give means for this uncivil rule." Toby's rule is uncivil and ungenerous toward Olivia and Viola; yet he lacks the ill will of Malvolio. Thus Maria, siding with Toby, chooses the lesser of two evils, even though she clearly recognizes Toby's fault.

Toby, however, does not operate alone; his cronies are careless Fabian and witless Andrew. The three together oppose Malvolio; even their excessive festivity may lessen the power of ill will; but their unconfined festivity becomes dangerous when Toby maneuvers his "dear minikin" Andrew into a duel that threatens free disposition and order. To oppose Malvolio, as Maria points out, is necessary; but to dismiss all restraint is not satisfactory. Toby, Fabian, and Andrew lack the moderation, grace, and wit that Feste has. The union between Maria and Toby and the confession of Fabian at the end of the play indicate the movement of Toby and Fabian toward Viola and Feste. Andrew we can do little more with than we can Malvolio: absolute ill will and absolute witlessness are both impossible to reform.

Toby's appetite is excessive and threatens anarchy; Malvolio's is distempered and threatens tyranny. Olivia indicates her potential for clear sight by describing accurately the fault of Malvolio when he calls Feste "a barren rascal": "O, you are sick of self-love, Malvolio, and taste with a distemper'd appetite. To be generous, guiltless, and of free disposition, is to take those things for birdbolts that you deem cannon bullets." Malvolio, of all the ships that sail on the sea of love, is most nearly a self-contained pirate: "Nothing that can be can come between me and the full prospect of my hopes." Although he gives credit to Jove, Malvolio knows that he himself deserves full credit for his own success.

Maria, with her "sport royal," makes Malvolio, the "time pleaser," a "common recreation" by playing on his self-conceit that "all that look on him love him." The gulling of Malvolio is comically acceptable because he is ill will itself being downed by the holiday that he would prevent, even though the profit from the gulling is less satisfactory than Viola's final recompense from Orsino. But for the holiday to go further and become anarchy is not comically acceptable. When Toby begins to endanger Viola and Sebastian, he becomes too uncivil. Olivia's criticism is harsh but proper: "Ungracious wretch, / Fit for the mountains and the barbarous caves, / Where manners ne'er were preach'd!" Toby joins Malvolio in disgrace, to be redeemed only by the generous gift of himself to Maria. Malvolio, incapable to the end of such free disposition, remains unredeemed.

Feste, dressed as Sir Topas the curate, goes to Malvolio in his prison of darkness that symbolizes Malvolio himself and tries to arouse the spirit of holiday generosity in him. He points out to Malvolio that the mind can be its own place if it is free and generous: "I say there is no darkness but ignorance, in which thou art more puzzled than the Egyptians in their fog." The darkness of the room, like the rain that falls every day, may be penetrated by light and warmth if one generously wills to do so. Feste's insistence that the room is light and bright indicates Feste's ability to will it so; Malvolio's failure to consider it light signifies his ill will.

With ill will comes captivity; with free disposition comes security. In The Comedy of Errors true security, as Luciana says, lies in social bonds; by being bound one becomes truly free, by losing one's self in the ocean one attains the fullest and noblest individuality. The same kind of security is recommended in Twelfth Night: the hazard of self and free acceptance of restrictions. Sebastian finally embodies that combination of Feste and Viola that makes collision on the sea a happy wreck. Safely ashore from the literal sea, Sebastian embarks on a "determinate voyage" of "mere extravagancy." Although Sebastian does not wish to endanger Antonio ("It were a bad recompense for your love"), he does accept with grace Antonio's bounteously offered purse:

I can no other answer make but thanks,
And thanks; and ever oft good turns
Are shuffled off with such uncurrent pay.

Sebastian most perfectly of all the characters in the play combines generosity, wit, and civility. He hazards himself, accepts support that he is freely offered, and recognizes, better than Viola, the possibility of delusion: "There's something in't / That is deceivable." He lacks Malvolio's self-conceited ability to think that his own worth is sufficient cause for everyone to love him, but he nevertheless accepts love that is offered:

Oli. Nay, come I prithee. Would thou'dst be rul'd by me!
Seb. Madam, I will.

He will be ruled; he voluntarily disposes himself to follow Olivia. Thus he is not a puppet, as Viola would have been had Olivia had her way, and as Andrew is to Toby. He retains his freedom to bestow himself where he will, chooses to bestow himself where he is desired, and thus forms, with Olivia, who is finally giving herself where she is desired, a free and mutually generous pair.

Antonio, like his namesake in The Merchant of Venice, demonstrates the hazard of self; he follows Sebastian even though great danger is present: "I do adore thee so / That danger shall seem sport, and I will go," "Willing love" and care, "as might have drawn one to a longer voyage," draw him after Sebastian. But Antonio's generosity, unlike Sebastian's, is modified by the fact that Antonio has been a pirate and may be again; he pirated a ship from Orsino:

It might have since been answer'd in repaying
What we took from them, which for traffic's sake
Most of our city did. Only myself stood out,
For which if I be lapsed in this place
I shall pay dear.

Antonio's generosity, like Olivia's and Orsino's, is not absolute; thus when he is captured he begins to doubt that he should have been generous: "What will you do, now my necessity / Makes me to ask you for my purse?" Since he saved Sebastian from "the rude sea's enrag'd and foamy mouth," he expects Sebastian to reap his generosity freely. When Sebastian seems ungracious and ungrateful, Antonio begins to fear for his own safety. The point is that safety on the sea from the rain that "raineth every day" requires human generosity, human civility. If people prey upon each other, the sea will accept the wrecks; if they support each other, even the accidents that do happen may be fortunate like the "happy wrack" that occurs in Twelfth Night.

Sebastian establishes the proper combination of the qualities of Feste and Viola to allow movement toward that happy wrack; the last-act accomplishes that combination in other characters. The act begins with Feste carrying Malvolio's letter to Olivia. Fabian asks to see it. Without violating generosity, in fact by encouraging generosity, Feste avoids showing the letter:

_Fab._ Now as thou lov'st me, let me see his letter.

_Clown._ Good Master Fabian, grant me another request.

_Fab._ Anything.

_Clown._ Do not desire to see this letter.

_Fab._ This is to give a dog, and in recompense desire my dog again.

But that very return of the dog allows a double generosity without intruding on Feste's free disposition and desire. This interchange effectively emphasizes Feste's ability to inspire generosity in others without giving up his own freedom. Then Feste offers some wise foolishness which the duke rewards:

_Duke._ Thou shalt not be the worse for me, there's gold.

_Clown._ But that it would be double-dealing, sir, I would you could make it another.

The duke gives Feste a second coin. Feste suggests that "the third pays for all":

_Duke._ You can fool no more money out of me at this throw. If you will let your lady know I am here to speak with her, and bring her along with you, it may awake my bounty further.

_Clown._ Marry, sir, lullaby to your bounty till I come again!

… But as you say, sir, let your bounty take a nap, I will awake it anon.

While the duke's bounty is asleep, the sea threatens to devour order and generosity as "blind waves and surges" wash the boats.

Antonio, brought in captive, accuses Viola once again of ingratitude. Then Olivia rejects Orsino's suit before he can speak, and the Duke accuses her of incivility:

_You uncivil lady, To whose ingrate and inauspicious altars My soul the faithfull'st off rings hath breath'd out That e'er devotion tender'd!_
Orsino even threatens to kill Olivia: "a savage jealousy / That sometime savors nobly," and then Viola: "I'll sacrifice the lamb that I do love, / To spite a raven's heart within a dove." Viola goes "most jocund, apt, and willingly, / To do you rest." Olivia feels herself beguiled and calls for the priest to confirm her marriage. Toby and Andrew come with broken heads. Finally Sebastian brings the proper combination of giving and taking, freedom and wit, to end the confusion. The duke, finally reawakened to generosity, asks a "share in this most happy wrack" and gives himself where he is desired, thus finally allowing free disposition.

Malvolio is sent for. Olivia offers to bear the cost of a celebration, "here at my house and at my proper cost." Orsino generously and civilly agrees; then he gives Viola his hand and himself—the true generosity. All are generous but Malvolio; even he is given a chance. Fabian freely confesses his and Toby's "device against Malvolio here, / Upon some stubborn and uncourteous parts / We had conceiv'd against him." The confession reaffirms the norm: Fabian is willing to forgive Malvolio; only Malvolio is obdurate in incivility: "I'll be reveng'd on the whole pack of you!" Toby, appetite, can be tempered: he has, "in recompense" to Maria, married her; ill will can only be avoided.

The play ends, as Feste foretold, with the ships in harbor and lovers well-met: "Journeys end in lovers meeting, / Every wise man's son doth know"; but it ends too with the awareness that the rain will fall again, as Feste also foretold: "Present mirth hath present laughter" and "Youth's a stuff will not endure." For finally there is Feste's song about the continual rain. We have seen the sunshine, now we see the rain; the final opposition seems to be one between Feste's conclusion and the play that we have just seen; but that opposition is not so abrupt, for the rain has been near throughout the play, in the death of Olivia's brother, in the near loss of Viola and Sebastian, in Feste's songs about life's melancholy, and most importantly in the ill will of Malvolio that appropriately is recognized but not reformed. The difference between this play and the comedies that precede it is finally the difference of Feste's song. The song is a description of the flow of time, of the dark strand in the weave, the dying fall, the deceit of disguise, the loss of the rose of beauty, the rain that raineth every day.

While the play does remain essentially a happy account of Jack getting Jill, the implication is no longer so clear that the man shall get his mare again and all shall be well. Fortunate shipwrecks may occur, but drownings also occur, and the sun that brightly illuminates all Twelfth Night except Malvolio's dark room may be shining through a break in the clouds of storm. It has rained before; it will rain again; one cannot trust in the sunshine, but one can perhaps trust in generosity, grace, and free disposition, in the mind's ability to be its own place, to turn a dark, rainy, devouring ocean into a sunlit kind sea teeming with life.

Twelfth Night lacks much of the substantial security of the earlier comedies; Sir Topas replaces Aemilia; a devouring ocean replaces Arden; the rain partly obscures the feast. Order is possible, to be sure; the comic norm remains; but that order requires more than a walk in the fields or the arrival of Theseus in the woods. The ring that Bassanio must take great care to keep safe has now been replaced by larger relationships. The consequences of fault are not yet tragic; one does not lose Desdemona or Cordelia; one does not even lose the sixteen years, youth, and innocence that Leontes loses. But one does see the rain closing in and the waves rising.

Twelfth Night Literary Criticism (Vol. 34): Appearance Vs. Reality

Terence Eagleton (essay date 1967)

At the opening of Twelfth Night, Orsino describes his love for Olivia in terms which directly recall some of the paradoxes of language and illusion in other Shakespearian plays:

> O spirit of love, how quick and fresh art thou!
> That, notwithstanding thy capacity
> Receiveth as the sea, nought enters there,
> Of what validity and pitch soe'er,
> But falls into abatement and low price
> Even in a minute.

(1, 1)

Orsino's love has the destructively creative quality of the language of Richard II and the Macbeth witches, and the illusions of Puck: it absorbs and transforms reality into its own image, levelling its values to its own standard and thus rendering all experience arbitrary and interchangeable. The free-ranging, ocean-like quality of excessive love is the ground of its own negation: its capacity to receive all experience is equally its inability to discriminate between the intrinsic values of particular items. Excessive love, like disembodied or elaborate language, is a self-generating subjectivity detached from physical reality and therefore illusory; like the illusions of Oberon and Richard II it dominates reality, shaping it to its own form and granting it validity only within these terms, negating the experiences from which it draws positive substance. Unrequited, melancholic love intensifies this process: it is self-consuming, as Orsino is pursued and consumed by his own desires. When love, like language and created illusion, ceases to be closely structured by the physical situations which render it intelligible, its relation to these situations becomes paradoxically both parasitic and imperialist: it feeds off a real condition which it simultaneously creates, and can then be seen as an embodied contradiction, a self-cancelling encounter of negative and positive life.

The complex relations of language and reality is a common theme in Twelfth Night. Language in the play, as in Gaunt's use of metaphor in Richard II, can shape reality creatively, disclosing through linguistic connection a previously obscure truth:

> Viola And what should I do in Illyria?
> My brother he is in Elysium.
> Perchance he is not drown'd—what think you, sailors?
> Captain It is perchance that you yourself were saved.
> Viola O my poor brother! and so perchance may he be.

The Captain catches up Viola's use of 'perchance' and gives it a slightly different emphasis, which Viola then takes up with a sense of new insight, using the word a second time with both her own original emphasis and the Captain's new meaning in mind.

This creative-exploratory use of language can be contrasted with the verbal fencing of Sir Toby Belch and his companions. In these exchanges language constantly overrides reality, ceaselessly spawning new meanings which grow, not from the substance of an argument, but from previous verbal resonances themselves unrooted in reality. Language detaches itself from reality and takes flight as a self-creating force, controlling rather than articulating the course of a conversation until reality comes to exist almost wholly at a verbal level, only tenuously connected to actual experience:

Sir Andrew Fair lady, do you think you have fools in hand?
Maria Sir, I have not you by th' hand.
Sir Andrew Marry, but you shall have; and here's my hand.
Maria Now, sir, thought is free. I pray you, bring your hand to the butt'ry bar and let it drink.
Sir Andrew Wherefore, sweetheart? What's your metaphor?
Maria It's dry, sir.
Sir Andrew Why, I think so; I am not such an ass but I can keep my hand dry. But what's your jest?
Maria A dry jest, sir.
Sir Andrew Are you full of them?
Maria Ay, sir, I have them at my fingers' ends; marry, now I let go of your hand, I am barren.

The progress of this exchange is shaped wholly by verbal resonances, each giving rise to another. The puns and allusions collide, counter-cross and interact rapidly, and one significant element in the word-play is the quick, confusing switches from physical fact to metaphor. Maria converts Aguecheek's metaphor of 'hand' into fact, then unifies fact and metaphor in the image of the hand drinking at the buttery-bar; Aguecheek latches onto the metaphor and is then further confused by Maria's ambivalent use of 'dry' to apply both to her own language and Aguecheek's hand; when Augecheek settles on the first meaning at Maria's instigation, Maria reverts to applying the term to physical fact—his hand—but in a metaphorical way. Maria's language absorbs and appropriates reality for its own purpose, without ever submitting to the contours of fact itself: her speech is an area of free, fluid existence ('thought is free') beyond the rigidities of stable definition, an area within which elements of experience can be endlessly interchanged, combined and devalued to create fresh absurdities and arbitrary connections.¹

Metaphor, then, can operate creatively or destructively: by breaking down the limits of settled definition it can extend one reality into illuminating connection with another; it can also break down defined reality into a purely negative freedom, disclosing insights and relations held at a sheerly verbal level beyond the boundaries of actuality and therefore incapable of interacting with known reality to reveal fresh truth. The breakdown of creative connection at the level of normal discourse is a corollary of this mode of communication:

Sir Toby He's as tall a man as any's in Illyria.
Maria What's that to th' purpose?
Sir Toby Why, he has three thousand ducats a year.

(1,3)

Verbal dexterity is effective only at the level of its own self-generated illusion: brute reality can expose it for what it is, as an elaborate nothing, a substanceless patter:
Sir Toby
Approach, Sir Andrew. Not to be abed after midnight is to be up betimes; and 'dilucido surgere' thou know'st—
Sir Andrew
Nay, by my troth, I know not; but I know to be up late is to be up late.
Sir Toby
A false conclusion! I hate it as an unfill'd can …

(2,2)

For Belch, reality consists in proving contradiction and illusion, and Aguecheek's simple-minded assertion of the self-evident offends his sensibility. Yet Aguecheek's mode of discourse is paradoxically similar to Belch's:
to affirm that things are what they are, to resist elaboration, is a tautology equivalent in its own realm to the contradictions which Sir Toby discerns. A tautology is as self-contained and self-created as Belch's own language: reality itself shares the quality of illusion.

The issue of language and reality emerges directly in Viola's conversation with the Clown in Act 3 Scene 1. The Clown acknowledges himself as a 'corrupter of words':

To see this age! A sentence is but a chev'ril glove to a good wit. How quickly the wrong side may be turn'd outward! … I can yield you (no reason) without words, and words are grown so false I am loath to prove reason with them.

Reason—reality—can be expressed only in language and yet is falsified by language; without language there can be no reason yet with language there can be none either—to speak or keep silent is equally illusory. The Clown is aware that language and experience are so intertwined that to manipulate words is to distort reality:

Viola … they that dally nicely with words may quickly make them wanton.
Clown I would, therefore, my sister had had no name, sir.
Viola Why, man?
Clown Why, sir, her name's a word; and to dally with that word might make my sister wanton.

Yet the power of language to shape reality to itself, a power which involves the absorption of reality into speech, highlights paradoxically the distance of language from reality:

… in my conscience, sir, I do not care for you. If that be to care for nothing, sir, I would it would make you invisible.

(3, 1)

Language draws real substance into itself and becomes a self-contained, substitute reality confronting a nothing—the vacuum left by the reality it has assimilated. Because it confronts nothing, and nothing cannot be changed, it is impotent to affect it: the Clown's rejection of Viola as nothing cannot in fact make her invisible.

Before the Clown leaves Viola he manages to extract from her two coins, and the connection of money and language is significant. The Clown's response to Viola's first coin is to ask for another:
Clown Would not a pair of these have bred, sir?
Viola Yes, being kept together and put to use.
Clown I would play Lord Pandarus of Phrygia, sir, to bring a Cressida to this Troilus.

The Clown personifies the coins, endowing them with real, generative life, reducing himself simultaneously to a neutral go-between, a mediating element. The relation of money (symbol) to human life (reality) is inverted, as it is in Richard II: the coins, like language, 'breed' by their own independent life, becoming the controlling masters of a human reality which exists as a parasite upon them. Human life is objectivised and inanimate life subjectivised in a single movement, as language, inanimate symbol, sucks life from real human existence and reduces it to a corpse, an inanimate nothing. In both cases, money and language control, and yet cannot control, reality: they dominate and determine it as a superior power, yet since their mode of domination is to absorb reality into themselves, they are merely regulating themselves.

The duping of Malvolio is a similar instance of the controlling power of language. Malvolio is driven to false and illusory action which he believes real by a language-created illusion—the letter written by Toby and his friends—which has all the force of reality. Malvolio's laborious tracing out of letters, words and meanings is an image of a man falling under the false power of language, viewing language as a completely adequate motivation to action. His behaviour before Viola is purely linguistic and therefore illusory, with no ground in fact: the letter determines and controls his physical existence, as in the text of the letter itself Viola is presented as saying that 'M.O.A.I. doth sway my life', shown as under the power of inanimate strokes of the pen. As a result of the illusion, Malvolio the servant overreaches his role to become a self-created master, as language itself, the servant of human life, becomes its tyrant. The letter which Belch later presses Aguecheek to write, challenging Antonio to a duel, reveals a similar confusion of language and reality:

Taunt him with the license of ink; if thou thou'st him some thrice, it shall not be amiss; and as many lies as will lie in thy sheet of paper, although the sheet were big enough for the bed of Ware in England, set 'em down; go about it. Let there be gall enough in thy ink, though thou write with a goose-pen, no matter. About it.

The interchange here of symbol and reality is parallel to the similar interchange in Maria's puns. The physical yet symbolic act of writing becomes itself a substitute for physical activity, so that metaphor constantly blurs into fact: the greater the physical size of the paper the greater the insults will be, the gall is almost literally in the pen despite the physical fact that the pen may be a goose-pen.

The illusory, interchangeable quality of language in the play, its capacity to absorb and regulate the substance of human reality, has a direct parallel in the action of the drama itself: in the illusions, switchings and mistakes involved in the adoption of human roles. Throughout the play, roles adopted as conscious illusions backfire and begin to control reality itself, to a point where the frontier of reality and illusion is dangerously obscured. Olivia and Orsino are both 'actors', self-consciously fostering roles of lover and beloved which are objectively false but seen by the actors themselves as real; the roles, like language, actually regulate their owners' physical behaviour, providing them, as in a play, with strictly delimited 'texts', given functions and attitudes, from which their personal action must never deviate. Each character's role depends on the role of the other, in an act of collaborative illusion: Orsino's identity as a rejected lover feeds off Olivia's identity as the cold beloved, and vice versa, in a reciprocal movement of negative and positive creation. Viola is then drawn within this illusion, through her adoption of an illusion of disguise to further her real aim of serving Orsino; she is made to act the part of one actor (Orsino) to another actor (Olivia) in a way which conflicts with her own genuine identity (her love of Orsino). Viola, like the Clown with his coins, is reduced from real human existence to the status of a neutral mediator between two illusions: in the scene where she presents Orsino's claims to Olivia she operates merely as an embodied verbal message, a metaphor connecting two separate realities. Her role in this scene is to live at a sheerly linguistic level, eliminating her own authentic desires; she is an actor who must confine herself to a given text, with no reality beyond this:

\begin{align*} Olivia & \text{ Whence came you, sir?} \\
Viola & \text{I can say little more than I have} \\ & \text{studied, and that question's out of my part.} \end{align*}

(1,5)

When Viola asks to see Olivia's face she is told that she is 'now out of (her) text'; the face which is then shown is equally a defined and static illusion, a 'picture' which can be itemised in mechanical detail, as Viola's set speeches are a similar categorisation of elements.

The consequence of Viola's entering the reciprocal illusion of Orsino and Olivia is the creation in Olivia of a reality—her love for Viola—which breaks beyond the illusion and yet is similarly illusory—she does not know that Viola is a woman. Both Viola and Olivia define themselves and each other in roles which contradict their personal reality, weaving a network of illusion which neither dare break: their conversation is false for each, yet each considers it real for the other. Viola's enforced role as mediator for Orsino is a kind of self-cancellation: she is placed in a 'double-bind' situation where to secure Orsino's love is to further his love for Olivia and therefore destroy his love for herself. Either way she will come to nothing: her original, conscious adoption of the illusion of disguise to win Orsino's love is turned against itself, controlling rather than nourishing her real aims. Viola's own substance of identity is at odds with her role as linguistic mediator in precisely the way that language, in the play, falsifies human reality. Olivia is placed in a similarly impossible position: in rejecting Viola at the level of linguistic mediator she must harm herself by rejecting her also as the 'man' she loves. Since Viola has fully assimilated this personal reality into her assumed role when she confronts Olivia, the language and substance cannot be separated out.

The story of Malvolio brings together similar themes and images into a significant pattern. Malvolio, like Macbeth, overreaches a defined social role at the instigation of inauthentic language and becomes himself inauthentic, illusory: his bid for a higher freedom is a self-enslavement, leading to physical imprisonment in a suffocatingly narrow dungeon which is at once materially cramping and, because pitch dark, a kind of nothingness, an absence of all material experience. By confining himself so strictly to the false role which Sir Toby creates for him, in order finally to overreach and negate it (he obeys 'every point of the letter', as Viola talks precisely within her text), he plunges himself into a prison which is a cynically apt image of his real condition: a space so narrow and enclosed that it is at once positively limiting and, in its darkness, a negation which allows his imagination free and impotent range beyond it. The prison, that is, is simply a grotesque intensification of Malvolio's previous existence, disclosing its deepest reality: his positive and pedantic self-confinement to a narrow social role—brought out in the solid, laborious quality of his language—and the self-negating, overreaching ambition which paradoxically accompanied it, are pressed in prison into caricatures of themselves, and the essential relation of these positive and negative aspects exposed within a single condition. Malvolio falls both below and above the level of true identity: he restricts himself inhumanly to a rigid social role, and simultaneously allows his imagination free and ludicrous range beyond it.

The scene where Sir Toby and the Clown visit Malvolio in his prison brings the confusions of illusion and reality to their highest peak. The Clown disguises himself as a curate, and in doing so exposes four levels of illusion: he is a Clown (and thus, as we shall see later, a kind of illusion) disguised in the illusion of a curate, a role itself often illusory ('I would I were the first that ever dissembled in such a gown'), visiting Malvolio in a prison whose darkness—itself a nothingness—renders the disguise superfluous, doubly unreal. This particular interaction of illusion and reality discloses the nature of the whole situation: Belch and his companions trap Malvolio in a created illusion aimed to reveal the reality of his character (a reality itself defined by illusory ambition), and then treat the illusion as real, bringing rational criteria to bear on it to torment Malvolio into a further sense of unreality. The Clown refuses to treat Malvolio's answers to his questions as 'real', attributing them to a devil inside the illusory facade of Malvolio's personality, treating Malvolio's physical reality as a disguise for a diabolic (and therefore illusory) reality behind it. Because Sir Toby and the Clown have themselves set, and can control, the terms of the illusory game in which Malvolio is trapped, they can turn any of his answers against him as proofs of his madness, offering a question or remark which he grasps as real and then withdrawing it as illusory:

Clown What is the opinion of Pythagoras concerning wild fowl?
Malvolio That the soul of our grandam might haply inhabit a bird.
Clown What think'st thou of his opinion?
Malvolio I think nobly of the soul, and no way approve his opinion.
Clown Fare thee well. Remain thou still in darkness: thou shalt hold th' opinion of Pythagoras ere I will allow of thy wits.

Malvolio cannot win: whatever answers he advances will be absorbed, neutralised and turned against themselves by the rules of the illusion. It is his word against the Clown's, and because the Clown controls the conventions of the game Malvolio will always lose:

Malvolio I am not mad, Sir Topas. I say to you this house is dark.
Clown Madman, thou errest. I say there is no darkness but ignorance; in which thou art more puzzled than the Egyptians in their fog.
Malvolio I say this house is as dark as ignorance, though ignorance were as dark as hell …

Within the framework of an illusion which has carefully excluded real fact, truth is a matter of who can destroy the other linguistically. The Clown frames his questions to create 'double-bind' situations for Malvolio, blocking off certain aspects of reality and loading his language to produce the replies he wants:

But tell me true, are you not mad indeed, or do you but counterfeit?

The possibility that Malvolio is neither mad nor counterfeiting but sane and ill-treated is carefully excluded from the question; whatever Malvolio replies can then be used to his detriment. When Malvolio attempts to prove his sanity by comparison with the Clown's—'I am as well in my wits, fool, as thou art'—the Clown, by exploiting the ambiguity of 'fool', as both a social title and a character-description, denies his own sanity and therefore Malvolio's: 'Then you are mad indeed, if you be no better in your wits than a fool'.

Illusion, then, both defines a man falsely and negates as false any criterion beyond itself to which appeal can be made: it is a kind of language which, by collapsing and controlling reality within itself, can adjust it endlessly for its own purposes. Illusion and language create a structure whose roles operate to control, not only the experience within the structure, but any possible experience outside it. By setting up the language and the illusion in a particular way, all experience is controllable and any assault on the structure can be deflected, as Malvolio's answers are deflected and distorted. Language, money, illusion, are only parts of reality, but parts which can encompass and regulate the whole.

Just as, in A Midsummer Night's Dream, Titania, herself an illusion, is trapped by Oberon into the further illusion of loving Bottom, so in this play Andrew Aguecheek, who helps Belch to ensnare Malvolio, becomes himself the victim of a Belch-created illusion, when he is induced to duel with Viola. Belch's manipulation of the duel is a striking instance of illusion creating reality: by mediating illusory information about each other to Viola and Aguecheek, Belch creates a situation in which each of the duellers thinks himself unwilling and the other willing to fight. The supposed mediator is in fact the creator and controller of the event: by deluding each character about the other, Belch can make something from nothing, fashioning a positive—a fight—from two negatives. By falsely defining each character to the other, Belch induces each to fight under the sway of this false image; by pretending to take his own created illusion as a real drama in which he is a minor participant, he produces a positive quarrel which is also a negation, one without cause or substance. In Viola's case, the illusion of the duel is simply a further illusion into which her original illusion of disguise has led her:
it interlocks with the illusion brought about by the confusion of her with her brother Sebastian. In Aguecheek's case, the duel serves to expose the disparity evident throughout the play between his language and action, his real condition and his illusions about it:

… besides that he's a fool, he's a great quarreller; and but that he hath the gift of a coward to allay the gusts he hath in quarrelling, 'tis thought among the prudent he would quickly have the gift of a grave.

Aguecheek's language and action are mutually cancelling: he is a contradictory embodiment of language and action, and the point of the duel is to bring him to recognition of this reality. Sir Toby persuades him first that language is an adequate substitute for reality:

… so soon as ever thou seest him, draw; and as thou draw'st, swear horrible; for it comes to pass off that a terrible oath, with a swaggering accent sharply twang'd off, gives manhood more approbation than ever proof itself would have earn'd him.

(3,4)

By creating this illusion, he can draw Aguecheek into the further falsity of the duel, a real action which reveals his negativity.

The positions of Belch and the Clown in this general confusion of reality and illusion, false role and language, are especially significant. Belch refuses all limit, all definition:

Maria … you must confine yourself within the modest limits of order.
Sir Toby Confine! I'll confine myself no finer than I am.

(1,3)

His rejection of definition is a refusal of external limit, of imposed convention; in a play where false versions of identity are being continually offered, he escapes relatively unscathed, defining others rather than suffering definition. Yet his rejection of restraint is not made in terms of an absolute freedom to become all, to appropriate all roles and experiences; it is made simply in terms of a freedom to be himself, to live within his own limits, confining himself to precisely what he is. His presentation in terms of physical sensuality, of the body, underlines this fact: like Falstaff, his overriding of social order springs from an achieved stasis, a bodily fullness which breaks order not by reaching beyond it but by ignoring it in favour of a stolid self-containment, by falling below rather than above it.

The Clown is in some senses the opposite of Belch, in some ways a parallel figure: they are positively related as polarities. The Clown, like Puck, is roleless, a negative, disembodied presence within and yet beyond the conventions of human community, all-licensed and thus a limitless nothing, a merely linguistic mode of existence, fast-talking but inactive. He is beyond community-rules because he questions all codes, all definitions, dissolving them into the paradox and contradiction of his free, fluid speech; yet he is also within the community because this negativity is sanctioned by the social role of Clown. Like Puck, his role is to be roleless; his positive and defined function in society is to criticise all function, all positivity. Olivia's rebuke to Malvolio, whom the Clown's wit offends, suggests the degree to which the fooling is sanctioned:

There is no slander in an allow'd fool, though he do nothing but rail; nor no railing in a known discreet man, though he do nothing but reprove.

(1,5)

The emphasis here is on 'allow'd' and 'known': once it is recognised that the fool's formal function is to rail—that he draws positive identity from this negativity—he can be tolerated: his social role both lends him defined reality and, by containing his wit, neutralises it to the level of play, of illusion. The Clown is himself aware of this process, as his ambivalent use of the word 'fool' signifies. As we have seen already in his taunting of Malvolio, the Clown creates paradox by using the word in two senses, as professional occupation and character-judgement:

Olivia Take the fool away.
Clown Do you not hear, fellows? Take away the lady … The lady bade take away the fool; therefore, I say again, take her away.                                            (1,5)

The Clown goes on to justify 'fool' as a judgement on Olivia, thus validating his reversal of her command. He dissolves the defined status of 'fool'—the social meaning—into the reality of human foolishness, thus showing the social status to be illusory—he, the Fool, has wisely revealed foolishness in what seemed reality—and therefore ironically exposing his own (illusory) role as more real than reality itself.

The truth implicit in his word-play is that to be a Clown is to be simultaneously real and illusory, positive and negative. The Clown is a 'corrupter of words' and as such the supreme focus of society's unreality, reflecting it back to them: he is thus both more real than others, disclosing what is ultimately true of them, and less real, since his own foolery is the function of an arbitrary social role before it is a genuine personal characteristic. He exists in so far as he is 'allow'd', as Fool, by society, given a social function which, because the negation of all function, is self-cancelling and illusory. Yet he is more real than others because consciously a fool, adopting this negative role with grim and positive realism:

Those wits that think they have (wit) do very oft prove fools; and I that am sure I lack thee may pass for a wise man.

(1,5)

Viola recognises this truth also:
This fellow is wise enough to play the fool;
And to do that well craves a kind of wit …
This is a practice
As full of labour as a wise man's art;
For folly that he wisely shows is fit;
But wise men, folly-fall'n, quite taint their wit.

The Clown is therefore more real than Orsino and Olivia, who are fools without knowing it; he is a good actor who, like Viola herself, consciously adopts an illusory role and remains undeceived by his own acting. The Fool is thus wiser than the fool: the more of a fool he is, the better Fool he makes and thus the less foolish he becomes, the more he fulfils a particular, settled definition without overreaching it into absurdity. The greater his clowning, and thus his illusion, the more real a man he becomes. The Clown, unlike Macbeth and Malvolio, can combine a complete social definition with complete freedom: total linguistic liberty is the constitutive element of his sanctioned role. He fuses the self-containment of Olivia and Orsino with the self-squandering liberty of Sir Toby Belch, achieving that synthesis which is implicit in the ideal (rather than, in this play, the reality) of the steward, who preserves and dispenses in careful balance. The Clown's sanity—his reality—springs from the fact that he fulfils a settled role consistently, and it is the lack of such consistency in the play as a whole which suggests that illusion and insanity are general conditions. Consistent role-playing allows conjunction and communication, a reciprocal confirmation of identity and thus of sanity; inconsistent role-playing creates insanity, unreality, as the general confusion of identities at the end of the play suggests. In this situation, the Clown's ironic self-awareness, his insight into the confusion, is a negative mode of sanity.

In the whole action of the play, then, illusion, role and language connect into a single pattern. The switching and interchange of human roles is a kind of living pun and metaphor, a blurring of the symbols through which reality is expressed in a way which casts radical doubt on the consistency of that reality. Hamlet's advice to the Players, to suit the action to the word and the word to the action, cannot be sustained: language overwhelms and manipulates action, draining reality until it finds itself in danger of collapsing into nothing under the weight of its own excess. If language is in this sense articulate unreality, social role shares the same quality: they, too, define reality falsely, detaching themselves from the real purposes they were fashioned to sustain into a self-contained realm of illusion where they set up relations between themselves in isolation from real experience, thwarting and obscuring it. The final irony, as in A Midsummer Night's Dream, is that this whole process occurs within a play which is itself, as the subtitle suggests, a kind of illusion, a momentary sport; when Fabian remarks that he would condemn Malvolio's behaviour as 'an improbable fiction' if he were to see it on stage, the play pauses to reflect on its own illusory nature, becoming for a moment less real than the characters it presents. When Viola confronts Olivia with Orsino's love, the effect, once the illusion of the whole play is held in mind, is one of an overlapping series of un-realities: Viola, an actor playing an actor playing an actor, presents the case of one actor playing an actor to another actor playing an actor. The relations of illusion and reality touch a peak of complexity which is equalled only later, in some of the mature tragedies.

Notes

1 c.f. Falstaff in Henry IV Part II: 'A good wit will make use of anything. I will turn diseases to commodity.' (1, 22).

2 c.f. the Clown's own connection between language and money when he remarks that words have been disgraced by bonds. C.f. also the quarrel between Antonio and Sebastian in Act 3 Scene 4, which is created and controlled by money: the purse which Antonio gave to Sebastian as a symbol of trust and friendship.
becomes humanly divisive, as (from Antonio's mistaken viewpoint) the 'purse-bearer', the servant, becomes the master, overstepping his role.

3 This interchange of animate and inanimate occurs in several minor images in the play. Physical objects are themselves symbolic—they have meaning, like signs, only in terms of what they do—but can be endowed with a constant human existence: Belch wishes that his boots should 'hang themselves in their own straps' (1, 3), Malvolio, at the moment he is endowing the symbolic shapes of written language with life, begs leave of the wax of the letter for breaking it.

4 c.f. also the exchange between Fabian and the Clown, Act 5 Scene 1:

   Fabian Now, as thouo lov'st me, let me see his letter.
   Clown Good Master Fabian, grant me another request.
   Fabian Anything.
   Clown Do not desire to see this letter.
   Fabian This is to give a dog, and in recompense desire my dog again.

The Clown frames his remark so that Fabian cancels out his own request: Fabian's generosity is turned against itself, by the Clown's verbal dexterity.

5 c.f. the Clown, Act 5 Scene 1: 'Marry, sir, (my friends) praise me and make an ass of me. Now my foes tell me plainly I am an ass; so that by my foes, sir, I profit in the knowledge of myself, and by my friends I am abused; so that, conclusions to be as kisses, if your four negatives make your two affirmatives, why then, (I am) the worse for my friends and the better for my foes.' Negative criticism induces by negation positive self-awareness.

SOURCE: "Shakespeare and Parmenides: Metaphysics of Twelfth Night," in Studies in English Literature,

[In the following excerpt, King focuses on the character of Feste, comparing his ambiguous comments to those made by the sixth-century Greek philosopher Parmenides regarding "what is " and "what is not. "]

Recurrent themes are by now such a recognized feature of Shakespearian drama that we are perhaps in danger of underrating them. And when one begins to reconsider Shakespeare's use of the most recurrent theme of them all, the contrast between the ideal and the real (between what the mind comprehends discursively or intuitively and what it apprehends by means of the senses), this caveat seems especially apropos. For everyone knows that Shakespeare manipulates this theme in play after play throughout his career, and it all begins to seem tediously old hat. One recollects the casket scene in The Merchant of Venice, the mirror scene in Richard II, and Falstaff's homily on honor in / Henry IV. One thinks of Hamlet's bitter awareness of the discrepancy between what ought to be and what is (or appears to be), and of Lear's anguished realization that the ethics of quality (what ought to be) must not be confused with any plausible ethics of quantity (what appears to be or may be in a material sense). And one recalls the obvious differences between appearance and reality in the comedies, differences that ultimately take on the resonance of symbols: the mistaken identities in The Comedy of Errors, the costume and sex disguise of Julia in The Two Gentlemen of Verona, and the misunderstandings that crop up in Much Ado About Nothing because at crucial moments different characters fail to see or hear distinctly.
Now a metaphysical view of things is at least implicit in all these scenes and situations, a metaphysic that is easier to get at, if not easy to define in any definitive way, in the tragedies. Lear, for instance, asks Edgar at a focal point in the play, "What is the cause of thunder?" (III.iv.160)—a question that remains unanswered, but implies a metaphysical force, or being, or what you will, that is responsible for both the physical and the moral universe. And Hamlet can return to the traditional Christian view that "there's a divinity that shapes our ends" and that "there's a special providence in the fall of a sparrow" (V.ii.10, 230-231). Even Coriolanus perceives at last that "nature" cannot be denied or made other than it is and that no man is "author of himself (V.iii.25, 36).

But in which of the comedies are the metaphysical aspects of Shakespeare's near obsession with the antithesis between appearance and reality explored with any acuity? Perhaps in As You Like It, where the kaleidoscopic shifts from one possible center of values to another and the modification of values as episode comments upon preceding episode suggest a possible relativistic view of human experience. Or perhaps in Much Ado, where in the church scene the difference between what seems to be and what is receives a steady analytical treatment. But more profoundly in Twelfth Night with its riddling sub-title, What You Will, and its holiday atmosphere that prompts commonsensical discrimination between the worlds of moral order and misrule, between the excess traditionally permissible to the Christmas season and the relaxed return to decorum with the arrival of Epiphany. In no other comedy of Shakespeare is delusion, self-induced or attributable to blameless misapprehension, so central, and in no other comedy is attention so consistently directed toward the ambiguities that play between "what is" and "what is not."

Yet even if this be so, what character in Twelfth Night is reflective enough to grapple with the contradictions inherent in the relationship of "seeming" to "being?" Viola will not do. Though intelligent enough to be attracted to the professional raillery of Feste, she is too much a part of the illusion that characterizes Illyria and too dependent upon the "whirligig of time" and its revenges to probe very far beneath the surface. There is only Feste, the one figure in all the comedies with a true gift for Socratic irony, and Socratic enough to know that he knows nothing: "Those wits that think they have thee [i.e., wit] do very oft prove fools; and I that am sure I lack thee may pass for a wise man" (I.v.36-38). And it is Feste who reappears as the Fool in Lear and sings another stanza to the nostalgic song, that elusive blend of sense and nonsense, with which Twelfth Night dissolves into conclusion.
